1. It is alleged that the verdict is contrary to law and without evidence to support it. While the evidence was circumstantial, it was very strong, well connected, and pointed with almost unerring certainty to the guilt of the accused. The larceny of the cow described in the bill of indictment was so clearly shown as to admit of no doubt. It was shown on the part of the state that the defendant was seen driving a cow, answering in all respects to the description of the stolen animal, from the direction of the place where she must have been stolen, and towards his slaughter pen. In addition, it was further shown that the hide and horns of the stolen cow were found at the slaughter pen of the accused within a short time after he was seen driving the cow. Other circumstances tended to strengthen the chain of evidence, which excluded every other hypothesis but that of the guilt of the defendant. The evidence fully warranted the verdict of guilty.

2. Another ground of the motion is that one of the jurors who qualified himself, and was sworn and acted on the trial of the case, was not, in truth and in fact, free from bias or prejudice against the defendant, and that the mind of this juror was not perfectly impartial between the state and the accused at the time when he qualified, and when, as a juror, he participated in the trial of the case and the return of the verdict, because the said juror, Parker, bore ill feeling against the defendant previous to the trial, and had openly stated and told one Strickland that the accused had stolen a cow from him in the year 1898, which prejudice and disqualification to serve as a juror were unknown to the accused and his counsel at the time he was accepted and sworn as a juror. This ground of the motion is supported by the affidavit of Strickland alone, and the question whether Parker was disqualified was left to be determined by the trial judge on this affidavit. He decided against the existence of the disqualification, and in doing so was amply supported, under the rule heretofore laid down by this court, which is, that after verdict, to disqualify a juror who tried the case, and who swore that he had not formed and expressed an opinion, and had no bias or prejudice, and was perfectly impartial, there should be the affidavit at least of two witnesses, or that which is the equivalent thereof, against such oath of the juror; otherwise, it is but oath against oath.

and the verdict will not be set aside on the ground of the incompetency of the juror. Hudgins v. State, 61 Ga. 182; Fogarty v. State, 80 Ga. 464, 5 S. E. 782. See, also, Hackett v. State, 108 Ga. 40, 33 S. E. 842. There was no error, therefore, in overruling the motion for new trial on this ground.

3. Error is alleged to that part of the charge which was given to the jury in the following language: "Among the other circumstances which the state claims that it has proved in this case, it contends that this defendant was found in the possession of the hide and horns of the animal alleged to have been stolen, and they have introduced in evidence what they contend is the hide and horns of cow alleged to have been stolen. The court charges you in reference to them that recent possession of a thing alleged to have been stolen may be considered by you along with other evidence in the case; but, before you would be authorized to consider such recent possession as an inculpating circumstance against the defendant, it would be necessary for you to find that the thing alleged to have been stolen was so recently in his possession immediately after the theft was alleged to have been committed, and was in his possession with his knowledge and consent." Among the objections urged to this charge, one is that it directed the jury that they might consider, as a circumstance of guilt, the recent possession of a thing alleged to have been stolen, whereas they should have been instructed that they might consider such possession of stolen property as a circumstance of guilt. It is freely conceded that the word "alleged," as used in the latter part of this charge, was not happy. This court, in the case of Brooks v. State, 96 Ga. 353, 23 S. E. 413, called attention to a well-recognized principle, when it said that no presumption of guilt arises from the mere possession by the accused of goods alleged to have been stolen from the premises at the time of the commission of a burglary, unless the goods were shown to have been in fact stolen therefrom, and the accused is found recently thereafter in the possession of them. In such a case two things must concur: It must be shown that at the time the alleged burglary was committed the goods were taken from the house which was broken, and it must be shown that recently thereafter they were found in the possession of the defendant. It is not the recent possession of goods that might have been in the storehouse, but the recent possession of goods shown to have been stolen therefrom at the time the burglary was committed, which affords the presumption upon which the guilt of the possessor of the stolen goods may be inferred. It was alleged in the bill of indictment in the present case that the accused stole a certain described cow. He denied the charge. It was therefore incumbent upon the state to prove by satisfactory evidence, as a starting point in its case, the fact that the cow was stolen. This fact was made to appear very clearly by the evidence, even if it was a contested fact during the trial of the case. The truth of the allegation that he stole the cow was the only point that he strenuously contested. The language of the charge may be open to the criticism that, by implication, the judge meant to convey to the jury the idea that they might consider the fact that a larceny was alleged, and the fact that the accused was in recent possession of property alleged to have been stolen, as an inculpating circumstance against him. It is to be noted, however, that the judge did not affirmatively say they might do this. What he did tell the jury was that they could not consider these things against the accused unless the possession was recent. It is evident that recent possession was the idea most prominent in the mind of the judge at the time the charge was given, and that his real purpose was to caution the jury that unless the possession was recent the fact of possession could not count against the accused. The evidence being conclusive that a larceny was committed by some one, we do not think that the jury could have been misled by the use of the word "alleged," in the concluding portion of the extract from the charge of which complaint was made, and therefore think that this inaccuracy should not be held as ground for a new trial.

4. After a careful examination of the other grounds of the motion, we are of the opinion that the court did not err in the admission of evidence as to which complaint is made, nor in his charge or failure to charge as set out in the other grounds of the motion. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

GEORGIA RAILROAD & BANKING CO. v. POUNDS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1900.)

RAILROADS—KILLING STOCK—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

There being some conflict in the evidence as to whether the engineer on the locomotive which struck and killed the cow "exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence" to prevent striking the animal, and the jury having returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the proven value of the cow, there was no error committed in overruling the certiorari.

FI. FA. FROM JUSTICE—RETURN—LEVY ON LAND.

An entry by a constable upon a fi. fa. issued from a justice's court in the following language: "I know of no personal property in the possession of the defendant on which to levy this fi. fa.,"—is not such a compliance with section 4167 of the Civil Code as will authorize a constable to levy the execution upon land.

E. S. & G. D. Griffith, for plaintiff in error. Price Edwards, for defendants in error.

FISH, J. C. C. Eaves brought his action against J. F. Garner, J. G. Weaver, and B. F. Morgan for damages which he alleged he had sustained by reason of the defendants having entered upon his land and cut and carried away certain timber. Upon the trial, to prove his title to the land, plaintiff offered in evidence a sheriff's deed thereto, made in pursuance of a sale under an execution issued from a justice's court. He also offered in evidence a copy of such execution, with the entries thereon; the original having been lost. The following entry appeared on the copy fi. fa.: "I know of no personal property in the possession of the defendant on which to levy this fi. fa. This 14th day of February, 1848. James S. Tribie, Cons." The court excluded the copy fi. fa., and the plaintiff excepted.

Section 4167 of the Civil Code, which is a codification of the act of 1811, provides that "no constable shall levy on any land unless there is no personal property to be found sufficient to satisfy the debt, which fact must appear by an entry on the execution, to be levied by a constable of the county where such execution was issued, or where the property to be levied upon may be found." The entry of the constable upon the fi. fa. in this case did not comply with this section of the Code. Instead of an entry of "no personal property to be found," which seems to imply that the constable should make some search for such property, he made an entry that he knew of no personal property in the possession of the defendant on which to levy the fi. fa. The defendant may have owned sufficient personalty to have satisfied the execution, which at the time of this entry was in possession of some one else, and the constable may have known this fact, and yet his entry would have been true. There was no error, therefore, in sustaining the objection to the introduction of the fi. fa. in evidence. There seems to have been no objection to sheriff's deed going in evidence; but, as the plaintiff offered no other evidence, the court did not err in granting a nonsuit. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

MORSE v. LOWE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1900.)

CONTINUANCE—ABSENCE OF PARTY.

Where, upon a motion for a continuance made in behalf of a claimant, it appeared that the claimant was providentially prevented from attending the trial, and the claimant's counsel stated, in his place, that he could not go safely to trial without the presence of his client, and no counter showing was made, it was erroneous to overrule the motion, although the entry, "Continued for sickness of claimant's family," had been made upon the docket at a previous term.

Claim case between J. A. Morse and William Lowe. Judgment for defendant. Claimant brings error. Reversed.

W. A. James, for plaintiff in error. J. S. James, for defendant in error.

FISH, J. This is a claim case. When it was called for trial in the court below, counsel for claimant made a motion for a continuance, upon the ground that the claimant was sick and unable to attend court; the counsel stating, in his place, that he could not go safely to trial without her presence, and that he needed her as a witness. The proof submitted in support of this motion was the affidavit of a physician and the testimony of the claimant's father. The physician testified that the claimant was ill, and would not be able to leave her home within the next two or three weeks, and that it would be impossible for her to attend court during that period of time. The claimant's father testified that she was sick, was wholly unable to attend court, and was under the treatment of a physician. No counter showing was made. The court overruled the motion, the case proceeded to trial, and there was a verdict finding the property levied upon subject. The claimant made a motion for a new trial, one of the grounds of which was that the court erred in overruling the motion for a continuance. The motion for a new trial being overruled, the claimant excepted.

There was no continuance charged against the claimant on the docket, unless the entry, "Continued for sickness of claimant's family, Nov. term, 96," can be so considered; but, as "continuances for providential causes are not to be charged against either party" (Printup v. Mitchell, 19 Ga. 587), this entry is to be considered, not as a charge of a continuance against the claimant, but as merely giving the reason for a general continuance of the case. So the question whether the claimant's continuances were exhausted does not arise. Counsel for claimant made a complete showing for a continuance. He proved that his client was confined at home by illness, and unable on that account to attend court, and stated, in his place, that he was unable to go safely to trial without her presence. Nothing more was needed. Civ. Code, § 5131;

Connel v. Sharpe, 82 Ga. 443; Mathews v. Willoughby, 85 Ga. 289, 11 S. E. 620. The law required a continuance, under the showing made, and it was, therefore, error to refuse it. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

BRANNON v. BARNES, Sheriff.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1900.)

EXECUTION—LEVY—CLAIM—FAILURE TO SELL—CONTEMPT—EVIDENCE.

1. If, after a levy is made by a sheriff or other officer, a claim is interposed to the property, it is the duty of such officer to transmit the execution, with his entries thereon, to the court from which it issued, together with the claim papers. Code, § 4621. If he fails so to do, the officer may be compelled by rule to so transmit such papers. Cottle v. Dodson, 25 Ga. 633; Brannan v. Cheek, 29 S. E. 937, 103 Ga. 354.

2. While a sheriff, under the provisions of the Code, is liable to be attached as for a contempt for neglecting to sell property upon which he has made a levy, the measure of such liability is the actual injury which the plaintiff has sustained by reason of such failure; and it is, therefore, competent for a sheriff, in defense to a rule brought against him for such neglect, to show that the property levied on was not subject to the execution. Wilkin v. Mortgage Co., 82 S. E. 135, 106 Ga. 182.

3. There was no error in the rulings of the court of which complaint is made.

DAVIS v. MIMS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1900.)

ACTION ON NOTE—BONA FIDE HOLDER.

This case turned upon two questions of fact, viz.: (1) Whether or not the plaintiff took the promissory notes upon which his action was based with notice of the equities between the original parties; and (2) whether or not the consideration of these notes had failed. It being essential to the lawfulness of a general finding for the defendant that the first of these questions should be properly resolved in the affirmative, and there being no evidence to warrant the jury in so doing, the verdict against the plaintiff was contrary to law, and the trial judge erred in not setting it aside.

Action by Bluthenthal & Bickart against S. S. Moore. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Slaton & Phillips, for plaintiffs in error. R. J. Jordan, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. It appears that Bluthenthal & Bickart filed a petition against Watkins and Moore, in which they alleged that plaintiffs had held a claim against Harp, secured by a mortgage on his stock of goods and fixtures; that they had foreclosed their mortgage, when Watkins purchased Harp's interest; that Watkins could not open the store on account of the foreclosure of the mortgage; that Moore orally "agreed with petitioners that if they would accept from said Watkins certain promissory notes in lieu of the mortgage which had been given them by said Harp on said property, and which was a superior lien thereon, and would release the foreclosure, and allow said Watkins to get possession of said property and dispose of the same free from the incumbrance of petitioners, he, the said S. S. Moore, would guaranty that the notes to be given by said Watkins would be promptly paid at maturity"; that the petitioners, acting on this promise and guaranty of Moore, accepted from Watkins the promissory notes, allowed him "to go in possession of the property, and relieved said property of the foreclosure of their mortgage." They prayed judgment against Moore and Watkins. Moore demurred to the petition on the ground that the agreement on his part was an oral promise to answer for the debt or default of another, and was therefore within the statute of frauds, and not enforceable. The court sustained this demurrer, and the plaintiffs excepted.

We think this judgment was clearly right.

While the petition alleges that Moore agreed to "guaranty" the payment of the notes of Watkins, we think that his liability, even if the promise had been in writing, would have been that of a surety, and not of a guarantor; for the consideration of his promise was not a benefit flowing to him, but to the principal debtor. Civ. Code, § 2966. As a surety, the oral promise did not bind him; nor was the undertaking of Moore an original one, which would bind him without its being in writing. The undertaking of Watkins to pay Harp's debt (Harp being discharged, and Watkins receiving the goods freed of the creditor's mortgage) was an original promise, and would have been binding although it had been oral. But the petition shows that Watkins assumed this debt in writing, by giving his promissory notes, and that Moore simply agreed to see that these notes were paid; the consideration for Moore's promise being the same as that of the notes, and not flowing as a benefit to him. No court, so far as we have been able to ascertain, has ever held that such a promise is an original one. It was claimed by counsel for the plaintiffs in error that Moore was liable because his promise came within the exception to the statute of frauds which was made by the act of February 20, 1854 (Acts 1853–54, p. 58). That act provided that the fourth section of the statute of frauds should not operate "in cases where there has been a performance of the agreement either in whole or in part." We would call attention to the fact, apparently overlooked by counsel, that the act was expressly repealed by the act of February 16, 1856 (Acts 1855–56, p. 240). It is true, the marginal annotation of the latter act indicates differently, but the annotation is erroneous. The provisions of the repealed act were, however, to some extent, adopted in the Code. Section 2694 of the Civil Code provides that the statute of frauds shall not extend to cases "where there has been performance on one side, accepted by the other in accordance with the contract," or "where there has been such part performance of the contract as would render it a fraud of the party refusing to comply if the court did not compel a performance." In the present case the plaintiffs have performed their part of the contract, but the acceptance has been by Watkins, and not by Moore; and this section of the Code, if applicable at all to this class of cases, does not apply to Moore, but would have applied to Watkins had his promise been oral. Counsel relied in the argument on the case of English v. Richards Co. (Ga.) 34 S. E. 1002. Even a cursory reading of the facts of that case will show that it is quite different from the present one. English and Venable operated two soda founts near the one owned by the plaintiff. The plaintiff's fount had been leased to Shropshire & Colyer. English and Venable agreed with plaintiff that if he would have his lessees surrender their lease, and would rent the fount to Williams, who was to run it in another neighborhood, and away from their founts, they would pay the rent, amounting to a certain sum, due by the lessees. This court held that the performance of this contract by the plaintiff was such performance as would make English and Venable liable for the rent which had been due by the lessees. The plaintiff had performed his part of the agreement, and it had been accepted by English and Venable, they being benefited by the removal of the fount to another locality. Further than this, they had assumed the debt of the lessees as part of the consideration of the contract. In the case now under consideration there was no acceptance on the part of Moore, nor did he receive any benefit, advantage, or consideration, and we cannot see how the principle of the above Code section can be applied to him. He simply promised, in consideration of credit given to his principal, to pay the debt in the event his principal failed to do so, and this is the very class of contracts which are by the statute required to be in writing in order to be binding on the promisor. We therefore think the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the petition. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

NATIONAL SURETY CO. OF NEW YORK v. MORRIS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1900.)

GUARDIAN'S BOND—RELIEF OF SURETY—APPLICATION.

1. A surety on a guardian's bond may, under the provisions of section 2533 of the Civil Code, base an application "to be relieved as surety" upon reasons other than such as relate to the "misconduct of his principal in the discharge of his trust."

2. As the application in the present case not only alleged against the guardian an act amounting to such misconduct, but also set forth facts showing that he was not in all respects a proper person to be intrusted with the management of his wards' estate, the demurrer to the application was not well taken.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Application by the National Surety Company of New York for discharge from the bond of N. A. Morris, guardian. Demurrer to the application sustained. Judgment affirmed on certiorari, and the surety company brings error. Reversed.

Smith, Hammond & Smith, for plaintiff in error. J. T. Pendleton, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. Section 2533 of the Civil Code declares: "The surety of any guardian on his bond, or, if dead, his representative, may at any time make complaint to the ordinary of any misconduct of his principal in the discharge of his trust, or for any other reason show his desire to be relieved as surety. Thereupon the ordinary shall cite the guardian to appear at a regular term of the court and show cause why such surety shall not be discharged." The words, "any misconduct of his principal in the discharge of his trust," are obviously exhaustive of all acts, whether of commission or omission, which pertain to the guardian's mismanagement of the estate or the nonperformance of any of the duties devolving upon him in his office. It follows that the words, "any other reason" which the surety may allege as constituting the basis of "his desire to be relieved" from the bond, must relate to some ground or grounds of relief not ejusdem generis with those which arise from the guardian's official misconduct. Want of personal integrity, lack of business capacity, extravagant or reckless living, indulgence in vicious or immoral habits, criminality, and scores of other things which might be suggested, would certainly afford good reasons for a "desire to be relieved as surety." The National Surety Company applied to the ordinary of Fulton county for a discharge from the bond of N. A. Morris as guardian of Gertrude and John Cooper, minors, and subsequently amended its application. The guardian filed a demurrer, containing both general and special grounds, which was sustained by the ordinary. On certiorari his judgment was affirmed.

Both the application and the amendment contain averments which are too loose and general to be treated as making any distinct charges against the guardian, and which, therefore, will not be noticed here; but some of the allegations are, as against the demurrer which was filed, sufficiently full and clear. They are, in substance: (1) That he refused to comply with a judgment allowing his wards specified sums per month out of the corpus of the estate in his hands; (2) that he had been convicted of a misdemeanor in the superior court of Cobb county; (3) that he had committed the offense of barratry as defined in section 326 of the Penal Code; and (4) that he had bought votes and used whisky to procure his election to a political office. The first of these charges related to misconduct in the management of the wards' estate. It was met by so much of the demurrer as was general, and by a feature thereof which was "speaking" in its character. Presumably, the judgment which the guardian refused to obey was rendered by the court of ordinary, though the application did not in terms so allege. The demurrer, instead of making the point that it failed to do so, alleges, in effect, that the judgment was rendered by that court, but that the guardian had entered an appeal from it. This allegation cannot, of course, be considered. So the application as it stands in substance charges the guardian with willfully disobeying a judgment with the terms of which he ought to comply; and this, if true, would be misconduct in the discharge of his trust. As to the remaining charges, we think they afford excellent reasons for the surety to "desire" to be relieved, and for retaining the application in court. If these charges are established, they are sufficient to show that the guardian is not a suitable man to manage the estate. Under such circumstances, a surety is not bound to wait till he becomes liable for actual waste or mismanagement. He may reasonably anticipate the same, and move for relief in time to get relief. It is true that the demurrer does specially raise the point that some of the charges made against the guardian are based on acts which occurred before the bond was signed. This fact, of itself alone, would not defeat the right of the surety to be discharged, however; certainly not, if it assumed liability upon the guardian's bond in ignorance of such previous acts on his part. Nothing alleged in the application warrants an inference to the contrary. It was, doubtless, open to special demurrer, in that it did not undertake to state what was the real truth in this regard; but no such point was presented. One who becomes surety for a guardian under the belief that he is in all respects a suitable man for executing the trust has the very best of reasons for desiring to be released from liability on the bond when he learns that his principal is not such a man. We must not be understood as intimating any opinion as to the real merits of this controversy. We are simply dealing with allegations which, on demurrer, must be taken as true.

Having dealt with every question thereby raised which was argued before us, our conclusion is that the demurrer should have been overruled. It will, of course, be incumbent on the company to prove its charge against the guardian. The superior court ought to have sustained the certiorari, and remanded the case, in order that the surety might have an opportunity so to do. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

GEORGIA R. CO. v. GOUEDY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1900.)

ACTION FOR SERVICES—DEFENSES—RECEIPT IN FULL.

1. In a suit by an employé against a railroad company for the balance of his wages, the company cannot legally defend by showing that the plaintiff had made a mistake whereby the company had suffered loss, which had been charged to an agent who was his superior, and under whom he was employed, and that in order to reimburse that agent it had stopped the wages of the plaintiff; such a course not being authorized by any rule of the company known to the employé, or agreed to by him.

2. The fact that the employé, when he received a part of his wages, gave a receipt in full for all demands, does not estop him to claim the balance, when it appears that he at the time protested against the "stoppage" of a portion of his wages.

3. It does not appear that the court committed error in any of the charges complained of, in refusing to charge as requested, or in the admission or exclusion of evidence, and the evidence fully warranted the verdict.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Action by J. H. Gouedy against the Georgia Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming and Alexander & Lambdin, for plaintiff in error. T. J. Ripley, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. A merchant in Union, S. C., ordered a car load of corn from a dealer in Nashville, Tenn. It was shipped from Nashville, and arrived in Atlanta, Ga., to be forwarded by the Georgia Railroad Company to Union. Werner was the local agent of the company in Atlanta. Gouedy was employed by the company as Werner's billing clerk, and charged with the duty of rebilling cars of this description to their destinations. In rebilling this particular car, Gouedy marked it for Marion, S. C. When it arrived at that place there was no consignee to receive it. It was finally traced and sent to Union, its original destination, but the consignee refused to accept it because of the delay in delivery. The car was then sent to Greenville, S. C., and sold by the railroad company at a loss. The amount of the loss on the corn, and the additional freight charges incurred by reason of the error in shipping, were divided among the various railroad companies over whose lines the corn had passed, the amount assessed against the Georgia Railroad Company being $58.90. This amount the company charged to the local agent, Werner, whom it held responsible. He, in turn, charged it to Gouedy, and when the paymaster came to Atlanta to pay off the employés of the company the payroll showed that $10 of Gouedy's wages had been marked as "stopped." Subsequently similar amounts were deducted from his wages, the amounts being given to Werner by the paymaster, until the amount of $58.90 had been deducted from Gouedy's wages on this account. Gouedy upon each occasion signed the payroll, thus receipting in full for all demands, but he protested to the paymaster against the deductions from his salary; assigning as his reasons that he had not been negligent in rebilling the car, because the destination of the car, as originally written, was as easily read "Marion," as "Union," and that he had never agreed for Werner to "stop" any part of his wages on account of this car. The paymaster replied that he had nothing to do with the matter; that Gouedy must appeal to the officials of the company; that, so far as he (the paymaster) was concerned, Gouedy must take the amount offered him, or else get nothing. Gouedy was finally dismissed, and brought suit in a justice's court for the balance due him on account of wages. The magistrate gave a judgment in his favor, and the company appealed to the superior court, where upon the trial the jury returned a verdict in his favor. A motion for a new trial was made and overruled, and the company excepted.

1. It was contended by the counsel for the plaintiff in error that by reason of the negligence of Gouedy, its servant, it lost $58.90, and that it had a right to deduct this amount from his wages. Even if the company had power to do this, the record discloses that it did not do so, but charged the loss to Werner, who was responsible, under the rules of the company, and then stopped Gouedy's wages simply for the purpose of reimbursing Werner. From the record it would appear that the company had been paid by Werner for the loss, and its action in withholding from Gouedy these various amounts made it a mere collecting agent for Werner. Gouedy had never been notified, either by Werner or by the company, that these amounts were to be deducted. He had never agreed that the deduction should be made; nor does the record disclose that there was any rule of the company, agreed to by Gouedy or known to him, authorizing such a procedure. If the company had adopted a rule or regulation to the effect that the amount of any loss occasioned by the negligence of an employé should be charged to him, and Gouedy had expressly agreed to the rule, the case might be different. Railway Co. v. Davis, 95 Ga. 298, 22 S. E. 833; Wood, Mast. & S. (2d Ed.) p. 186. But as no such rule was shown, and no agreement of Gouedy to such an arrangement, the company was clearly without authority to make the deduction. By the action taken, Gouedy was fined for negligence, without his having any opportunity to make defense, and, indeed, without his knowing anything of the charge of negligence imputed to him.

2. It was also contended that Gouedy, having signed a receipt in full for all of his wages, was estopped to claim the amount deducted therefrom. Receipts are always open to explanation, and, where one signs a receipt purporting to be for all due him, he can explain the circumstances under which he signed it, and if it appear that he did not receive all that was due him, but was forced to take what he did receive, or get nothing, the receipt does not estop him to claim the balance. It will be remembered that Gouedy did not direct the amount deducted to be paid to Werner, but protested against such a course. Of course, if he, at the time he signed the receipt, agreed that the company should pay the money to Werner, or if he, knowing all the facts, by signing the receipt tacitly directed the payment to Werner, he could not recover. The facts of this case, however, do not justify any such finding.

3. The above are the controlling questions in the case. There are many grounds in the motion for new trial,—complaint being made of charges of the court, of refusals to charge as requested, and of the admission and exclusion of evidence,—but they involve no new or important question not covered by what has been said above. After a careful consideration of them, we find no error, the trial judge having taken the view of the case indicated above. The evidence fully warranted the verdict, and it was not error to refuse to grant a new trial. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

SOUTHERN AGRICULTURAL WORKS v. FRANKLIN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1900.)

INJURY TO MINOR EMPLOYÉ—NEGLIGENCE OF SUPERINTENDENT—PLEADING.

1. Following the decision of this court in Cotton-Factory Co. v. Speer, 69 Ga. 137, which was approved and followed by a full bench in Augusta Factory v. Barnes, 72 Ga. 217, the general rule of law exempting a master from liability to one servant for the negligence of a co-employé does not apply to the case of a child who was injured or killed in consequence of the negligence of a superintendent under whose orders the child was at work, and which orders the child was bound to obey,—the more especially when the child was by its father hired to the common master of both the child and the superintendent to do a particular kind of work, which was not dangerous, and was by the superintendent, without the father's knowledge or consent, required to do other work, which was dangerous, and was in consequence injured or killed. (a) The foregoing disposes of the general demurrer filed in the present case.

2. The petition as amended set forth the plaintiff's cause of action with sufficient distinctness in all material particulars, and was good against the special grounds of the demurrer.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by R. B. Franklin against the Southern Agricultural Works. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Slaton & Phillips and D. W. Rountree, for plaintiff in error. Geo. L. Bell and C. P. Goree, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. R. V. Franklin brought suit in the city court of Atlanta against the Southern Agricultural Works, and, for cause of action, substantially alleged that: The defendant was a corporation having its principal office in the city of Atlanta. The defendant at the time of committing the grievances mentioned, to wit, on January 17, 1899, and for several months prior thereto, was the owner and operator of a certain manufactory, situate on Marietta street, in said city, used in manufacturing agricultural implements, and was then engaged in that business. It had a steam engine, producing steam power of great force and pressure, which was used to move and work machinery, gearing, and belting, which said machinery, gearing, and belting were used in manufacturing said agricultural implements. There were certain other machinery, gearing, and belting, to wit, a large shaft or axle, moving, and was in motion and was kept in motion by means of the steam engine. There were also other machinery, gearing, belting, shafts, cogwheels, and shearers, used in the manufacturing of said implements, and while in operation extremely dangerous. On January 2, 1899, defendant employed petitioner's son, George W. Franklin, as an employé and servant to do and perform certain work and labor for it in its manufactory, for hire, wages, and reward, to wit, to put plows on the bench to the grinders at the emery wheels in said manufactory. George W. Franklin was petitioner's son, and at the time of his employment was a minor of tender years, being at the time between 13 and 14 years of age, and, although small in size for his age, he was sound and healthy, and of a strong constitution, and was sober, industrious, etc. Petitioner hired his son to defendant to do the specific work mentioned, and the character thereof was not dangerous, and was not connected with any of the machinery in the manufactory; and the duties of his work did not require him to have anything to do with the machinery, or to be acquainted with or have any knowledge of it. Petitioner was well acquainted with the machinery in defendant's manufactory, and knew of its dangerous character. His son was wholly inexperienced and unacquainted with it and its operation, and, knowing this, petitioner only consented to hire him to do the specific work mentioned, and would not, under any consideration, and did not, consent for his son to work at, with, or about any of said machinery. Defendant changed the work in which he was employed up to January 17, 1899, and on that day, while he was engaged in the performance of the duties of his employment, the defendant withdrew him from the specific duties for which he was employed, and assigned him to other duties, not connected with or embraced within his special employment. He was ordered by Robert Quinn, the foreman of the shearers and punchers in said manufactory, to leave his said work and go to another room, where a shearer was located, which was a dangerous machine, connected by shaft, cogwheels, pulleys, and belting with the main axle or shaft and steam engine, and was wrongfully, carelessly, and negligently put to work by said foreman on said shearer and near said cogwheels, which were revolving with great force and velocity, being propelled by a powerful steam engine, without instructing him as to the danger of said machinery or how to work at the same, and while engaged at the said shearer, under the express order of said foreman, and having been at work at the same only a short time, the said George W. Franklin was, by the wrongful conduct and negligence of defendant, caught in said machinery between the cogwheels, whereby he was mortally wounded, from the effect of which he died. Robert Quinn, foreman, was authorized to hire and discharge employés for the defendant, and did on January 2, 1899, hire said George W. Franklin from petitioner to work for defendant at the specified work aforesaid. Said Franklin was working under Quinn, foreman, and it was his duty to obey the orders of Quinn, who was placed in authority over him by defendant. Petitioner was entitled to the earnings of his son from the date of his death to his majority, a period of 7 years and 21 days. At the time of his death his son was earning 35 cents a day, and his capacity to earn still more would have increased with his age; by reason of all of which he was damaged in a sum stated. To meet a special demurrer of defendant, plaintiff amended his petition by alleging that defendant was also guilty of negligence in putting his son, who was a minor of tender years and unacquainted with machinery and its operation, to work at, upon, and about said machinery. It then specified how he was hurt, while helping one Guerin change the blades on the shearer, in obedience to the order of Quinn, defendant's foreman; said machinery being provided with a loose pulley for stopping it and cogwheels in the room where Franklin was injured, without interfering with the operation of other machinery in other departments. The shearer was not in operation when Franklin was put to work at, upon, and about said machinery, and while he was working at, upon, and about it, and at the time he was injured, having been stopped by means of a clutch for that purpose; and said cogwheels were in close proximity to the shearer upon which Franklin was working, and were exceedingly dangerous, by reason of their close proximity to the shearer, and by reason of their revolving with great force; and it was defendant's duty to stop them from revolving before putting said minor son to work upon the machinery, yet defendant disregarded its duty, in that it did not stop the cogwheels from revolving, but put his son to work upon the machinery while the cogwheels were revolving with great force, which was negligence on defendant's part. Defendant was further guilty of negligence in putting his minor son to work upon said machinery without first having made it reasonably safe for him to work at, by boxing the cogwheels, which could have been done with ease, and at very little expense, and would have prevented the injuries aforesaid. It was defendant's duty to box its machinery, yet defendant disregarded its duty in this regard, and did not box the cogwheels and make the machinery reasonably safe, but put the minor to work upon it without making it safe by boxing the cogwheels or otherwise guarding them. By reason of the negligent conduct aforesaid the said Franklin was in some way, the precise manner of which is unknown to petitioner, caught between the cogwheels, and received the injuries aforesaid. To this petition the defendant demurred on various grounds, the special grounds of which were met by the amendment. The demurrer was overruled by the judge below, upon which judgment defendant assigns error.

1. The main contention which seems to be relied upon by counsel for plaintiff in error is that Quinn, the foreman of the shearers and punchers, was a fellow servant of the deceased, and that a workman engaged in the same establishment, and having superintendence over a few others, is not a vice principal. The general doctrine that a master is not liable for an injury of an employé resulting from the negligence of a fellow servant we do not think has any application to this case. Under previous decisions of this court, it has been definitely decided that this does not apply to the case of a child who is injured in consequence of the negligence of a superintendent under whose orders the child was at work, and which orders the child was obliged to obey. In the case of Cotton-Factory Co. v. Speer, 69 Ga. 137, the general principle was announced that the agent who represents the corporation as master over other employés occupies the position of the corporation, for such time, as to such subordinates; that the corporation is bound to appoint a skilled and prudent manager to such position, and is negligent if it employs an imprudent or incompetent person. This doctrine by that decision is especially applied to a case where the injured employé was a child, without access to the president or general superintendent, and who received his orders solely from the manager of the branch of the business in which he was engaged. It was further decided in that case that it made no difference that such subordinate manager violated the orders of his superior officer, in placing the employé in a position of danger; nor did it matter that at the time the entire factory where the injury occurred was under the general supervision of a watchman, and he had an altercation with the subordinate manager under whom the class of employés to which plaintiff belonged were at work. See the able opinion of Chief Justice Jackson on page 149. This case was approved by this court in Augusta Factory v. Barnes, 72 Ga. 228, where it was held that the defendant's agent, in the case of a minor employé, owed the child a higher degree of care and duty, which required its agents in authority over her to look after her safety while under its charge and engaged in the performance of her duties. The court then approves the ruling of this court in Cotton-Factory Co. v. Speer, 69 Ga. 137, and remarks that "we do not understand that there was anything in the opinion of Mr. Justice Crawford, who dissented from the majority, contravening this rule, so that to this extent the judgment may be considered unanimous." See, also, McIntyre v. Printing Co., 103 Ga. 288, 29 S. E. 923, where it appeared from the testimony that a child about 14 years of age was placed at work on a machine, and that she got her orders from one who was foreman in the room in which she worked, who told her to go to work on the machine. Justice Cobb, in his opinion, states: "Whether the character of the machine was such that the dangers in operating it were patent to a child of plaintiff's age and capacity, and whether she was guilty of negligence in the way in which she operated it, and thus brought her injuries upon herself, are questions which should have been submitted to a jury, under proper instructions from the court." We think that case impliedly recognizes the doctrine announced in the present instance. It was decided in Scudder v. Woodbridge, 1 Kelly, 195, that the doctrine that the principal is not liable to one agent or employé for damages occasioned by the negligence or misconduct of another agent or employé is not applicable to slaves. We do not see why the same doctrine would not with like force and reasoning be applied to minor children of tender age, who are subject to the orders and supervision of a person in whose charge they are placed. The cases of Hazlehurst v. Lumber Co., 94 Ga. 535, 19 S. E. 756; Hoyle v. Laundry Co., 95 Ga. 34, 21 S. E. 1001; Cates v. Itner, 104 Ga. 679, 30 S. E. 884; and Daniel v. Forsyth, 106 Ga. 568, 32 S. E. 621,—have no application to this case, for they refer to adults. The case of Manufacturing Co. v. Taylor, 95 Ga. 615, 23 S. E. 188, does refer to an injury to a minor, but it appears there that the minor had been repeatedly and distinctly warned of the danger and told thereof, and it appears that it was a case where the overwhelming preponderance of the testimony showed full diligence of the defendant in all respects. Therefore it can have no application to the case as made by this petition. That case has no reference to the principle involved in a child acting under the orders of a sub-boss, and being injured in consequence of his negligence. So far as our research has extended, the Georgia cases, as above indicated, which rule that a sub-boss, though having power to employ and discharge hands and those working under him, is their fellow servant, when it appears that there is a master higher in authority, have been applied exclusively in cases where the injury was to an adult. The principle herein is announced in the case of Railroad Co. v. Fort, 17 Wall. 553, 21 L. Ed. 739, where it appears that a boy was engaged in a machine shop as a workman or helper, under the superintendence of C., and required to obey his orders. After being employed a few months in receiving and putting away moldings as they came from a molding machine, the boy, by order of C., ascended a ladder to a great height from the floor, among rapidly revolving and dangerous machinery, for the purpose of adjusting a belt by which a portion of the machinery was moved, and, while engaged in the endeavor to execute the order, had his arm torn from his body. The jury found that the order was not within the scope of the boy's duty and employment, but was within that of C.; and the court held that the company was liable in damages for the injury, and that the rule that the master is not liable to one of his servants for injuries resulting from the carelessness of another, when both are engaged in a common service, although the injured person was under the control and direction of the servant who caused the injury, whether a true rule or not, had no application to that case. See, also, Coal Co. v. Richmond, 7 C. C. A. 485, 58 Fed. 757–760, announcing the same principle; McKinney, Fel. Serv. p. 104. In the case at bar the minor who was killed is alleged to have been taken away from the discharge of the duties which he had been hired to perform by his father, and placed at work at a dangerous place, under the orders and directions of an agent of the defendant who had charge of this work, and superintended the laborers engaged thereon; and one of the vital questions in the case is whether or not this conduct of the defendant, through such a superintendent, was negligence. Under the allegations in the petition, and the authorities above cited, this is clearly a question for investigation by the jury. The court was therefore right in overruling the general demurrer filed by defendant to the petition.

2. The petition as amended, we think, set forth the plaintiff's cause of action with sufficient distinctness in all material particulars, and was good against the special grounds of the demurrer. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

KOCH et al. v. BROCKHAN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1900.)

JUDGMENT — VALIDITY — EXECUTION — LEVY —TITLE TO LAND—INJUNCTION.

1. Even if a prayer for the establishment and enforcement of a specific lien upon land described in a deed given to secure the payment of an unconditional promissory note did not take an action thereon out of the rule that, in suits on unconditional written contracts, judgments are to be rendered by the judge without a jury, a judgment upon such a note, though based upon a verdict, was not for this reason void, when the judgment was signed by the judge, who thus adopted as his own judicial act the substance of the jury's finding.

2. When one who was a guardian signed a promissory note both individually and as guardian of another, and, to secure the payment of the same, in like manner executed a deed to realty owned in common by the two, such deed passed to the creditor at least the guardian's individual undivided interest in the land; and where in such a case the creditor, after obtaining on the note a general judgment embracing a special lien on the land, conveyed it to the grantee individually and as guardian, the ward at the time being dead, and the guardian his sole heir at law, it became lawful for the creditor to levy upon and sell the land in its entirety, as the individual property of the surviving guardian. The creditor's deed of reconveyance for the purpose of making such a sale revested in the guardian the latter's original undivided interest, and under the law of inheritance the remaining interest was vested in the guardian individually. Under these circumstances, the fact that the deed was made as indicated did not so cloud the title as to make it unlawful for the sheriff to seize and sell as the property of the guardian the entire fee in the land.

3. Where, on the hearing of an equitable petition to enjoin such a sale, there was evidence to warrant the judge in finding that the defendant in execution actually had in hand money belonging to the ward's estate more than sufficient to pay all lawful claims against the same, and had filed an application for a discharge, alleging therein that the ward's estate had been fully administered, it was proper to hold that the sale should not be enjoined on the theory that the guardian, as the legal representative of the ward's estate, was first entitled to administer his original undivided interest in the land, and accordingly to an exemption of 12 months from legal interference with such estate.

4. The trial judge ruled correctly on all the questions involved in this case, except the one first above dealt with, and erred in granting the injunction on the ground that the plaintiff's judgment was void.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Suit by Annie D. Brockhan against Fred and William Koch. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Kontz & Austin, for plaintiffs in error. John L. Hopkins & Sons, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. Annie D. Brockhan filed her equitable petition in Fulton superior court against Fred and William Koch. She alleged, in substance, as follows: Petitioner is the sister of Willie Brockhan, who died in June, 1899, insane, intestate, and leaving petitioner as his sole heir at law. In November, 1890, petitioner was duly appointed Willie's guardian, who was thereafter formally and duly adjudged to be insane. In 1896 petitioner made and executed to Fred and William Koch a note, both as an individual and as guardian of Willie Brockhan, for the sum of $2,956.56, and at the request of defendants executed and delivered a deed, to secure the same, to certain tracts of land, which land at the time of the execution and delivery of the deed was jointly owned by petitioner and Willie, the interest of each being one-half, respectively. By executing the deed, petitioner attempted to create a lien upon Willie's one-half interest to secure one-half of the amount of the note. She averred that the attempt to create such a lien was illegal, and the deed was null and void. In February, 1898, suit was instituted by Fred and William Koch upon the note, and on March 8th a judgment was rendered against her individually and as guardian of Willie Brockhan. Under that judgment it was sought to assert a special lien, by virtue of the deed mentioned above upon the interest of Willie Brockhan. A fi. fa. was issued in conformity with the judgment, and a deed filed by Fred and William Koch purporting to reconvey the land to petitioner, and to her as guardian of Willie Brockhan. A levy was made in pursuance of the judgment and fi. fa., asserting a special lien against the interest of said Willie Brockhan, and the interest of both petitioner and Willie was advertised for sale by the sheriff on the first Tuesday in December, 1899. It was further alleged that the sale was proceeding illegally, because of Willie's death, and because no administration has been had upon his estate; that the deed is invalid, because there was no legal right or power in petitioner, as such guardian, to create such lien; that there were debts entitled to priority over the debts of Fred and William Koch, due by the estate of Willie Brockhan; that these debts were for funeral expenses of Willie, to the amount of $143.14, and some taxes. Petitioner has applied for letters of administration upon the estate of Willie Brockhan. She prayed that the sheriff be made a party to the petition, and be enjoined from proceeding with a levy and sale of the property under the fi. fa. until Willie's estate can be properly administered by the ordinary's court. An amendment was filed to the petition, attaching a copy of the note sued upon, a copy of the verdict found by the jury, and the judgment of the court, and alleging that Willie Brockhan died, leaving no child or children, father, brother, or sister, save only plaintiff, and that she was his sole heir at law. It further alleged that she was proceeding to administer the estate of Willie Brockhan, and that an inventory appraisement thereof had been duly filed with the ordinary. She charges that the estate is amply solvent, and that the property upon which the fi. fa. was levied is easily worth $25,000, and that Willie's interest therein is worth $9,000. In answer to this the defendants denied the material allegations of the petition, by paragraphs. They admitted that Annie D. Brockhan was the guardian of Willie Brockhan, that he was insane and had died in the asylum, and that plaintiff was his sole heir. They further set up in their answer that they are not seeking to subject any part of his estate under their fi. fa., but simply had the same levied upon the entire land as the property of the plaintiff, Annie D. Brockhan. They further say that whether or not the lien created by Annie D. Brockhan, individually and as guardian, is, in strict law, a lien on the ward's estate, is a matter they are not called on to admit or deny; but they assert that in equity they would have a right to establish their lien, inasmuch as the money advanced by them, which the deed purported to secure, was used to pay off and discharge legal and valid incumbrances and liens against the identical property described in the deed, and which existed against the same before and at the time it descended by inheritance to Willie Brockhan. Defendants, however, have levied the fi. fa. only against Annie D. Brockhan, and claim that she is now the sole heir, as shown by her returns as guardian of her deceased ward; that she has ample money in her hands to pay off the debts of that estate; that by virtue of their general judgment they have a lien upon the entire property; and that they have seized and levied on it as her property alone. They allege that the guardian, by operation of law, became the administratrix of his estate, and that it appears from her final returns made September 8, 1899, that the guardian has on hand $2,830.19 with which to pay the indebtedness of the estate of her ward, which indebtedness amounts to a much less sum, according to her allegations. Defendants deny that the sale of the property under their fi. fa. would defeat the proper administration of the estate of Willie Brockhan, or cause loss to creditors, and they further aver that the property is not of such value as alleged by plaintiff; that the houses thereon are in bad condition and repair, and taxes thereon have not been paid for years; that Annie D. Brockhan had mortgaged the same to M. & J. Hirsh for $6,626.95, besides interest; and that consequently the levying of their fi. fa. on the property is not excessive. On the trial of the case below, plaintiff introduced the record of the suit in the city court of Atlanta; the same being an action instituted by Fred and William Koch against Annie D. Brockhan, and Annie D. Brockhan as guardian of Willie Brockhan, filed February 15, 1898. In this petition plaintiffs allege that Annie D. Brockhan, individually and as guardian of Willie, was indebted to them upon a certain promissory note, and coupons attached thereto, in the sum of $3,193.08, besides interest. The petition further alleged that there was a warranty deed given under the provisions of the Code by Annie D. Brockhan, and Annie D. as guardian of Willie, to secure the payment of the debt, to certain property in the city of Atlanta, and certain other land located in Fulton county, both of which tracts were fully described, and that they had received a bond to reconvey on payment of the debt. The petition prayed for a general judgment for the debt, and also that a special lien be set up on said tracts of land, to be enforced by levy and sale after filing quitclaim deed. To that petition there appears to have been no answer, and the jury rendered a verdict for the amount sued for, and further found that plaintiffs' special lien be set up, as prayed, upon the realty described in the petition. On this verdict a judgment signed by the judge was entered accordingly. It appears that an execution following this judgment was issued thereon, and levied upon the property therein described as the property of Annie D. Brockhan. A quitclaim deed from Fred and William Koch to Annie D. Brockhan individually, and to her as guardian of Willie Brockhan, was executed on October 31, 1899, and recited that the lands described were deeded by defendants to secure the payment of the debt sued on, and it was made for the purpose of levy and sale under the provisions of the Code. This deed was recorded in the clerk's office on November 9, 1899. The levy bore date the same day. Plaintiff also introduced various deeds showing title to the country property in question to be in Annie D. Brockhan, and title to the city property to be one half in her and the other half in Willie Brockhan. She further introduced proof showing the amount of funeral expenses and taxes due by the estate of Willie Brockhan, and offered evidence by her affidavit to the effect that her returns to the ordinary as guardian of Willie Brockhan did not, in point of fact, correctly state the cash she had on hand. On the other hand, evidence was introduced in behalf of defendants showing the annual returns of Annie D. Brockhan as guardian of Willie Brockhan to the court of ordinary of Fulton county for the years 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, and 1895, allowed, approved, and recorded, and her final return on September 8, 1899, from which it appeared that there was in the hands of the guardian cash to the amount of $2,830.19. Defendants also introduced application for letters of dismissal filed by Annie D. Brockhan as guardian of Willie Brockhan, dated September 8, 1899. In the petition for dismissal, which was duly signed by the guardian, she recites that she has fully discharged the duties of her trust, and is legally entitled to a discharge therefrom. The above are, in substance, all the material facts in the record necessary to a thorough understanding of the issues involved in the present case. After hearing the evidence and the arguments of counsel, the judge granted an order enjoining the defendants from selling or proceeding to sell the property under the execution sought to be enjoined by the plaintiff in her petition, upon which judgment the defendants below assigned error in their bill of exceptions. In the opinion of the judge giving reasons for his judgment, it appears that he based the same solely upon the ground that the judgment upon which the fi. fa. issued was void, because that was a suit upon an unconditional contract in writing, in which the constitution requires a judgment to be rendered without the intervention of a jury.

1. We think the judge was wrong in his conclusion, and that the authorities which he cites to sustain his position have no application to this case. For instance, in Lester v. Insurance Co., 55 Ga. 475, it is announced in the headnote, "A verdict, in a civil case, founded on contract, where no issuable defense is filed on oath, is illegal." It will be seen from the opinion of Judge Bleckley in that case that the judgment was entered upon the verdict found by the jury, not by the judge, but was signed by counsel in the usual form of judgments upon verdicts. The case of Tippin v. Whitehead, 66 Ga. 688, was a suit under the constitution of 1868, which was brought on a contract. No defense was filed. It was simply held that where a verdict was taken, and judgment entered thereon by counsel, it was void, and that a judgment by default should have been entered by the court. The case of Mosely v. Walker, 84 Ga. 274, 10 S. E. 623, cited by counsel for defendant in error, is not at all in point. It was simply decided there that the suit was on an unconditional contract in writing, and, no issuable defense being filed under oath, a judgment rendered by the court without the intervention of a jury was legal and valid. The same is true of Stansell v. Corley, 81 Ga. 453, 454, 8 S. E. 868. In fact, our attention has been called to no case in this court where it was ever decided that, in a suit upon an unconditional contract in writing, the fact that a verdict was found would render a judgment therein signed by the judge himself a nullity. The court has simply ruled that a judgment entered by counsel on a verdict in such a case is void. This principle is decided in Lockett v. Usry, 28 Ga. 345. It was there ruled that a verdict rendered in a case where there is no issue is a nullity, and may be treated as such. It was further held, "Although the judgment of the court purports to be founded upon a verdict, and the verdict is void, still the judgment can be executed, provided it be good without the verdict." In Coleman v. Slade, 75 Ga. 63, it was held, "The notes involved in this case were unconditional contracts in writing, and, no issuable plea having been filed, the verdict of a jury would have been a mere formality, and a judgment by the court was not valid." But we do not think it follows that the verdict in this case was necessarily a nullity. It is true, the note declared upon was an unconditional contract in writing, but the petition goes further, and seeks other relief besides a general judgment upon the note,—alleges that a deed was given to secure the same, and asks for a judgment creating a special lien upon the property described in that deed. That deed was not attached to the petition, nor was this particular relief sought founded upon any unconditional contract in writing. The case of Palmer v. Simpson, 69 Ga. 792, was one where a specific lien on certain property was claimed, and a judgment was sought to be so molded as to condemn such property. It was held that in that kind of a case the mode of procedure was as in equity, so far as verdicts and decrees were concerned, and such cases did not fall within the constitutional provision requiring the judge to render judgment by default, without a jury, on an unconditional contract in writing. Nor would a decree subjecting such property be void because founded on a verdict. The court further remarks that this decree was signed and entered by the court itself, and differs from the case of Lester v. Insurance Co., 55 Ga. 475. To say the least of it, the relief sought in the present petition leaves it very doubtful whether it could have been obtained without a verdict, and this court has repeatedly decided that in such cases the better practice is to obtain verdicts, and judgments entered upon them will not be treated as void or nullities. See Everett v. Westmoreland, 92 Ga. 673, 19 S. E. 37, and Crow v. Mortgage Co., 92 Ga. 815, 19 S. E. 31, affirming the decision in Railroad v. Pendleton, 87 Ga. 751, 13 S. E. 822, where it was decided, "In any case admitting of doubt, the question of rendering a judgment by the superior court without a jury is one not involving jurisdiction, but the proper exercise of jurisdiction; and an improper decision of it is mere error, and will not render the judgment void." We think that decision is directly applicable to this case, as the present instance involves sufficient doubt as to whether there should have been a verdict for the application of that rule. If it was an error, it might have been corrected upon proper motion, and, in the event of such motion being overruled, this proceeding could have been reviewed by direct bill of exceptions to this court. But no such steps were taken, no defense was then filed to the suit, or objection made to the granting of the special relief prayed for; and we think it was clearly too late, after the term of the court at which this judgment was rendered, even if there were any error in the rendition thereof, to make an attack on any such ground.

2. It is contended that, as the guardian had no right to thus create a lien on the estate of her ward, it was a nullity, and hence the judgment was void as a lien upon the property. There can be no question about the fact that when a guardian signed a promissory note both individually and as guardian of another, and, to secure the payment thereof, executed a deed to realty, one tract of which she owned in common with the ward, and the other tract she owned absolutely by herself, such deed passed to the creditor at least the guardian's undivided interest in the land; and where in such a case the creditor, after obtaining a general judgment which also embraced a special lien on the land, conveyed it to the grantee individually and as guardian, the ward at the time being dead, and the guardian his sole heir at law, it was lawful for the creditor to levy upon and sell the land in its entirety, as the individual property of the surviving guardian. There is nothing in the contention that a sale under such circumstances would have created a cloud upon the title, so as to make it unlawful for the sheriff to seize and sell the entire fee in the land; for the public could readily be put upon notice that while the insane ward had, in his lifetime, an interest in some of the property, yet he had died, leaving the remaining defendant in the case as his sole heir, thus vesting in her an absolute title to the same.

3, 4. The judge, in his opinion granting the injunction, expressly holds: "It will be noted that in this case there is a general judgment against Annie D. Brockhan as an individual, as well as the judgment against her as guardian. It appearing that the guardian and quasi administratrix is also the sole heir of the ward; that she has made a solemn admission in judicio that she has fully discharged the trust (necessarily involved, that she had delivered the property to herself as heir), and asked to be dismissed; that she either really has or ought to have ample funds in hand to pay the debts of the deceased ward set up by her as outstanding; that this proceeding is in equity, and is by her alone, and not by any creditors; and that she is in possession of the land,—I am of opinion that she cannot protect herself from levy under a general judgment against her by alleging that she holds as guardian and quasi administratrix of the deceased ward, and would be entitled to a year before suit could be brought. I therefore base my judgment on the grounds indicated, viz. that the verdict and judgment are void." We think there is sufficient evidence in the record to warrant the conclusion reached by the judge, that the defendant in execution actually had in hand money belonging to the ward's estate, more than sufficient to pay all lawful claims against the same, and had filed an application for discharge, alleging therein that the ward's estate had been fully administered; and it was proper to hold that the sale should not be enjoined on the theory that the guardian, as the legal representative of the ward's estate, was entitled to administer the same, and accordingly entitled to an exemption of 12 months from legal interference.

The trial judge correctly ruled on all the questions involved in the present case, except the one first above dealt with, but erred in granting the injunction on the ground that the plaintiff's judgment was void. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

DELANEY v. GEORGIA, C. & N. RY. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 1, 1900.)

RAILROADS—OBSTRUCTING WATER COURSE—ACTION—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action against a railroad company for obstructing a water course, the complaint alleged that defendant had negligently constructed a culvert too narrow to permit the water to pass through, as a result of which it was backed up on plaintiff's land. After alleging a lease of the railroad from said company to the other defendants, the complaint alleged that said lessees have "kept and maintained, with full knowledge of its unlawful and negligent construction, and without any effort to remedy it, the culvert before named, to the continuous damage of this plaintiff, as above alleged." Held bad on demurrer, in that it fails to allege that defendant lessees increased the obstruction made by the lessor, or that notice and demand for removal of the same had been made on the lessees.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Lancaster county; A. W. Buchanan, Judge.

Action by Robert H. Delaney against the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railway Company, the Seaboard & Roanoke Railroad Company, and the Raleigh & Gaston Railway Company. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Green & Hines, for appellant. J. L. Gleen and T. Y. Williams, for respondents.

JONES, J. This appeal is from an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint pleaded by the two last-named defendants, on the ground that as to them it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute the cause of action. The complaint alleged, in substance, that the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railway Company, in building its roadbed over a water course on plaintiff's land, negligently constructed a culvert too narrow to permit the volume of water to pass through without flooding, and thereby flooded, plaintiff's land, injuring said land and destroying his crops. After alleging a lease of said railroad, etc., by the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railway Company to the two last-named defendants, and stating particulars of damages, the complaint alleged that said lessees since said lease "kept and maintained, with full knowledge of its unlawful and negligent construction, and without any effort to remedy it, the culvert before named, to the continuous damage of this plaintiff, as above alleged." The complaint did not allege the placing of any obstruction over said stream by the demurrants, nor the increase by them of the obstruction alleged to have been made by their lessor; nor did the complaint allege any demand upon the lessees for the removal of said obstruction. The fundamental principle governing questions of this kind is that in order to constitute a cause of action the complaint must show a delict or breach of duty by defendant violative of plaintiff's right. Therefore, in Hammond v. Railroad Co., 16 S. C. 574, the complaint was not demurrable, because the allegations practically amounted to a statement "that the defendant had obstructed the drainage of plaintiff's land by closing up certain ditches necessary to secure that end," such positive acts constituting the delict alleged. Hence, with reference to such a complaint, the court held it error to charge the jury that defendant, the grantee, was liable for any damages caused by the failure to remove the obstruction caused by the acts of the former company, the grantor. So, as applied to the case before the court in that action, the principle was announced that the mere failure of the grantee to remove obstructions placed by the grantor affords no cause of action against the grantee, and the court stated that "the plaintiff must go further, and show that by some act of the defendant the plaintiff's system of drainage has been obstructed, or that the obstructions caused by the former company have been increased." But it should not be understood that Hammond's Case meant to assert that, in every action against the grantee for the continuance of a nuisance created by the grantor, it was essential to allege and show that the grantee increased the obstructions constituting the nuisance. That is merely one way by which the delict of defendant may be shown, and was a proper way, under the complaints in that case. We understand it, also, to be the law in this state that the grantee or lessee of the creator of an obstruction constituting a private nuisance has no duty to remove said obstruction until after notice and demand for removal; but after such notice and demand the continuance of the nuisance becomes a nuisance, and the duty to remove or compensate arises. Elliott v. Rhett, 5 Rich. Law, 420; Leitzsey v. Water-Power Co., 47 S. C. 476, 25 S. E. 744, 34 L. R. A. 215; Townes v. City Council, 52 S. C. 404, 29 S. E. 851. In such a case it would not be essential to allege the placing or the increasing of the obstruction by the grantee, since the delict could be shown by the continuance of the original nuisance after notice and demand for removal. But in the present case it was alleged that the lessor or grantor placed or created the obstructions, and it was not alleged that notice was given to, and demand for removal was made upon, the grantee or lessee. Therefore it was not error to sustain the demurrer for failure to allege that the grantee or lessee increased the obstructions made by the grantor or lessor. The ruling of the circuit court is directly supported by the case of Privett v. Railroad Co., 54 S. C. 98, 32 S. E. 75, which was largely based upon the principles stated in Hammond v. Railroad Co., supra.

After the dismissal of the action against the two demurring defendants, the plaintiff chose to proceed with the case against the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railway Company, and recovered a judgment for damages for the construction and maintenance of obstructions complained of, from which judgment there is no appeal. In such a case it would not be proper to remand the case with leave to amend. Judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

RINAKE v. VICTOR MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 1, 1900.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES — INJURY TO SERVANT — LIABILITY OF MASTER—INSTRUCTIONS—MATTERS OF FACT —ADOPTION OF STRUCTURES—DUTY TO REPAIR.

1. An instruction that where a master allowed an independent contractor to erect appliances on his premises for the use of the contractor, and the master adopted and used such appliances himself, or acquiesced in their use by his servants while engaged in his work, he was as responsible for his servants' safety as if he had erected the appliances himself, was proper, without submitting to the jury that such acquiescence must have been for such a period of time as would indicate an adoption by the master, since the word "acquiesced" was used by the court in the sense of "being satisfied with," and such acquiescence would amount to an adoption.

2. An instruction that if, after an independent contractor had quit a job and left the premises, the master adopted and used the structures he had erected, or acquiesced in their use by his servants, then such structures became those of the master, and if, by reason of his failure to keep them in good repair, a servant was injured, he was responsible for the injury, was not objectionable, as charging the jury in respect to matters of fact, since the court did not undertake to say what facts amounted to an adoption of the structures.

3. Where a master had provided several ways of approach to a building for the use of his servants, an instruction that, unless forbidden to do so, his servants might leave by any one of them which was most convenient, and if, in so doing, a servant was injured by the negligence of the master to keep it in a reasonably safe condition, the master was liable for the injury, was proper.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Spartanburg county; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by Fred Rinake against the Victor Manufacturing Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Haynsworth & Parker and Hydrick & Wilson, for appellant. Duncan & Sanders, for respondent.

JONES, J. The appeal in this case complains of the charge to the jury. So much of the charge as is relevant to the exceptions made is as follows: "(1) A master is bound to provide reasonably safe places and structures for his servants while they are in the performance of his work, and reasonably safe approaches for the purpose of enabling them to go to and to depart in safety from their place of work. (2) Where a master allows an independent contractor to erect and use appliances on his premises for the purpose of carrying on the work of such independent contractor, and adopts and uses such appliances and structures, or acquiesces in the use of such appliances and structures by his servants while they are engaged in his work, then such master makes such appliances and structures his own, and is just as responsible for their safety while they are being used by his servants as he would be if he had erected them himself. (3) Where an independent contractor erects certain appliances and structures on the premises of another for the purpose of carrying on the work he is engaged in, and a master who is also carrying on work there adopts and uses such appliances, or consents to and acquiesces in the use of them by his servants while they are engaged in his work, such master makes such appliances and structures his own while his servants are using them, and is just as responsible for their being kept in good repair while being so used as he would be had he erected them himself. (4) Where an independent contractor erects structures and appliances on the premises of another for the purpose of enabling him to carry on his work, and joins such appliances and structures to those of a master who is also engaged in carrying on work there, and such appliances and structures are used in common by this independent contractor and by this master and his servants, such master, while the appliances and structures which were built by the contractor are being used by him and his servants in his work, becomes responsible for their safety and good repair; and if he negligently fails to keep them in a reasonably safe condition, and by reason of this a servant of his, while in the performance of his work, is injured, such master is responsible for such injuries. (5) Where a master adopts and uses the structures and appliances which have been built for the use of another, or where he consents that his servants, while in the performance of his work, shall use them, then he makes himself responsible for such appliances being kept in a reasonably safe condition; and if he negligently fails to do so, and one of his servants, while engaged in the master's work, is on this account injured, such master is responsible for such injuries. (6) Where an independent contractor erects appliances and structures on the premises of another for the purpose of enabling him to carry on his work, and, after his contract is over, goes away and leaves such appliances and structures on such premises, and one who is to carry on work there, as a master, adopts them as his own, or permits and consents and acquiesces in the use of such appliances and structures by his servants while they are engaged in his work, he thereby makes them his own, and is just as responsible for their being kept in a reasonably safe condition as he would be if he had erected them himself. (7) If, after an independent contractor has quit his job, and left the premises where he had been at work, a master adopts and uses the appliances and structures which this independent contractor had erected, or permits and acquiesces in the use of them by his servants while they are in the performance of his work, then such appliances and structures, to all intents and purposes, become the appliances and structures of the master; and if, after this, he negligently fails to keep and maintain them in a reasonably safe condition, and by reason of such failure one of his servants, while in the performance of his duties, is injured, such master is responsible for such injuries. Where a master has provided for the use of his servants several ways of approach to a building, or several ways of entering and leaving it, a servant, unless he is forbidden to do so, can, in going to and leaving his work, enter or leave by either of these ways that may be most convenient to him; and if, while he is using any of these ways, he is injured by reason of the neglect of the master to keep this way in a reasonably safe condition, such master is responsible for such injury."

The exceptions made to said charge are (1) that it was a charge in respect to matters of fact, in violation of the constitution; (2) that it was error to charge that acquiescence in the use by his servants of such appliances and structures erected by the independent contractor amounted to an adoption thereof by the master, unless the court qualified such charge as to duration and character of use, or unless it was submitted to the jury to determine whether or not such acquiescence was for such period of time or of such character as would indicate an adoption by the master, and that it should have been submitted to the jury to determine what extent and character of use with the knowledge of the master would be equivalent to the adoption. The exceptions are not well founded. The charge was not in respect to matters of fact, contrary to the constitution, but was nothing more than a hypothetical statement of facts as a necessary basis for the statement of a legal proposition. The court properly did not undertake to charge the jury what facts amounted to an adoption of, or consenting acquiescence in the use by the employés of, such appliances and structures, but left it to the jury to determine these matters. It is manifest from the connection that the court used the term "acquiesces" in the sense of "being satisfied with," involving the assent of the will, and such acquiescence would amount to an adoption of such appliances and structures; and it is not disputed that if the master adopts, for the use of his servants, appliances or structures erected by an independent contractor, he is responsible for their safety while being used by his servants in the discharge of their duties. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

WILSON v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 2, 1900.)

REMOVAL OF CAUSES — FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—STATUTORY DOMESTICATION —EFFECT—RESIDENCE.

A railroad corporation, created under the laws of Virginia, which has complied with the requirements of Act March 19, 1896, providing that such foreign corporation shall thereupon become a domestic corporation, with all the rights and liabilities thereof, is still a nonresident of South Carolina, within the act of congress authorizing the removal of causes from state to federal courts on the ground of nonresidence, and hence is entitled to have a cause against it in a state court removed to the United States court.

Pope, J., dissenting.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Fairfield county; O. W. Buchanan, Judge.

Action by John Wilson, administrator of the estate of Noah Y. Wilson, deceased, against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

B. L. Abney, for appellant. G. T. Graham and Ragsdale & Ragsdale, for respondent.

JONES, J. This action was brought in the court of common pleas for Fairfield county for damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate by the defendant corporation, and resulted in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $4,500. A petition and bond for the removal of the cause to the circuit court of the United States for the district of South Carolina on the ground of diverse citizenship was duly filed, and on the call of the case for trial the court (Hon. O. W. Buchanan, presiding) was asked to proceed no further, except to pass an order for removal. This was refused, and notice of appeal and exceptions was immediately served. After judgment on the verdict of the jury, exceptions were taken to the order refusing to remove, to the ruling compelling defendant to proceed to trial, and to the judgment and rulings of the court.

The first question presented is whether there was error in refusing to remove the cause to the United States court. The plaintiff was a citizen of South Carolina, and alleged in the complaint that the defendant was a corporation under the laws of this state. The petition for removal alleged that the defendant, at the commencement of the suit and at the filing of the petition, was a citizen and resident of the state of Virginia, being a corporation created under the laws of that state. It is not disputed that the defendant was originally created a corporation under the laws of Virginia, and thereafter complied with the act of the general assembly of this state approved March 19, 1896, entitled "An act to provide the manner in which railroad companies incorporated under the laws of other states or countries may become incorporated in this state." This act was construed, in connection with section 8, art. 9, of the constitution, in the case of Railway Co. v. Tompkins, 48 S. C. 52, 25 S. E. 982, wherein the court, speaking by Judge J. D. Witherspoon, said: "A state, by its legislature, may impose upon foreign corporations, which seek to come within its limits to conduct their business, the condition that they shall be subjected to the duties and obligations of domestic corporations; in short, that they shall be, when so acting within the territorial limits of the state, domestic corporations, for the purpose of jurisdiction. The question whether the legislature of a state has adopted and domesticated a corporation created by another state is in any case purely a question of legislative intent. 6 Thomp. Corp. § 7890; Murfree, Foreign Corp. § 455. It was competent for the legislature of this state to provide by the act under consideration for the adoption of foreign corporations as domestic corporations, without violating the section of the constitution above quoted [section 8, art. 9]. The title of the act under consideration, and the third section thereof, clearly show that such was the intention of the legislature. Under the third section of said act, a foreign corporation complying with the provisions of said act ipso facto becomes a domestic corporation, enjoying the rights and subject to the liabilities of domestic corporations as fully as if it were originally created under the laws of this state." In that case it was also held that the Southern Railway Company had complied with said statute. Thereafter, in the case of Mathis v. Railway Co., 53 S. C. 257, 31 S. E. 240, this court held that the said Southern Railway Company, having become a domestic corporation by compliance with said act, was not entitled to the benefit of those provisions of the act of congress of the United States governing the removal of causes from the state courts to the United States circuit court because of diverse citizenship. We have been induced to review the case of Mathis v. Railway Co., supra, and, after careful consideration, have reached the conclusion that it is not in harmony with the recent decisions of the United States supreme court, by which this court must be controlled on questions of this kind. The Mathis Case was supposed to be in harmony with the decision in Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Alabama, 2 Sup. Ct. 432, 27 L. Ed. 518, wherein it seemed to hold that the Memphis & Charleston Railroad Company, previously incorporated in Tennessee, and afterwards made an Alabama corporation by the statutes of Alabama, could not remove into the circuit court of the United States a suit brought against it in Alabama by a citizen of Alabama. But this court failed to observe the distinction between the creation of a new corporation out of natural persons, and the mere adoption of a foreign corporation as a domestic corporation for local purposes. A corporation is indisputably presumed to be composed of citizens of the state creating it, and for purposes of federal jurisdiction the citizenship of its corporators is imputed to the corporation. In the case of Railway Co. v. James, 16 Sup. Ct. 627, 40 L. Ed. 808, the supreme court of the United States refused "to extend the doctrine of indisputable citizenship, so that if a corporation of one state, indisputably taken, for the purpose of federal jurisdiction, to be composed of citizens of such state, is authorized by the law of another state to do business therein, and to be endowed for local purposes with all the powers and privileges of a domestic corporation, such adopted corporation shall be deemed to be composed of citizens of the second state, in such a sense as to confer jurisdiction on the federal court at the suit of a citizen of the state of its original creation." As the right of removal depends upon diverse citizenship, we take it that the United States court, upon the principle announced above, would not extend the doctrine of indisputable citizenship to a corporation originally created in one state, and afterwards adopted as a domestic corporation in another state, so as to make such adopted corporation a citizen, also, of the second state. This we think is made clear by the following language of the court in the James Case, referring to an act by the legislature of Arkansas similar to the South Carolina act under which defendant became a domestic corporation: "It is true that by the subsequent act of 1889, by the proviso to the second section, it was provided that every railroad corporation of any other state which had theretofore leased or purchased any railroad in Arkansas should within 60 days from the passage of the act file a certified copy of its articles of incorporation or charter with the secretary of state, and shall thereupon become a corporation of Arkansas, anything in its articles of incorporation or charter to the contrary notwithstanding; and it appears that the defendant company did accordingly file a copy of its articles of incorporation with the secretary of the state. But whatever may be the effect of such legislation, in the way of subjecting foreign railroad companies to control and regulation by the local laws of Alabama, we cannot concede that it availed to create an Arkansas corporation out of a foreign corporation, in such a sense as to make it a citizen of Arkansas, within the meaning of the federal constitution, so as to subject it, as such, to a suit by a citizen of the state of its origin. In order to bring such an artificial body as a corporation within the spirit and letter of that constitution, as construed by the decisions of this court, it would be necessary to create it out of natural persons, whose citizenship of the state creating it could be imputed to the corporation itself. But it is not pretended in the present case that natural persons, resident in and citizens of Alabama, were by the legislation in question created a corporation, and that therefore the citizenship of the individual corporators is imputable to the corporation." By reference to the South Carolina statute referred to, it will be seen that it did not undertake to create a new corporation out of natural persons, but merely provided a mode by which foreign corporations might become domestic corporations. Section 3 provides "that when a foreign corporation complies with the provisions and requirements of this act [by filing in the office of the secretary of state a copy of its charter, paying therefor such fees as may be required by law, and causing a copy of such charter to be recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyances or clerk of the court of common pleas, in each county in which such company or corporation desires or proposes to carry on its business or acquire or own property], it [the foreign corporation] shall ipso facto become a domestic corporation, and shall enjoy the rights and be subject to the liabilities of such domestic corporation; it may sue and be sued in the courts of this state, and shall be subject to the jurisdiction of this state as fully as if it were originally created under the laws of the state of South Carolina." Inasmuch as this legislation and the proceedings thereunder created no new corporation out of natural persons, but merely domesticated or adopted an existing corporation, there can be no citizenship of corporators imputed to the corporation as adopted, except the indisputable citizenship of the original corporators. So, in the case of Louisville, N. A. & C. Ry. Co. v. Louisville Trust Co., 19 Sup. Ct. 817, 43 L. Ed. 1081, the court, citing James' Case, supra, held that for purposes of federal jurisdiction a corporation remains a citizen of the state originally creating it, notwithstanding it be afterwards also made a corporation of another state.

In the argument of the case of McCabe v. Railway Co., 36 S. E. 1024, which was heard during the present term, and involved, also, the question of removal, counsel for appellant, Messrs. Andrew Crawford and J. S. Muller, raised a point not directly raised in the case at bar, but which we deem proper to be considered now, viz. whether the defendant can be considered a nonresident of this state, in the sense of the federal statute of 1887-88, governing removal of causes. In the first place, the petition for removal alleges that the defendant is a nonresident of this state. This allegation of fact was not traversed, and, as we understand, is not properly traversable, except in the circuit court of the United States after removal. Therefore, for the purposes of the present contention, it appears as a fact that the defendant is a nonresident of this state. In the second place, while "citizenship," and "residence" are not always synonymous, we are of opinion that a foreign corporation, though domesticated in this state, being a citizen of the state originally creating it, must be deemed to have its domicile or residence in the state of its creation, and so is a nonresident of this state, in the sense of the statute governing removals, whatever may be the view as relating to mere local matters not affecting federal jurisdiction. As stated in Ex parte Shaw, 12 Sup. Ct. 937, 36 L. Ed. 771, "The legal existence, the home, the domicile, the habitat, the residence, the citizenship, of a corporation, can only be in the state by which it was created, although it may do business in other states whose laws permit it."

We must therefore hold that the defendant was entitled to remove the cause to the circuit court of the United States, being a citizen and resident of Virginia, and that it was error to proceed with the trial in the state court. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider any other question presented. The judgment of the circuit court is reversed.

POPE, J., dissents.

JENKINS v. CHARLESTON ST. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 2, 1900.)

BUILDING CONTRACT—RESCISSION—DAMAGES—EVIDENCE—PROFITS—NONSUIT—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action for damages for the wrongful rescission of plaintiff's contract to build defendant's power house and barns, it was not error to permit plaintiff, who was an experienced contractor, and had obtained reliable estimates on much of the work, to testify what was the difference between the cost of the work to him and his bid to the defendant, especially as other witnesses testified to the same point without objection.

2. In an action for the wrongful rescission of plaintiff's contract to erect defendant's power house and barns, the error, if any, of allowing an answer to the question when the buildings were completed by the one who did the work, was harmless.

3. In an action for the wrongful rescission of plaintiff's contract to erect defendant's power house and barns, where the making and breach of the contract and the damages were all in issue, and there was some evidence on all of them, a denial of a nonsuit was proper.

4. Where plaintiff, at defendant's request, bid on the erection of certain buildings for defendant, and his bid was accepted, and thereafter, without cause, defendant refused to allow plaintiff to do the work, it was not error for the court to charge that plaintiff's prospective profits on the contract might be considered in assessing damages, since the profits on a contract of this nature are susceptible of close approximation in advance.

5. Where the charge of the court states facts in hypothetical form, for the purpose of declaring the law thereon, it is not a violation of Const. art. 5, § 26, providing that the judge shall not charge the jury on matters of fact, but shall declare the law.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Charleston county; J. C. Klugh, Judge.

Action by Edward N. Jenkins against the Charleston Street-Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Mordecai & Gadsden, for appellant. Trenholm, Rhett & Miller, for respondent.

POPE, J. In an action to recover damages for breach of contract, the plaintiff recovered a judgment against the defendant for the sum of $800. After judgment thereon, the defendant appealed to this court on three grounds: First, that the circuit judge erred in admitting certain testimony; second, that the circuit judge erred in overruling defendant's motion for a nonsuit; third, that the circuit judge erred in his charge, and also in his refusal to charge the jury. We will examine these grounds of appeal in their order.

The circuit judge allowed the plaintiff, Edward N. Jenkins, while on the witness stand, to detail the grounds upon which he had based his claim for damages, by stating how he reached his conclusion that the defendant railway company had damaged him in the sum of $1,000 in refusing to award him, or, rather, in canceling, the contract for the construction of the power house of defendant, and also in allowing the same witness to detail the grounds whereon he thought the defendant electric railway company had injured him in the sum of $1,750 in canceling the contract for building the car barn of defendant. In his complaint plaintiff had, in effect, alleged that he was a contractor in the city of Charleston, S. C., of experience, skill, and responsibility; that on the 13th day of February, 1897, the defendant electric car company, a corporation under the laws of this state, offered the contract of building the power house and the car barn of the defendant company according to certain plans and specifications; that the plaintiff, at its instance and request, put in his bid to do that work, along with four other separate contractors, and that, in the preparation of plaintiff's said bid, he was subjected to labor and expense therefor; that on Monday afternoon, the 15th day of February, 1897, at the hour of 6 o'clock, and in the presence of all of said five contractors, their respective bids were opened, and it was then discovered and announced that the plaintiff's bid for the construction of each of the two buildings was the lowest, and that the defendant then announced that in a few days it would communicate with the plaintiff touching said contract; that on the 17th day of February, 1897, the defendant, by letter, requested the plaintiff to call at its office on that day; that the plaintiff did call, and then and there arranged with the defendant that the 1st day of May, 1897, should be inserted in the contract as the day on which the plaintiff was to complete the two buildings, and also that the demurrage of $25 inserted in the contract should be changed to $50 per day after May 1, 1897, until contract should be completed; that afterwards, but in the same interview, the defendant insisted that plaintiff should obtain a bond of some solvent surety company, in the penal sum of $7,500, for the faithful performance of said contract by the plaintiff; that, although no such stipulation or condition had ever been mentioned before between these parties, yet he agreed, and went out to see if he could arrange with some said company, and soon returned to the defendant office with the information that the America Surety Company, a corporation located in New York City, and which only issued policies or bonds from the home office, in New York City, would sign his bond as his surety; that then this plaintiff's contract with the defendant was complete; that, notwithstanding it would take a reasonable time to complete the bond, the defendant through its attorney, F. Moultrie Mordecai, Esq., when the plaintiff had announced that he had made arrangements with the Charleston agents and attorneys of the America Surety Company for said bond, at once thereafter announced that said bond should be filed with the defendant by 12 m. o'clock on the next day, the 18th of February, 1897, though afterwards this arrangement was by the defendant extended to 6 o'clock of the afternoon of the 18th of February, 1897; that such condition being impossible of performance, for lack of reasonable time, the defendant, in disregard of plaintiff's rights, awarded the contract to the bidder next to the plaintiff in the lowest amount bid.

The first and second exceptions: The two questions admitted over defendant's objection were: (1) "What was the difference between the cost of completing the contract, to you, and the bid which you made to the company?" (2) "When was the work finished by Mr. Oliver?" Great care is observed in courts to prevent any testimony relating to breaches of contracts, when such testimony is speculative and uncertain in its character. And this is entirely proper. Witnesses should always, when they can do so, speak from direct knowledge. The very best that any witness can do is to detail facts. It seems to us that a man who has devoted his life in acquiring the mastery over those classes of knowledge which enter in to make a contractor may be said to have the power to make estimates of the cost of a proposed building, so that he can announce the cost of such building. This witness testified that he had estimates made by experienced subcontractors of much of the work. This being so, we do not see why his testimony was not admissible. Feaster v. Cotton Mills, 51 S. C. 143, 28 S. E. 301, is a very good illustration of this doctrine. So, too, Moorer v. Andrews, 39 S. C. 427, 17 S. E. 948, where a man was allowed to recover the difference between the market price of certain cords of wood (36 cords), and what those 36 cords would have cost to render them marketable. Is this not the same principle? But, apart from all this, in the case at bar the witness H. F. Zacharia testified, without any objection thereto, to the same matters covered by plaintiff's testimony on this point. Now, as to the second question, relating, as it does, to the time employed by Mr. Oliver in completing these buildings, we can see no harm to the defendant from any answer to this question. Possibly it might seem to develop any hypocrisy in the defendant, if any such existed, as to the deep anxiety professed by the defendant to have the work finished by May 1, 1897, when it was shown that such work was not actually finished until July 1, 1897, and no complaint was ever made by it. These exceptions are overruled.

The third ground of complaint urged by the defendant against the rulings of his honor, the circuit judge, related to his declining to grant the defendant's motion for a nonsuit. The rule governing nonsuits is so well settled that no extended reference to the rule in the abstract is necessary. Was there any material testimony bearing on the issues developed by the pleadings in the case at bar? The circuit judge decided that there was some such testimony. We agree with him. The contract was in issue. There was testimony bearing on it. The breach of the contract was in issue, and there was testimony bearing on that issue. There was some testimony relating to the amount of damages resulting from the breach of the contract. These things being true, the nonsuit would have been highly improper by the circuit judge.

We will now pass upon the sixth and eighth grounds of appeal together, as they relate to the same matter: "Sixth. Because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'Next you would consider the claim of the plaintiff that he lost the profits on his contract by reason of the breach by the defendant. When a man makes a contract with another, he is entitled to the benefits of that contract; and, if one of the benefits is a certain amount of profit, he is entitled to receive that benefit. If the other side violates the contract and deprives him of that benefit, along with others, he is entitled to recover the amount of such profits from the party violating the contract,'—but should have charged the jury that the profits, in an action of this kind, could not be recovered." "Eighth. Because his honor erred in refusing to charge the fifth request of the defendant, which reads as follows: 'The profits which might have resulted from a building contract upon which no work has been done cannot be considered as an element of damages, as the same are too vague and speculative.'" It seems to us, if the testimony established the existence of a contract between these litigants, and, further, that there was testimony that the defendant made a breach of said contract, and also that there was testimony that such a breach of said contract was the direct cause of damage to the plaintiff, which said damage could be estimated in dollars and cents, then it was proper for the circuit judge to submit such questions to the jury. We cannot, as a court, consider whether the jury allowed too much money to the plaintiff for defendant's alleged wrongdoing. The "case" shows that this question was not presented to the circuit judge in a motion for a new trial on the ground of excessive damages. For the circuit judge to have charged the fifth request, embodied in the eighth ground of appeal, would have required that he charge the jury that no work on the contract had been done by the plaintiff. As our views have been expressed on this matter in our consideration of the first and second grounds of appeal, we will not linger here. These exceptions are overruled.

We will next consider the remaining exceptions in one group, relating, as they do, to an alleged violation by the circuit judge of the constitution, which forbids a circuit judge to charge the jury upon the facts, namely: "Fourth. Because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'And so if you find from the testimony that the defendant did impose upon him the additional condition that he should give bond in a surety company, and that he proposed to give a bond in a certain surety company, which was acceptable to the defendant, and with which proposition it signified its satisfaction and acceptance, then the plaintiff was entitled to a reasonable time within which to comply with the condition by giving bond; and if you should find from the testimony that the surety company in which he proposed to give his bond, and in which the defendant street-railway company agreed to accept his bond, was not in the city of Charleston, but was at a distance from the city, then it would be a matter for you to consider as to what would be a reasonable time within which the plaintiff could comply with the condition thus fixed, and give the bond in that company,—the company which had been tendered and accepted as his surety by the defendant,'—as, in so charging, his honor, the circuit judge, charged the jury in respect to a material question of fact in the case, in violation of section 26 of article 5 of the constitution of this state. Fifth. Because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'And if you should find further, from the testimony, that the defendant itself prevented, by curtailing the time within which he was to give bond to such an extent as that it didn't allow him a reasonable time, and that it thus prevented his giving bond and complying with that condition, then the plaintiff would still have the right to insist that because of the wrongful interference of the defendant he had been prevented from complying with that condition, and to insist that his contract should be accepted and complied with on the other side, or that the other side should make him just compensation for its breach of contract,'—as, in so charging, his honor, the circuit judge, charged the jury in respect to a material question of fact in the case, in violation of section 26 of article 5 of the constitution of this state." "Seventh. Because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'In other words, to express it more definite, Mr. foreman, that Mr. A., we will say, had agreed to furnish so many thousand brick at certain figures, and that Mr. A. was a reliable man, able to perform his contract, or able to respond in damages for the breach of his contract, and that Mr. B. had promised to furnish lime and cement, or that Mr. A. and Mr. B. were selling these articles at that price, and that this plaintiff was able to buy these articles at the price himself,'—as, in so charging, his honor, the circuit judge, charged the jury in respect to a material question of fact in the case, in violation of section 26 of article 5 of the constitution of this state." "Ninth. Because his honor erred in charging the fourth request to charge of the defendant, —erred in qualifying same and charging the jury as follows: 'That must be qualified, Mr. foreman and gentlemen. A person who fails to do these things of his own motion or of his own fault cannot maintain such an action, but a person placed in that position, and who fails to perform these conditions, of executing or furnishing a bond and executing a contract, because of the unlawful and unreasonable interference of the other side, still has the right to insist either upon the performance of his contract, or to recover compensation from the other side for the breach of contract,'—as, in so charging, his honor, the circuit judge, charged the jury in respect to a material question of fact in the case, in violation of section 26 of article 5 of the constitution of this state."

We will first consider the fourth and fifth exceptions. Our constitution does state this negation of power in the circuit judge. Article 5, § 26: "Judges shall not charge juries in respect to matters of fact, but shall declare the law." Here it is evident that the circuit judge can no longer state the testimony. In Norris v. Clinkscales, 47 S. C. 488, 25 S. E. 797, which was decided in October, 1896, the acting justice of this court (Judge Benet) with a great deal of care and ability reviewed most of the cases on the subject of the charge of the presiding judge to the jury with reference to the provision of the constitution of 1868 on this matter, and traced the results wrought by article 5, § 26, of the constitution of 1895. He deduced certain rules on this subject, in these words: "And any direct reference to the testimony in charging a jury, any expression as to what is in evidence, any remark that would amount to a stating of the testimony in whole or in part, is absolutely prohibited. At the same time, we cannot presume that it was the intention of the framers of the new constitution, many of whom were members of the bar, and learned in the law, and familiar with the decisions of this court, to require trial judges, in their charges, to declare the law, and yet forbid them to base that law upon any foundation, by which alone they can make it apply to a given case. The constitutional mandate is that 'they shall declare the law.' * * * Now, it must be found solely in the latter,—a supposed state of facts. [Italics ours.] We therefore conclude and hold that as it would be impossible to declare the law applicable to a case on trial, without connecting the legal principles involved with some state of facts, actual or hypothetical, it was the intention of the framers of the new constitution, in amending section 26 of article 4 [constitution of 1868], that the trial judge, in charging the law of the case, should lay before the jury that law as applicable to a supposed state of facts, but that in so doing he should carefully avoid repeating the evidence on the facts at issue, making no statement of the testimony either in whole or in part. We are clearly of the opinion that under section 26, as it now reads, a judge may, in declaring the law applicable to the case, base that law upon hypothetical findings of fact by the jury, and instruct the jury that, if they believe so and so from the evidence they have heard, then such and such will be the result. In so doing, if he be careful not to repeat any of the testimony, nor intimate directly or indirectly what is in evidence, he will be chargeable neither with stating the testimony, nor with charging in respect to matters of fact." There was no issue between these parties litigant that a bond was required by the defendant in a surety company, and that the American Surety Company was that company. The pleadings and correspondence on both sides show this. Then where was it illegal in the circuit judge declaring the law in the hypothetical case set up in these two grounds of appeal? Let the exceptions be overruled. We overrule the seventh ground of appeal, for the reason that upon its very face it appears that the law declared was based upon a purely hypothetical case.

As to the last exception (the ninth), we will say that the defendant had requested the presiding judge to charge as follows: "(4) The lowest bidder for the construction of a building, who fails to execute a bond or sign a contract therefor, as he understood he was to do, cannot maintain an action for damages for breach of contract based upon his bid." Now, the defendant, in its request to charge, embodied a hypothetical case. All that the circuit judge did was to properly modify the proposition of law submitted by the defendant. The circuit judge did not quote any testimony or state any testimony. This exception is overruled. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

STATE v. LEE.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 31, 1900.)

CRIMINAL LAW—HOMICIDE—TRIAL—CONTINUANCE—DYING DECLARATIONS—OPINION—ADMISSIBILITY—INSTRUCTIONS—FAILURE TO REQUEST—WAIVER—THREATS — ADMISSIBILITY—REMARKS OF COURT—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Where defendant moved for a continuance, and produced a doctor's certificate that defendant's nervous system was disturbed and disordered and that he was in bad physical condition, but his appearance and manner did not indicate any nervous trouble or physical weakness, his motion was properly denied.

2. Where deceased was shot by defendant, who claimed the killing was accidental, the admission of a statement of deceased, as a dying declaration, that "he shot me for nothing," was not objectionable as a mere expression of opinion, since it constituted a statement of a fact.

3. Where deceased was shot by defendant, and there was evidence that they had engaged in quarrels frequently for several years prior to the shooting, the admission of a statement of deceased, as a dying declaration, that the shooting was willful and malicious, is not objectionable as the mere statement of an opinion, without facts on which to base it, since there was testimony which tended to show that there were facts within the knowledge of the deceased on which he might have based an opinion, and it was not necessary for him to state them.

4. Error based on the failure of the trial court to give an instruction in his preliminary charge is harmless, where such instruction was given on the final charge.

5. Where an instruction is proper when considered in connection with the whole charge, the fact that it was misleading when taken separately is harmless.

6. Where deceased was shot by defendant, who claimed the killing was accidental, an instruction that if the jury found that the killing was accidental homicide, but occurred when the defendant was in pursuance of an unlawful or felonious act, they should find him guilty of murder, was not objectionable as charging that the defendant should be found guilty of murder if he accidentally killed the deceased in pursuance of an unlawful act which was not felonious, since the instruction was correct as a general charge, and, if defendant desired a more specific one, he should have requested it.

7. Where deceased was shot by defendant, who claimed that the killing was accidental, evidence of threats made by defendant against deceased several years prior to the killing was not objectionable as too remote, since the length of time intervening is a circumstance to be considered by the jury in determining whether there was any connection between the threats and the deed.

8. Where deceased, who was a physician, was shot by defendant, and the statements made by deceased were admitted as dying declarations, a remark of the trial court in the presence of the jury that the testimony justified the opinion; that there was a continuous dying condition, of which the deceased was aware, bearing in mind that he was a medical man, and therefore able to form a more intelligent opinion of his condition than a layman,—was not so prejudicial to defendant, in indicating the opinion of the court as to the weight to be given the dying declarations by the jury, as to necessitate a reversal.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Darlington county; W. C. Benet, Judge.

Maxcy G. Lee was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Woods & McFarlan, for appellant. J. M. Johnson, for the State.

GARY, A. J. A general statement of the facts herein is correctly set forth in the argument of the appellant's attorneys, as follows: 'October 5, 1899, Maxcy C. Lee, a young physician, was living with his aged father, Dr. Henry J. Lee, in Darlington county, near a little hamlet called 'Lydia.' The father and son had thus been living together for about five years, engaged in the practice of medicine in partnership. Dr. Henry Lee had lost his wife some three years before. His other children had married and settled around him at varying distances, and Maxcy, who was unmarried, was his sole companion; the only other inmate of his house being a white woman (a Mrs. Munn), employed as cook and housekeeper. Dr. Henry Lee had reached the age of seventy, and was held in high esteem and much beloved throughout the surrounding country. He was well to do, owning at least $25,000 in property,—mainly in money. As a general thing the relations between father and son were of the most cordial and affectionate character; and when the old man was unwell it was the practice of the son to sleep with him, so as to administer to his needs during the night. Both men, however, at times drank to excess, and at times quarreled violently, being both of passionate nature. These quarrels, as far as the testimony shows, were followed by speedy reconciliations. They occupied bedrooms in the rear part of the body of the house, fronting each other across a wide passage, and the doors of these rooms were in line, for the free circulation of air. As Maxcy Lee said, the house was built for ventilation. Dr. Henry Lee's room was on the right to one going down the passage from the front door of the house, and Maxcy Lee's on the left. Some two weeks or ten days before the fatal occurrence, Maxcy Lee had borrowed from a friend at Darlington C. H. (one Early) a double-barreled, hammerless, breech-loading gun, of superior make and value, for the purpose, he said, of killing some turkeys that had become wild, and had obtained, to go with it, No. 3 or 4 shot. This gun was regarded as a curiosity worth looking at by Maxcy Lee, and friends of his called in, or were called in, to examine it. There was some difficulty in unbreeching and working it, and, Maxcy being unskillful in so doing, his father handled the gun for inspection. The gun had its place in Maxcy's room, while the father had a gun that was kept in his own room. October 5th Maxcy Lee went to Darlington C. H., and while there obtained permission from Early to retain the gun a little longer. He returned home late in the day, riding with his brother Dickson Lee, who came with him. They had whisky with them, and on reaching home some hot water was obtained, and father and sons together took a toddy. As far as the testimony shows, they were on the best of terms, and were seated together in the bedroom of the father. No dinner had been put up or prepared for Maxcy, and he ordered an early supper, and was perhaps put out because he had nothing to eat. The father asked about the Early gun, and Maxcy said Early had sold it for $100. Sim Woods, a colored servant, was present, and asked to see the gun; and, being told to do so, he got the gun from Maxcy's room and handed it to Dr. Henry Lee, who unbreeched it. Sim said it was unloaded, but he failed to put himself in a position to ascertain this fact. The old man was seated when he handled the gun, and Sim and Maxcy were standing; and, unless Sim had been standing just behind the stock of the gun, he could not have seen whether or not it was loaded. One barrel certainly was unloaded. After the gun had been replaced, Sim was told to go after the mail. It was raining, and, looking for an umbrella, Sim found that Maxcy's was broken. Upon this, Maxcy spoke very roughly and angrily to Mrs. Munn, reproaching her for not taking better care of his property. As far as the testimony shows, this roughness of the son did not offend the father. They were apparently sitting there, in the father's bedroom, on the friendliest of terms; the one imparting the news of the court house to the other. The 2d of October had been the father's birthday, and as a birthday present the son had given him a gold watch chain. Dickson had left, and Dr. Henry Lee had walked out to the road to meet Sim and receive his mail. While there, Mrs. Munn, doubtless offended by Maxcy's rough talk, came out of the house with a bundle. The old doctor directed her to go back, but, saying that she could not, she went her way. The old man got his mail (papers and letters) and went to the house. Sim and another negro were at the well, near the road. They saw him enter the house, and directly afterwards, as they say, they heard the report of the gun. Dr. Henry Lee said: 'As I came down the passage, Maxcy shot me from his door. He was in eight feet of me.' If Sim heard aright, he said further that Maxcy was standing in his (Maxcy's) room door, and shot him as he turned to go into his (Dr. Henry Lee's) room door. Maxcy Lee said that he was still in his father's room when the old man returned with the mail; that he (Maxcy) took his letters and went into his own room and sat on his bed, working with the gun in his lap; that his father came out in the passage and stood in front of him, eating an apple, when the gun fired." The defendant was found guilty, with a recommendation to mercy, and sentenced to life imprisonment in the state penitentiary. He appealed upon the following exceptions:

"(1) That his honor abused his discretion in refusing to continue the case in accordance with the motion of the defendant made on the 25th and 26th days of October, as it is respectfully submitted that said case should have been continued upon the physician's certificate presented for that purpose on said days.

"(2) That his honor abused his discretion in refusing to continue the case under the physician's certificate presented of date November 6, 1899, to which day he had postponed the trial of the case from the 26th day of October; it being respectfully submitted that under said certificate the defendant was not in any condition to undergo the strain of a serious trial, and the case should have accordingly been continued.

"(3) Because it is respectfully submitted that his honor, the circuit judge, abused his discretion in refusing, when said certificate of date November 6th was presented, and motion made for continuance, to allow defendant's counsel to call into court the physician, to more abundantly and fully show that defendant was not in fit physical condition to stand the trial.

"(4) His honor erred in charging the jury, in his preliminary charge, as follows: 'If you come to the conclusion by the preponderance of the evidence that the killing was accidental, you will then have to determine whether it was such an accidental killing as should be allowed to go unpunished, or whether it belongs to another class of accidental killing, that requires to be punished. If you come to the conclusion that it was not accidental, then you will have to determine whether it was unlawful homicide, and, if so, whether it was murder or manslaughter.' His honor thus, it is respectfully submitted, making the conclusion of the jury as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant dependent upon a preponderance of the evidence, thus throwing the burden upon the defendant of establishing his innocence, and not upon the state to prove his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt upon the whole case, thereby misleading the jury in laying down the rules of law by which they were to consider the testimony, inasmuch as in his entire preliminary charge he failed to instruct the jury to the effect that upon the whole case, including the evidence as to the special defense, the jury must be satisfied of the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt.

"(5) If some accidental homicides are punishable in law, as his honor instructed the jury, his honor erred in charging the jury in his said preliminary charge, 'The defendant, as I understand from his counsel, does not deny the fact of the killing, but sets up a plea that it was accidental;' and again in charging, 'But he pleads that it was an accidental killing,'—thus indicating to the jury that the defendant had set up a plea which furnished no excuse in law, and misstating what the defendant's plea was; the defendant having pleaded not guilty to the indictment, and set up the plea of excusable homicide, by reason of the fact that the killing was done accidentally, without criminal carelessness on his part.

"(6) His honor erred in instructing the jury in his said preliminary charge as follows: 'The defendant who sets up the plea of accidental killing takes upon himself the burden of proving that the killing was accidental. He is not required to prove that beyond a reasonable doubt, but the law requires him to establish that plea by the preponderance of the evidence, by the greater weight of the testimony,'—inasmuch as he failed in his said preliminary charge also to instruct the jury that the defendant must have the benefit of every reasonable doubt upon a consideration of the entire testimony in the case; the jury thus being under a misapprehension as to the rules of law by which they were to be governed while they were hearing the evidence in the case.

"(7) His honor erred in instructing the jury as follows: 'The jury must gather from the testimony four requisites of the plea of accidental homicide, which I hope the jury will bear in mind: First. The jury must be satisfied by the preponderance of the evidence that the killing was indeed and in truth accidental; that no element of intention entered into the act. Second. That at the time of the killing the defendant was not engaged in any unlawful occupation or doing any unlawful act. Third. That, if he was engaged in a lawful occupation or doing a lawful act, that he was doing so with a due regard to the lives and persons of the bystanders or those in the range of the danger; and the jury is to be the judge of the amount of care and caution to be exercised under the various circumstances. Fourth. It should be shown to the satisfaction of the jury, by the preponderance of the evidence, that the defendant at the time of the killing had no intention to kill or injure the deceased or any one else;' the said charge, it is respectfully submitted, being incomplete, to the disadvantage of the defendant, and not in accordance with law. It was incomplete, and so calculated to mislead the jury: (1) In that it failed tc add that, whatever the conclusion as to the preponderance of the testimony in respect to the special plea, the defendant could be convicted only in case, upon the whole testimony, the jury should become satisfied of his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; (2) in that it failed to instruct the jury, in the case of unlawful occupation at the time of the killing, as to the difference in the character of the offense, and the degree of crime, dependent on whether the defendant was engaged in the commission of a felony or in the commission of a misdemeanor; (3) and that, in matter of negligent killing, it failed to instruct the jury that the negligence must be more than would be sufficient as a basis for a civil action for damages, and must be so gross as to become culpable and afford a reasonable ground for the implication of malice. The charge was not in accordance with law, in that it made the jury sole judge of the amount of care and caution to be observed, when it is submitted that the negligence in such case presents a mixed question of law and fact, and the jury should have been instructed as to what constitutes criminal negligence in law.

"(8) His honor erred, in his said preliminary charge, in instructing the jury that they must gather from the testimony, as one of the requisites of accidental homicide, 'that at the time of the killing the defendant was not engaged in any unlawful occupation or doing any unlawful act,' without also explaining to or instructing the jury that said unlawful act must be one out of which the killing arose.

"(9) His honor erred, in his said preliminary charge, in utterly failing to charge the jury that the defendant must be acquitted unless the jury should be satisfied from a consideration of the whole testimony adduced that the defendant was guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, and that it was the duty of the state to make out its case accordingly, thus leaving it to the jury to reason upon and weigh the testimony while they were hearing it upon the mere preponderance of the evidence, and placing the burden upon the defendant to prove his innocence on his special defense.

"(10) His honor erred in admitting in the testimony a statement of the witness Sim Woods as to what he said occurred between the deceased and defendant a week or two before the killing, and a conversation which took place between them; the same having no relevancy to the issue, involving no threat applicable to the killing, indicating in no way the relations between the defendant and the deceased on the 5th of October, 1899, and preceding a friendly living together and harmonious intercourse that had been put in testimony by the state.

"(11) His honor erred in admitting the statement of the witness Sim Woods as to the alleged conversation between the defendant and deceased, and the abusive language used by him to Mrs. Munn, the evening of the killing; the said testimony being irrelevant to the issue, and not a part of the res gestæ, and tending simply to prejudice the minds of the jury against the defendant.

"(12) His honor erred in admitting the alleged dying declarations of Dr. H. J. Lee, testified to by the said witness Sim Woods, because it did not appear that at the time the alleged dying declarations were made the deceased believed, or expressed his belief, that death was imminent or impending, and because said alleged dying declarations did not relate to the circumstances of the killing, but the deceased was merely characterizing the act and expressing his opinion, unsupported by circumstances, and which he would not have been allowed to testify to under oath, had he survived.

"(13) His honor erred in permitting the witness Dr. Wallace to testify to alleged dying declarations of the deceased, because it was not made to appear that the deceased believed or was informed that death was imminent or impending at the time said alleged declarations were made, and because they involved a mere opinion of the deceased, unsupported by any circumstances.

"(14) Even if the alleged dying declarations stated by Dr. Wallace were otherwise competent testimony, his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in refusing defendant's motion to strike out that part of the so-called dying declarations which clearly related to the matter of opinion expressed by the deceased.

"(15) His honor erred in permitting the witness Dr. Wallace to state in the presence of the jury what the defendant said about his father five or six years or more before the killing, to the effect that one or the other of them would have to die before nine o'clock that night; said testimony being utterly irrelevant to the issue, and being entirely remote from any proof of threats or motive to take the life of the deceased years thereafter, and tending only to prejudice the jury against the defendant.

"(16) His honor erred in admitting in evidence the alleged dying declaration of the deceased, testified to by Mrs. M. V. Galloway, there not being sufficient evidence that the deceased, at the time the alleged declarations were made to her, considered that death was imminent or impending; and, if otherwise competent, said alleged dying declarations should have been excluded because they did not relate to the circumstances of the killing, and were utterly incompetent to go to the jury as dying declarations of the deceased.

"(17) His honor erred in permitting the witness W. K. Thomas to testify as to what the deceased said about his chances for living or dying, for the purpose of determining the admissibility of the alleged dying declarations of the deceased, which his honor had already ruled to be admissible as such.

"(18) His honor erred in interrogating the witness W. K. Thomas, when recalled, for the purpose of showing what the deceased said as to living or dying, and undertaking himself to extract from the witness testimony which the solicitor had failed to bring out, inasmuch as by so doing he invaded the province of the jury, and indicated his opinion as to the value of the alleged dying declarations, and stepped beyond the province of the judge in jury trials, contrary to the spirit, if not the letter, of article 5, § 26, of the constitution.

"(19) His honor erred in permitting the witness Mrs. S. E. Hay to testify to alleged dying declarations of the deceased; there being no sufficient evidence to show that the deceased considered or believed that death was imminent or impending at the time said alleged declarations were made by him, and because, if otherwise competent, the said alleged dying declarations did not relate to the circumstances of the killing, but involved a mere opinion of the deceased, unsupported by circumstances.

"(20) His honor erred, during the examination of the witness Mrs. S. E. Hay, in stating in the presence of the jury: 'I hold that the testimony justifies the opinion that there was a continuous dying condition, of which the deceased was aware; bearing in mind that he was a medical man, and able, therefore, to form a more intelligent opinion of his condition than a layman,'—thereby indicating his opinion as to the value or weight to be given to the alleged dying declarations by the jury; his honor's duty being simply to pass upon the admissibility of the testimony.

"(21) His honor erred in questioning the witness Dr. Wallace, when recalled by the solicitor, as to the belief of the deceased as to whether he would live or die, asking the witness a series of questions thereon, and endeavoring thereby to bring out by his examination testimony which the solicitor had failed to bring out by asking the witness leading questions tending to elicit the testimony desired for the state, and, by the form and manner of his examination of said witness, indicating to the jury his opinion upon a material question of fact for their consideration, and thereby violating article 5, § 26, of the constitution of this state.

"(22) His honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in admitting in testimony the alleged dying declarations of the deceased testified to by the witness Henry Thomas, because there was no sufficient evidence that at the time the alleged dying declarations were made the deceased believed or was told that death was imminent or impending, and because, even if said alleged declarations were otherwise competent, they were inadmissible and incompetent because the statement by the deceased that he was willfully shot by the defendant was a mere expression of opinion from him, unsupported by circumstances.

"(23) His honor erred in directing, of his own motion, that Dr. Wallace be recalled when Henry Thomas was upon the stand, for the purpose of undertaking to prove by the former that the deceased was in a dying condition at the time the alleged declarations testified to by Henry Thomas were made, and himself examining Dr. Wallace, and putting to him such leading questions, and in such form and manner, as to indicate to the witness and to the jury his opinion upon a question of fact for the consideration of the jury, to wit, the value of the alleged dying declarations as testimony, and whether death was imminent and impending at the time; the sole province of the judge on that question being to pass upon the admissibility of the testimony offered by the state.

"(24) His honor erred, when passing upon the defendant's objection to the witness Henry Thomas stating what the deceased said to him as to the killing, by clearly indicating to the jury, in his remarks thereon, his opinion as to the force and value of the alleged dying declarations; the same being a question of fact for the jury. Especially did his honor err herein in his remarks as to admitting such testimony, by using the following language in the presence of the jury: 'A statement made by a dying person, warned to state all the circumstances for the purpose of being used as evidence, sometimes comes with a questionable coloring, because even a dying person may have a desire for vengeance on the person who kills him; but, where statements are made without any warning that they are going to be used as testimony, they come into court as dying declarations if the court is satisfied that the person was really in a dying condition and had no hope of recovery.'

"(25) His honor erred, when the witness

Henry Thomas was being examined for the state by the solicitor, and objection was interposed by the defendant to his testimony, in directing, of his own motion, that the witness Dr. Wallace be recalled, and in taking out of the hands of the solicitor the examination of said witness, to bring out all the facts as to witness' knowledge as to the condition of the deceased, and what he said, there being involved in his honor's questions and in the witness' answers a very material inquiry for the jury, to wit, whether the deceased was in a dying condition, and as to the worth and value of the alleged dying declarations; it being respectfully submitted that such examination upon material and vital questions of fact for the consideration by the jury should be inquired from witnesses by the solicitor, and not by the presiding judge.

"(26) His honor erred, when defendant objected to certain testimony about to be elicited from the witness O. D. Lee, in making the following remarks thereon: 'This, I apprehend, will relate to what was testified by Dr. Wallace as to a threat alleged to have been made four or five years ago;' his honor thus stating in the presence of the jury that the remarks alleged to have been made about his father by the defendant years before the killing, and previously testified to by Dr. Wallace, constituted a threat by the defendant against his father, the same being a question of fact entirely for the jury; and thereby his honor invaded the province of the jury in relation to the said question of fact, as to which they should have been left to reach their own conclusions without any intimation of opinion by the circuit judge.

"(27) His honor erred in permitting the witness Willie Warr to testify to an alleged difficulty between deceased and defendant, and to go into the particulars thereof, which was alleged to have occurred a week before the killing, and which, it is submitted, was irrevelant to the issue; and it being further submitted that the state should have been confined to the proof of hostile relations that existed, if any, between the parties at the time of the killing, and not allowed to go into the particular instances of disputes or difficulties, and the details thereof.

"(28) His honor erred, in his final charge to the jury, in urging upon them to reach an agreement and to change their individual conclusions upon the evidence; thus, it is submitted, leaving the members of the jury to conclude that the exercise of their separate independent judgments, if it should result in a disagreement, would be displeasing to the court and abhorrent to the law, whereas the exercise of such independent judgment by every juror is the basis of jury trial.

"(29) His honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in his said final charge, in that, although he instructed the jury that the burden of proof was on the defendant throughout to establish a special defense, yet he failed also to make it clearly evident to the jury that it was the duty of the state to prove the defendant's guilt, upon the whole case, beyond a reasonable doubt.

"(30) His honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'You will therefore take the evidence and determine for yourselves whether the defendant has satisfied you by the greater weight of testimony that he should be allowed to go free and unpunished; thus leaving the jury to acquit or convict accordingly as the defendant had satisfied them that he was guilty or innocent.

"(31) His honor erred in instructing the jury in his said final charge that before they could acquit the defendant they must be satisfied by the preponderance of the evidence that the four requisites which he laid down were complied with and fully met, whereas he should have instructed them that, although it rested upon the defendant to establish a special defense, yet before they could convict they must be satisfied of the guilt of the defendant, upon the whole case, beyond a reasonable doubt; his honor's instructions herein being, it is submitted, especially misleading to the jury, although he did afterwards charge that the failure of the defendant to establish such special plea did not relieve the state of the burden of proving his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

"(32) His honor erred in charging the jury in respect to matters of fact, in violation of article 5, § 26, of the constitution of this state, as follows: 'In this case the state argues to you that murder has been proved by the dying declarations of the deceased, and by circumstantial evidence, and by evidence of the admissions of the defendant. You will recall that in the course of the trial the court was required repeatedly to pass upon the admissibility or inadmissibility of certain evidence; and if there is before you evidence of any statement made by the deceased before he died, but after the mortal stroke was given or the mortal shot was fired, such evidence has been admitted, if it be in the case, after the court was satisfied that the dying man knew that he was a dying man and had no hope of recovery, and made a statement under the expectation of impending death. If there is such evidence in the case for you to consider, all that my decision as to that evidence amounted to was that it was admissible as evidence,—not that you are to take it as absolutely true, but that you are to consider it just as you take evidence taken on the stand from a witness that has been sworn to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. It comes before you without being cross-examined. You are to weigh it, and say from its internal evidence and from the other evidence in the case whether, in your opinion, it is true or not. Such evidence is admissible under the theory that a person who is on the verge of the grave, looking into the face of death, having given up hope of life, is free from any temptation to tell what is not true, and that his circumstances take the place of the oath administered to the witness in court; and although such statements made by the dying person are, from their very nature, hearsay, and although generally hearsay is not admitted in court as evidence, that is an exception to the rule, and such statements are admitted in evidence, and are to be considered by the jury.

"(33) His honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'If there is circumstantial evidence in the case, you will weigh it and ascertain what facts the state has proved. If the state has proved one or more facts by circumstantial evidence, then you will say what presumptions arise out of those facts. In the majority of cases that come into the criminal court, the state is bound to rely wholly or in part on circumstantial evidence, in contradistinction from the evidence of eyewitnesses, which is spoken of as positive testimony;' his honor thus charging the jury as to matters of fact, in violation of article 5, § 26, of the constitution of this state.

"(34) His honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'If there are admissions of the defendant himself in evidence, you will consider them. They are admitted in evidence, being an exception to hearsay. They are admitted in evidence, and you are to determine whether or not they are true, and, if true, what is their effect as indicating, or not, the guilt of the defendant;' his honor thus charging the jury with respect to matters of fact, and thus violating the provisions of article 5, § 26, of the constitution of this state.

"(35) His honor erred in charging the jury 'that the defendant in this case is not to be acquitted on the ground of accidental homicide unless he has satisfied you by the greater weight of the testimony that he is entitled to be excused and go unpunished,' whereas he should have charged that the defendant must be acquitted unless the state proved his guilt upon the whole case, including any special plea, beyond a reasonable doubt.

"(36) His honor erred throughout his said final charge, whenever charging the jury upon the matter of proof of a special defense, in failing to clearly state to the jury that the defendant must be convicted, if at all, upon the proof by the state of his guilt upon the whole case, including the testimony as to a special defense, beyond a reasonable doubt."

It will not be necessary to consider these exceptions in detail, as all the questions presented by them can be disposed of under the heads arranged by the appellant's attorneys in their arguments. The first question to be considered is whether there was error on the part of the presiding judge in refusing the motion of the defendant for a continuance, made on the grounds fully set forth in the record. After a careful consideration of the facts, we fail to discover any error in refusing the motion.

The next question for consideration is whether there was error in allowing the state to introduce in evidence the statements of the deceased as dying declarations. The appellant's attorneys interposed two objections to the admissibility of said testimony. It was objected first that the conditions required for the admission of the testimony were not present, and next that the declaration was an inadmissible expression of opinion. We will first consider whether the requisite conditions existed for the introduction of the said testimony. In 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 382, it is said: "As to their relevancy, dying declarations are governed by the same rules as testimony, except that they are restricted to the act of killing and the circumstances immediately attending it, as forming part of the res gestæ." In the same volume (page 364) it said: "In order that the dying declarations of a deceased person may be admissible under the dying-declarations rule, the declarant must at the time of making them have been in extremis, and fully conscious of his impending dissolution. Both of these conditions must exist. Thus it has been said that it is not alone sufficient that the declarant believe that he is about to die. To be admissible under the dying-declarations rule, his declarations must have been made while he was in extremis. And, even though the declarant was in extremis, his declarations are not admissible unless they were made by him while he was under a sense of impending death. To render his declarations admissible, the declarant must not only believe that he is about to die, but must be without any expectation of recovery. * * * According to the clear preponderance of authority, if the deceased had the slightest hope of recovery when the declarations were made, they are inadmissible." The rules are stated in State v. Bradley, 34 S. C. 139, 13 S. E. 316, as follows: "(1) Death must be imminent at the time the declaration was made. (2) The declarant must be so fully aware of this as to be without hope of life. (3) The subject of the charge must be the death of the declarant, and circumstances of the death must be the subject of the declaration." In State v. Johnson, 26 S. C. 155, 1 S. E. 511, it was said: "We are aware that cases have been cited, and others might be, decided elsewhere, in which courts have gone to extreme lengths in excluding dying declarations as not coming fully up to the rule; but we do not think any set form of words should be required to show that the declarant was in such a condition as to render his declarations competent, but that the court must draw a rational conclusion from all that was said, taken in connection with such surrounding circumstances as must have been known to the declarant, as to whether the declarant was in such a condition of mind as would render his declarations competent. None of the cases in this state have gone to such lengths as we find in some of the cases elsewhere, and we are not disposed to follow such cases." We have not undertaken to reproduce the testimony relevant to this question, as it would not be of any practical benefit. We are, however, fully satisfied that there was a compliance with all the requirements of law, and that there was no error in this respect in allowing said testimony to be introduced.

We will next consider whether said testimony was inadmissible on the ground that it was the expression of an opinion. When the state offered to introduce in evidence the statement hereinafter mentioned, the following took place: "Mr. Woods: If your honor please, my position is this: That that is a declaration on the part of the deceased of inferences from a state of circumstances which is not stated, and that the court has laid down the rule that it must relate to the circumstances themselves, not to inferences or conclusions from these circumstances. The general doctrine is that nothing can be stated by this witness in regard to the alleged dying declarations which the deceased, if living, would not be allowed to testify to in an action of assault and battery. Q. (By the court to the witness). Was what he said about a drunken fool part of the same conversation? A. Yes, sir. The Court: I cannot hold that the expression 'He shot me for nothing,' or 'He killed me for nothing,' is purely an expression of opinion. It might be and it might not be, just as an expression 'He shot me accidentally' may or may not be a matter of opinion. It may be a matter of fact stated in that manner. It certainly is as much a matter of fact as if a dying person were to say 'He shot me from anger,' or 'from jealousy,' or 'from revenge,' or 'because I struck him.' If the deceased knew of no cause for the shooting, it is difficult to see how he could have expressed that better than to say 'He shot me for nothing.' But my ruling is not as to the expression, 'He shot me for nothing,' alone. The statement is one statement, as I understand it from the witness, and concludes with the statement, 'To be killed by a drunken fool.' Mr. Woods: I think I had better put my objection in this form: I object to the whole statement. Does your honor rule the whole statement in? The Court: If it is one statement. Mr. Woods: Then I move to strike out the objectionable part and leave the unobjectionable part in, even though it is one statement. The Court: I must let the whole statement in. (Exception noted. The jury were now overruled.) Q. Now state plainly, so that the jury can hear it, just what the old doctor said about the killing to his daughter Mrs. Josey. A. He said: 'Fannie, Max has shot me.' He said: 'An old man, three score and ten, to raise up a son to kill him in his own house for nothing,—a drunken fool.' He said, 'Don't you think this is a high state of civilization?'" The declarant also stated that the shooting was willful and malicious. The appellant's attorneys admit there are authorities to the effect that testimony that the deceased was shot "for nothing" is admissible as a dying declaration, and cite the case of Boyle v. State, 105 Ind. 469, 5 N. E. 203, 55 Am. Rep. 218, in which the court uses this language: "The declaration does not assume to be the expression of an opinion, but it professes to be, and in truth is, the statement of a fact; for, if there was no reason or cause whatever, no opinion could be given for its sufficiency or insufficiency. Whether there is any cause for an act must be a fact, but, if it be conceded that there is a cause, then whether it was or was not adequate might well be deemed matter of opinion." The court further says: "There is an essential difference between a statement denying a thing, and one admitting the existence of a thing and qualifying its character. Thus, to declare that liquor was sold, but not illegally, or that a man was struck, but not unlawfully, would, so far as the qualifying words are concerned, be a conclusion. If, however, these words should be struck out, facts only would remain." The words, "He shot me for nothing," are not merely the expression of an opinion, but the statement of a fact, and there was no error in admitting such testimony. There is another reason why not only this declaration, but testimony that he was shot willfully and maliciously, was admissible in evidence. In the case of Jones v. Fuller, 19 S. C. 70, the rule is thus stated: "From these authorities we deduce the following conclusions: First, that the exception to the general rule that the opinions of witnesses are not competent evidence is not confined to the case of expert testimony; second, that while it is necessary that the witness should first state facts upon which he bases his opinion, where facts are such as are capable of being produced in language, it is not necessary to do so where the facts are not capable of reproduction in such a way as to bring before the mind of the jury the condition of things upon which the witness bases his opinion; third, that such evidence is competent from the necessity of the case." Although the deceased did not state the facts and circumstances that induced him to believe that the shooting was willful and malicious, nevertheless there was testimony tending to show facts and circumstances within his knowledge upon which his opinion might have been based. Under such circumstances, the testimony was properly submitted for the consideration of the jury.

The next question to be disposed of is whether there was error in the preliminary charge. The only error assigned is that the presiding judge failed to charge certain propositions of law mentioned in the exceptions. These propositions were afterwards charged, and, even if there was error in the first instance, it was thereafter remedied.

The next question that will be considered is whether the presiding judge committed error of law in charging on the facts. The exception raising this question is too general, but, waiving this objection, it cannot be sustained, as we fail to discover wherein the defendant was prejudiced.

Under the head of "Alleged Errors of Law in Final Charge," the appellant's attorneys argue as follows: "In his final charge the circuit judge made the guilt or innocence of the accused to depend upon a preponderance of the testimony as to a special defense. Notably, he said to the jury, 'I charge you that the defendant in this case is not to be acquitted on the ground of accidental homicide unless he has satisfied you by the greater weight of the testimony that he is entitled to be excused and go unpunished.' And again in charging: 'If, however, you are satisfied by the preponderance of the evidence that the homicide was such an accidental homicide as should not be excused, but that it was an accidental homicide which should be punished as involuntary manslaughter (I think you will remember what I explained to you in that connection), you will say, "Guilty of involuntary slaughter;"' thus instructing that, unless the jury was satisfied that the homicide was excusable because accidental, conviction followed." These words should be considered in connection with the other parts of the charge, and when so construed we are satisfied that there was no prejudicial error. They also say in their argument: "Again, his honor erred in charging: 'Or if, after the definition I have given you, you come to the conclusion that, even if an accidental homicide, it was such an accidental homicide as takes place when a defendant is doing an unlawful or felonious act, you will in that case have to find him guilty of murder,'—because, even if the homicide was committed while the defendant was in pursuance of an unlawful act, not felonious, the jury could at most only find him guilty of manslaughter." The presiding judge substantially charged the law applicable to the case, and, if the appellant's attorneys desired a more specific charge, requests to that effect should have been presented. They say likewise: "His honor governed the jury, with respect to the amount of care, caution, and prudence that the defendant should have exercised, as would be required in a civil case, and failed to charge them as to what was criminal carelessness, at the same time making the jury sole judges of both the facts and the law on this subject." As has just been stated, the presiding judge charged the law substantially, and, if a more specific charge was desired, requests should have been presented.

The appellant contends that there was error in admitting evidence of other disputes and quarrels in which the defendant used threats against the deceased. In the case of State v. Campbell, 35 S. C. 32, 14 S. E. 294, the court says: "We are not aware of any rule of law which fixes any definite time within which a threat must be made, before the perpetration of the act to which it is supposed to refer, in order to render testimony as to the making of the threat competent evidence. Of course, where a great or even a considerable length of time has elapsed between the making of the threat and the perpetration of the deed to which it is supposed to point, such length of time is a circumstance to be considered by the jury in determining whether there is any connection between the threat and the deed, but there is no rule of law, and, in the nature of things, it would be practically impossible to prescribe any rule, fixing the limit beyond which a threat would not be competent evidence." The testimony was therefore admissible.

The appellant lastly contends that there was error on the part of the circuit judge in intimating his opinion on the facts during the progress of the case, but we fail to discover any error in this respect necessitating a reversal of the sentence. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

ROUNDS et al. v. AIKEN MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 27, 1900.)

ARBITRATION AND AWARD—BUILDING CONTRACTS—SUBMISSION—PROCEEDINGS—PUBLICATION—REVIEW.

1. Where the terms of a building contract called for a gross sum for all the work to be performed thereunder, for the submission of differences to the arbitration of designated persons, and that payment for extra work should be governed by the contract price, it was proper for the arbitrators to determine the value of such extra work by the current market price thereof.

2. Where one of the arbitrators testified that he gave plaintiff notice that the umpire agreed on would sit with the board at a certain meeting, and it appeared that at the meeting plaintiff's arbitrator, in response to a question, announced that plaintiff would not be present, owing to doubts as to his ability to establish his claim, this was sufficient to establish that plaintiff had notice of the meeting.

3. Where the action of the board of arbitrators at a certain meeting was communicated to plaintiff the following day, and plaintiff attended several meetings of the board thereafter, and never made objection to the work of the board, he cannot complain that he was not notified of the meeting.

4. Where, under the terms of a contract providing for the submission of certain differences to arbitration, it was provided that, in case of a disagreement between the two arbitrators appointed, they should call in a designated person as umpire, it was not necessary for the umpire, when called in, to hear the testimony of witnesses, but it was proper for him to arrive at his conclusion from the findings of the other two arbitrators.

5. It is no objection to an award of arbitrators that it was not signed by the umpire until the morning after the other two had signed it, where the terms of the submission make the finding of two sufficient, and do not require any formal publication thereof, and it appears that the parties were duly served with a copy of the award.

6. In the absence of a statutory requirement, it is not necessary that witnesses before a board of arbitrators should be sworn.

7. Where matters of dispute have been submitted to arbitrators, and they have heard evidence in good faith, and after full consideration determined the matters, their finding will not be reviewed because of mere errors of judgment.

8. Where in the findings of a board of arbitrators there was an allowance made for extra woodwork complete, and it appeared that the woodwork was painted, an objection that no allowance was made for extra painting was not well taken.

9. Where a submission to arbitration was for the purpose of determining "the price to be paid for such extra work, * * * or the amount to be deducted for omissions by the contractors in the erection of the building," etc., and the evidence before the board showed that certain ventilators were of an inferior quality, an objection that they were allowed at only $10, whereas they cost $35, was not well taken, since the deficiency in quality constituted an omission, within the meaning of the terms of the contract, and the finding of the arbitrators thereon is conclusive.

10. Where it appeared that plaintiffs, in their bid for the erection of a building, had estimated 928,339 brick for a wheel pit, but had put in only 519,020, the difference constituted an "omission," within the meaning of the contract, providing for the submission to arbitration of questions as to the amounts to be deducted for "omissions in the erection of the building," and was therefore within the jurisdiction of the board of arbitrators.

11. The fact that defendant in a case before arbitrators had admitted certain allowances to plaintiff for brick did not preclude the board from allowing a smaller amount, since a board of arbitration is not governed by the technical rules of law as to the admission of evidence, etc., but is intended to arrive at a just determination of the matters in dispute.

12. The fact that an agent of defendant was present at the sittings of the board of arbitration while determining matters in controversy between plaintiff and defendant, and acted as its clerk in figuring amounts, is not ground for setting aside the award, where plaintiff was also permitted to be present, and made no objection to the conduct of the agent or to his presence, and it did not appear that any harm was done thereby.

13. Where it appeared that defendants had paid for four cords of wood as material to be used by plaintiff in constructing a mill house under a contract, the latter had no right to dispose of it; and, having done so, the item became a proper charge against plaintiff before a board of arbitration sitting for the settlement of differences between plaintiff and defendant.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Aiken county; W. C. Benet, Judge.

Action by Charles L. Rounds and J. C. Hagler, co-partners, against the Aiken Manufacturing Company, to set aside an award of arbitrators. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. T. Gary and G. W. Croft & Son, for appellants. Henderson Bros. and Joseph R. Lamar, for respondent.

POPE, J. This action was commenced on the 1st day of June, 1898. I do not know that any words of mine would more accurately describe how the action was, in the opinion of the plaintiffs, rendered necessary, with the grounds for that opinion, than by adopting those employed by the circuit judge (Judge Benet) in his well-considered opinion. Hence I will reproduce the text of that decree:

"Decree.

"The defendant, the Aiken Manufacturing Company, a corporation by and under the laws of this state, having organized to do business as manufacturers of cotton goods at Bath, in the county and state aforesaid, determined to erect a brick structure or cotton factory at said place; and, having advertised for competitive bids for the erection of said buildings and appurtenances, the plaintiffs on March 11, 1895, filed with the defendant's agent a bid, in writing, to do the work according to the plans and specifications that had been previously prepared by an architect, and which had been examined by the plaintiffs. Said bid, together with the pencil memorandum known in the case as the "Barrett Memorandum," and which will be herein referred to, shows that the plaintiffs undertook to do the work required on the original mill and appurtenances for the lump sum of $53,198; and said bid, so modified by the Barrett memorandum, passed into a written agreement, which was made and executed by the parties on March 16, 1895, which paper is the contract in the case. It is noteworthy that there is not a thing set forth in the contract going to show at what price the plaintiffs were to furnish lumber or material of any kind, except as set forth in the nineteenth section of said article,—that the brick were to be at $4.25 per M., on an estimate that it took 2,000,000 of brick to complete the work. There is nothing in the contract going to show on what basis the plaintiffs estimated that they should be paid for laying brick, either in Portland or Rosendale cement or lime. It is further agreed that all extra work should be paid for in proportion to the work in the original contract, and section 26 provides that no payment on account by the owners shall be deemed a waiver of the right to object to defective material or imperfect work. The work under the contract progressed, and as it progressed extra additions were agreed to be made to the mill and to the work, all under the same contract, and the builders, or plaintiffs, went on to carry out the same. Payments were made to them from time to time, and it is unquestioned that much more than the original contract price was paid to them. After the work was completed, dispute arose as to the amounts due to the plaintiffs by the defendant, and in order to settle said disputes without litigation an agreement in writing was entered into by the parties to submit the same to arbitration. The terms of said agreement are important. The preamble recites that whereas, the contract aforesaid provides 'that any dispute or difference concerning the meaning and construction of the plans, drawings, or specifications, as to what is extra work, shall be decided by the architect'; and whereas, in the specifications it is provided that 'in case any dispute arises respecting the true value of the extra work, or of work omitted at the request of the owner, the same shall be valued by two competent persons, one employed by the owner and the other by the contractor, and those to have the power to name an umpire, whose decision shall be binding upon all parties'; and whereas, a controversy is pending 'in relation to the price to be paid by said company to said Rounds & Hagler for certain extra work done and performed by said Rounds & Hagler for said company upon their mill and canal and other structures at Bath, and also for material furnished by said Rounds & Hagler in doing such work, and deductions for work omitted.' Then the matter in dispute is submitted to the arbitrament and award of arbitrators, to determine 'the price to be paid for such extra and additional work and material furnished, or of the amount to be deducted for omissions by them in the erection and building of the Aiken Manufacturing Company's mill and canal and other structures at Bath, South Carolina.' It is agreed, further, that the builders shall nominate one of said arbitrators, and the owners another. Those are called, in the submission, 'arbitrators,' and they are given 'power to nominate an umpire.' He is called an 'umpire' in the submission. It is further provided, 'The award of any two shall be final and binding upon the parties.' And there is no provision in the submission as to when the award is to be made, as to how it is to be published, or what notice, if any, is to be given to the parties that the award is reached. There is a provision to this effect: 'That the schedule of measurements as made by Rounds & Hagler and A. H. McCarrell, and contained in their respective books, shall be produced and delivered to the board of arbitrators, and, as far as said measurements coincide and agree, they shall be accepted as correct; and, whenever said measurements do not agree, then the board of arbitrators shall take such course as they may deem proper to ascertain such measurements as they need.' There is no provision in the submission as to the acceptance by the arbitrators of any price that may have been placed upon material or work by the contractors or by McCarrell. Under this submission the corporation appointed, as their arbitrator, Joseph B. Storey; the plaintiffs appointed, as theirs, Charles B. Allen; and those two appointed, as the umpire, T. O. Brown; and on the 15th day of September, 1896, the three parties took an oath to carry out the terms of the submission. The evidence in the case shows that these three gentlemen are competent men, and stand well in the city of Augusta, where they live; and, in fact, in the argument of the case counsel on both sides paid proper tribute to all of them. The two arbitrators, Storey and Allen, met. McCarrell appeared before them as representing the company, and Mr. Rounds the firm of Rounds & Hagler. It is unquestioned that a rule or regulation was agreed on, which was notified both to McCarrell and Rounds, that the arbitrators would meet every afternoon at the office of the Aiken Manufacturing Company, in Augusta, Georgia, at three o'clock, and sit a reasonable time to consider the matters in question. This place was chosen without any objection on the part of Mr. Rounds, and at the suggestion of Mr. Allen, because he said it was more commodious and suitable than his own private place of business. Both McCarrell and Rounds were present at many meetings. The arbitrators made calculations in the presence of both of them, questioned them, examined other witnesses, and went into all documents presented. Rounds made no objection either to the place of meeting, the mode of procedure, or the fact that McCarrell was present, or to the fact that sometimes he was called upon to do figuring for the arbitrators. These meetings continued through many days. Mr. Rounds testifies that he did not attend a good many of these meetings, for the reason that he had business elsewhere that called him, and he could not attend. Mr. Allen testifies that quite frequently, after the arbitrators had their afternoon sittings, he told Mr. Rounds of what was going on, and of the decisions which were reached by the arbitrators. It is established that the mode of procedure adopted by the arbitrators was this: That Rounds presented a claim or estimate of his account, which had been previously prepared by Mr. Allen for him, and from his statements; that McCarrell presented a paper, on the one side of which was stated his claim or estimate of the company's version of what was due, and on the other side his statement of the Allen estimate. The arbitrators compared the Allen estimate with its revision by McCarrell, and found it correct, and then proceeded to gather all the facts they could on the various estimates, considering them item by item. It seems that none of the witnesses who were examined (and they were very few) were sworn, nor did any person present ask that they should be sworn. The estimate of McCarrell claimed that the company was due to the builders $2,219.39, but, as the arbitrators proceeded, it is shown that when he made that estimate he was not aware of the facts and figures set forth in the bid of Rounds & Hagler and the Barrett memorandum, or that the ventilators put upon the mill were not Star ventilators, as required by the specifications, or of the size required. It appears that Storey and Allen differed very little, and that, whilst on the item of how many brick Rounds & Hagler bid should be placed on the wheel house and wheel pit they differed, yet there was no contrary decision by them; but Allen preferred that the umpire should be called in to verify his work, as the umpire, Mr. Brown, was very familiar with brick work. He was called in on this matter, and a few other minor matters. What took place then will be considered hereafter. On the 10th of November, 1896, an award was made, signed by both arbitrators and the umpire. All of them swear that they signed the award. It seems that Storey and Allen signed together, and called in Mr. Brown, at Allen's office, and Brown signed in their presence. This award gave to the plaintiffs $1,002.86. This action is brought by the plaintiffs to set aside said award, and the allegations of the complaint will be considered seriatim, together with the facts applicable pro and con to each allegation. There is no allegation of actual fraud on the part of the arbitrators, nor is there any proof that shows any fraud. The specifications of error alleged in the complaint against the award, and upon which it is claimed the award should be set aside, and this matter, which took forty-odd days to be settled by the arbitrators, should be sent to the court for settlement, are set forth in the seventh paragraph of the complaint.

"(1) The first specification of error is as follows: 'That the arbitrators exceeded the authority given them under articles of submission, for they proceeded to readjust, assess, and value the work done and material furnished by the plaintiffs under the original contract, instead of confining their investigation, as they were bound to do under the agreement of submission, to extra material and extra work furnished and performed in doing the additional extra work.' This allegation should be considered along with what is alleged in the fifth paragraph of the complaint,—that it was 'agreed to pay the plaintiffs for and at the same rate and proportion as similar work which the plaintiffs had agreed to do under the original contract'; that is, that the extra work was to be paid at the same rate and proportion as similar work under the original contract. The submission not only provides that the arbitrators should ascertain the price to be paid for such extra and additional work and material furnished, but that they should also ascertain 'the amount to be deducted for omissions in the erection and building of the Aiken Manufacturing Company's mill, its canal, and other structures.' The facts in the case go to show that a gross award was made. The process of procedure adopted by the arbitrators in reaching that result are set forth in what is called the 'O. K. Paper,' in evidence; and that indicated clearly that in order to arrive at the price of the extra work, and the omissions which were made in the original work, the arbitrators were obliged to consider what was done in the original work, and what they did was simply to make, from the evidence and facts before them, upon their best judgments, a statement of the accounts between the parties, setting forth on one side, in the beginning of the contract, price of the original work, $53,198, and following up that credit to Rounds & Hagler by credits of the value of work which they actually did, as found by calculations and measurements, and by placing on the opposite side of the accounts the charges which they considered proper against Rounds & Hagler for omissions, and deductions for omissions which they should pay, and also the money which had been paid to them; and, by this process being followed up to the end, they ascertained that the original work and the extra work were worth, according to the bids of the original work and the value of the extra work, based upon the value of the original work, $78,121.89, and that there had been paid to Rounds & Hagler in cash, and due by them to the company for omissions and deductions, $77,119.03, leaving a balance due them of $1,002.86. If we deduct from $78,121.89, the whole amount estimated as the value of the original contract, and the extra work, the sum of $53,198, the contract price, it will be seen the arbitrators estimated the value of the extra work at $24,923.89. By Paper K, put in evidence, dated November 4, 1896, it will be found that, in reaching their conclusions of the value or price to be paid for laying of brick, Storey and Allen decided 'that the proper and fair prices to be allowed Rounds & Hagler for extra brick work are as follows: $10 per M. for brick in Portland cement; $9 per M. for brick in Rosendale cement; $8 per M. for brick in lime.' The submission required them, where the 'schedule of measurements' between the parties agreed, to take those schedules; but there is nothing in the submission that binds them to take the prices, nor is there anything in the contract fixing the prices. After hearing Rounds & Hagler, and investigating their notebook as to what they claim they bid for this work, and considering the fair price of such work, they decided as stated aforesaid. Mr. Brown, when on the stand, testified that such figures fixed by the arbitrators were fair, and the market prices.

"(2) The second specification of error in the award is that, the umpire having been called to act with the arbitrators, it was necessary that the plaintiffs should have been notified of his sitting with the board, and given an opportunity before the board thus composed, before it acted upon any matter submitted to it, but that no such notice or opportunity was given to the plaintiffs, and hence the award is null and void. The facts on this specification are that Mr. Allen says, in so many words, positively, that he notified Mr. Rounds of the meeting at which Mr. Brown was to appear as umpire. Mr. Storey swears that at the meetings just previous to the night meeting in question, when Mr. Brown was present, and at which previous meeting Storey, Allen, and McCarrell were present, it was agreed that Brown should be called in at that night meeting. This Rounds does not deny, and did not deny when on the stand. He testifies, however, that he knew that Brown was to be called in, and requested Allen to notify him of the meeting. Why Allen should decline to have him present is not explained. Brown testifies that when he reached the meeting place he asked if Rounds was to be present, and Allen said, 'No,' because he told him that his claim would not stand. Allen swears positively that he notified Rounds of the meetings, for the umpire. From this testimony, considering the burden on the plaintiffs to show that there was no notice or opportunity given, it is clear, as a matter of fact, that Rounds had full notice that Brown was to be at that meeting, and, of his own accord, did not attend. He says that Allen told him of the result of the meeting the next morning, and yet he made no objection, and no request for a rehearing; and that decision of Brown reached at the night meeting was on October 16, 1896, and the award was never made until the 10th November, thereafter. He was actually present at the subsequent meeting, where Brown acted. The only date of subsequent meeting given in the evidence was October 30, 1896.

"(3) The third specification of error is that, the arbitrators having called in the umpire to act with them, the board thus composed could only hear any disputed matter by calling and swearing and examining witnesses before them, but that the said board, in disregard of the law and the plaintiffs' rights, proceeded to settle such differences without swearing or examining any witnesses upon such differences, simply by each of the two arbitrators making his statement or report to the umpire, who then announced his conclusions, which the board adopted. The facts which the testimony show under this head are substantially these: That when Brown met the arbitrators he took no evidence from witnesses, by swearing the witnesses or by examining any witnesses, but that, as the questions which he was called in merely to pass upon were measurements of the plans and the inspection of the books, he examined the plans and the books, and drew his conclusions from them, and from what the two arbitrators said of them as to their investigations. On the question whether Rounds & Hagler, when they bid for the work on the wheel pit and the wheel house, bid on 928 M. brick, or 650 M., he decided in favor of the first number, after his own personal inspection of the book of Rounds & Hagler, and the figures thereon corresponding with the figures on the plans, and after making calculations thereon. He rendered his decision that night in writing. If, as stated in the second head, above, Rounds had actual notice, then he cannot complain; but, even if he did not have actual notice of the meeting, still he says that on the next day Allen informed him of the decision. That was many days before the final result was reached. He went before the board again, with Brown present, and, though he knew that Brown had not examined him, yet he did not demand that either he or other witnesses should be examined on that ground, and thereby he waived his right.

"(4) The fourth specification of error is that, even if the umpire had heard the cause and evidence upon the disputed issue, the award is null and void, for the reason that he did not join in the findings and execute the same with the two arbitrators. The facts on this head are that a tissue copy is produced by the plaintiffs, which they claim is the award, only signed by Storey and Allen. The defendant produced the written award, which is unquestionably signed by all three of the arbitrators; and the evidence shows that Allen and Storey signed it one night, in the presence of each other, and the next morning Brown signed it in the presence of both Allen and Storey. The submission does not require any formal publication of the award. Mr. Winter swears that he, as clerk of the defendant company, on the 14th of November served a copy of the award on Mr. Rounds. Even if the tissue copy was the original award, it is signed by the two arbitrators; and, if that is the conclusion of two, it is binding.

"(5) The fifth specification of error is that none of the witnesses were sworn. As a matter of fact, that is the case; but it is also a matter of fact that none of the parties required that the witnesses should be sworn, and the law on the subject is stated elsewhere.

"(6) The sixth specification of error is 'that through a mistake or oversight on the part of said arbitrators the plaintiffs were charged with the value of upward of 900 M. brick, as furnished to them by the defendants, and they were given no corresponding credit for using or laying the brick, and the work done by them, thus depriving the plaintiffs of a large sum of money that was justly due them.' At the hearing Mr. Rounds reduced this item by his figuring to some 555 M., but it does not appear in the testimony that whatever was done about the brick was done 'through a mistake or oversight on the part of said arbitrators.' It is admitted on both sides that the item of the brick question was in discussion before the arbitration, many days, and that was the very item that the umpire was called on, and that whatever was done about these brick was done, not by an oversight or miscalculation, but after formal consideration. Further, page 3 of the O. K. statement shows that whilst on the one side charges are made against Rounds & Hagler for brick as upon the basis of work not done, though bid for, yet on the other hand they are given full credit for work actually done, both in the original contract and the extra work.

"(7) The seventh specification of error is that by an oversight the plaintiffs were not allowed any compensation for extra painting done on the extra work. The facts here show, by reference to item 7 of the O. K. paper, that claimants are allowed pay for woodwork complete, and by reference to the yellow paper in evidence and an examination of the claim in Allen's statement of item 7 painting was claimed, and in the McCarrell statement an estimate of the woodwork complete was claimed. This matter was considered, it seems, by the finding of the arbitrators, and decided as stated in item 7.

"(8) The eighth specification of error is that the arbitrators failed to allow the plaintiffs payment for such extra work in the proportion that similar work was paid for under the original agreement. The facts show that there were no figures in the original agreement to show the price of any specific work, but that a gross sum was agreed on: nothing fixed as to the price of laying brick in Portland or Rosendale cement or lime;

nothing fixed in the contract as to the price of woodwork or ironwork, or anything else, except the price of $4.25 per M. for brick laid down at Bath. This being the case, and the arbitrators being called on to fix the price of extra work, they had to consider what they thought was the price of these species of work in the original contract; and, taking into consideration all the facts and circumstances, they decided themselves, and that ought to be conclusive.

"(9) The ninth specification of error is that the arbitrators have deducted from the price of material furnished for work done by the plaintiffs coming under the original agreement, and have thereby wronged the plaintiffs. The facts in this case show that it was submitted specifically and distinctly by the submission to the arbitrators to make all necessary deductions for omissions in materials not put in or work not done.

"(10) The tenth specification of error is that the board irregularly and contrary to law suffered A. H. McCarrell to be constantly in attendance upon them, 'and that, without giving the plaintiffs notice or opportunity to be present, the said A. H. McCarrell was, in the absence of plaintiffs, questioned, and allowed to make certain statements,' etc., to the board, and that this conduct was enough to set aside the award. The facts show that McCarrell was present, as representing the company, and so was Rounds, as representing his firm; and the facts further show that Rounds knew McCarrell was present (was present with him), knew that McCarrell did figuring for the board at their request, and that he did so when Rounds was present, and yet he never objected to the same. Mr. Hagler distinctly testified that he told Rounds that McCarrell ought not to be present, but yet Rounds testified that he never at any time objected to McCarrell being present or figuring for the board. All of the arbitrators say that they reached their conclusion, not from any figuring that McCarrell did, but from their own consideration and own work, and simply had McCarrell to write out their conclusions for them,—such, for instance, as to multiply the amounts found by them by the prices fixed by them,—and that afterwards they verified all these statements for themselves. Mr. Storey says that, though McCarrell wrote the award which was signed by the arbitrators, he wrote the original draft in pencil, and that is produced to the court; and just here it is very plain, on the contention that was made that the red figures which appear on the O. K. statement were put there after the conclusion was reached, that they must have been put there before, because the aggregate amount in red figures at the end of each column is stated in the black figures below in exactly the same amounts by which the conclusion reached was arrived at.

"The aforesaid condensed statement of facts are found by me to be the facts in this interesting case, as the basis of the conclusion to be reached herein. Said facts are ascertained after a careful consideration of the pleadings and the testimony, oral and documentary, presented to me in open court; the witnesses having been sworn and examined and cross-examined before me at the hearing at Aiken during the winter term, 1899, and afterwards at a day agreed on between counsel, as the hearing could not be concluded at the regular term. We will now consider the law which is applicable to the facts and circumstances surrounding the various transactions of this contract, as found by the court. Arbitrations ought to be encouraged by the courts, and awards not set aside unless some established principle of law has been violated or some gross injustice done by the arbitrators, or where it is clearly established that fraud has crept into the action of the arbitrators. It is clearly laid down in 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 706, that 'all reasonable presumptions will be made in their aid [that is, in aid of awards]. No intendment will be indulged to overturn them, but every reasonable intendment allowed to uphold them. To warrant a court in reviewing an award upon its merits, something more than error in the decision must be shown.' In our own case of Cohen v. Habenicht, 14 Rich. Eq. 49, Chancellor Inglis states the matter tersely as follows: 'Every controversy touching civil rights necessarily involves questions both of law and of fact, and the ordinary tribunals are not so organized as to provide for determining each according to strict rules of right. Arbitration is a method for settling their disputes which parties choose to substitute for the regular tribunals. By submission of matters in controversy, which does not clearly provide otherwise, arbitrators are therefore invested with at least as large powers of investigation and determination as are possessed by the tribunals which they supplant. But, more than this, the very purpose in transferring the controversy to such private forum is that its fair adjustment may not be obstructed or trammeled by the technical rules of legal science; that consideration may be admitted as elements both in the matter and mode of composition which could not find access to the judgments of the regular courts. The aim is that substantial justice between the parties may be effected. To reach this result, uncertainties and doubts of law are to be solved by the arbitrators, and their conclusions herein became law of the parties pro hac vice. The rigor of extreme rules may be moderated by the requirements of fair dealing and good conscience.' The written submission signed by the parties having a controversy gives to the arbitrators jurisdiction to determine the question in controversy, and jurisdiction of the parties concerned; and much latitude is given to the arbitrators in their mode of procedure, the kind of notice they may give of the hearings, and the form in which the award may be made. It is unquestioned that if a hearing is had entirely ex parte by the arbitrators, without notice or opportunity to the other side to be present, such an award should be set aside, as was done in the case relied on by plaintiffs' counsel, decided by our court of appeals, and set forth in Shinnie v. Coil, 1 McCord, Eq. 475; but where the parties have notice of a hearing and opportunity to be heard, and are present and make no objection to the mode of procedure, they are deemed to waive all irregularities as to the procedure, and the award is valid and binding, unless assailable on the grounds of fraud, or, in some cases, of mistake such as is relievable in equity. With these general remarks applicable to the general aspect of the case, we will now proceed to consider the specific questions of law that arise:

"(a) It is claimed that the award is not valid, for that the same was reached by the arbitrators exceeding the authority given them by the submission. It is unquestioned that if the arbitrators exceed the submission the award may be avoided, but, as found by me in this case, as a matter of fact the arbitrators did not exceed the submission in this case, and acted fully within the submission; and I so find as a matter of law. This award, as promulgated by the arbitrators, is contained on one sheet of paper, and awards a gross sum to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiffs; and whilst a great deal of testimony in the shape of documents was placed before the court, as to the process by which the arbitrators reached that award, that final award is the document to be considered. It is stated by Mr. Morse, in his excellent work on Arbitration (page 165), 'that the process by which arbitrators came to an agreement is of no consequence, and cannot be inquired into by the court, neither be made a basis to vacate their award.' This quotation seems to be based upon reason and good sense, but, after careful examination of all documents and proceedings showing the process by which the arbitrators reached the award finally promulgated, I find nothing herein to invalidate the award.

"(b) As a matter of fact, it has been found that the plaintiffs had full notice of the various meetings held by the arbitrators, and full opportunity to attend; but, beyond that, it is very clear, as established law, that all irregularities as to the mode of procedure can be waived. See Morse, Arb. pp. 116–118; Wats. Arb. *296. It is well settled that, unless called upon to do so, it is not necessary for the validity of the award that the witnesses should be sworn (see Morse, Arb., p. 131); and in fact it has been held by our own court, in the case of State v. McCrosky, 3 McCord, 808, that arbitrators have no power to swear witnesses, and that witnesses sworn before arbitrators could not be indicted for perjury, because the arbitrators had no power to administer the oath. In this case, though the plaintiffs knew that the witnesses examined were not being sworn, they proceeded with the arbitration without asking that they should be sworn.

"(c) The award in this case was signed by all three of the arbitrators. The submission provided that 'the award of any two shall be final and binding upon the parties.' Mr. Brown, the umpire, was only called in to verify calculations; and it is insisted that he should have reheard the witnesses, and not made the conclusions without rehearing the witnesses. The plaintiffs had notice and opportunity to appear before him, and did not appear at one of the meetings before him; and the court cannot perceive the violation of any principle of law by the conduct of the hearing after the umpire was called in. Our own supreme court, in the case of Finney v. Miller, 1 Bailey, 81, after careful consideration of the English authorities upon the subject, held distinctly that where the arbitrators had disagreed upon the facts the umpire could be called in, and that he could take the facts already found by the arbitrators, and consider the disputed questions, and decide them, and that the umpire need not hear all the testimony anew, from the mouths of the witnesses, unless the parties require that he should do so. This case is followed in the case of Sharp v. Lipset, 2 Bailey, 113, and the general principles upon which these adjudications are based are sustained by other respectable authorities, such as Graham v. Graham, 49 Am. Dec. 559; Morse, Arb. p. 264; Wats. Awards, *296; Kid, Awards, 103. And the court concludes, as a matter of law, based upon the facts already found, that there was nothing in the conduct of the arbitration, either in omission or commission, after the umpire was brought in, that violates any principle of law or would vitiate the award.

"(d) It is to be noticed that there is nothing in the submission providing how the award shall be published or notified to the parties, and, this being the case, it is settled law that no particular form or kind of notice is required. Mr. Morse, in his work already referred to, at page 285, says, 'Publication of an award is necessary only where the submission expressly stipulated that it shall be published or notified to the parties.' There is no question, from the facts already found, that the plaintiffs knew that the award had been made, and that a copy was delivered to them, and the court sees no grounds to set aside the award because of any nondelivery or nonpublication thereof. It is satisfied that everything was done that it was necessary to do to bring the information contained in the award before the plaintiffs, and 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 704, states the doctrine as follows: 'It is impossible to give a stated rule by which to determine what is a sufficient publication. Anything done which enables the parties to receive a knowledge of its contents may be called a publication.' Certainly the plaintiffs in this case received knowledge of the contents of this award.

"(e) It is next to be considered what is the law on the subject of setting aside an award in a court of equity on the grounds of mistake. It is very certain that there is quite a difference in the idea of 'mistake,' as a principle upon which awards can be vacated, and the idea of 'mere error of judgment' on the part of the arbitrators. The doctrine seems to be well stated by the supreme court of the United States in the case of Burchell v. Marsh, 17 How. 550, 15 L. Ed. 99, as follows: 'Courts should be careful to avoid a wrong use of the word "mistake," and, by making it synonymous with mere error, assume to themselves an arbitrary power over awards. The same result would follow if the court should treat the arbitrators as guilty of corrupt partiality merely because the award is not such a one as the chancellor would have given. We are all too prone, perhaps, to impute either weakness of intellect or corrupt motives to those who differ with us in our opinion.' And to the same effect will be found our case of Mitchell v. De Schamps, 13 Rich. Eq. 21. See, also, 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1453–1456, and Pom. Eq. Jur. § 839. In not a single item brought before the court, in the claim that the award is erroneous, is there the slightest resemblance to what is called 'mistake' in equity. Every item which has been claimed to amount to a mistake relievable in equity was considered and contested before the arbitrators, and passed on by them; and, no matter how glaring may be the errors in the results reached, unless such results are tantamount to fraud, yet they are the results of the court of the choosing of the parties in this matter, and they are bound by them. This is applicable to the brick item, to the painting item, to the Lombard iron bill, and to the various other matters claimed as mistakes committed by the arbitrators. It may be that if I had been sitting upon the board of arbitrators I might have allowed some of the items disallowed by the arbitrators; but if they, as they seem to have done, gave their honest judgments upon these matters, and considered all of these matters, as they seem to have done, carefully, and have arrived at a deliberate conclusion, I can see nothing in the evidence which would warrant me, in the exercise of the equitable jurisdiction of the court, to set aside this award on the ground of mistake.

"(f) Nor can the court find any legal ground, arising out of the alleged conduct of McCarrell, to vacate the award. It has already been shown, as matter of fact, that his attending on the meetings of the board of arbitrators had no effect upon their conclusions, that what he did was merely ministerial, and that each of the arbitrators, for himself, verified all calculations made by him, before reaching a conclusion. Besides this, Mr. Rounds knew that McCarrell was present from beginning to end, and though, on one occasion, Mr. Hagler told Rounds that he objected to McCarrell's being present, never once did Rounds raise that objection before the arbitrators; and now, after the result has been reached, it seems clear to the court that any objection he could have made on that score is waived by the plaintiffs, with full knowledge of the facts before them, and it is so held. The case of Small v. Trickey, 66 Am. Dec. 256, is a well-considered case on this subject. The English doctrine is therein stated and sustained as follows: 'It was held in the house of lords in the case of Drew v. Drew, 33 Eng. Law & Eq. 9, that, where an arbitrator examined witnesses behind the back of one of the parties, such party is justified in at once abandoning the reference and applying to a judge to rescind the submission; but if he continue, after the fact came to his knowledge, to attend the subsequent proceedings, this will be a waiver of the irregularity, and he cannot afterwards set aside the award on that ground.'

"As a matter of law and fact, it is held that the award made between the parties in question on November 10, 1896, by J. B. Storey, Charles B. Allen, and T. O. Brown, is valid and binding on the parties. Wherefore it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said award be, and the same is hereby, confirmed, and that the complaint in this action be dismissed, with costs to be paid by the plaintiffs.

"W. C. Benet, Presiding Judge."

The plaintiffs have appealed from this decree, and set forth their objections thereto in 24 grounds of appeal. I may remark, before setting out to give them consideration, that I greatly regret that I cannot, in my view of what is due to the parties litigant, reproduce the testimony, as I would like to do; for it would require, to do so, several hundred pages. This testimony is both oral and documentary. The former is not so extended, but the latter is quite voluminous, including as it does the following: The plans and specifications of the architects for the original cotton mill. The contract for executing the said plans and specifications. The book containing sundry calculations of Rounds & Hagler in reference to this contract to build the mill under the plans and specifications, which latter expressly provided for any additions or alterations of the original plan and specifications. Testimony that certain alterations were made in the plan of the building, showing that where, under the original plan, a part of the building was to be one story in height, by the alteration of said plan all of the building was three stories in height; that a disagreement between the contractors and the owners of the mill led to an arbitration, which was duly provided for by an agreement in writing for such submission to two arbitrators, one to be chosen by Rounds & Hagler, and one by the Aiken Manufacturing Company, with the right to the two arbitrators to choose an umpire; that in the submission of this controversy it was expressly provided that Rounds & Hagler should present their schedule of measurement as contained in their books, and that A. H. McCarrell, for the Aiken Manufacturing Company, should present its schedule of measurement as contained in its books, and that accordingly these schedules of measurements of each party were presented in writing, accompanied by their books, respectively; that such schedules were entered in writing on the opposite sheets of what was known as the "Yellow Paper," wherein 144 items were set out; that the two arbitrators passed upon each one of these 144 items, and allowed or disallowed or modified the same said 144 items; that 2 items were passed upon by Mr. Brown, an experienced and highly respected contractor for brickwork, as the umpire, whose judgment was placed in writing, signed by himself. Settlement sheets of the arbitrators. The memorandum book of Rounds & Hagler. The memorandum made by Mr. Barrett for the mill. Calculations by Mr. Estes for the mill. The original award, signed by the two arbitrators and umpire, dated November 10, 1896. Copy thereof on tissue paper given by Mr. Allen to Rounds & Hagler on the night of November 9, 1896. Also copy of the original award served upon Rounds & Hagler on November 14, 1896. The foregoing list of papers are embodied in the "case for appeal," except that the plans and specifications for the cotton-mill building, in all their many details, are not reproduced in this appeal, though enough is introduced in the "case" to enable this court to understand the issues. After the award, plaintiffs brought an action to annul the award. I have spent days in my endeavor to understand the differences of these parties, as these differences are represented by the documentary evidence, together with the explanations thereof by the testimony of the witnesses on each side. And I shall now, as briefly as may be, respond to the questions raised by the grounds of appeal.

I will consider the first and nineteenth grounds of appeal together. Here the appellants claim that the arbitrators and umpire have, in their award, exceeded the power stipulated for their exercise in the articles of submission. Enough of the contents of this paper is embodied in the decree of Judge Benet to excuse me for not inserting the same at this point. The very terms of the plans and specifications of the architect for the building of the Aiken Cotton Mill at Bath, S. C., required any changes in the plan of that building to be governed by the remuneration the builders, Rounds & Hagler, received for their work and material in building the original mill. In the contract of Rounds & Hagler the gross sum of $53,198 is contracted for by them in payment for all their work and the materials they should furnish in building the mill under their bid in writing. This being a sum in gross, how could any one determine what any particular price of the work or material in said mill building would cost? To determine the value of labor or material was only necessary in order to ascertain the value of similar labor or material in the alterations made outside of the original mill building. These exceptions are overruled.

I will next pass upon the second, third, fourth, fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, and the eighteenth grounds of appeal, relating as they do to kindred subjects. These exceptions are as follows: "(2) It is submitted that the award is null and void because, the umpire having been called in to sit with the arbitrators to pass upon differences existing between them, he failed to have the plaintiffs before him at such hearing, or to give the plaintiffs notice of the time of such hearing, so that they might have had an opportunity to be heard; and his honor, the circuit judge, erred in not so deciding. (3) It is submitted that the award is null and void because after the arbitrators had called in the umpire to sit with them to pass upon the number of brick estimated by the plaintiffs in their original bid, as necessary for the wheel pit, which was in dispute between them, such matters could only be passed upon by calling and examining witnesses before the board as so composed, but that the board, in disregard of law and the plaintiffs' rights, allowed such disputed matters to be passed upon and decided by the umpire upon each of the arbitrators making a report of their respective views to him; and his honor, the circuit judge, erred in not so deciding. (4) Because the award was reached as the judgment of the umpire from statements made to him by the two arbitrators; that the same was not signed by the umpire when declared and published, and for that reason it is null and void, and the same could not be cured by the umpire subsequently signing the same; and his honor, the circuit judge, erred in not so deciding." "(15) Because his honor, the circuit judge, erred in finding that the arbitrators and umpire signed the award on November 10, 1896, for it plainly appears from the evidence that the award was signed only by the arbitrators on that day, and not until after it had been announced and served on the plaintiffs was it signed by the umpire. (16) Because his honor, the circuit judge, erred in finding as a matter of fact that Rounds had notice of the night meeting at which the umpire, Brown, was to attend to pass on the number of brick estimated in the bid for the wheel pit; for it plainly appears by the testimony that Rounds had no notice of such meeting. (17) Because his honor, the circuit judge, erred in holding that because Rounds appeared before the umpire after he had rendered his decision concerning the number of brick estimated to be placed in the wheel pit, and did not then object to such finding of the umpire, or then demand that he should be heard upon such question, he had thereby waived his right to be notified of such meeting. (18) Because his honor, the circuit judge, erred in holding that the award is good if signed only by the two arbitrators; for, it is submitted, while such is the rule when the arbitrators themselves agree, yet when the agreement is brought about by the decision of the umpire, as in this case, then the award is not valid unless signed by the umpire."

(a) I agree with the circuit judge that the testimony of C. D. Allen is convincing that Rounds & Hagler were satisfied that Brown was the umpire, and that he would sit at the time he did with the arbitrators; but, even if this was not so, Rounds was notified that night or the next morning, October 16, 1896, of the particular decision of Brown as umpire, and that he never communicated any objection to the finding, and that he afterwards was present with the arbitrators when Brown, the umpire, was with them, at which time he made no request to be heard by himself or through his witnesses. It is admitted that under the authority of the case of Small v. Courtney, 1 Brev. 205, some notice of the umpire's being present to hear and determine any of the issues included in the submission should have been extended to Rounds or Hagler. I am satisfied he received the notice of the hearing by the umpire, and that it was his own fault that he was not present. It is significant that his own arbitrator, Allen, who was afterwards his own witness, stated to Brown, the umpire, upon his inquiring as to where Mr. Rounds was, and if he would be present, replied in the negative, giving as his reason Brown's doubts of his case.

(b) Full testimony had been offered by Rounds & Hagler to the dispute as to 928,339 brick or 650,000 brick. This little book was in evidence. But the walls and their thickness were disclosed by the plans and specifications, as well as practical ocular demonstration. An allowance of 21 brick to the cubic foot was admitted. The two arbitrators and the umpire had all these things before them. The umpire said he could demonstrate by calculations that 928,339 brick were used, and not 650,000. This last proposition of the umpire, while on the witness stand, was not contradicted by the plaintiffs, so far as requiring him to actually make the calculation as he claimed he could. Experts generally know what they are swearing to in matters of this kind, such as the quantity of brick to be necessary in building walls of well-determined dimensions. I agree with the circuit judge in this matter, also.

(c) As to the fourth ground of appeal: The cases of Finney v. Bailey, 1 Bailey, 81, and Gibson v. Broadfoot, 3 Desaus. 534, are ample authority for the conclusion of the circuit judge on this point.

(d) It was a question of fact as to on what date the umpire actually signed the award. There was some testimony on the subject looking to an uncertainty as to whether the umpire signed on the same day as the arbitrators; that is, some testimony that the arbitrators signed at night, on November 9, 1896, and that the umpire signed next day (November 10, 1896), in their presence. By the special agreement in the submission, the finding of two of the board of arbitration was sufficient. Certainly two signed, even if the 9th is fixed, but all three on the 10th, if that was the date in November, 1896. What difference ought it to make if the umpire, Brown, only signed the award on November 10th, and the other two on November 9th? Had not Brown, the umpire, already in writing signed his name to the two findings he was called in to pass on? I desire my response at this point to be limited to the facts in proof in the case at bar. I would not desire any looseness in the signing of awards generally to be recognized by me. The circuit judge was right.

(e) As to the sixteenth ground of appeal, I have already indicated my opinion that Rounds, as a matter of fact, had notice of the night meeting at which the umpire, Brown, was to pass on the question of 928,000 brick or 650,000. I sustain the circuit judge.

(f) I conceive that this the eighteenth ground of appeal is not well taken, for the reasons set out in "d," and it is overruled.

I will next pass on the fifth ground of appeal, which is as follows: "(5) Because it appears from the evidence that the testimony of all the witnesses was taken without having them sworn, and for that reason the award is rendered null and void; and it was error in his honor, the circuit judge, in not so deciding." This submission to arbitration is under no statute of this state, nor under any order of court. It is a submission under the common law. In 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 659, it is stated: "At the common law an arbitrator has no power to administer an oath to the witnesses who are brought before him. But the administration of an oath by him does not invalidate the proceedings." This is no longer an open question in this state. State v. McCrosky, 3 McCord, 308, which goes to the full length to which the Encyclopædia, just above quoted, goes. This ground of appeal is overruled.

I will next consider in one group the sixth, seventh, and eighth grounds of appeal: "(6) Because it appears from the evidence that through a mistake and oversight the plaintiffs were charged with 928,339 brick, as being their estimate, as contained in their original bid for building the wheel pit, whereas it appears by the weight of the evidence the plaintiffs' estimate for doing such work was only 650,000 brick, and the plaintiffs have thereby been deprived of $2,783.39 in money on that account alone; and the circuit judge erred in not so deciding. (7) Because it appears by the evidence that by mistake or oversight the plaintiffs were not allowed any compensation for the painting on extra work, and the circuit judge erred in not so deciding. (8) Because it appears from the evidence that the plaintiffs furnished iron for the extra work to the amount of $547.43, and, by mistake or oversight on the part of the arbitrators, were only credited with $390; that such iron was worth $547.43, at the rate such work was charged for in the original contract. And it further appears that no amount whatever was allowed the plaintiffs as compensation for placing and putting up such extra ironwork, and that the plaintiffs thereby have been unjustly deprived of a considerable sum of money; and his honor, the circuit judge, erred in not so deciding."

(a) I have already announced my full concession with the finding of the circuit judge on this subject. It has always seemed to me that when three practical, bright-minded brick experts join in an agreement of this character, it is entitled to great weight. The sixth exception is overruled.

(b) The witnesses who were arbitrators testified that they allowed for the painting by taking the wood or iron work when painted, thereby affording full compensation for the painting as an item. This exception is overruled.

(c) So far as concerns the Lombard Iron Company's account, which the plaintiffs claimed they have paid, it may be remarked that this account, in its entirety, was certainly before the arbitrators. The plaintiffs claimed $547.43. The defendant (respondent) claimed that only $260 was due. After hearing all sides, an award for $390 was made to Rounds & Hagler. In 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 661, it is said: "In the United States the arbitrator is not bound by the strict rules of law as to the admission or rejection of evidence. He may receive the evidence of witnesses who are legally incompetent, if he thinks proper." That great liberality is allowed arbitrators when their findings of law and fact are canvassed in this state, see Mulder v. Cravat, 2 Bay, 370; Mitchell v. De Schamps, 13 Rich. Eq. 9. This exception is overruled.

I will next consider the ninth ground, which is as follows: "(9) Because it appears from the evidence that the plaintiffs had paid $35 apiece for the three ventilators placed, as called for by the original contract, and that they had paid the same price for the ventilators used in the extra work; that under the terms of the contract they were entitled to be paid for the extra ventilators at the price of the ventilators used under the original contract, but that the arbitrators, without right, reduced the price of the ventilators put up under the original contract to $10 apiece, and they also without right fixed the price of the extra ventilators at the same price; and his honor, the circuit judge, erred in not so finding." In the original contract Rounds & Hagler had contracted to furnish two Star ventilators. Instead of these, they furnished a cheap imitation of the Star ventilators, only 30 inches in diameter, while the Star ventilators were 36 inches in diameter. Rounds & Hagler wanted to charge $35 each for the ventilators furnished by them, when their own witnesses said $10 was a fair price. Under the submission, it was agreed that the arbitrators should pass upon any omission by Rounds & Hagler. This was such a palpable omission that the award contained only an allowance for $10 each for these ventilators. This exception is overruled.

I will next consider the tenth ground of appeal, which is as follows: "(10) Because it appears from the evidence that the plaintiffs were allowed for building the wheel pit and tail race a credit of $5,190.39, and charged back for the same items $10,025.20, thus wrongfully causing a loss to the plaintiffs on this item of $4,834.99, whereas, the work not being omitted, the plaintiffs should have only been charged back the amount which they were credited for the same. In fact, such items were not extra work at all, and should not have been taken in account by the arbitrators; and the circuit judge erred in not so deciding." The wheel pit and tail race, in this controversy, have certainly occupied an important position. In respondents' argument, in answer to this exception, they say:

"It will be seen, by reading this exception, that the counsel who prepared it based his allegation of error upon the idea that the work out of which these charges arose was not omitted work. That statement in the exception that it was not omitted work is a most violent presumption; for the fact is, as we will submit under the testimony, that that is exactly the category in which it is, and that the arbitrators so found, and properly found. Let us look to the yellow paper. We will find in italics the decision of the arbitrators: 'It is decided that Rounds & Hagler estimated 928,339 brick in Portland cement; that the company paid them $742 for the tail-race walls; and further decided: Wheel house and tail-race wall, as built, 24,715¼ cubic feet, at twenty-one per foot, equaled 519,020 brick in Portland cement.' That was their decision. What does it mean? That in the contract price, for the lump sum of $53,198, Rounds & Hagler undertook to put in the wheel house and its appurtenances 928,339 brick, and that, in accordance with the figures set forth in the Barrett memorandum and bid, included in that $53,198 was $742 for the tail-race walls. Let the court, if they wish any explanation of that matter and of the figures contained therein, look to the explanation of Mr. Estes * * * and his testimony. The arbitrators then decided that Rounds & Hagler, for the pay which they received in that lump sum, contracted to put in 928,339 brick in the wheel house and wheel pit, and to build the tail-race walls for $742; but the arbitrators decided, as will be seen by the other part of the decision, that the value of what was done, namely, 'the wheel house and tail-race wall, as built, 24,715¼ cubic feet, at twenty-one per foot, equals 519,020 brick in Portland cement,' was less than the amount of brickwork which they contracted to do, and hence the difference which they did not do was omitted work, to be paid for at the price of omitted work. Now let us look at the O. K. statement, and see the price at which they stated this omitted work. They gave Rounds & Hagler credit for what? A. They thus express it: 'The wheel house and tail-race wall, as built, 24,715¼ cubic feet, at twenty-one per foot, equals 519,020 brick in Portland cement, at $10, equals $5,190.20.' That is, they gave him credit for the wheel house and tail-race wall as built. Now, then, there was more work, more brick, which they should have put in those same structures, and hence they charged against them the total which they had contracted to build, and the difference between which they did build and what they had contracted to build was omitted work, which must be charged against them. What, now, do they charge against Rounds & Hagler?

It is decided that Rounds & Hagler based their bid on 928,339 brick in Portland cement, at $10 equals	$ 9,283 39
Also, that for tail race, as per original plan, Messrs. R. & H. charged the company	742 00
	$10,025 39

"Hence, if we deduct from $10,025.39, which is the value of the work they contracted to do, and for which they were paid in the $53,198, the lump price for the contract, the amount $5,190.20, which is the price of the wheel house and tail-race wall as built, there will be left the sum of $4,835.19, not $4,834.99, as the price of the omitted work, which, under the submission heretofore called to the attention of the court, the arbitrators had a right to require that Rounds & Hagler should pay. In this connection we desire to submit to the court the following figures, to show that in item 30 the amount, $9,283.39, charged by the arbitrators against Rounds & Hagler, is not excessive or too much. If the court will look at the bid (Barrett memorandum), it will see that the following figures are correct:

They bid for foundation work	$ 7,500 00
For wheel house	8,472 00
	$15,972 00
They were allowed per Barrett memorandum	17,100 00
Excess allowance	$ 1,128 00
Add to this the amount of actual bid for wheel house, etc.	8,472 00
Total which contract called for	$ 9,600 00
But arbitrators only charged them with	9,283 39
Difference in their favor	$ 316 61"

From the views thus presented, it would seem that the circuit judge had committed no error as here pointed out, and the exception is overruled.

I will next notice the eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth grounds of appeal: "(11) Because it appears from the evidence that the plaintiffs' bid upon the original work was upon the basis of the following prices for brick, namely: Brick laid in lime mortar, per thousand, $9: brick laid in Rosendale cement, per thousand, $10; brick laid in Portland cement, per thousand, $11.50, —and the arbitrators were therefore bound to allow the plaintiffs the same prices for laying the brick in the extra work; and they also erred in fixing prices of the brick laid in mortar at $8 per thousand, laid in Rosendale cement at $9 per thousand, and laid in Portland cement at $10 per thousand, for such finding was arbitrary and without any evidence to support the same; and the circuit judge erred in not so finding. (12) Because it appears from the evidence that the defendants did not object to, but had themselves allowed, $8.75 per thousand for brick laid in lime mortar, and $9.50 per thousand for brick laid in Rosendale cement, and therefore the arbitrators had no authority to reduce said amounts; and it was error in the circuit judge in not so deciding. (13) Because it appears from the evidence that the arbitrators have reassessed the entire brickwork in the defendant's mill as valued at $8 per thousand for brick laid in lime mortar, $9 per thousand for brick laid in Rosendale cement, and $10 per thousand for brick laid in Portland cement, instead of at $9, $10, and $11.50, respectively, and have thereby, unjustly and without right, caused the plaintiffs a loss of one dollar to one dollar and a half on every thousand of brick laid in said mill. (14) Because it appears from the evidence, while the arbitrators have allowed the plaintiffs the price of $10 per thousand for brick laid in Portland cement, they have in several instances, as appears upon the O. K. account, charged the plaintiffs $10.75 per thousand for brick omitted to be laid in Portland cement, thus showing that the arbitrators, either through mistake or partiality, deprived the plaintiffs of a considerable sum of money; and his honor, the circuit judge, erred in not so deciding."

(a) It was in a lump sum that Rounds & Hagler made their bid, $53,198. They now contend that such bid was upon the basis set out in the exception. This is a part of their testimony. As I remarked a short while ago, under the decisions of this state great liberality is allowed arbitrators in reaching their conclusions. There was nothing in the submission which would compel them to adopt Rounds & Hagler's views. They did adopt their views in a vast majority of the 144 items considered by them. In some instances the arbitrators and the umpire declined to accept their suggestions. I cannot say they were in error. The matter was confided to them by Rounds & Hagler. Now that they have lost, they must bear themselves with equanimity. This exception is overruled.

(b) The arbitrators were not bound to accept the suggestions of the Aiken Manufacturing Company. The truth is, they knew more about these matters than did the defendant (respondent). This exception is overruled.

(c) As to the thirteenth exception, I may say that it was perfectly competent, under the terms of this submission, to ascertain what similiar work under the original contract was worth, so as to apply such values to the same kinds of work under the alterations and additions which were made to the mill building. This exception is overruled.

(d) The facts do not bear out the allegations made in the fourteenth exception, and it is overruled.

I will next consider ground of appeal 14½, which is as follows: "(14½) Because the circuit judge found, as matter of fact, 'that whilst, on the item of how many brick Rounds & Hagler's bid should be placed in the wheel house and wheel pit, they differed, yet there was no contrary decisions by them; but Allen preferred that the umpire should be called in to verify his word, as the umpire, Mr. Brown, was very familiar with brick work.' In such finding his honor erred, for it plainly appears from the evidence that the umpire, Brown, was not called in to verify Allen's work, but, to the contrary, to decide the differences between the arbitrators concerning the number of brick which should be charged against the plaintiffs for such work." I do not consider that the phraseology of the circuit judge was quite as happy in the connection as it usually is, but nevertheless it is patent that he is referring to the fact that the arbitrators did unite in calling in Mr. Brown as umpire, though it was primarily at the request of Mr. Allen. The exception is overruled.

I will now pass upon the twentieth and twenty-first grounds of appeal: "(20) Because it appears from the evidence that A. H. McCarrell, the representative of the defendant, was in constant attendance upon the arbitrators; that he sat with them at every meeting of the board, in the absence of the plaintiffs as well as when they were present; that he was constantly called by the arbitrators to do their calculations, and ever present in their consultations, and when they were deciding differences between the parties, and was really the clerk of the board. It is submitted that it is improper that the triors of issues between contending parties should be so attended by one of the parties, in the absence of the other, that his influence in making the calculations for the board tends to bias their judgment to the prejudice of the other party, and in this case did so influence the board of arbitrators, and under such circumstances the said McCarrell's so sitting with the board of arbitrators was improper, and rendered the award null and void; and it was error in the circuit judge in not so deciding. (21) Because it appears that the red lettering and figures on the O. K. statement was placed there by McCarrell after the said statement had been signed by the arbitrators, and that the same was the work of said McCarrell, and not of the arbitrators; and it was error in the circuit judge in not so deciding." I cannot regard Mr. McCarrell's presence with the arbitrators as any ground for setting the award aside. Mr. Rounds was invited to be present. He was for a week or 10 days. Then his other business called him away to attend to it. Mr. McCarrell was admittedly the employé or agent of the Aiken Manufacturing Company. His presence with the board was stipulated for in the submission for at least a part of the time. No harm has been pointed out as the result of his presence before the board. It must always be remembered that he was the representative of a deaf and dumb creature,—a corporation,—an artificial person. This exception is overruled. I do not admit that the allegations of fact set up in the twenty-first exception are well grounded. Everything was regular. The findings were those of arbitrators. Let this exception be overruled.

I will next consider the twenty-second, twenty-third, and twenty-fourth exceptions: "(22) The circuit judge holds: 'Every item which has been claimed to amount to a mistake relievable in equity was considered and contested before the board of arbitrators, and passed on by them; and, no matter how glaring there may be errors in the result reached, unless such are tantamount to fraud, yet they are the result of the court of the choosing of the parties in this matter, and they are bound by them,' in such finding and conclusion. It is submitted that the circuit judge erred, for a glaring or gross mistake in the findings of a board of arbitrators is not above the law, but is subject to the jurisdiction of equity, to the end that justice may be done. (23) It appears from the evidence that the defendants themselves stated the account between themselves and plaintiffs, by which they admitted an indebtedness of $2,219.39, and to that extent there was no dispute on the part of the defendants of the plaintiffs' account; and it was therefore error in the board going behind such admissions, and reducing the defendants' liability to an amount less than what they admitted, and it was error in the circuit judge in not so deciding. (24) It is admitted that no such question as what might be due by the plaintiffs to the defendant on account of wood or lumber taken away by A. J. Twiggs was submitted to the arbitrators, and that they had no authority or right in making any award concerning the same; and the circuit judge erred in not so deciding."

(a) The circuit judge did not intend to assert that no glaring or gross mistake in the findings of a board of arbitrators is above the law; that is, beyond the jurisdiction of a court of equity to relieve against. His honor, the circuit judge, had before him the case of Aiken v. Bolan, 1 Brev. 239, when the court said: "The court (all the judges present except Grimke) said all rewards are entitled to great favor and indulgence, and ought not to be too rigidly examined and construed; that it was made a mode of deciding controversies which ought not to be discouraged, and therefore the courts had never set aside awards, except for misbehavior of arbitrators, as on account of gross partiality, collusion, or fraud, or else on account of some mistake which arbitrators may fall into without design, by which their award is made to operate in a way they did not intend, or for some mistake apparent on the award. "What he meant to express was the spirit of Aiken v. Bolan, supra. He was not in error. The circuit judge had before him the case of Mulder v. Cravat, 2 Bay, 372.

(b) If the arbitrators were clothed, as they were, under the submission, to do substantial justice to the plaintiff and defendant in regard to the transaction involved in the labor and material furnished by the appellants to the respondent in the construction of the cotton mill and its ways, and among those transactions the board of arbitrators found that the respondent, under a mistake of fact, had been willing to concede to the appellants more than they were entitled to receive, it was in the power of said board to adjust these matters as required by truth, right, and justice. See, also, Cohen v. Habenicht, 14 Rich. Eq. 31. This exception is overruled.

(c) Lastly, as to the twenty-fourth exception, wherein the appellants suggest that the four cords of wood belonging to the Aiken Manufacturing Company, and which were given by the appellants to one Mr. Twiggs, and which four cords of wood were valued at $10, were not included in the submission, and therefore the board of arbitrators were in error in considering and disposing of the same: First. I may say, if this had been error, it would not have invalidated the award, except as to the $10 itself. Mitchell v. De Schamps, 13 Rich. Eq. 23, 24, where the court sustained the award, but, as $426.50 in Confederate money had not been included in the award, the court referred it to the commissioners to ascertain and report its value. Second. I remark that it was no mistake in the board of arbitrators to include it. This four cords of wood was part of the material paid for by the respondent to the appellants as material in constructing the mill house. Having been paid for by the respondent, the appellants had no right to dispose of it. Having done so, they should respond to the respondent for the $10, its value. This ground of appeal is dismissed. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

CITY COUNCIL OF GREENVILLE v. KEMMIS.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 7, 1900.)

GAMING—CITY ORDINANCE—INTERPRETATION—SENTENCE.

1. Greenville City Charter (19 St. at Large, p. 109) authorized the city council to make all ordinances necessary for the welfare of said city, and for the peace and good government thereof, and to impose fines and penalties for the violation of such ordinances. The city council passed an ordinance prohibiting any person from permitting his inclosure, place, or house to be used as a place for gaming with cards for money or other stake, and imposing a fine and imprisonment as penalty for its violation. Held, that such ordinance was not in conflict with Cr. St. § 391, making it a penal offense to play in public places, or to keep any tavern, store, public house, or house used as a place for gaming, but was a valid exercise of the city's charter power.

2. A furnished room in a hotel, which defendant rented and occupied, and permitted others to use to play cards for money in, was his "place," within a city ordinance forbidding any one to permit his inclosure, place, or house to be used as a place for gaming with cards for money or other stake.

3. Where the sentence imposed for violation of a city ordinance is within the limits of the ordinance and the city charter, no error of law is committed; the severity of the sentence, within those limits, being discretionary with the trial court.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Greenville county; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Roy Kemmis was convicted, under an ordinance of the city of Greenville, of permitting his place to be used as a place for gaming, and he appeals. Affirmed.

The following are the grounds of defendant's appeal: "(1) That his honor erred in confirming the decision of the mayor in finding the defendant guilty, when there was no testimony to show that the alleged gaming took place in a house, place, or inclosure belonging to defendant, or in a place used for gaming, or that there was any evidence of any gaming on the day of arrest, when defendant had no notice of the charge that gaming had taken place on another day. (2) His honor erred in confirming the finding of the mayor in finding the defendant guilty of keeping a gaming house, when the testimony, even if competent, showed no more than that defendant had engaged in a single game of cards, which did not constitute the offense charged. (3) His honor erred in confirming the judgment of the mayor, when he should have held that the maximum fine allowed by ordinance was in this case excessive and unjust. (4) His honor erred in confirming the decision and judgment of the mayor, when he should have held that as defendant was not guilty of the charge under the laws of South Carolina, which laws have defined gaming houses, and defendant not being the keeper of a public house as defined by the said laws of the state, defendant could not be guilty under an ordinance which enlarges the offense beyond the limit set by the legislature. (5) Because his honor erred in holding that the city ordinance under which the defendant was convicted was constitutional and valid, and that the mayor had jurisdiction of an offense created by said ordinance, when his honor should have held that the ordinance was void, inoperative, and unconstitutional, and the mayor had no jurisdiction of the offense created thereby; and his honor should have held that when the law of gaming is defined, and the punishment prescribed, by the laws of the state, a municipal corporation is not authorized to suppress any gaming not prohibited by said state laws, but it is confined to the use of such means as may be within its power to enforce within its limits the law as defined and specifically laid down by the legislature."

W. G. Sirrine, for appellant. B. A. Morgan, for respondent.

McIVER, C. J. The defendant was tried and convicted before the mayor's court for the city of Greenville for a violation of one of the ordinances of said city, and sentenced to pay a fine of $50, or be imprisoned for the term of 30 days. He paid the fine under protest, and gave notice of appeal to the circuit court,—upon what grounds does not appear in the "case." That appeal was heard by his honor, Judge Watts, who passed the following order dismissing the appeal: "The above-stated case came up before me for hearing upon appeal from the mayor's court of the city of Greenville upon exceptions stated, matter written and oral; the oral being as to matters jurisdictional. Upon hearing said case upon said appeal, and after the argument of appellant's counsel, it is ordered that the exceptions or grounds of appeal be overruled, the appeal dismissed, and the judgment of the court below confirmed." From this order the defendant has appealed to this court upon the several grounds set out in the record, which will be incorporated by the reporter in his report of this case. So far as these grounds raise any question of fact, they may be passed by with the simple remark that this court has no jurisdiction to review decisions of questions of fact in such a case as this. We do not, therefore, propose to consider these grounds seriatim, but will confine our attention to the questions discussed in the argument of counsel for appellant.

The first point made is thus stated in the argument for appellant: "The ordinance is unconstitutional and invalid because it enlarges the offense of keeping a gaming house as already defined by the law of the state." The first remark we have to make in regard to this point is that it seems to have been made under a misapprehension of the true nature of the case. It assumes that the offense with which appellant was charged, and of which he was convicted, was "keeping a gaming house," whereas the "case" shows that "the charge upon which defendant was tried was permitting his place, house, or room to be used as a place for gaming with cards for money or other stakes," in violation of one of the ordinances of the city, set out in the "case," the terms of which will hereinafter be more particularly referred to. And the mayor, in his return, which is set out in the "case," states the offense charged in the same language. The mayor nowhere says what he is quoted by counsel for appellant as saying,—that the charge was "for keeping a gambling house." So that the first point made by appellant cannot, for this reason, be sustained. But as we understand from the argument that the real ground taken by appellant is that inasmuch as the state has, by section 391 of the criminal statutes, undertaken to legislate upon the subject of gaming, and after making it a penal offense for any person to play "at any tavern, inn, store for the retailing of spirituous liquors, or in any house used as a place for gaming, or in any barn, kitchen, stable, or other outhouse, or in any street, highway, open wood, racefield, or open place, at any game or games with cards or dice," etc., and making it the duty of any trial justice (now magistrate) to prosecute such offenders, also made it his duty to prosecute "the keeper or keepers of taverns, inns, stores for the retailing of spirituous liquors, public places, or house used as a place for gaming or other public house," and declared "that every person so keeping such tavern, inn, retail store, public house, or house used as a place for gaming, or such other public house," shall, upon conviction, be imprisoned, etc., showing that the offenses thus denounced must be committed in some public place, it is not competent for the municipal corporation of the city of Greenville to pass an ordinance going beyond this, and making it a penal offense for a person to permit his private room in the city of Greenville to be used as a place for gaming. In the first place, it may be questioned whether the statute referred to is confined to those who have done any of the acts therein forbidden in a public place. Certainly the acts denounced as criminal offenses in the succeeding section (392), are not confined to those done in some public place. But, waiving this, we think that, even if the criminal statutes referred to can be so construed as to relate only to acts done in some public place, still there is no reason why this alone can be regarded as sufficient to prevent the municipal corporation of the city of Greenville from passing the ordinance under which appellant has been convicted. It is quite true that a municipal corporation derives all of its powers from its charter, and can exercise no power which is not therein granted, either expressly or by necessary implication. But by the act to charter the city of Greenville (Acts 1885; 19 St. at Large, 109) the city council of Greenville is expressly vested with full power and authority to pass all such ordinances "as shall appear to them necessary and requisite for the security, welfare and convenience of said city, for preserving health, life and property therein, and securing the peace and good government of the same, and may fix and impose fines and penalties for the violation thereof: provided, nevertheless, that * * * no fine shall exceed the sum of fifty dollars, or imprisonment extend for a period longer than thirty days, or either, or both, for the same offense." In pursuance of this authority the city council passed the ordinance here in question, entitled "An ordinance to prevent the pernicious practice of, and engaging in, gaming for money within the city of Greenville, S. C.," one of the provisions of which is that "it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to * * * permit his, her or their enclosure or place or house to be used as a place for gaming with cards * * * for money or other stake"; and the punishment to be imposed for such offense is a fine not exceeding $50, or imprisonment for not more than 30 days.

It was admitted at the trial that the room in which the offense was alleged to have been committed was occupied by the defendant; it being a furnished room in the building known as the "Central Hotel," rented by defendant. There was testimony tending to show that when the sergeant of police entered the room he found the defendant sitting at the head of the table, on which there were three packs of cards, and a pack of poker chips near the defendant, and in a bureau drawer the sergeant found a quantity of poker chips. On the right of the defendant two other persons were sitting, one of whom had money in his hands. There was also testimony that on a previous occasion persons were seen playing cards in that room, for money, in the presence of the defendant. The contention on the part of the appellant is that this was a private room occupied by defendant, and that, inasmuch as the law-making power of the state had not seen fit to make it a criminal offense for a person to permit his private room to be used as a place for gaming with cards for money, the city council had no authority to do so. Granting, for the sake of argument only, that the legislature has not seen fit to make it a criminal offense for a person to permit his room in a building formerly used as a hotel, which he rents and occupies, to be used as a place for gaming with cards, we see no reason whatever why that should operate as a prohibition to the city council from passing such an ordinance as that here in question. Common experience shows that city corporations find it necessary, for the peace and good order of the city, to forbid the doing of many acts, under penalty, as to which the legislature has not found it necessary to legislate. The ordinance is certainly not in conflict with any act of the legislature. The state legislation upon the subject, even if construed as contended for by appellant, and the municipal legislation here in question, can both stand together, and there is no conflict whatever. The utmost that can be said is that the municipal corporation, under the authority vested in it by its charter, has seen fit to make an act done within the corporate limits a criminal offense, which the legislature has not seen fit to constitute such an offense. Indeed, it is well settled in this state, at least, that the same act may be made an offense both against the state and the municipal law. As that great jurist, Judge Cooley, expresses it in his work on Constitutional Limitations, at page 199 of the second edition: "Indeed, the same act may constitute an offense both against the state and the municipal corporation, and both may punish it without violation of any constitutional principle." And in a note he says, "Such is the clear weight of authority, though the decisions are not uniform," and proceeds to cite the cases. In one of the cases which he cites (Rogers v. Jones, 1 Wend. 261), we find the following language, which is so appropriate to the case in hand that we quote it: "If the legislature have passed a law regulating as to certain things in a city, I apprehend the corporation are not thereby restricted from making further regulations." To the authorities cited by this distinguished author we may add the case of Cross v. North Carolina, 132 U. S. 132, 10 Sup. Ct. 47, 33 L. Ed. 287, especially at page 139, 132 U. S., page 49, 10 Sup. Ct., and page 290, 33 L. Ed., decided since Judge Cooley wrote. This doctrine has been expressly recognized and approved in this state (see State v. Williams, 11 S. C. 288, and the cases therein cited), and has again been approved in the comparatively recent case of City Council v. O'Donnell, 29 S. C. 368, 369, 7 S. E. 528, 529, 1 L. R. A. 636, 637. If this be so, then it is clear that even though the legislature may have passed a statute in reference to the offense against the state of gaming, the municipal corporation of Greenville is not thereby restricted from making further regulations upon the same subject, which, of course, have no operation except within the corporate limits of Greenville. See, also, the cases of City Council v. Heisembrittle, 2 McMul. 233, and City Council v. Aherns, 4 Strob. 241. The case of Heise v. Town Council, 6 Rich. Law, 404, cited by counsel for appellant, has no application to this case. There the case turned upon the fact that the town council had no power, under its charter, to impose a forfeiture as a penalty for a violation of its ordinances. Here, however, the city council of Greenville are expressly invested by its charter with the power to pass such ordinances as shall appear to them necessary for securing the peace and good government of the said city; and, if we were at liberty to inquire into the propriety of the means which they saw fit to adopt to suppress the pernicious vice of gaming, we would be inclined to agree with them that in order to effect the laudable purpose a very efficient means would be that which they adopted, for if persons who rent furnished rooms for lodging in a city like Greenville are permitted, with impunity, to use their rooms as places for gaming, the vice would flourish, even if every public gaming house in the city were entirely suppressed. We are satisfied, therefore, that appellant's first position cannot be sustained.

The second point made by counsel for appellant is thus stated in his argument: "Even if the ordinance is valid, the defendant is not guilty of the offense charged." This point, as developed by the argument, seems to rest, first, upon the theory that the charge made against defendant was "keeping a gambling house," which, as we have shown above, was not the charge made against the defendant, and therefore more need not be said as to that. The real ground, however, upon which this second point made by appellant seems to rest, is that the room which it is alleged the defendant permitted other persons to use as a place for gaming was neither his "inclosure," nor "place," nor "house," and, as the ordinance used those terms in describing the offense denounced, he could not legally be convicted. This is quite technical, but still defendant has a right to make the point, and it must be considered. But the question is whether the point is well taken. We do not think so, for two reasons: (1) The room which defendant rented and occupied was certainly his "place" as long as he continued to occupy it. He could lawfully forbid any person who was objectionable to him from entering his room or "place" of abode. Even his landlord had no right to enter upon it without the consent of the tenant, except under circumstances not necessary to be stated here. It was his castle, as much as the poor man's hut in the wilderness. But (2) we have very high authority for saying that the room was his "house." See 2 Bish. Cr. Law, §§ 107, 108. And as was said by O'Neall, J., in State v. McDowell, Dud., at page 347, in speaking of bawdy houses: "Without concert between defendants occupying different rooms for purposes of prostitution in a lodging house, the offenses are just as distinct as when they occupy different houses; for, in the case supposed, each room is a bawdy house and its inmate the keeper." The second point cannot, therefore, be sustained.

The third and last point made is that the fine imposed "was excessive and unjust." It certainly was within the limits prescribed both by the charter and the ordinance, and therefore there was no error of law in imposing a fine within those limits. This being so, the amount of the fine was a matter exclusively within the discretion of the mayor, and in his return he gives a very good reason for going to the limit of the law in this instance, as he had found that the imposition of a smaller fine had proved to be inefficacious in suppressing the evil. The judgment of this court is that the order or judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 7, 1900.)

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—PLAINTIFF NOT OWNER—ANSWER—DEFENSE—SUFFICIENCY.

The complaint in foreclosure did not allege plaintiff's ownership of the note and mortgage. Defendant's answer admitted all the allegations of the complaint, except the one that the amount claimed was due to plaintiff, and further alleged that she made a note and mortgage to the firm of A. & C.; that subsequently such firm dissolved, C. taking the assets to wind up; that thereafter A. obtained a receiver for the firm on the ground that C. was wasting the assets; that defendant's mortgage to the firm was transferred to plaintiff after the appointment of the receiver, though the assignment was antedated; that such transfer to plaintiff was fraudulent; that defendant, in ignorance of the truth, gave plaintiff the note and mortgage in suit in renewal of those formerly given to the firm; and that plaintiff was not the owner of the note and mortgage in suit, nor of the ones of which these were a renewal. Plaintiff demurred to the answer for failure to state a defense. Defendant received leave to amend by setting up a demand by the receiver for payment of the amount of the mortgage to A. & C., and that the note and mortgage in suit were void for want of consideration. Held, that the leave to amend was harmless, since the answer alleged facts which constituted the defense of failure of consideration, and denied the material fact of plaintiff's ownership of the note and mortgage sued on.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Abbeville county; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by S. J. Duckworth against Jane E. McKinney. From an order allowing defendant to amend, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The following is the report of the master: "Pursuant to the order of the court, I held a reference in this cause and took testimony, a copy of which is appended hereto. This is a suit brought by the plaintiff to foreclose a note and mortgage. The allegations usual in a case of this kind are found in the complaint. The defendant answered the complaint, and the plaintiff demurred to the answer, except the first paragraph thereof. At the trial the defendant asked leave to amend her answer. For convenience I will consider the demurrer and the motion to amend together. Ought the demurrer to be sustained? The plaintiff contends that defendant in her answer has admitted all the allegations of the complaint, and that the only defense which she has attempted to set up is an irrelevant one, namely, that somebody else is interested, and should have been made a party; and then, as to the amendment of the answer, plaintiff contends that it cannot be allowed, in that it comes too late and is not in the proper form, that it should be before answer and by affidavit, and that to allow it would be substantially to change the defense. Defendant contends that demurrer should not be sustained; that the plaintiff has no right to the money, and that the answer is therefore not demurrable; that, even if it is demurrable, it can be amended; that the amendment is within the power and discretion of the court; and that the amendment proposed does not materially change the defense. I should have stated that the plaintiff contends that the defendant in her answer admits all the allegations of the complaint except one, and that she denies that in the very words of the complaint, which is bad pleading and cannot be allowed. I agree with the plaintiff that the defendant has admitted all the allegations of the complaint, and I sustain his contention that it is not allowable to deny the allegations of the complaint in the very words thereof,—that that is what the law books call a 'negative pregnant,' and is not good pleading. So far as I can see, the only defense which the defendant really puts up in her first answer is that another person is interested in the proceedings, and she does not even ask that this third person be made a party. It seems to me that the defense set up is irrelevant and frivolous. Even if what the defendant contends for is true, what difference does it make to her? Who constituted her the protector and guardian of Tennent? Nor do I think the answer can be amended as requested. It would change substantially the entire defense. Surely to allow the defendant to plead failure of consideration would be a radical change of the defense. I find, as conclusions of law, that the motion to amend the answer should be disallowed, the demurrer sustained, and the answer, except the first paragraph thereof, stricken out, and that the plaintiff should have judgment against the defendant for the sum of $340.83, and a foreclosure of the premises mentioned in the complaint."

To the above report of the master the defendant filed the following exceptions:

"(1) Because it was error on the part of the said master to hold that the first paragraph of the defendant's answer is in form a negative pregnant, and therefore should be disregarded. It is respectfully submitted that the said paragraph is a specific denial, and should not be disregarded. (2) Because the said master erred in sustaining the demurrer to the defendant's answer, and in holding the same to be frivolous and irrelevant. It is respectfully submitted that the allegations of the answer make a valid defense of failure of consideration. (3) Because it was an abuse of discretion on the part of the said master to refuse to allow the said defendant to amend the said answer, and in holding that the said proposed amendment would substantially change the defense. It is respectfully submitted that the proposed amendment did not change substantially the defense, but tended to make more definite and certain the specific defense relied on, to wit, failure of consideration. (4) Because the said master misunderstood and misconstrued the whole scope of the defendant's answer, in holding and stating that the 'defendant contends that the demurrer should not be sustained, that the plaintiff has no right to the money, and that the answer is therefore not demurrable, and, even if it is demurrable, it can be amended.' It is respectfully submitted that the defendant's attorneys took no such position, but took the position that the answer in effect showed that the sole consideration for the mortgage sued on was that the old mortgage would be canceled; that the old mortgage had not been canceled, but that Tennent, the receiver, was threatening to sue this defendant, by order of the court of common pleas, to foreclose said old mortgage; and that therefore there had been a failure of consideration for the mortgage sued on in this action. (5) Because the said master erred in holding that plaintiff should have judgment against the defendant for the sum of $340.83 and a foreclosure of the premises mentioned in the complaint. (6) Because the said master erred in not considering the testimony taken by him, and reporting to the court his conclusions of law and fact therefrom."

The case was argued before Judge Watts upon the exceptions to the master's report and all the papers and proceedings in the cause, and Judge Watts passed the following order:

"This case came before me upon exceptions to the master's report. I hold that the master was in error in holding that the defendant's answer put in issue none of the allegations of the complaint, and the exception to such holding by the master is sustained. I hold that the special matter set forth does not, by itself, constitute a defense, and should have been stricken out on demurrer; but it was error on the part of the master to refuse to allow the defendant so to amend her answer as to set up the defense of want of consideration. Defendant should be allowed to deny that the plaintiff is the owner and holder of the mortgage sued on. It is therefore, on motion of defendant's attorneys, ordered that the exceptions to the master's report, as indicated above, be sustained; that the cause be remanded to Walter L. Miller, Esq., master, to take testimony and decide all questions of law and fact involved in said cause, and that he report his findings to this court; that the defendant be, and she is hereby, allowed 20 days from the rising of this court in which to amend her answer as indicated above."

The following are the exceptions of the plaintiff to the order of Judge Watts:

"(1) Because his honor erred in holding that the master erred in holding that defendant's answer put in issue none of the allegations of the complaint, when the first paragraph of defendant's answer is in these words: 'That the defendant admits all the allegations of the complaint, except so much of paragraph 5 as alleges the whole sum of said note and mortgage is now due and owing to the plaintiff, which she denies,'—said answer being an express admission of the complaint being true, except as to the amount, which, being denied by a negative pregnant, was no denial at all. (2) Because his honor erred in holding that the master was in error in refusing leave to the defendant to so amend her answer as to plead want of consideration, it being respectfully insisted that the master was right for three reasons, viz.: (a) That want of consideration can never be pleaded to a sealed instrument. (b) That it was proper to refuse to allow the amendment during the trial. (c) Because the master properly held that it would change substantially the defense set up by the defendant. (3) Because the plasiding judge erred in holding that the defendant should be allowed to deny that the plaintiff was the legal owner and holder of the mortgage, the defendant having admitted by her answer the title of the plaintiff to the papers sued on. (4) Because his honor erred in remanding the case to the master to take the testimony and report all issues of law and fact, the master having already taken the testimony as if the answer had been amended, and there being nothing for the court to do but to consider the case as it was and render judgment. (5) Because it is respectfully submitted that the master was right in holding the first paragraph of defendant's answer to be a negative pregnant, and in reporting in favor of the plaintiff, and it was error in the presiding judge to set aside said report; the answer raising no relevant issues. (6) Because the motion to amend the answer, as made before the master, being to amend so as to set up the defense that some third person was claiming the debt, and said claim not being made as provided in section 143 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the master was right in refusing to allow the amendment, and the presiding judge was in error in reversing the master's report on that point."

Wm. N. Graydon, for appellant. F. B. Gary and M. P. De Bruhl, for respondent.

McIVER, C. J. This was an action to foreclose a mortgage of real estate given to secure the payment of a promissory note executed by defendant to the plaintiff. The allegations of the complaint were in the usual form appropriate to such an action, except that there was no allegation that the plaintiff was the owner and holder of the note and mortgage. The defendant answered, in the first paragraph saying: "That the defendant admits all the allegations of the complaint, except so much of the paragraph 5 as alleges the whole sum of said note and mortgage is now due and owing to the plaintiff, which she denies." In the other paragraphs of her answer she makes substantially the following allegations: (2) On the 3d of February, 1896, she gave a note and mortgage to the firm of Allen & Cooley, and that upon the dissolution of said firm her said note and mortgage were turned over to D. K. Cooley, one of the members of said firm, for the purpose of paying the debts of said firm of Allen & Cooley. (3) That some time during the month of February, 1898, B. B. Allen, the other member of the firm of Allen & Cooley, commenced an action against said D. K. Cooley and T. D. Cooley, alleging, among other things, that D. K. Cooley had fraudulently transferred a large part of the assets of Allen & Cooley, which had been turned over to him in order that he might pay the debts of said firm, and was wasting and squandering said assets, and asking that a receiver be appointed to take charge of said assets. (4) That a receiver was appointed, and D. K. Cooley was required to turn over the assets to such receiver. (5) That the said D. K. Cooley transferred defendant's note and mortgage to Allen & Cooley, mentioned herein, after the order appointing the receiver was granted, although the assignment thereof was antedated. (6) That the defendant, in ignorance of the foregoing facts, and being then under the belief that the plaintiff was the owner of the note and mortgage previously given by her to Allen & Cooley, gave the note and mortgage in suit to plaintiff in renewal of the former one to Allen & Cooley. (7) That the transfer of the note and mortgage, given by defendant to Allen & Cooley, to the plaintiff, was fraudulent, and made for the purpose of evading the order of the court above referred to; that there was no consideration given by the plaintiff; and that he took the same well knowing the purpose of the transfer, and that his demand on the defendant for the note and mortgage sued on in this case was a part of the scheme to put the assets of Allen & Cooley beyond the reach of the court. The eighth paragraph of the answer is in the following language: "That the defendant is informed and believes that the plaintiff is not the owner of the note and mortgage sued on in this action, nor was he the owner of the note and mortgage alleged to have been assigned to him by the said D. K. Cooley, and for which these now in suit were given, and that the said defendant [obviously a misprint for plaintiff] has no right to bring this action."

The case was referred to the master "to hear and decide all issues of law and fact." At the reference the counsel for plaintiff interposed a demurrer to the answer, except the first paragraph thereof, on the ground that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a defense, in this: that said answer shows on its face that the defendant admits all the allegations of the complaint, and sets up an affirmative defense which is irrelevant to the issues raised by the complaint, and also that the answer fails to state that any other person has made or is making any claim against her for the same debt, which allegation is absolutely necessary in a case of this kind. The master stated that he would pass upon the demurrer at a later stage of the case, and would allow testimony to be introduced, subject, of course, to his action on the demurrer. Counsel for defendant then moved to amend the answer by stating that, after the execution of the note and mortgage in suit, the defendant received notice from W. C. Tennent, receiver, of the order of the court above referred to, and demanding payment to him, as receiver, of the money due by the defendant on the note and mortgage to Allen & Cooley, and that the note and mortgage in suit were without consideration and void. The master said that he would allow the amendment for "the present," but that, if he saw fit to disallow it afterwards, he would do so, and that he would allow testimony to be introduced in support of the allegations in the answer as amended, but that, if he finally determined to disallow the amendment, he would strike out any testimony that would not have been received if the answer had not been amended. The master then proceeded to take the testimony as set out in the "case," which tended to sustain the allegations contained in the answer which were demurred to. The master made his report, in which he sustained the plaintiff's demurrer to the answer, and refused the motion to amend, and, holding that there was no denial of the allegations of the complaint, rendered judgment as prayed for therein in favor of the plaintiff. A copy of this report should be incorporated by the reporter in his report of the case. To this report the defendant filed exceptions, and the case was heard by his honor, Judge Watts, upon the report and exceptions thereto, who rendered judgment sustaining some of the exceptions, and remanded the case to master to hear and decide all questions of law and fact in the case, allowing the defendant 20 days to amend her answer so as to set up the defense of want of consideration. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals upon the several grounds stated in the record. Let the decree of the circuit judge and the exceptions thereto be also embraced in the report of this case by the reporter.

It seems to us that the scope and effect of the answer as originally filed has been wholly misconceived. While it may be true that the first paragraph of the answer presents a negative pregnant, amounting to no denial at all, inasmuch as the form in which it is presented may be regarded as admitting that there is something due on the note and mortgage sued on (1 Enc. Pl. & Prac. 796; Curnow v. Insurance Co., 46 S. C. 93, 94, 24 S. E. 76, 77), yet, under the view which we take of this case, this matter becomes immaterial. It seems to us that the other paragraphs of the answer, properly construed, set up at least three defenses: (1) Fraud in obtaining the note and mortgage sued on; (2) failure of consideration; and (3) a denial that the plaintiff is the owner and holder of the note and mortgage upon which he bases his action. If the facts alleged in the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh paragraphs of the answer be true (and they must be taken to be so on demurrer), then it is clear that a case of fraud on the part of the plaintiff in obtaining the assignment of the mortgage given by defendant to Allen & Cooley, and also in obtaining the note and mortgage sued on, is presented, which should defeat plaintiff's right to a recovery in this action. If the facts there alleged be true, especially those stated in the sixth paragraph of the answer, taken in connection with the other allegations, then the defense of want of consideration or of failure of consideration (and in this case it matters not which) is certainly presented; for if the note and mortgage sued on were given in consideration of the payment and satisfaction of the note and mortgage to Allen & Cooley, and this last-mentioned note and mortgage have not been paid and extinguished (as they have not been, if the other facts alleged in the answer be true), then certainly there was want of consideration, or at least failure of consideration, for the note and mortgage sued upon. The contention on the part of the appellant that while failure of consideration of an obligation under seal may be set up as a defense to an action on such an instrument, yet want of consideration cannot, as the seal imports a consideration, avail the appellant in this case, for two reasons: (1) Because the note, which constitutes the substratum of plaintiff's action was not an instrument under seal, the allegation in the complaint being that the note sued on is a "promissory note"; and if the note was without consideration, then there was no debt, and if no debt, then there could be no valid mortgage. (2) Because the defense was really a failure, rather than a want, of consideration; for if the transaction between the plaintiff and the defendant was, as it is alleged in the answer to have been, then it amounted to this: that the plaintiff agreed that, if the defendant would give him the note and mortgage sued on, he would, in consideration thereof, pay and extinguish her note and mortgage to Allen & Cooley, and this he not only has not done, but cannot do, if the allegations in the answer be true, and thus the consideration upon which he obtained the note and mortgage sued on has failed.

The allegations in the eighth paragraph of the answer were clearly sufficient to raise the issue as to whether the plaintiff was the owner and holder of the mortgage sued on, which was certainly a material issue in the case. It seems to us, therefore, that the master erred in sustaining the demurrer to all the paragraphs of the answer except the first, as those paragraphs of the answer did set up the defenses above indicated, and, if not clearly and sufficiently set up, then the plaintiff's remedy was by motion to make the answer more definite. It is true that the answer does not set up in so many words that there was a "want of consideration" for the note sued on, or that there was a "failure of consideration"; but it does set up facts which go to sustain such a defense, and that is sufficient. The view taken by the master, as well as by appellant, that the defendant, by her answer, attempted to set up as a defense that the debt sued on was due, not to the plaintiff, but to another person (the receiver), is based upon an entire misconception of the answer. The defense is not that the defendant admits that she owes the debt evidenced by the note and mortgage sued on, but claims that she owes such debt to a third person, and not to the plaintiff; but, on the contrary, she practically denies that she owes the debt evidenced by the note and mortgage sued on to any one, and therefore the provisions of section 143 of the Code, cited by counsel for appellant, have no application to this case.

While we see no real necessity for any amendment to the defendant's answer, inasmuch as, according to our construction of the original answer, she has already set up the defense of a want of consideration, or a failure of consideration, and also denied that the plaintiff is the owner and holder of the note and mortgage sued on, we see no objection to allowing the defendant to amend her answer, if she be so advised, as allowed by the circuit judge. We see no error, therefore, in the judgment rendered by the circuit judge, although there might be some difference of opinion as to the reasons given for such judgment. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

HUNTER et al. v. HUNTER et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 2, 1900.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—SALE OF REAL ESTATE — POWER OF EXECUTRIX — TRUSTS—LIFE ESTATE—IMPLIED POWER TO SELL — PROBATE PROCEEDINGS — ORDER OF SALE—NECESSITY—PREMATURE ACTION—APPEAL AND ERROR—SUBROGATION—FAILURE TO PLEAD—EFFECT.

1. Where testator, after directing his wife, as his executrix, to pay all his debts and funeral expenses out of his personal estate, devised the residue of his estate to her for life, to support herself and to support and educate testator's children, the life estate given the wife was incumbered with a trust for the support and education of testator's children, and she had no power to sell her life interest in the estate.

2. Where testator's property consisted in part of things consumable in use, as provisions, farming produce, etc., and he devised his property to his wife for life, for the support of herself and to support and educate his children, the fact that he directed that, at the death of his wife, all of his property "that might be left" after the support of the family and education of his children should be equally divided among the children, did not give the wife the implied power to sell her life interest in the estate, since the words "that might be left" referred to the property that had not been consumed.

3. Where testator's executrix applied to the probate court for an order to sell his real estate to pay his debts, but the probate proceedings contained no order of sale, they did not confer on executrix any power to convey the real estate.

4. Where by the terms of a will a devise of a life estate to testator's wife was burdened with the trust for the support and education of testator's children, an action brought by the children during the lifetime of the wife to set aside a sale of her life interests was not premature.

5. Where an executrix, under a mistake as to her powers under testator's will, sold her life interest in the estate to defendants, and testator's children filed a bill to set it aside, and the money paid by defendants had been used to discharge testator's debts, but defendants' answer did not in terms raise the question of their right to be subrogated to the creditors' rights, and that question was not passed on by the trial court, it will not be decided by the court on appeal, but the cause will be remanded, with leave to defendants to amend their answer by formally pleading subrogation.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Laurens county; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by Eugene S. Hunter and others against Nannie W. Hunter and other. From an order dismissing the complaint, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

The following is the will referred to in the opinion:

"The State of South Carolina, Laurens County. I, Samuel M. Hunter, of the county and state aforesaid, do make and ordain this, my last will and testament, in manner and form as follows, to wit: (1) I direct my executrix to pay my just debts and funeral expenses, and to erect a suitable monument over my grave, out of the proceeds of any of my personal property that she can best spare. (2) I will all the rest and residue of my estate, both real and personal, to my wife, Nannie W. Hunter, for and during her lifetime, to support herself and my children and to educate my children. (3) I hereby authorize my wife to give to my children, as they may severally go to housekeeping, such of my property as she may deem proper for them to have, and such as she may think she can spare, and to keep an account of it, so as to make all my children equal in the final division of my estate at the death of my said wife. (4) At the death of my wife I will that all my property then left, after supporting and educating the family and children, shall be equally divided among my children living at the death of my wife. If any of my children should die in the lifetime of my wife, leaving a child or children living at her death, such child or children shall take the share of the deceased parent in my estate. At the death of my wife I direct that all of my estate, both real and personal, that may be left after supporting the family and educating my children, shall be divided among my children living at my wife's death and the children of any of my children that may die in the lifetime of my wife, by four disinterested and competent men, to be selected by my children, without the aid or interference of any court; the children of a deceased child to take the parent's share. (5) I appoint my wife, Nannie W. Hunter, executrix of this, my will, during her lifetime. At her death I appoint my sons, Eugene, Samuel, Stokes, and William Mills, executors of this, my last will; also my son, Melmoth Leander. S. M. Hunter. [L. S.]

"Signed, sealed, and acknowledged in our presence this 28th day of August, A. D. 1875, as witnesses. J. P. Miller. John W. Stokes. W. L. Wait."

Ball, Simkins & Ball and Haynsworth, Parker & Patterson, for appellants. N. B. Dial and W. H. Martin, for respondents.

McIVER, C. J. On the 25th day of April, 1883, S. M. Hunter, having first duly made and executed his last will and testament, departed this life, leaving surviving him his wife, the defendant Nannie W. Hunter, and his children, who are the plaintiffs in this case. The said Nannie W. Hunter was the duly appointed and qualified executrix of the will of her deceased husband, and as such she made deeds to S. M. Nabors, A. Y. Thompson, and E. J. Fleming, purporting to convey to these persons, in the different proportions mentioned in the complaint, a tract of land lying in the county of Laurens, which deeds bear date, respectively, as follows: That to S. M. Nabors on the 9th of May, 1885; that to A. Y. Thompson on the 8th of August, 1885; and that to E. J. Fleming on the 18th of November, 1885. It seems that some proceeding was instituted in the court of probate for Greenville county,—exactly when does not appear, though, from such portions of the record of that proceeding as were introduced in evidence, it was probably early in January, 1885,—the object of which seemed to be to obtain an order for the sale of the real estate of the testator, in aid of the personalty, to pay his debts, and also for the purpose of enjoining creditors from suing the executrix at law, and requiring them to prove their claims under that proceeding; for there is an order to that effect, but there is no order for the sale of the real estate, and there is no evidence that any order of sale was ever granted. The present action was brought by the plaintiffs, comprising all of the children of the testator, against the said Nannie W. Hunter and the other defendants, who claim title to the land in question under the sales made by the said Nannie W. Hunter as aforesaid, in which the plaintiffs claim that the said Nannie W. Hunter had no authority, either as executrix or otherwise, to sell any of the real estate of the testator; that the life estate given to her by the will was given to her in trust for the support of herself and the children of testator, and also for the education of said children; that the said Nannie W. Hunter has never performed the trust imposed upon her, but, on the contrary, has deprived herself of the means of doing so by selling the land as aforesaid, which constituted the principal part of the testator's estate. Wherefore the plaintiffs demand judgment "that the said Nannie W. Hunter may be removed as trustee of the said life estate, and that the will be construed by this court, and that it be declared that the said life estate is subject to the support of these plaintiffs, and that the rents and profits thereof be apportioned between the said Nannie W. Hunter, or her grantees, and these plaintiffs, and that the said Nannie W. Hunter and her grantees do account to these plaintiffs for all rents and profits heretofore derived from said land, and that it be declared that after the termination of said life estate these plaintiffs are the owners in fee simple of the said lands, and for the costs of this action." To this complaint the defendant Nannie W. Hunter filed no answer, but the other defendants, who are in possession of the land, claiming under the sales above mentioned, answered, setting up, among other things, the claim that Nannie W. Hunter had authority as executrix to sell the land, or that, at least, she took a life estate therein, unincumbered with any trust, which estate she had a right to sell, and has sold; and as a further defense they claim that said Nannie W. Hunter had the right to sell the land under the proceedings in the court of probate above mentioned, that the lands were purchased at their full value, and that the proceeds of the sale were applied to the payment of the debts of the testator and to the support and education of his children, the plaintiffs herein. They also claim that said sales were made with the knowledge, consent, and approval of the plaintiffs. Finally, they plead the statute of limitations; the action, it appears, not having been commenced until 30th of June, 1899.

Upon the pleadings, thus briefly stated, the case came on for trial before his honor, Judge R. C. Watts, when the testimony set out in the "case" was introduced. The only portion of the testimony which, under the view we take of the case, we deem it necessary to state, is that portion of Mrs. Nannie W. Hunter's testimony, in which she states that the entire proceeds of the sale of the land were applied by her to the payment of the debts of the testator; and this testimony does not anywhere appear to have been denied. The circuit judge, took the view that as Nannie W. Hunter, under the will, took a life estate unincumbered with any trust, she had a right to sell that estate; and hence, without considering any of the other questions in the case, he held that the action was prematurely commenced, and therefore rendered judgment dismissing the complaint with costs. From this judgment plaintiffs appeal upon the several exceptions set out in the record, and, in accordance with the proper practice, respondents have given notice that, if this court finds itself unable to sustain the judgment of the circuit judge upon the ground upon which he rested it, they would ask this court to sustain such judgment upon the grounds set out in the record. We do not deem it necessary to set out these exceptions and these additional grounds in hæc verba, but think it will be sufficient to state the questions which these exceptions and grounds raise: (1) Is there anything in the will which justifies the inference that the testator intended to invest his executrix with the power to sell his real estate? (2) Was the life estate given to the wife incumbered with any trust in favor of the children? And, if so, is there anything in the will which justifies the inference that the testator intended to invest his wife with the power to sell such life estate? (3) Did the executrix derive any power to sell the land in question from the proceedings in the court of probate of Greenville county? (4) If the sale was made without authority, does the fact that the proceeds of such sale were applied to the payment of the debts of the testator entitle the defendants to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors whose claims were satisfied by their money? And have they the right to retain possession of the property so purchased until they have been repaid the amounts so paid by them?

1. The first of these questions depends upon the construction of the will as a whole, and for this reason a copy of the same should be incorporated by the reporter in his report of the case. It is quite certain that the will contains no express authority to the executrix to sell any portion of his estate, though the terms of the first clause might be sufficient to warrant the inference that the testator intended to invest his personal property, if the same became necessary to effect the purposes therein indicated; but there is not a word in the will, so far as we can discover, which indicates an intention on the part of the testator to invest his executrix with power to sell his real estate. Indeed, this question was not seriously discussed at the hearing, and may be dismissed without further remark.

2. This question is more important, and is, in fact, one of the turning points in the case; and, as we differ with the circuit judge in the view which he has taken as to this point, we have examined this question with great care. The question naturally divides itself into two branches: (a) Was the life estate given to the wife incumbered with any trust? (b) If so, was there any power conferred upon the executrix to sell such life estate thus held by her in trust?

As to the first branch of the inquiry, it seems to us that the case of Wylie v. White, 10 Rich. Eq. 294, cited by counsel for appellants, is conclusive. The testator, after providing, in the first clause of his will, for the payment of his debts and funeral expenses, and for the erection of a monument over his grave, "out of the proceeds of any of my personal property that she [the executrix] can best spare," proceeds, in the second clause of his will, as follows: "I will all the rest and residue of my estate, both real and personal, to my wife, Nannie W. Hunter, for and during her lifetime, to support herself and my children and to educate my children." It will thus be seen that the testator not only expressly declared the quantity of estate which he gave to his wife, but also the purposes for which it was given to her. It was not given to her in such terms as would import that he intended his wife to take the bounty provided for her, as her own absolutely, to dispose of as she should think fit; but, on the contrary, the purposes for which it was given were distinctly declared. There are no words used in this or in any other clause of the will which indicate that the testator merely hoped or expected, or had a confident belief, that his wife would use the property for the support of herself and the children and for the education of the children, which expressions have sometimes been construed to be mere precatory words. On the contrary, the words used expressly declare the purposes for which the property was given to her for her life; and to those purposes it must be devoted. If so, then the language used is not only quite sufficient to create a trust, but must be so construed, even though the word "trust" is not used, in order to insure the accomplishment of the purposes for which the property is declared to have been given. For, as was said, in Wylie v. White, supra: "To create a trust it is not necessary that the word should be employed in the instrument. It was said by Lord Eldon in Rex v. Denison, 1 Ves. & B. 273, that the word 'trust' not being made use of 'is a circumstance to be attended to, but nothing more; and if the whole frame of the will creates a trust, for the particular purpose of satisfying which the estate is devised, the law is the same, though the word "trust" is not used.'" And, again, quoting from Hill. Trustees, 65: "Thus, when a gift in a will is expressed to be for the benefit of others, or to be at the disposal of the donee for herself and children or towards her support and her family, or to enable the donee to provide for or maintain his children, * * * or where the gift is expressed to be made to the end or to the intent that the donee should apply it to certain purposes, in all these cases the terms employed have been held sufficient to fasten a trust upon conscience of the donee,"—showing that in every case the general purpose and intention of the donor, and not the use of one particular term or another, will decide the question whether a party does or does not take in a fiduciary character. These authorities, based as they are upon sound reason and common sense, satisfy us that this will should be construed as creating a trust in the wife for the accomplishment of the purpose declared by the testator. If so, it is clear, then, that the life tenant could not sell even her life interest, unless something can be found in the instrument creating the trust which would invest the life tenant with power to sell the life estate.

This renders it necessary to consider the second branch of the inquiry: (b) Is there anything in the will which invests the life tenant with power to sell the life estate? It is quite certain that there is no such express grant of power in the will; and, if such power is conferred at all, it must be by implication. The contention, as we understand it, is that such power may be implied from the following language, used in the fourth clause of the will: "At the death of my wife, I direct that all of my estate, both real and personal, that may be left after supporting the family and educating my children, shall be divided among my children." Stress is laid upon the words which we have italicized, as implying that the testator intended and expected that some, at least, of the property should be sold. In view of the undisputed fact that some of the property left by the testator consisted of such things as would be consumable in the use, such as provisions, farming produce, horses, mules, and farming implements, it seems to us that the most natural inference to be drawn from these words is that the testator meant all of his property, except such as might be consumed in the use for which it was given (all that may be left or all that remained after it had been applied to the use for which it was intended), rather than that the testator intended by those words, by implication, to invest the life tenant with the power of sale,—rather a remote and strained implication by which to create so important a power as that of sale. This view is supported by the authorities cited in the argument, which need not be dwelt upon here; for, even if it could be assumed that the testator intended, by the words relied upon, to invest the life tenant with power to sell, yet it is very obvious that, if such a power was conferred, it was conferred solely for the purpose of effecting the primary object of the testator,—the support of the family and the education of the children. As there is no pretense that the sale was made for any such purpose, but, on the contrary, the undisputed fact is that it was made for the payment of the debts of the testator, and that every dollar of the proceeds of such sale was applied to such debts, we need not consider this point further. It was also contended that, if the life estate was originally incumbered with a trust, it terminated when the children attained their majority. We are unable to discover in the terms of the will any warrant for such a contention, and it may therefore be dismissed without further consideration.

3. The next general inquiry is whether the sales of the land in question can be supported by the proceedings of the court of probate for Greenville county. Passing by any other questions raised, or that might be raised, in reference to the effect of those proceedings, a conclusive answer to this question is found in the fact that those proceedings do not show that any judgment or order of sale was ever made by that court; and there is no evidence aliunde tending to show that any order of sale was ever made. The record of those proceedings, as offered in evidence, was manifestly not complete; and while it may be true that where a partial record does show that a final judgment was rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, and the only defect in the record is the absence of certain steps leading up to the judgment, the court may infer from such judgment that the necessary steps to be taken before such judgment could be properly rendered had been taken, yet where there is no final judgment, and the record only shows that certain steps leading up to the judgment had been taken, the fact that a judgment had been rendered cannot be inferred. Brown v. Coney, 12 S. C. 144. Indeed, the testimony aliunde in this case rather tends to show that no order of sale was ever granted by the court of probate, but that Mrs. Nannie W. Hunter, being advised by her father, who is characterized in the circuit decree as a lawyer of high character and many years experience at the bar, that she had authority as executrix to make the sales, abandoned the proceeding in the court of probate before it culminated in any final judgment, and made the sales as executrix; for the deeds on their face so show, and they are signed by her as executrix, and no allusion whatever is made in these deeds to any proceeding in the court of probate. It is clear, therefore, that she derived no authority to sell this land from such proceedings. Holding these views, we cannot concur in the view taken by the circuit judge that the action was prematurely brought, and for that reason only the complaint should be dismissed; for if, as we have seen, the life estate was given to Mrs. Hunter burdened with a trust for the support of herself and the children, and if, as we have also seen, she has violated such trust by selling the land without lawful authority, then it seems clear that the plaintiffs, who are the children of the testator, have now a status in court to assert and preserve such rights as they may be found to have in the premises.

4. This leads us to the fourth and last inquiry in the case,—the question of subrogation. In the outset the appellants raise the point that, as no such question is raised by the pleadings, it cannot be raised now. While, under the judgment which we decide to render in this case, this point becomes immaterial, yet we may say that, while the word "subrogation" does not appear to have been used in the answer, yet the essential facts out of which the right of subrogation arises, to wit, that the lands were sold by the executrix under a supposed authority so to do, and the proceeds of such sale were applied to the debts of the testator, and the further fact that Nannie W. Hunter was permitted to testify, without objection, that she had sold the lands and had applied the entire proceeds of such sale to the payment of the debts of the testator, might be sufficient to show that such point is not well taken. We will therefore proceed to consider the question of subrogation upon its merits. In 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.), at page 258, where the writer is discussing the doctrine of subrogation, we find, as an illustration of one of the instances in which the right of subrogation arises, the following language: "So, where an executor sells real estate and uses the proceeds in the payment of debts, under a mistake of his powers, and the purchaser is ousted by the devisee, the land, in equity, will be subjected to indemnify the purchaser to the extent to which his money was applied to the debts over and above the personal estate." See, also, 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1300. But we need not go beyond the limits of our own state for authority upon this point. In Cathcart v. Sugenheimer, 18 S. C. 123, the property of a lunatic had been sold under an order of the court of common pleas, made in a proceeding instituted by the committee of the lunatic, to which the lunatic was not made a party. Subsequently the commission of lunacy was superseded, and Cathcart, the person who had been declared a lunatic, having been restored to his rights as a person sui juris, brought an action to recover certain property bought by the defendant Sugenheimer at the sale above mentioned. One of the defenses set up was that, the defendant's money having gone to pay debts of the lunatic, she had the right to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors whose debts had thus been paid by the defendant's money. The court sustained the right of subrogation. In delivering the opinion of the court Mr. Justice McGowan uses this language: "Wherein did this sale differ from that of the property of a decedent for the same purpose?"—and then quotes with approval the following passage from Freem. Jud. Sales, 51: "If by a sale of the lands of a decedent his debts are paid, and it turns out that the sale is void, the purchaser has the right to be subrogated to the claims which he has by his purchase paid, and he has also the right to retain possession of the property as security for the repayment of the sums to which he is entitled." That has been recognized and followed the recent case of Bailey v. Bailey, 41 S. C. 337, 19 S. E. 669, 728. But, inasmuch as the question of the defendant's right of subrogation was not in terms made in the pleadings, and was not considered or decided by the circuit judge, it seems to us proper to pursue the course which was adopted in the case of Bailey v. Bailey, supra, and remand the case to the circuit court, for the purpose of enabling that court to pass upon the question of the defendants' right to subrogation, with leave to the defendants, if they shall be so advised, to amend their answer by setting up formally their right to subrogation.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed solely upon the ground of error in holding that the complaint should be dismissed for the reason that the action was prematurely brought, and that the case be remanded to that court for the purpose hereinabove announced.

GRIFFITH et al. v. CROMLEY et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 10, 1900.)

GUARDIAN AD LITEM—WITHDRAWAL OF COMPLAINT — NECESSITY FOR NEW APPOINTMENT—COMPLAINT — SUFFICIENCY — OBJECTIONS—WAIVER—PREJUDICIAL ERROR—TRIAL BY JURY—WAIVER—TRIAL—DECISION—FILING—TIME.

1. A guardian ad litem was appointed for certain minors, who were about to sue for the partition of land. Thereafter a summons and complaint were lodged with the sheriff for service, but were withdrawn without being served. A second action was then commenced, but no new order appointing a guardian ad litem was obtained. Held, that the power conferred on the guardian appointed had not been exhausted, since the first complaint was not dismissed on its merits, but was withdrawn before service of the summons accompanying it, and that therefore the second action was properly commenced without a new appointment.

2. In an action by minors for the partition of lands, an objection that the complaint did not state sufficient facts, in that their guardian ad litem was illegally appointed, and was not a fit and competent person for the position, because privy in interest and relationship with parties whose interest was adverse to that of the minors, was insufficient, since it failed to show prejudicial error.

3. In an action for the partition of lands, an objection in the answer that the complaint did not allege that plaintiffs were seised of the premises within 10 years was insufficient, since the defect appeared on the face of the complaint, and therefore could only be interposed by demurrer.

4. Under Const. 1895, art. 5, § 17, providing that it shall be the duty of judges of the circuit court to file their decisions within 60 days from the rising of the last court of the circuit then being held, a decision filed after the expiration of the 60 days will not be invalid, if the delay be caused by act of the court, and not by the laches of the parties.

5. Code, § 274, provides that issues of fact for the recovery of money only, or of specific real or personal property, must be tried by jury, unless a jury be waived or a reference be ordered. In an action for partition of lands, defendants consented that the case be referred to the master of the county to take testimony and report the same to the court. Held, that defendants' consent to the reference to take testimony constituted a waiver of the right to a trial by jury.

Gary, A. J., dissenting.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Saluda county; O. W. Buchanan, Judge.

Suit for partition by Lula Griffith and others against A. B. Cromley and others. From the decree for plaintiff defendant A. B. Cromley appeals. Affirmed.

C. J. Ramage and Eugene W. Able, for appellant. Croft, Tillman & Peurifoy, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. In order to understand the questions that are raised by the pleadings and presented by the exceptions, it is necessary to refer to the complaint and answer, which are as follows:

Complaint: "(1) That Mary G. Cromley, late of the county of Edgefield, died intestate, on or about 5th day of August, 1885, being possessed in fee at the time of her death of the following described real estate, to wit: All of that tract, piece, or parcel of land situate, lying, and being then in the county of Edgefield, but now the county of Saluda, in the state of South Carolina, and containing 102 acres, more or less, and bounded on the north by the lands of Amanda Peterson, on the east by lands of J. A. Griffith, on the south by lands of W. T. Cromley, and on the west by lands of Mrs. Crawford. (2) That the said Mary G. Cromley left as her heirs at law and distributees the defendant A. B. Cromley, her husband, and the defendant Hardy Griffith, a brother, Fannie G. Cromley, a sister, who had intermarried with W. T. Cromley, and Lulu Griffith, a sister. That on the 17th day of July, 1887, the said Fannie G. Cromley departed this life intestate, leaving as her heirs at law the plaintiff W. T. Cromley, her husband, the plaintiff H. J. Cromley, a son, and Fannie B. Cromley, a daughter. (3) That the plaintiffs and defendants own and possess the above-described premises as tenants in common, in the following proportions; that is to say: The plaintiff Lulu Griffith is entitled to the undivided one-sixth part in fee in said premises, and the plaintiffs W. T. Cromley, H. J. Cromley, and Fannie B. Cromley are each entitled to the undivided one-sixth part in fee thereof, and the defendant Hardy Griffith is entitled to the undivided one-sixth part in fee thereof, and the defendant A. B. Cromley is entitled to the undivided one-half part thereof in fee; and the plaintiffs are desirous that partition of the same be had. (4) The plaintiffs further allege that the defendant A. B. Cromley has enjoyed the rents and profits of said premises ever since the death of the said Mary G. Cromley, and also committed waste thereon by cutting and removing timber to the value of $400 therefrom, and that he should be required to account to these plaintiffs for their share of the same. (5) That by an order of B. W. Crouch, clerk of the court of common pleas for the county of Saluda aforesaid, bearing date 6th day of August, 1897, William Griffith was appointed the guardian ad litem for the plaintiffs H. J. Cromley and Fannie B. Cromley, who are infants, with a power and authority to bring this action in their behalf, and he is now such guardian ad litem."

Answer of A. B. Cromley (the only answer in the case): "(1) That he denies each and every allegation contained in the complaint of the plaintiffs, and demands strict proof of the same and every part thereof. (2) As a further and separate defense this defendant avers that he is informed, and believes his information to be true, that the plaintiffs have no legal capacity to sue herein; that there is a defect in the parties plaintiff hereto; that the complaint of these plaintiffs does not allege facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that the guardian ad litem herein for H. J. and Fannie Cromley was irregularly and illegally appointed, and is not a fit and competent person to be their guardian ad litem, being privy in interest and relationship with those whose interest is inconsistent with and adverse to the interest of H. J. and Fannie Cromley; and, further, in that the complaint of the plaintiffs herein does not allege that the plaintiffs herein for themselves, or either of them for himself, or any one in their interest or through whom they may claim, were seised of the premises described in the complaint within 10 years of the time of the commencement of this action. (3) As a further and separate defense the defendant A. B. Cromley avers that he is the owner in his own right absolutely in fee simple of the tract of land described in the complaint. (4) As a further and separate defense the defendant A. B. Cromley avers that more than 10 years have elapsed since the plaintiffs' right of action accrued, and the defendant has been in adverse possession of said land for more than ten years. (5) As a further and separate defense the defendant A. B. Cromley avers that during the time he has been in possession of the land described in the complaint he has erected on the land various improvements and betterments, which are now on said land, and he has caused the land to be variously otherwise improved, believing all the while that his claim in and to the land was good and valid; that the betterments and improvements on the lands described were all made in good faith and upon the belief aforementioned, and are of the value of $300; and in case these plaintiffs should recover the said premises, or any part thereof, for any reason whatsoever, this defendant begs that he be allowed the value of these improvements before the prayer of the complaint be allowed."

The following facts are stated in the record: "At the August, 1899, term of court for Saluda county this case was called for trial by Judge O. W. Buchanan. Motion was made to continue by the defendant on the ground that leading counsel was absent from the court. This motion was overruled. Defendant's counsel then urged the court to be allowed a trial by a jury upon the issues raised by defendant's answer. This request was promptly overruled by the court, and a hearing on the merits ordered. After argument of the attorneys for the plaintiffs and defendant had been heard, the court took the case under advisement. On Saturday, December 9, 1899, the following order was filed in the office of the clerk of the court of Saluda county: 'After reading the pleadings, evidence, and papers herein, and after hearing arguments for and against the matters and things contained within the complaint, it is ordered, decided, and adjudged that the relief prayed for shall be allowed, that the allegations of the complaint are sustained by the evidence and the law, and that the contentions of the defense are not made out by the evidence herein. It is further ordered that the usual writ in such cases do issue from the clerk of this court, directed to commissioners, who will be directed to make partition of the premises as required by law, or if, in such commissioners' opinion, such land cannot be divided with due regard to the interest of all parties concerned, then with power to make the usual recommendation in such cases; that all parties have leave to apply at the foot of this order for any further order to carry out the provisions hereof. [Signed] O. W. Buchanan, Presiding Judge. November 5, 1899.'"

The defendant appealed upon numerous exceptions, some of which relate to findings of fact upon the questions of title to the land, while others present questions that do not properly arise under the pleadings. Furthermore, the conclusion which this court has reached renders unnecessary the consideration of some of the other exceptions, as the questions raised by them become speculative.

The objections to the sufficiency of the complaint on the grounds "that the plaintiffs have no legal capacity to sue herein," and "that there is a defect in the parties plaintiff hereto," are based upon the following state of facts: In 1897 W. T. Cromley filed a petition for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for the infants H. J. Cromley and Fannie B. Cromley, then under 14 years of age, alleging "that the said infants, together with Lulu Griffith and W. T. Cromley, were about to commence an action in the court of common pleas in and for the said county and state for the partition of a tract of land in said county and state and for other purposes, and that the said infants had an interest in the result of the said action." The clerk of the court appointed William Griffith guardian ad litem for said infants on the 6th of August, 1897. The appellant's attorney, in his argument, states the facts as follows: "H. J. Cromley and Fannie B. Cromley, infants under the age of 21 years, by their guardian ad litem, William Griffith, and W. T. Cromley and Lula Griffith, plaintiffs, caused to be issued against Hardy Griffith, Joseph Griffith, A. B. Cromley, and Samuel Crawford and John Crawford, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Crawford Brothers, defendants, a summons and complaint. The summons and complaint in this action was signed by Edwin F. Strother, Jr., plaintiffs' attorney, and verified by W. T. Cromley on August 6, 1897. The complaint stated, among other things, that plaintiffs desired partition of certain lands, described, and an injunction prohibiting wastes. * * * Afterwards this summons and complaint was lodged with the sheriff of Saluda county for service, and the following indorsement made thereon: 'Filed this 19th of August, 1897. Entered page 22. M. A. Whittle, Sheriff of Saluda County, S. C.' It does not appear that this summons and complaint was served. It seems that it was afterwards withdrawn from the hands of the sheriff. Thereafter, on February 2, 1898, the summons and complaint in the present action was prepared and signed: 'Croft, Tillman & Peurifoy, Plaintiffs' Attorneys.' On February 11, 1898, this summons and complaint was served on the defendant. The infant plaintiffs, H. J. and Fannie Cromley, appeared in the action brought by Messrs. Croft, Tillman & Peurifoy by William Griffith as their guardian ad litem, by virtue of the appointment made upon motion of Mr. Edwin F. Strother, J., on August 6, 1897, in the action, the summons and complaint of which had been withdrawn after being filed with the sheriff of the county for service." As the first complaint was not dismissed upon the merits, but was withdrawn before service of the summons accompanying it, the power conferred upon the guardian ad litem to bring the action for partition was not exhausted, and the second action was properly commenced without another order appointing a guardian ad litem for the infants.

The next objection interposed by the appellant was "that the complaint did not allege facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that the guardian ad litem herein for H. J. and Fannie Cromley was irregularly and illegally appointed, and is not a fit and competent person to be the guardian ad litem, being privy in interest and relationship with those whose interest is inconsistent with and adverse to the interest of H. J. and Fannie Cromley." Even if there was error, the appellant failed to show that it was prejudicial to him. He therefore has no right to raise this question.

The last objection interposed to the sufficiency of the complaint by the appellant in his answer was "that the complaint did not allege that the plaintiffs herein for themselves, or either of them for himself, or any one in their interest or through whom they may claim, were seised of the premises described in the complaint within ten years of the time of the commencement of this action." The ground urged by the appellant appeared upon the face of the complaint. This objection could not, therefore, be set up as a defense in the answer, but could only be interposed by demurrer. Even, however, if the appellant had demurred, it could not have been sustained.

We will next consider the question raised by the exception whether the judgment was null and void by reason of the fact that it was not filed within the time required by law. Section 17, art. 5, of the constitution of 1895 is as follows: "It shall be the duty of the * * * judges of the circuit courts to file their decisions within sixty days from the rising of the last court of the circuit then being held." No penalty is therein provided, and it was intended to affect the validity of a judgment filed after the time specified, though a judge disregarding such requirement without good reason for so doing would be subject to impeachment. The rule is thus stated in Mitchell v. Overman, 103 U. S. 62, 26 L. Ed. 369, to wit: "The adjudged cases are very numerous in which have been considered the circumstances under which courts may properly enter a judgment or a decree as of a date anterior to that on which it was in fact rendered. * * * We content ourselves with saying that the rule established by the general concurrence of the American and English courts is that where the delay in rendering a judgment or a decree arises from the act of the court—that is, where the delay has been caused either for its convenience, by the multiplicity or press of business, the intricacy of the question involved, or of any other cause not attributable to the laches of the parties—the judgment or decree may be entered retrospectively as of a time when it should or might have been entered up. In such cases, upon the maxim, 'Actus curiæ neminem gravabit,' which has well been said to be founded in right and good sense, and to afford a safe and certain guide for the administration of justice, it is the duty of the court to see that the parties shall not suffer by the delay." This language is quoted with approval in the case of State v. Fullmore, 47 S. C. 34, 24 S. E. 1026.

Another question presented by the exceptions is whether the defendant was entitled to a trial by jury upon the issue of title raised by the pleadings. The record contains the following statement, to wit:

"Upon issue joined thus the following order was made:

" 'On motion of Croft, Tillman & Peurifoy, plaintiffs' attorneys, with the consent of Eugene W. Able, defendants' attorney, it is ordered that the case be referred to the master of this county to take the testimony herein and report the same to this court. Ernest Gary, Presiding Judge. December 12, 1898.'

" 'We consent to the above order. Croft, Tillman & Peurifoy, Plaintiffs' Attorneys. Eugene W. Abel, Defendants' Attorney.' "

As hereinbefore stated, the defendant demanded a trial by jury when the case was called for trial before his honor, Judge Buchanan, which was refused. Section 288 of the Code is as follows: "Trial by jury in the court of common pleas may be waived by the several parties to an issue of fact in actions on contract, and with the assent of the court in other actions, in the manner following: (1) By failing to appear at the trial. (2) By written consent, in person or by attorney, filed with the clerk. (3) By oral consent in open court, entered in the minutes." Section 274 of the Code contains this provision: "An issue of fact in action for the recovery of money only, or of specific real or personal property, must be tried by a jury, unless a jury be waived, as provided in section 288, or a reference be ordered." The words which we have italicized refer to references ordered by consent of the parties to the action for the purpose of trying the issue of fact. The defendant's consent that the testimony should be taken by the master was not a waiver of his right to demand a trial by jury, any more than if he had consented that the testimony should be taken de bene esse or before the clerk of the court. The testimony could have been read to the jury, and there is no inconsistency between the foregoing order of reference and a trial of the issue of title by a jury. The circuit judge erred, therefore, in ruling otherwise.

It is my opinion that the judgment of the circuit court should be reversed, and the case remanded to that court for a new trial; but, as the majority of this court think otherwise, the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

McIVER, C. J. (dissenting). While I concur in the conclusions reached by Mr. Justice GARY upon all the other points considered by him in his opinion, I cannot agree with him in regard to his last conclusion, to wit, that the circuit judge erred in refusing the motion of appellants for a trial by jury of the issue of title raised by the answer. On the contrary, I think there was no error in refusing the motion, made at the time and under the circumstances when it was made. The action was brought for partition, and was, therefore, cognizable in equity. When, however, the appellant by his answer raised an issue of title to real estate, he had a right to have such issue tried by a jury, unless such right was waived; and the practical question presented here was whether there was such waiver. While it is true that there was no express waiver, yet it seems to me that such waiver can, and should, be implied from his conduct. In the first place, after issue joined, the appellant consented to an order "that the case be referred to the master of this county to take the testimony herein and report the same to this court." In section 274 of the Code it is provided that an issue of fact in an action for the recovery of real property must be tried by a jury unless a "jury trial be waived, as provided in section 288, or a reference be ordered." As it cannot be claimed that a jury trial was waived in any of the modes designated in section 288 of the Code, the inquiry is narrowed down to the question whether such mode of trial was waived by the consent to the order of reference above stated. What was the nature and scope of that order? It was a reference of "the case"; not of any particular issue in the case, but the whole case. For what purpose? "To take the testimony herein and report the same to this court." Now, as the pleadings show that there were other issues in the case, which were not triable by a jury as a matter of right, besides the issue of title, and as a whole case was referred to the master to take the testimony on all these issues and report the same to the court, the necessary inference seems to be that the testimony was to be reported to the court for the purpose of enabling the court to pass upon all the issues; that is, for the trial of the whole case by the court. As was said in Meetze v. Railroad Co., 23 S. C., at page 25, when a party consents to an order of reference, "he must be regarded as consenting to the necessary incidents to a reference." Again, as there were other issues in the case besides that of title, and as the testimony in the whole case was to be taken and reported by the master, how was that relating only to the issue of title to be separated from that relating to the other issues, not triable by a jury, if appellant's demand for a trial by jury had been granted? Could the court, under the stringent provisions of the constitution, venture to instruct the jury what portion of the testimony reported by the master was applicable to the issue of title, which alone they were authorized to try, and what was not? And, if this was not done, would not the case be left in inextricable confusion before the jury? But, in addition to this, it is provided in section 294 that, "when the reference is to report the facts, the report shall have the effect of a special verdict." If so, then, if the demand for a trial by jury had been granted, the court would then have been confronted with two verdicts,—one the special verdict found in the report of the master, and the other the verdict of the jury,—and under such a state of things it would be difficult to say how the court should deal with these two verdicts. In view of the practical difficulties thus suggested, it seems to me that the safest conclusion to adopt is that, when a party consents to such an order of reference as was granted in this case, he must be regarded as consenting to the necessary incidents to such an order of reference, one of which is that the whole case is to be tried by the court upon the testimony reported by the master.

Again, it will be noticed that no demand for a trial by jury was ever made by appellant until after his motion to continue the case was made and refused, and this was at the August term of 1899, when, as I understand it, jury trials in civil cases cannot be had; and the fact that he made his motion to continue his case at that term was an implied admission that it was triable by the court, and not by a jury, which could only be by reason of the fact that he had waived his right to the latter mode of trial. It will also be observed that the appellant's motion was not for a trial by jury of the issue of title, but for a trial by jury "upon issues raised by defendant's answer"; and, as there were other issues raised by the answer upon which he was clearly not entitled to a trial by jury, there was no error in refusing the motion as made. This may seem somewhat technical, but as I am satisfied that all parties, in the outset, at least, intended and expected that the order of reference would bring about a trial of the whole case by the court, I feel less hesitation in presenting this technical ground.

As I do not think any of the other exceptions—not considered by Mr. Justice GARY, and not necessary to be considered under the view which he took—can be sustained, I think the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed.

POPE and JONES, JJ., concur.

BAKER et al. v. IRVINE (three cases).

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 7, 1900.)

APPEAL FROM MAGISTRATE—SERVICE OF NOTICE—ACCEPTANCE—JURISDICTION.

1. The requirement of Code Civ. Proc. § 360, that there be personal service of notice and grounds of appeal on the magistrate who tried the case, is satisfied, where acceptance of service thereof is signed in the magistrate's name by one authorized by him to do so, though the magistrate is not present.

2. The circuit court, after dismissing an appeal from a magistrate on the ground that the magistrate was not served with notice and grounds of appeal, has not jurisdiction to entertain a motion to reverse the judgment appealed from on the ground that the magistrate had no jurisdiction to try the case, there being no longer any case before the circuit court.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Greenville county; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Three actions,—the first by J. A. Baker and W. C. Baker, the second by J. A. Baker, the third by W. C. Baker,—all against W. H. Irvine. From judgments of a magistrate for plaintiffs, defendant appealed to the circuit court, which granted plaintiffs' motion to dismiss said appeal, and refused defendant's motion to reverse the magistrate's judgment on the ground that he had no jurisdiction. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Carey & McCollough and Shuman & Mooney, for appellant. Blythe & Blythe, for respondents.

McIVER, C. J. These three cases were heard and will be considered together. In each case the defendant took two appeals, both of which may, and, as we think, should, be considered together, as the second appeal depends largely upon the effect of the order from which the first appeal was taken. Each of the cases was tried by a magistrate, who rendered judgment in each case in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, who undertook to appeal therefrom to the circuit court, and the sole question raised by the first appeal is whether the notice of appeal in each of the three cases was given in time. In discussing this question we shall, for convenience, speak as if they were but a single case, though our language must be regarded as applying to each of the cases. It seems that the judgment of the magistrate was rendered on the 7th day of December, 1899, and the notice of appeal accompanying the grounds of appeal has upon it the following indorsement: "We hereby accept service of the within notice and grounds of appeal, as of each case herein, this 12th day of December, 1899. Blythe & Blythe, Plaintiffs' Attorneys. G. W. Nichols, Magistrate." On the 23d of March, 1900, plaintiffs' attorneys gave notice to the attorneys for defendant that, upon the call of the case for trial at the next term of the court of common pleas, they would move to dismiss the appeal upon the following grounds: "Because no notice of appeal in either of said cases was ever personally served upon G. W. Nichols, Esq., the magistrate who tried said cases and rendered judgment therein. This court has, therefore, no jurisdiction to hear said appeals, or either of them." The attorneys for defendants were also notified that upon the hearing of said motion they would use the affidavits of G. W. Nichols, Esq., the said magistrate, and of E. M. Blythe, Esq., copies of which were served with the notice, as well as the indorsement of acceptance of service above set out, purporting to have been made by G. W. Nichols, Esq., magistrate. The affidavits thus referred to as set out in the "case," and that of the magistrate contains the following language: "No notice and grounds of appeal were ever per ionally served upon me, but on the 12th of December, 1899, on the last day allowed for he service of said notice and grounds of ppeal, I was called to the telephone at Athens, S. C., by some one at Greenville, S. ., whose voice I identified as that of J. A. IcCollough, Esq., one of the defendant's atorneys, who asked me if I would authorize Miss Lola Turner, a stenographer in his ofice, to accept service for me of the notice nd grounds of appeal. I replied I would do o if there was nothing wrong about it. Mr. IcCollough replied that he would be responsible for that. I was then spoken to over the elephone by some one with a feminine voice, whom I believe to have been Miss Turner; nd I authorized her, over the telephone, to ccept service for me of the notice and rounds of appeal. No papers of any kind were served upon or delivered to me by defendant or his attorneys until the 13th day of December, 1899, the day after the time for ppealing had expired, when I received hrough the mail at Athens, S. C., a package ontaining the notice and grounds of appeal." he other affidavits used at the hearing of he motion to dismiss the appeal are set out n the "case," but need not be stated here, s they are simply confirmatory of the statements made by the magistrate, Nichols, in his ffidavit above copied, and state the further acts that Miss Turner, in pursuance of the uthority conferred upon her by the telehone message from the magistrate, did sign he name of G. W. Nichols, magistrate, to the cceptance of service of the notice and rounds of appeal indorsed thereon, and that Messrs. Blythe & Blythe, attorneys for plainffs, also signed said acceptance, all on the 2th of December, 1899, within five days aft- the judgments appealed from were rendered. At the call of the case for hearing, his motion to dismiss the appeal was heard y his honor, Judge Watts, who passed an rder that the appeal be dismissed, basing his onclusion upon the ground that, "from the acts stated in the aforesaid affidavits, I conude, as a matter of law, that said facts do ot constitute personal service on the magisate, as demanded by section 360 of the Code Civil Procedure." From this order defendnt appeals, upon the grounds set out in the ecord, which need not be stated here, as they ractically raise but two questions: (1) Whether, under the facts stated, there was a fficient and substantial compliance with the w requiring personal service of the magisate with the notice and grounds of appeal ithin five days after the judgment was rendered. (2) If not, whether the magistrate, eing the only person who could object to the ant of service, has not waived such objecon by making his return within the time escribed, in which no objection was made any want of personal service of the notice nd grounds of appeal, as appears by his reurn, made January 3, 1900, as set out in the ase."

As to the first question, there is no doubt that acceptance of service or acknowledgment thereof in writing is equivalent to personal service. Benson v. Carrier, 28 S. C., at pages 122, 123, 5 S. E. 272; Whetstone v. Livingston, 54 S. C., at page 543, 32 S. E. 562, where it is said that a statement made in the magistrate's return that "'notice of appeal was served on March 2nd, 1898,' while sufficient, as an admission, to show that the magistrate was served with the notice of appeal, does not show, or even purport to show, that either the respondent or his attorney was ever served with any notice of appeal." (Italics ours.) If, therefore, the magistrate had with his own hand signed his name to the acceptance of service indorsed upon the notice and grounds of appeal, there can be no doubt the service would have been sufficient. Now, while it is true that Nichols, the magistrate, did not with his own hand sign his name to the notice and grounds of appeal in this case, yet, as it seems to us, he did what was equivalent thereto. The undisputed facts are that the magistrate was asked, over the telephone, by the defendant's attorneys, to authorize Miss Turner to accept service of the notice and grounds of appeal, which he consented to do; that he was then spoken to over the telephone by a lady whose voice he recognized as that of Miss Turner; and that he authorized her, over the telephone, to accept service for him of the notice and grounds of appeal in this case, whereupon Miss Turner immediately signed the name of the magistrate to the indorsement on the back of the notice and grounds of appeal, as hereinabove set out, as authorized by him to do. This, it seems to us, amounted in law to the same thing as if the magistrate had with his own hand signed his name to the acceptance of service. If the magistrate had been personally present, and, owing to some temporary disability, was incapacitated from writing, and had for that reason requested Miss Turner to sign his name to the paper, and she had done so, there cannot be a shadow of doubt that the signature so made would in law be regarded as the signature of the magistrate. Indeed, the case of In re Strong's Will (Sur.) 16 N. Y. Supp. 104, which is cited with approval by this court in Smythe v. Irick, 46 S. C., at page 315, 24 S. E. 69, 32 L. R. A. 77, affords an instance of this kind. There one of the subscribing witnesses to a will, being temporarily incapacitated from writing "by reason of a felon on her hand," asked a bystander to sign her name, which was done, and the court held it to be sufficient. Take another case. Suppose these parties had been upon opposite sides of an impassable stream, and the magistrate had called to Miss Turner, requesting her to sign his name to the acceptance of service, and she had done so; could there be a doubt that in law such signature would be regarded as that of the magistrate? The point made by counsel for appellant, that, while this may be true where the person who authorizes another to sign his name is personally present, and sees the agent sign his name, it is not true where the person whose name is signed by another is not present, cannot be sustained in this case. The only object of requiring the presence of the person whose name is signed by another is for the purpose of identifying the paper which is signed, and that the signature was made by the person who was authorized or requested to make it. But here no question has been or could be made to either of these identities; for the undisputed facts are that the magistrate knew the voice of Miss Turner, and knew that she was the person whom he authorized to sign his name; that she was the person who did sign the magistrate's name by his authority; and that the magistrate knew that the paper which he authorized her to sign was the acceptance of service of the notice and grounds of appeal. All these facts he knew just as well as if he had been personally present when she signed his name. Under this view, it becomes unnecessary to consider the second question above stated. We think, therefore, that the circuit judge erred in granting the motion to dismiss the appeal, and his action in that respect must be reversed.

The second appeal arises out of the following facts: On the day after the plaintiffs had served the notice of their motion to dismiss the appeal, to wit, on the 24th of March, 1900, the defendant's attorneys served attorneys for plaintiffs with notice of a motion to reverse the judgment appealed from, upon the ground that the magistrate had no jurisdiction to try the case, inasmuch as the defendant was a resident of Greenville township, and that the said G. W. Nichols, the magistrate, did not reside in the township of Greenville, and had no jurisdiction therein. This motion was based on certain affidavits served with the notice of the motion, and set out in the "case," and also upon the record in the case. The motion was called up after the motion to dismiss the appeal had been heard, and after the circuit judge had announced his decision that he would dismiss the appeal. After hearing argument on the motion of defendant to reverse the judgment for lack of jurisdiction, the circuit judge granted an order refusing the motion upon the ground that after having dismissed the appeal there was nothing before him, and he could not, therefore, hear or determine the defendant's motion, and for that reason defendant's motion must be dismissed. From this order the second appeal is taken, upon the several grounds set out in the record, which, under the view we take, need not be stated here. As soon as the circuit judge rendered judgment dismissing the appeal, there was no longer any case before him in which any order of any kind could be passed. His judgment dismissing the appeal must be regarded as the law of the case until it is reversed by proper authority. The fact that this court has now reversed the order dismissing the appeal cannot affect the question. In the attitude which the case then occupied, there was no error on the part of the circuit judge in refusing defendant's motion to reverse the magistrate's judgment for lack of jurisdiction, for the reason that there was then no case before him in which he could grant any order or take any other action. He could only acquire jurisdiction of the case by appeal, and if, as he had decided, there was no appeal, he never acquired jurisdiction of the case. It is quite true that a question of jurisdiction can be raised at any stage of a case, but there must be a case before the court before that or any other question can be raised or determined. So soon, however, as the order of the circuit judge dismissing the appeal is reversed by this court, the way will then be open for the defendant to raise the question presented by his motion, in such form as he may be advised, and have the same considered and determined upon the merits, which have not yet been considered or decided either by this or the circuit court. In affirming the order brought before us by the second appeal, we must not, therefore, be considered as concluding the defendant from hereafter raising the question of jurisdiction presented by his motion, and having the same considered and determined on its merits, first by the circuit court, and by appeal to this court if desired.

The judgment of this court on the first appeal is that the orders dismissing the appeals from the judgments of the magistrate in each of the three cases named in the title be reversed, and that the said cases be remanded to the circuit court for the purpose of hearing and determining the questions presented by the several appeals from the judgments of the magistrate. In the second appeal the judgment of this court is that the order appealed from be affirmed, solely on the ground that, as long as the orders dismissing the appeals from the judgments rendered by the magistrate stood unreversed, there was no case before the circuit court in which he could pass any order; but without prejudice to the right of the defendant to raise the same question of jurisdiction presented by his motion, in such form as he may be advised, and have the same considered and determined upon the merits, first by the circuit court, and then by this court, if he shall so desire.

FERST et al. v. POWERS et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 2, 1900.)

ATTACHMENT — COMPLAINT — SUFFICIENCY—LEGAL AND EQUITABLE ACTIONS—JOINDER—AFFIDAVITS—TIME OF FILING—UNDERTAKING—EXECUTION BY AGENT.

1. Where a complaint sought to obtain judgment for moneys alleged to be due for goods sold and delivered to a defendant, and to set aside his alleged void assignment or transfer of a stock of goods, it was error to set aside an attachment because such action was for equitable relief only, since, under the Code, legal and equitable causes of action may be united in the same complaint; and such complaint stated a cause of action at law for goods sold and delivered, on which judgment could be rendered independent of the equitable relief sought, and hence was sufficient to justify a resort to attachment.

2. Under 23 St. at Large, p. 30, amending Code, § 250, and requiring attachment affidavits to be filed at the time of the issuing of the warrant, within 48 hours thereafter, such an affidavit may be filed within 48 hours after issuance of the attachment, since it was the manifest object of the amendment to reduce the time within which affidavits could be filed from 10 days to 48 hours, and the apparent conflict therein is reconciled, and its object attained, by construing it to require filing at the time of issuing the warrant, or within 48 hours thereafter.

3. Since an undertaking in attachment need not be under seal, the names of attachment plaintiffs may be signed thereto by agents; and an undertaking so signed under authority of telegrams, which are attached thereto, is sufficient.

4. Since a verified complaint may be used as an affidavit in an application for attachment, such a complaint, stating a cause of action at law against a defendant whose property was sought to be attached, to recover for goods sold and delivered, and affidavits reciting his insolvency, and his assignment to his co-defendant, who probably knew of his insolvency, a few days after receipt of a considerable stock of goods, and that he represented the debts to be protected by the assignment as greater than they actually were, and other facts and circumstances in support of the general statement that the assignment was in fraud of creditors, sufficiently stated facts showing a cause of action against such defendant, with the amount and grounds thereof, and that he had assigned his property with intent to defraud his creditors, as required by Code, § 250.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Laurens county; O. W. Buchanan, Judge.

Action by M. Ferst's Sons & Co. and others against John H. Powers and another to recover for goods sold, and to set aside an assignment, as in fraud of creditors. An attachment was issued in aid of the action, and from an order setting the same aside the plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

The following is the complaint referred to in the opinion:

"The State of South Carolina, County of Laurens. Court of Common Pleas. Joseph Ferst, Aaron Ferst, and Leon Ferst, partners doing business under the firm name of M. Ferst's Sons & Co., and J. J. Maddox and J. E. Maddox, partners doing business under the firm name of J. J. & J. E. Maddox, Plaintiffs, against John H. Powers and John W. Fowler, Defendants. The plaintiffs above named, by Irby & Babb and Graydon & Giles, their attorneys, complaining of John H. Powers and John W. Fowler, the defendants aforesaid, allege: (1) That the said plaintiffs, Joseph Ferst, Aaron Ferst, and Leon Ferst, are, and were at the times hereinafter set forth, partners doing business under the firm name of M. Ferst's Sons & Co. (2) That the plaintiffs J. J. Maddox and J. E. Maddox are, and were at the times hereinafter set forth, partners doing business under the firm name of J. J. & J. E. Maddox. (3) That the defendant John H. Powers was until about the 13th day of December, A. D. 1899, engaged in the mercantile business in the city of Laurens, in the county and state aforesaid. (4) That at divers times during the years 1898 and 1899 the said firm of M. Ferst's Sons & Co. sold and delivered to the said John H. Powers sundry articles of goods, wares, and merchandise, by open account, on which there is now due and unpaid the sum of nine hundred and sixty-seven dollars and seventy-five cents. (5) That at divers times during the years 1898 and 1899 the said firm of J. J. & J. E. Maddox sold and delivered to the said John H. Powers sundry articles of goods, wares, and merchandise, by open account, on which there is now due and unpaid a balance of four hundred and fifty-six dollars and seventy cents. (6) That on or about the 13th day of December, A. D. 1899, the said John H. Powers transferred and delivered to the defendant John W. Fowler his entire stock of goods in his store in the said city of Laurens, consisting of staple and fancy groceries and other articles. (7) That the plaintiffs are informed and believe that the pretended consideration for the said transfer and delivery of the said stock of goods was an agreement by the said John W. Fowler that he would satisfy a claim of four hundred dollars alleged to be due and owing him, the said John W. Fowler, by the said John H. Powers for rent of the store lately occupied by him in the said city of Laurens, and that he, the said John W. Fowler, would pay sundry claims alleged to be due by the said John H. Powers to the following named parties, to wit: To one W. A. Todd, lately a clerk in the store of the said John H. Powers, the sum of five hundred dollars, alleged to be due to him by the said John H. Powers on his salary as such clerk; to the People's Bank of Laurens, a certain promissory note, the amount of which is not known to the plaintiffs; to Bailey's Bank of Clinton, a certain promissory note, the amount of which is not known to the plaintiffs; and to the Bank of Laurens a certain other note, the amount of which is not known to the plaintiffs. (8) That the plaintiffs are informed and believe that the said stock of goods was worth, at cost price, the sum of eighteen hundred or two thousand dollars, and that the said John H. Powers claims to have sold the said stock of goods to the said John W. Fowler at eighty per cent. of their said cost price. (9) That the plaintiffs are informed and believe that at the time of the said alleged sale the said John H. Powers was totally insolvent, and had not enough property to pay the debts due and owing by him. (10) That the plaintiffs are informed and believe that the amount now claimed to be due and owing to the said John W. Fowler by the said John H. Powers for rent is larger than the amount actually due, and that the amount actually due is only about two hundred dollars; and the plaintiffs also are informed and believe that the amount alleged to be due to the said W. A. Todd by the said John H. Powers is much greater than the sum actually due to him. (11) That the plaintiffs are informed and believe that the said alleged sale was made for a consideration much less than the real value of the said stock of goods, that it was in part voluntary and pretensive, and that it was made and accepted with the intent and purpose to hinder, delay, defeat, and defraud the creditors of the said John H. Powers, and especially these plaintiffs, who are the largest creditors of the said John H. Powers, as they are informed and believe. (12) That the plaintiffs are informed and believe that the said alleged sale was made and accepted with the intent and purpose to give to the said John W. Fowler, W. A. Todd, the People's Bank, Bailey's Bank, and the Bank of Laurens a fraudulent and unlawful preference over the other creditors of the said John H. Powers; and they are advised by their counsel that the same is in effect an assignment with preferences, and is contrary to the assignment acts of this state. Wherefore the plaintiffs demand judgment against the defendants: First. That the plaintiffs M. Ferst's Sons & Co. have judgment against the defendant John H. Powers for the sum of nine hundred and sixty-seven and $^{25}/_{100}$ dollars. Second. That the plaintiffs J. J. & J. E. Maddox have judgment against the defendant John H. Powers for the sum of four hundred and fifty-six and $^{70}/_{100}$ dollars. Third. That the said alleged sale of the said stock of goods be set aside and be declared to be fraudulent and void. Fourth. That the plaintiffs may have such other and further relief as to the court may seem to be just and proper. Irby & Babb, Graydon & Giles, Plaintiffs' Attorneys."

"This cause came before me on a motion at chambers to set aside an attachment given by the clerk of court for Laurens county. The motion is made on several grounds. The allegations of fraud in the affidavits make out a prima facie case, so far as such a claim could well be made such by conclusion. If unrebutted, the inference of improper conduct would be strong. The grounds for setting aside are based upon several objections, growing out of alleged defects in filing the affidavits, making up the undertaking, alleged insufficiency of the matters stated in the affidavits, and in failing to state facts showing fraudulent disposal of property or a fraudulent assignment of the same, and lastly because attachment will not lie under such an alleged cause of action. To understand the effect of this last objection, the complaint must be referred to. There are two plaintiffs, it will be noticed,—Ferst's Sons & Co. and J. J. & J. E. Maddox; two independent claims for goods sold, or alleged to have been sold, and delivered to John H. Powers, who was until about 13th December, 1899, engaged in mercantile business in the city of Laurens. That on that day (the said 13th day of December, 1899) the defendant Powers transferred and delivered over to Fowler, his codefendant, his entire stock of goods under an agreement(?) whereby the said Fowler, it was claimed, was to satisfy a claim of four hundred dollars alleged to be due and owing to said Fowler for the rent of the store lately occupied by him, and in addition the said Fowler was to pay sundry claims alleged to be due by Powers to the clerk, W. A. Todd, to the People's Bank of Laurens, to Bailey's Bank of Clinton. It is charged that the goods so conveyed were worth the sum of eighteen hundred or two thousand dollars, and the said Powers claimed to have sold the stock to Fowler at eighty per cent. of the cost price. That the said John Powers was totally insolvent, and had not any property to pay the debts due and owing. They further say that the amount due to Fowler and to Todd was not as much as was claimed by Powers; that it was, in fact, voluntary and pretensive; and that it was made and accepted with the intent and purpose to hinder, delay, defeat, and defraud the creditors of Powers, and especially these two firms, plaintiffs, who are the largest creditors of the said John Powers. It was charged that the said sale was made and accepted with the intent and purpose to give to the said John W. Fowler, W. A. Todd, the People's Bank, Bailey's Bank, and the Bank of Laurens a fraudulent and unlawful preference over the other creditors of the said John H. Powers, and they are advised by their counsel that the same is in effect an assignment and preference, and contrary to the assignment acts of this state; and after demanding judgment for the amounts claimed to be due each of the plaintiffs, respectively, it is further demanded that the said alleged sale of the said stock of goods be set aside and declared to be fraudulent and void, and that the plaintiffs may have such other and further relief as to the court may seem just and proper. It is to be observed that W. A. Todd, Bank of Laurens, Bailey's Bank, and People's Bank are not made parties.

"The objection to the form of the complaint and its character is material here; for if there was no cause of action, or an appropriate cause of action, there could not be a proper attachment under it. It may be observed that, giving the complaint the most liberal construction, it is rather to be construed as demanding an equitable relief than any relief at common law. By giving it the effect of an equitable proceeding, the joinder of two independent demands in the same complaint may not appear so unusual, though it is contrary to the rule in that character of cases. Evidently the purpose was to make a creditors' bill, and to create an equity thereby, and a lien upon the property of the debtor. Powers, and thus to hold it by the hands of the court to respond to the demands of plaintiffs and all creditors equally. This much it has been thought best to say with reference to its character. Fraud and collusion are charged, whereby it was intended to defeat, hinder, delay, and defraud the other creditors. This being the character of the complaint, will attachment lie? I do not think that attachment is the proper remedy in actions of an equitable nature. I do not think that the usual equitable verdict should be displaced by so stringent, rigid, and harsh a proceeding as that by attachment in the first instance. 'An attachment can only be considered in the light of an action at law.' Havis v. Trapp, 2 Nott & McC. 132. See, also, 1 Wait, Act. & Def. 441; Drake, Attachm. 40; 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 184. I do not construe Bank v. Stelling, 31 S. C. 371, 9 S. E. 1028, as contradicting this view. Here the defendants are both residents of the state. The nominal ownership, at least, is in Fowler. It is true, the creditor has the choice of remedies. See Miller v. Hughes, 33 S. C. 542, 12 S. E. 419; Burch v. Brantley, 20 S. C. 503; Amaker v. New, 33 S. C. 28, 11 S. E. 386. I do not think he can exercise the common law (or statutory) and equitable at the same time, by using one cause of action and a remedy appropriate to another at the same time. The sale is alleged to be in part, at least, fraudulent. If the attachment is issued, it must be issued for all the matters and things charged in the complaint in this case,—as well for the matters charged to have been done honestly as for those done fraudulently,—whereas it should issue, if at all here, only by reason of the fraud done. I do not think attachment was ever intended to supply the place of any equitable process, injunction, etc. By referring to the character of the complaint, I am by no means satisfied that in its statement of an equitable cause of action it is sufficient; but I do not pass on its insufficiency, however, inasmuch as the objection made is not that the statement is insufficient in not showing any cause, but that, being the statement of an equitable cause of action, attachment cannot issue in its enforcement, or as an aid or remedy for, or dependent(?) upon, such equitable action. Having decided that an attachment will not lie under such a complaint, the other grounds become of no avail, and need not be considered. Wherefore it is ordered that the writ heretofore issued by the clerk of court be set aside, vacated, and declared vacated, and that the attachment or action based upon such writ be set aside and be considered released."

Irby & Babb and Graydon & Giles, for appellants. Ferguson & Featherstone and W. H. Martin, for respondents.

McIVER, C. J. The two plaintiffs in this case, being separate and distinct mercantile firms, claiming to be creditors of the defendant John H. Powers, who up to the 13th of December, 1899, was engaged in the mercantile business in the city of Laurens, united in this action, which was commenced on the 20th of December, 1899, for the purposes hereinafter stated. No question seems to have been raised as to the propriety of these two plaintiffs thus uniting in this action, and hence we say nothing as to that. The object of the action will be best disclosed by a copy of the complaint, which was verified, as set out in the "case," and for this reason the reporter will incorporate the same in his report of the case. It will be convenient, however, to state, in general terms, that the action seems to have been for a twofold purpose: (1) To obtain judgment against the defendant Powers in favor of the several plaintiffs for the amounts alleged to be due them, respectively; (2) to set aside an assignment or transfer by the defendant Powers to his co-defendant, Fowler, of his entire stock of goods, for the purpose of applying the same to the payment of certain other specified persons, by the said Powers, because such assignment or transfer was void under the assignment act, as well as under the statute of Elizabeth. At the time of commencing the action a warrant of attachment was obtained from the clerk, which "was duly served on both Powers and Fowler at the time of the serving of the summons and complaint. Copies of the affidavits on which the warrant was issued were also served on said parties, and the originals filed in the clerk's office." In this quotation from the "case" it is not stated when these copy affidavits were served, or when the originals were filed in the clerk's office; but those facts, it is claimed, will appear in the affidavit of the clerk, which will hereinafter be referred to. Soon thereafter the defendants moved before his honor, Judge Buchanan, to vacate said attachment upon the following grounds: (1) Because the original affidavits upon which the warrant of attachment is based were not filed in the clerk's office at the time of the issuing of the warrant, as required by law; (2) because the bond is not signed by plaintiffs; (3) because the affidavits are insufficient, in that they fail to state any facts going to show a fraudulent disposal of property, or a fraudulent assignment of property, such as is contemplated by the assignment act; (4) because the affidavits fail to state facts showing any fraud at all on the part of defendants; (5) because an attachment will not lie in this action. On the 8th of January, 1900, the circuit judge granted an order setting aside the attachment, a copy of which is set out in the "case," which should likewise be incorporated in the report of the case. From this order, plaintiffs appeal, upon the several grounds set out in the record, which need not be stated here, as they make, substantially, but two questions: (1) Whether the action in aid of which the attachment was issued was for equitable relief only; (2) whether in such an action a warrant of attachment can be issued. The defendants, in accordance with the proper practice, have given notice that, in case this court should be unable to sustain the order of Judge Buchanan on the ground upon which he rested his conclusion, they would ask this court to sustain said order upon the first four grounds upon which they rested their motion to vacate the attachment, which are set out above.

Our first inquiry, therefore, is whether this was an action for equitable relief only. It is well settled, under the Code of Procedure, that a plaintiff may unite in the same complaint both legal and equitable causes of action, and that is exactly what was done in this case. The complaint sets out a cause of action for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendant Powers, and demands judgment against him for the amount thereof; and this is, surely, nothing but a legal cause of action, pure and simple, without any feature of equitable cognizance. It is true that there is another cause of action set out in the complaint, against both of the defendants, which is of an equitable character, to wit, that upon which the relief demanded is that the assignment by John H. Powers to his co-defendant, John W. Powers, of his entire stock of goods, should be set aside. But that does not invest the whole action with the character of an equitable action; for if, upon the trial, the plaintiffs shall fail to establish their equitable cause of action, that would not prevent them from obtaining judgment against Powers, if they shall establish their claims for goods sold and delivered. In the case of Magruder v. Clayton, 29 S. C. 407, 7 S. E. 844, that was the result of such a case as this. See, also, Adler v. Cloud, 42 S. C. 272, 20 S. E. 393, to the same effect. In both of those cases the actions were brought for the double purpose of setting aside certain assignments and transfers of property, and at the same time for the purpose of obtaining judgments against the debtor on the claims alleged to be due to the plaintiffs; and in both of the cases, after the plaintiffs had failed to establish their equitable cause of action their right to establish their legal cause of action was distinctly and fully recognized. See, also, to the same effect, Bank v. Stelling, 31 S. C. 360, 9 S. E. 1028. It seems to us, therefore, that the circuit judge was in error in holding that this was an action for equitable relief only, and therefore not such an action as would enable the plaintiffs to resort to the remedy by attachment; for, as we have seen, the action was founded upon two causes of action, one of a purely legal character, and the other equitable in its character, and hence there was error in setting aside the attachment on that ground only. Under this view, it becomes unnecessary to consider the question whether an attachment can be resorted to in an action of purely equitable cognizance, as this is not such an action, and therefore no such question can arise in this case.

We will next proceed to consider the additional grounds relied upon by the defendants to sustain the order appealed from:

The first ground is based upon the theory that the law requires that the original affidavits upon which the warrant of attachment shall be filed in the clerk's office at the time of issuing the warrant. The law upon the subject is to be found in section 250 of the Code, as amended by the act of 1899 (23 Stat. at Large, p. 30), and the particular language relied upon seems to be the following: "It shall be the duty of the plaintiff procuring such warrant, at the time of the issuing thereof, to cause the affidavits upon which the same was granted to be filed in the office of the clerk of the court of common pleas, or with the magistrate, in which or before whom the action is to be tried, within forty-eight hours after the issuance of the attachment." While there is an apparent conflict in two of the clauses of the sentence just quoted from the statute, as the first clause seems to require the filing the affidavits at the time of issuing the warrant, while the last clause requires that the affidavits be filed within 48 hours after the issuance of the attachment, yet it is the duty of the court to reconcile such conflict, if possible, and this may be done by reading the sentence somewhat in this way: Declaring that these papers must be filed at the time of issuing the warrant, or within 48 hours thereafter. This would give effect to every part of the sentence, while that contended for by respondents would completely ignore the provision that these papers should be filed within 48 hours after the issuance of the attachment. Besides, the manifest object of the act of 1899, in which the words relied upon are found, was to amend section 250 of the Code by reducing the time within which the affidavits were required to be filed from 10 days after issuing the warrant to 48 hours; and to adopt the construction contended for would defeat that object. But if there is a clear and absolute repugnancy, which cannot be reconciled, between two sections of a statute, or between two clauses of the same section, the last must be preferred to the first. Potter, Dwar. St. 132; End. Interp. St. § 183. And, if we are forced to resort to this rule, it follows that, if the affidavits are filed within 48 hours after the issuance of the warrant of attachment, the statute will be complied with. This being the law, it seems to us that the two affidavits of the clerk set out in the "case" are sufficient to show that this requirement was complied with. The first ground upon which the motion to vacate the attachment was based cannot, therefore, be sustained.

The second ground upon which the motion was based means, no doubt, the undertaking required was not signed by the plaintiffs. It appears from the statements made in the "case" that this undertaking was signed as follows: "Joseph Ferst, Aaron Ferst, Leon Ferst, as M. Ferst's Sons & Co. by T. D. Darlington, Agent. J. J. Maddox, J. E. Maddox, as J. J. & J. E. Maddox, by Ellis Graydon. W. C. Irby." These signatures of the plaintiffs were made by T. D. Darlington and Ellis G. Graydon, respectively, under the authority of telegrams to these gentlemen, respectively, which were attached to the undertaking; and Mr. W.

C. Irby signed his own name, doubtless as surety. This, we think, was a sufficient compliance with the statute. The undertaking in the attachment need not be under seal. Grollman v. Lipsitz, 43 S. C. 339, 21 S. E. 272. And therefore we see no reason why the names of the plaintiffs could not be signed by the gentlemen named as agents, under the authority of telegrams from the plaintiffs which were attached to the undertaking. See what is said on this point in Bank v. Stelling, 31 S. C. 371, 9 S. E. 1028. The second ground of the motion cannot, therefore, be sustained.

The third and fourth grounds of the motion may be considered together, as they both raise the question whether the affidavits set forth the facts showing such a fraudulent disposition of the property of the defendants as is contemplated by the attachment act. In section 250 of the Code it is provided that a warrant of attachment may be issued "whenever it shall appear by affidavit that a cause of action exists against such defendant, specifying the amount of the claim and the grounds thereof, and that the defendant * * * has assigned, disposed of or secreted any of his or its property with the like intent"; that is, with an intent to defraud his creditors. It seems to us that a casual reading of the affidavits will be quite sufficient to show that all these things are fully set forth therein. There can be no doubt that the complaint, which is verified, and may therefore be used as an affidavit in an application for an attachment, fully sets forth the facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action at law against the defendant John W. Powers, the defendant whose property was sought to be attached, and in the affidavits the following facts were stated: That John H. Powers was insolvent (a fact probably known to his co-defendant, Fowler, from the circumstances); that the assignment was made but a very few days after Powers had received a considerable portion of his stock of goods; that the amount of the debts which were to be protected by the assignment was smaller than as represented by Powers,—besides various facts and circumstances going to sustain the general statement that the assignment was made with intent to defraud the creditors of Powers. Indeed, the circuit judge, in his decree, says, "The allegations of fraud in the affidavits make out a prima facie case," from which, "if unrebutted, the inference of improper conduct would be strong"; and it does not appear that any counter affidavits were submitted. It seems to us, therefore, that neither the third nor the fourth ground of motion can be sustained; and, as the fifth ground has already been disposed of, we must hold that there was error in granting the order vacating the attachment. It is the judgment of this court that the order appealed from be reversed.

FERST et al. v. POWERS.

MADDOX et al. v. SAME.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 2, 1900.)

ACTION — ANOTHER ACTION PENDING — DISMISSAL—MOTION.

1. An action will be dismissed, and an attachment issued therein set aside, where another action is pending for the same cause, since both cannot be maintained.

2. The question whether another action is pending for the same cause need not be set up by plea or answer, but may be raised by a motion to dismiss.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Laurens county; O. W. Buchanan, Judge.

Actions by M. Ferst's Sons & Co. and J. J. & J. E. Maddox against John H. Powers. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Irby & Babb and Graydon & Giles, for appellants. Ferguson & Featherstone and W. H. Martin, for respondent.

McIVER, C. J. These two cases, being identical, except as to names and amounts, were heard and will be considered together. Indeed, these two cases were heard in connection with the case of M. Ferst's Sons & Co. and J. J. & J. E. Maddox against John H. Powers and John W. Fowler (see 36 S. E. 744), in which the opinion of this court has been prepared, and should be filed at the same time as this opinion is filed. For convenience, the case just named will be designated as "Appeal No. 1," while the present case (embracing the two cases named in the title of this opinion) will be designated as "Appeal No. 2."

It appears that very soon after his honor, Judge Buchanan, had granted his order vacating the attachment, which was the subject-matter for consideration in appeal No. 1, these plaintiffs commenced separate actions against John H. Powers for the sole purpose of recovering the amounts alleged to be due them, respectively, for goods sold and delivered, and at the same time sued out warrants of attachment. Thereupon the defendant in each of the cases made a motion before his honor, Judge Buchanan, to vacate the attachments on the several grounds set out in the "case." It was stated in the notice of the motion that it would be based upon the pleadings and affidavits in these actions, and also upon the pleadings and affidavits in the action which we have designated as appeal No. 1. The motion was granted upon the single ground that, there being another action pending for the same cause, these actions cannot be maintained, and therefore the attachments must be set aside. The present appeal presents the single question whether there was error in such ruling.

We agree with the circuit judge. As will be seen by reference to our opinion in appeal No. 1, it is clear that the action in that case, so far as one of the causes of action there stated is concerned, was the same as the cause of action set forth in the pleadings in these cases. That case, unquestionably, is still pending, and the plaintiffs cannot be permitted to pursue the defendant Powers on the same cause of action in two cases at the same time; for if, as was shown in the opinion prepared in appeal No. 1, the plaintiffs in these two cases may, if they prove their claims, obtain judgment for the amount of their claims for goods sold and delivered, they certainly cannot maintain these actions, based upon the very same claims, as long as that case is pending; and, if they have no cause of action in these two cases, then they are not entitled to the attachments. Central Railroad & Banking Co. v. Georgia Const. & Inv. Co., 32 S. C. 319, 11 S. E. 192.

The contention on the part of the appellant that the question whether another action is pending for the same cause cannot be raised by a motion, but that it must be set up by plea or answer, cannot be sustained. One of the facts necessary to be shown by affidavit in order to obtain a warrant of attachment is that a cause of action exists; and if that is not only not shown, but is negatived, by the affidavits on the motion papers, then the attachment cannot stand. See Baum v. Bell, 28 S. C. 201, 5 S. E. 485. The judgment of this court is that the order appealed from be affirmed.

CALVERT v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 10, 1900.)

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS.

A railroad company incorporated under the laws of another state is a nonresident of South Carolina, for the purpose of removal of causes to a federal court, though it has complied with the requirements of Act March 19, 1896, providing that thereupon such corporation shall become a domestic corporation, with all the rights and liabilities thereof.

Pope, J., dissenting.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Abbeville county; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by W. H. Calvert, administrator of D. C. Calvert, deceased, against the Southern Railway Company. Defendant's petition to remove the cause to the federal court was refused, plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

T. P. Cothran, for appellant. W. N. Graydon, for respondent.

JONES, J. This action was for $10,000 damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate by the defendant company on its line of railway in Abbeville county, in this state. Before entering upon trial the defendant interposed an objection to the jurisdiction of the court, on the ground of defendant's right to remove said cause to the circuit court of the United States, based upon the following agreed statement of facts: "(1) That the Southern Railway Company on the 18th of June, 1894, became a corporation under the laws of the state of Virginia. (2) That said Southern Railway Company has complied with the constitution (article 9, § 8), and with the acts of assembly of said state in reference to foreign corporations doing business in this state, by filing with the secretary of state a certified copy of its charter, on the ——— day of January, 1897, and by filing the same with the register of mesne conveyance of Abbeville county on April ———, 1896. (3) That on the ——— day of July, 1899, the defendant filed with the clerk of the court of common pleas of Abbeville county its petition for removal of this cause to the circuit court of the United States for the district of South Carolina, and accompanied said petition with a properly executed bond, as required by law. Said petition and bond were filed within the time required by the statutes of South Carolina for answering the complaint herein. (4) That thereafter, on the ——— day of July, 1899, the defendant served upon plaintiff's attorneys its answer in this case. (5) That within the time required by law the defendant filed with the clerk of the United States circuit court for the district of South Carolina a certified copy of the record in said cause, and procured the said cause to be docketed in said last-named court. The plaintiff does not waive the objection that such filing and docketing cannot be made until the state court signs an order allowing removal of said cause to the U. S. court. (6) That, notwithstanding said proceedings for removal, the plaintiff has procured said cause to be docketed upon calendar 1 of the court of common pleas for Abbeville county." The circuit court overruled the objection, on the authority of Mathis v. Railway Co., 53 S. C. 257, 31 S. E. 240, and from the order in the premises is this appeal.

The question of the right of the defendant company to remove a similar cause, on substantially the same state of facts, was considered in the recent case of Wilson v. Railway Co. (filed on the 2d day of August, 1900) 36 S. E. 701, wherein the case of Mathis v. Railway Co., supra, was overruled, and the right of defendant to remove on the ground of diverse citizenship and nonresidence was sustained. That decision controls this case. Upon the filing of the required petition and bond for removal, the state court has no jurisdiction to proceed further. Marshall v. Holmes, 141 U. S. 505, 12 Sup. Ct. 62, 35 L. Ed. 870; Pelzer Mfg. Co. v. Sun Fire Office, 36 S. C. 213, 15 S. E. 562; Dunham v. Carson, 37 S. C. 279, 15 S. E. 960. The judgment of the circuit court is reversed.

POPE, J., dissenting.

OUSLEY et al. v. BAILEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1900.)

RECEIVERS—JUDICIAL SALE—PURCHASER'S TITLE—UNRECORDED CONVEYANCE.

A purchaser of land at judicial sale, acting in good faith and without notice, acquires title as against a prior conveyance by the owner, unrecorded at the time of the making and confirmation of such sale.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Coffee county; Joseph W. Bennet, Judge.

Action by R. F. Ousley & Bro. against J. S. Bailey & Co. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Leon A. Wilson, for plaintiffs in error. Toomer & Reynolds, for defendants in error.

LITTLE, J. Ousley & Bro. filed a petition in the superior court of Coffee county by which they sought to enjoin Bailey & Co. from entering and cutting the timber on lot of land No. 438, in the Sixth district of said county, alleging that they had a perfect title to the same. The defendants, admitting that it was their purpose to cut such of the timber on said lot as was suitable for sawmill purposes, denied that petitioners had any title to the same, but averred that the defendants had a full legal title to said land and the timber thereon. At the hearing the following agreed statement of facts was submitted, in connection with the pleadings: "On March 29, 1842, the state of Georgia granted to Abraham Hargraves lot of land 438, in the Sixth district of Appling, now Coffee, county. On December 30, 1853, Abraham Hargraves, for a proper consideration, conveyed said lot to Christopher Hargraves. This deed is regular, and was properly recorded. On December 4, 1877, John Fussell, the duly-qualified administrator on the estate of C. C. Hargraves, for a proper consideration, conveyed this lot to Hardy Summerlin, and the deed is regular, and has been properly recorded. On May 4, 1887, Hardy Summerlin made a deed for a proper consideration, conveying to James McDonald all of the timber on said lot of land suitable for sawmill purposes. This deed is properly witnessed, and is duly recorded. On June 20, 1890, James McDonald, who was at that time solvent, made a deed, in consideration of the sum of $300, to E. J. Stokes, F. M. Stokes, and W. E. Burbage, doing a turpentine business under the firm name of Stokes Bros. & Co., in the county of Coffee, said state, whereby the said James McDonald did lease and convey unto the said Stokes Bros. & Co., their heirs and assigns, lot of land and timber No. 438, lying in the Sixth district of Coffee county, in the state aforesaid, for a term of three years, beginning at whatever time the above-leased timber was boxed; the parties of the second part agreeing to return back unto the said James McDonald, his heirs and assigns, the above-leased premises, at the expiration of said lease, in as good condition as could be expected from such usage. This deed is properly executed, and was filed for record on January 7, 1895, in the clerk's office of Coffee superior court, and recorded on the same day. On January 18, 1893, Stokes Bros. & Co., as aforesaid, made a deed, for a valuable consideration, conveying the same property mentioned in the McDonald deed to O. H. Lowther. This deed is properly recorded, and was so recorded on January 7, 1895, and was filed for record on same day. The same property was conveyed by O. H. Lowther, by proper instrument of writing, duly executed, and for a proper consideration, to Williford & Loring, a firm composed of R. F. Williford and G. W. Loring; and Williford & Loring, in turn, by proper instrument of writing, for a valuable consideration, conveyed the same property to Chancey & Purdom; who, in turn, for a proper consideration, and by proper instrument of writing, conveyed the premises to R. F. Ousley & Bro., the plaintiffs in the above-stated cause; which deed from Williford & Loring to Chancey & Purdom was recorded properly, October 22, 1898. The deed from O. H. Lowther to Williford & Loring was recorded December 30, 1896. The deed from Lowther to Williford & Loring bears date December 30, 1896, and the deed from Williford & Loring to Chancey & Purdom bears date the 10th day of October. 1898, and the deed from Chancey & Purdom to R. F. Ousley & Bro. bears date October 4, 1899; this last deed being filed for record and recorded October 4, 1899. In the fall of 1898, Chancey & Purdom, a firm composed of A. H. Chancey and J. O. Purdom, entered upon said lot of land, and boxed the sawmill timber thereon for turpentine purposes (this was the first entry made upon said lot of land for such purposes), and worked the same one year; that is, until October 4, 1899, at which time they sold the same for turpentine purposes. The second year of said working will expire in the fall of the present year, and the said Ousley & Bro. claim the right under the lease to work it an additional year after the expiration of the present year. While said Chancey & Purdom were in the possession working the same for turpentine purposes, Bailey & Co. having actual notice of such possession and the working of the said timber for such purposes, R. F. Ousley & Bro. purchased the turpentine interests from said parties for the remaining period mentioned in the McDonald lease. On May 1, 1900, said Bailey & Co. notified plaintiffs in writing as follows: 'We are now about ready to cut the timber on lot 438. We have delayed as long as we could, and will still delay as much as possible, but we are liable now to go into it any day, and this is to let you know, so that you will not go to any extra expense with your boxing.' After this notice was given, the petition for injunction in the above-stated case was brought. In the latter part of 1893, James McDonald, who was then engaged in the cutting and manufacturing of lumber at McDonald's Mill, Coffee county, Ga., was placed in the hands of a receiver at the suit of the Downing Company and others, as provided for under Civ. Code, §§ 2716, 2721, Henry T. Kennon being appointed temporary receiver. At the March term, 1894, of Coffee superior court, a decree was rendered in the said cause, appointing Henry T. Kennon as master commissioner therein, who was instructed by the order and decree entered by Hon. J. L. Sweat, judge of the superior court, on the 8th day of November, 1894, to proceed to advertise for sale all of the property of said James McDonald, and dispose of and offer all of the assets and property of the said James McDonald on the 10th day of December, 1894, before the court-house door at Douglas, Coffee county, Ga. Said master commissioner proceeded to advertise certain property in accordance with the terms of said order of November 8, 1894, and did on the 10th day of December, 1894, during the legal hours of sale, before the court-house door of Coffee county, Ga., expose and offer for sale all of said property, real, personal, and assets of every description, as the property of the said James McDonald. At said sale H. W. Reed became and was the highest and best bidder therefor, and all of the property mentioned in the deed hereinafter stated, as the property of James McDonald, was knocked off to him at and for the sum of $58,173.90. Among the property so sold by said receiver and master commissioner was all of the timber suitable for sawmill purposes on lot of land No. 438, lying and being in the Sixth district of Coffee county, Ga. In accordance with said order and decree of November 8, 1894, said sale was duly confirmed; and thereupon, on the 14th day of December, 1894, Henry T. Kennon, master commissioner, under order of the court, made a deed to H. W. Reed, conveying the property sold by him under the decree in said cause, including the said timber for sawmill purposes, on the said lot of land 438, in the Sixth district of Coffee county, Ga., which deed was properly witnessed and filed for record in the office of the clerk of Coffee superior court, on December 31, 1894, at 3 o'clock p. m., and on the 8th day of January, 1895, was duly recorded in the clerk's office of Coffee superior court, in Book of Deeds K, pages 25 to 31, inclusive. On the 14th day of December 1894, H. W. Reed made, executed, and delivered to J. S. Bailey & Co. a deed, consideration $75,000, conveying all of the property mentioned in the deed to H. W. Reed by H. T. Kennon, master commissioner aforesaid, among which property so conveyed was all of the timber suitable for sawmill purposes on lot of land No. 438, in the Sixth district of Coffee county, which deed is properly executed, and was filed for record on January 3, 1895, in the office of the clerk of Coffee superior court, and recorded in the clerk's office of the superior court of Coffee county, January 9, 1895. At the time said H. W. Reed took said deed from Kennon, master commissioner, and at the time said J. S. Bailey & Co. took said deed from H. W. Reed as aforesaid, neither had notice or knowledge, actual or constructive, that on the 20th day of June, 1890, James McDonald had made a deed, hereinbefore mentioned and set forth, to the said Stokes Bros. & Co., nor did they have any notice or knowledge, actual or constructive, at that time, of the conveyance of the same premises from said Stokes Bros. & Co. to O. H. Lowther."

It will be seen from the foregoing statement that both the plaintiffs and defendants trace their title to McDonald; the plaintiffs in error holding by a direct chain of title under a conveyance made by McDonald on June 20, 1890, while the defendants in error claim through Reed, under a deed made by the master commissioner conveying all the property of McDonald to Reed on December 14, 1894. The position, however, is well taken by the defendant in error that at the time Reed became the purchaser of the property of McDonald, and at the time they purchased the same property from Reed, that neither Reed nor themselves had any notice of the prior conveyance made by McDonald to Stokes Bros. & Co. in 1890, nor of the several conveyances constituting the chain of title of the plaintiffs in error, nor were any of the conveyances in that chain of title on record, and hence they were not chargeable with notice that McDonald had conveyed the timber prior to their purchase of the land; and that inasmuch as the conveyances by the commissioner to Reed, and by Reed to the defendants in error, were duly recorded before any of the conveyances in the chain of title of the plaintiffs in error, the conveyance to the latter of the timber on the lot in question is by law postponed to the title of the defendants in error. To this, however, it is replied that, prior to the time when Reed purchased the property of McDonald at the commissioner's sale, McDonald had by proper conveyance devested himself of all title to the timber on the lot of land, and that by his purchase Reed only took such title to the lot of land in question as McDonald had at the time. These contentions, under the admitted facts in this case, raise only one question, and that is whether the provisions of our law found in section 2778 of the Civil Code, declaring when instruments requiring record take effect, are applicable to conveyances made under a judicial sale. Just here it may be well enough to refer to the distinction which exists between judicial and execution sales. Mr. Rorer, in his treatise on the Law of Judicial and Execution Sales, declares that a judicial sale is, in contemplation of law, a sale made pendente lite, and that all the authorities concur that judicial sales are sales made by the court, and in which the court is the vendor; that it matters not to the contrary that such sale is made through the instrumentality of a master, a commissioner, or other functionary appointed thereto by the court; that as such sales are not valid or binding, and confer on the purchaser no right to the property, until confirmed by the court, and as the confirmation is the judicial act of the court, such a sale becomes a judicial sale. Ror. Jud. Sales, §§ 1, 4, 28. The same author, however, declares, in section 590, that, in making ordinary execution sales simply by virtue of his office, the sheriff or marshal acts as the ministerial officer of the law, and not as the organ of the court; that the officer is not the instrument or agent of the court, as in judicial sales, and that the court is not the vendor, but that the authority of the sheriff or marshal rests on the law and on the writ; that the functions of the court terminated at the rendition of the judgment therein; and that the law is the officer's only guide.

Attention is called only to this distinction because, under the uniform rulings of this court, the registration acts of this state are applicable in cases of sales made by sheriffs under execution, on the theory that the officer represents in such sales the defendant in execution. McCandless v. Acid Co. (Ga.) 34 S. E. 142, and authorities cited. But, inasmuch as in judicial sales—such as that under which the defendants in error claim title—the sale is made by the court, the question arises whether the same provisions of law protect the bona fide purchaser for value. We think they do. The statute is plain that any instruments conveying title to land, or creating liens on land, which are required to be recorded, take effect only from the time they are filed for record as against the interest of third parties, acting in good faith and without notice, who may have acquired a transfer or lien binding the same property. It will be noted that the terms used in describing the persons who are protected have been very much broadened by the act of 1880, on which the section of the Code we are referring to is based. Formerly, it was the settled rule in this state that the holder of a junior deed, taken in good faith, without notice of a former conveyance, and recorded within 12 months from the time of its execution, would prevail against the holder of an unrecorded conveyance. Wise v. Mitchell, 100 Ga. 614, 28 S. E. 382. But, as the law now exists, a third party, acting in good faith, without notice, who has acquired a transfer of property, and whose deed has been recorded, acquires a title as against a prior conveyance of the same property unrecorded at the time he acquired a title. It would seem, from the language used, that a purchaser at judicial sale comes within the rule stated in the Code, which is evidently founded on the declared policy of the registry laws, which is that title, and all that affects it, should be disclosed by the public records; from whence the rule is obtained that a purchaser may rely upon the title as it appears of record, and that he will be protected against unrecorded conveyances, outstanding equities, secret liens, and conditions of which he has no notice. Ror. Jud. Sales, § 154, and cases cited in note 1, on page 242.

Construing a statute of Illinois which declares that "all deeds, mortgages or other instruments of writing which are required to be recorded shall take effect and be in force after the time of filing the same for record and not before, as to all creditors and subsequent purchasers, without notice," etc., the supreme court of the United States, in the case of McNitt v. Turner, 16 Wall. 352, 21 L. Ed. 341, said that the term "purchasers," as used in the statute, included purchasers at judicial sales, and that a deed not filed for record is as to them wholly without effect. It must be ruled, therefore, under the broad words of our statute, as well as on the authorities cited, that a purchaser at a judicial sale, for value and without notice, whose deed is duly recorded, acquires title to real property, as against a prior conveyance from the owner unrecorded at the time of the sale. The trial judge did not err in refusing the injunction. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

MORRIS v. VEACH et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1900.)

GUARANTY — CORPORATE STOCK — ENFORCEMENT—TENDER—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT.

1. When one induces another to purchase stock in an incorporated company, and in consideration thereof undertakes in writing to guaranty to pay to the subscriber "one hundred cents in the dollar" for the stock "within ninety days from the date" of such agreement, the purchaser could not maintain against the guarantor an action upon the contract without showing affirmatively that in due time he had tendered the stock to the latter, and demanded of him payment in accordance with the terms of the agreement.

2. An agreement in writing that a subscriber for stock in an incorporated company was to be held "harmless from any * * * loss or damage or liability whatever as a stockholder," and that he should "in no way suffer any loss or damage by reason of [his] connection with said company as a stockholder," was not an undertaking to guaranty the subscriber against loss sustained by reason of the stock having become worthless on the market.

3. The contract involved in the present case, when construed as a whole, cannot be held to contain an unconditional agreement to pay the par value of the shares of stock therein referred to within 90 days from the date of the contract.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Atlanta; A. E. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by J. M. Veach & Co. against C. M. Morris on a contract of guaranty. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant brings error. Reversed.

C. J. Simmons, for plaintiff in error. Rosser & Carter, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. Veach & Co. brought suit against Morris, alleging in their petition that the defendant was indebted to them upon a contract of guaranty. The paper containing this contract recites in a preamble that a corporation known as the Atlanta Grocery Company had been organized in the city of Atlanta; that Veach & Co. had subscribed for 12 shares of the capital stock, which subscription was to be paid with a note of the defendant, Morris, for $1,199.10, payable to plaintiffs; that N. W. Murphy and Morris had agreed to guaranty that plaintiffs should receive 100 cents in the dollar for the amount of stock subscribed, on or before the expiration of 90 days from the date of the signing of the contract; and that the plaintiffs were to be held harmless from any liability, loss, or damage by reason of their subscription. The stipulations in the contract are as follows: "Now, therefore, in consideration of the surrender by said J. M. Veach & Company of said note of C. M. Morris in payment of said stock, said N. W. Murphy and C. M. Morris hereby obligate themselves severally and jointly to pay said J. M. Veach & Company one hundred cents in the dollar for said twelve shares cash within ninety days from the date of this agreement and guaranty, and further obligate themselves severally and jointly to hold said Veach & Company, and each of them, harmless from any liability on said stock, and from any loss or damage or liability whatever as a stockholder in said Atlanta Grocery Co. It is the express purpose of this agreement and guaranty that said J. M. Veach & Company, nor either of them, shall be in any way liable as stockholders in said Atlanta Grocery Co., and that they shall in no way suffer any loss or damage by reason of their connection with said company as a stockholder, and that said N. W. Murphy and C. M. Morris severally and jointly guaranty J. M. Veach & Company, and each of them, against any such liability, loss, or damage." The contract was dated June 11, 1894, and was signed by Murphy and Morris. To the action Morris filed an answer, in which it was set up that the plaintiffs had not tendered to him, either within 90 days or at any time, the 12 shares of stock referred to in the contract. The answer further alleged that "plaintiffs retained said stock as their own until long after the Atlanta Grocery Company had failed and become insolvent, and the insolvency and failure of said company occurred long after the expiration of 90 days after the date of said contract, being the time mentioned in said contract," and "that no demand was made on him until just before the bringing of the suit, and not until long after the Atlanta Grocery Company had become insolvent and said stock worthless." It appeared at the trial that Murphy had made certain payments to the plaintiffs upon the contract, which reduced the sum claimed by them to be due to the amount sued for in the present case. The judge directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, and to this judgment, as well as to other rulings made at the trial, the defendant excepted.

The contract involved in the present case, properly construed, contains two separate and distinct undertakings on the part of Murphy and Morris: (1) They were bound to pay to the plaintiffs 100 cents in the dollar for the 12 shares of stock within 90 days from the date of the contract, provided the plaintiffs desired to sell the stock, and so notified Murphy and Morris within 90 days; (2) they were further bound to indemnify the plaintiffs against loss on account of their subscription to the stock in the Atlanta Grocery Company in the event the plaintiffs were held liable in any way on account of that subscription, or in any other way, by reason of their connection with the company as a stockholder. When the parties entered into the contract sued on, there were, in all probability, in the minds of the plaintiffs, two contingencies which might arise, that they desired to so guard as to protect themselves from possible loss: First, they might not desire to continue as stockholders in the company; and, second, their subscription to stock not having been paid in money, but in property, some question might arise as to the real value of the property, and, if it was worth less than the amount of their subscription, they might for this reason be held liable on their stock subscription, or in some other way, on account of their connection with the company. The first contingency was provided for in the undertaking first referred to, and the second in the undertaking last referred to. In order for the plaintiffs to recover for a breach of the undertaking first mentioned, it is absolutely necessary that they should allege and prove that there had been a tender of the stock to the defendant, and a demand for the par value of the same, if not within 90 days from the date of the contract, at least before the suit was brought. They obligated themselves to pay a certain amount "for said twelve shares," and it was certainly contemplated that the payment of the amount stipulated should result in their obtaining that for which they had paid, to wit, the 12 shares of stock.

In order for the plaintiffs to recover for a breach of the undertaking last mentioned, it is incumbent upon them to allege and prove that they had been held liable on their subscription to the stock, or had been endamaged in some way on account of their connection with the company as a stockholder. Neither the averments of the petition nor the evidence at the trial authorized a recovery for a breach of either undertaking. It was contended that the contract amounted to a guaranty that the plaintiffs would not suffer loss on account of the insolvency of the company, and the consequent depreciation and possible destruction of the market value of the stock. We do not think the contract capable of this construction. Fairly construed, the contract cannot mean other than what we have above indicated. An undertaking to pay 100 cents in the dollar for shares of stock within a given time certainly cannot amount to an undertaking to indemnify a person against loss resulting from the stock becoming worthless on the market after the expiration of that time. Neither can an undertaking to hold a person harmless from liability on a subscription to stock in an incorporated company, and from loss or damage or liability as a stockholder in such a company, or from loss or damage by reason of connection with the company as a stockholder, be held to mean that the person so indemnified will be held harmless if the stock depreciates in market value, or for any reason becomes worthless on his hands. While the language of the contract is broad, it is not so broad as to authorize a holding that the defendant would be liable to the plaintiffs for loss sustained by them on account of the corporation having become insolvent, and the stock having in consequence been rendered worthless. Neither can the contract be properly construed to contain an unconditional agreement to pay within 90 days a sum of money equal to the par value of the 12 shares of stock. If the plaintiffs had in due time tendered to the defendant the shares of stock, they could have compelled him to pay, according to the stipulations in the contract, 100 cents in the dollar; or if the plaintiffs are ever held liable or sustain damage on account of having subscribed for the stock, or having become connected with the company as stockholder, the terms of the contract are broad enough to amount to an indemnity against loss or liability of this character. But loss or liability incident to the destruction of the market value of the stock is not a loss or liability covered by the terms of the instrument, and the defendant would not be liable, even if the plaintiffs had sustained such loss. It would, we think, be straining the language of the contract, broad though it is, to hold that the defendant agreed to guaranty that the 12 shares of stock should always be worth 100 cents on the dollar, or that the plaintiffs would be entitled to this amount whenever they desired to call for the same, whether the stock was worthless or not.

The court erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiffs. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

EDWARDS v. PLANTERS' & PEOPLE'S MUTUAL FIRE ASS'N OF GEORGIA.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1900.)

INSURANCE POLICY—CONSTRUCTION.

A policy of fire insurance expressly stipulating that a gin house, "which shall at intervals be operated by steam," will not be protected "so long as it is so operated," does not cover a loss occasioned by the burning of a gin house, the machinery in which is operated by steam power, if, on a day during the regular ginning season, the engine be fired up with a view to getting the machinery in order for ginning on the next day cotton already in the house, and the fire occurs during the intervening night. This is so though for a period of many days prior to that on which the engine is fired up no ginning has been done.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Clayton county; John S. Candler, Judge.

Action by J. L. Edwards against the Planters' & People's Mutual Fire Association of Georgia. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Jas. K. Hines and J. L. Travis, for plaintiff in error. C. T. Roan and W. L. Watterson, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. The plaintiff in error excepted to a judgment of nonsuit. His action was brought against the association for the recovery of a loss sustained by the burning of his gin house. The company interposed the defense that the property described was not, at the time of the fire, covered by the policy. It contained a stipulation in these words: "If a gin house or other building be taken into this association which shall at intervals be operated by steam, the insurance on such building, or buildings adjacent and endangered thereby, shall be removed so long as it is so operated; but, such danger being removed from such building, the policy shall again become intact." The following is a condensed statement of so much of the evidence as is now material to be considered: The plaintiff's gin was one operated by steam. The fire occurred on the 14th day of January, 1896, at 4 o'clock in the morning. The ginning season usually begins in September and ends in January. No cotton was ginned by the plaintiff after the 31st day of December, 1895, but during the month of January, and up to the date of the fire, customers had been putting cotton in the gin house to be ginned. It was the intention of the person in charge of the gin to do some ginning on the 14th. With this end in view, the engine was fired up on the 13th to see if the machinery was all right, but, as it was found to be out of order, the engine was stopped. We are of the opinion that the judgment of nonsuit was right. Even if the above-quoted stipulation in the policy is susceptible of the construction that it should, during the continuance of the ginning season, protect the gin house for intervals of one or more days while ginning operations were entirely suspended,—which is, to say the least, doubtful,—we are quite clear that where cotton was in the gin house, ready to be ginned, and on a given day the engine was fired up with a view to getting the machinery in order for ginning on the ensuing day, and during the intervening night the property was destroyed by fire, the company was not liable. Certainly, if any cotton had been actually ginned on the 13th, and operations had been suspended merely because of some temporary breakdown in the machinery, and there had been an intention after making the needed repairs to resume ginning on the next day, it could not be doubted that a fire occurring before the time for beginning work on that day should be regarded as a fire taking place during an interval in which operations by steam were being conducted. It makes no practical difference that there was no actual ginning on the 13th. As steam was generated and the machinery put in motion, thus bringing into active operation the very dangers against which the company, by its contract, declined to insure the plaintiff, the case presents the same aspect as if cotton had really been ginned on that day. Any other construction than that which we have placed upon that clause of the policy now under consideration would manifestly be unjust to the company, and would, we think, fail entirely to carry out the intention of the parties. Certainly it cannot fairly be gathered from this policy that the company undertook to keep the property insured by night, when the engine was at a standstill, and yet, merely because the wheels were turning, be exempt from liability for a fire which occurred in the daytime, when those operating the gin were present, and thus enabled to take proper precautions to prevent loss. Literally speaking, it would all the while be true that the gin was not being operated by steam during the hours of night, if work was conducted only by day, but it was obviously the purpose of the company to avoid assuming the risk of fires which might originate in the nighttime during a period when ginning operations were being actively carried on by day. The above disposes of the question by the determination of which this case is controlled, and we therefore do not refer to points made in the bill of exceptions relating to other matters of defense set up by the company. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

COMMERCIAL PUB. CO. et al. v. CAMPBELL PRINTING-PRESS & MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1900.)

APPEAL—NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—REVIEW—REPLEVIN—EVIDENCE.

1. Grounds of a motion for a new trial alleging error in admitting or in rejecting evidence cannot be considered, when they fail to distinctly inform the court what was the evidence to which they respectively relate.

2. When, in defense to an action of bail trover for the recovery of personalty which the plaintiff had sold to the defendant under a contract reserving title till the purchase money should be paid, the latter set up that the former had received a part of the price, and was not, without returning the same, entitled to a verdict for the property itself, it was not, though no claim for hire was made in the petition, erroneous to admit in behalf of the plaintiff evidence showing the value of the property for hire while in the defendant's possession, or to charge the jury that, if such value was equal to or exceeded the amount of the payments upon the purchase price, the plaintiff was not bound to return the money which the defendant had paid upon the purchase.

3. The evidence warranted the verdict.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by the Campbell Printing-Press & Manufacturing Company against the Commercial Publishing Company and another to recover personal property sold under a conditional sale. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants bring error. Affirmed.

W. R. Brown, for plaintiffs in error. Harvey Hatcher, Jr., and E. M. & G. F. Mitchell, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. The Campbell Printing-Press & Manufacturing Company brought against the Commercial Publishing Company and R. B. Blackburn, as receiver of its assets, an action of bail trover for the recovery of a printing press and outfit. In its petition the plaintiff alleged that it had entered into a written contract with the publishing company, under the terms of which it agreed to purchase the property in question, paying therefor by installments, but that after paying a portion of the purchase money it had refused to comply further with its obligations; that the property was sold with reservation of title, and it was expressly stipulated in the contract that, should such default be made, the plaintiff should have the right to immediately retake possession, but that, notwithstanding this stipulation, and the fact that the publishing company was in default, it had, on proper demand, refused to yield possession of the property, which conduct on its part amounted to a conversion of the same. On the trial the plaintiff elected to take a verdict for the property itself. The defense interposed was that the contract between the parties was one of conditional sale, and the plaintiff was in equity liable to account for so much of the purchase money as had been paid to it, etc., to the end that the rights of the defendants in the premises might be protected, and an equitable rescission of the contract effected. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, which embraced a finding that the payments made upon the purchase price of the property did not exceed its fair rental value while in the possession of the publishing company. The defendants thereupon filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and they excepted.

1. One ground of the motion alleges error in admitting oral evidence with reference to a certain matter, but fails to state what the evidence was. In several grounds complaint is made of the admission in evidence of certain documents, without setting the same forth either literally or in substance. In two of the grounds it is alleged that the court erred in refusing to permit certain questions to be answered, but the motion does not state what evidence the movant expected to elicit thereby. It is obvious, in view of the repeated rulings of this court, that none of these grounds of the motions present any question upon which we can undertake to pass.

2. The only question of law properly made is presented in certain grounds of the motion assigning error upon the admission of evidence as to the value of the property for hire, and complaining of instructions given to the jury with reference to this matter. These instructions were to the effect that, while it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to account for and return the purchase money it had received, it was not bound to do so, if the value of the property for hire, while in the possession of the defendants, was equal to or exceeded the amount of the payments made upon the purchase price. It was insisted that the evidence admitted over objection was inadmissible, and the charges referred to were inappropriate, because the plaintiff had not, in its petition, prayed for the recovery of any sum as hire. We do not think the court erred either in admitting the evidence or in instructing the jury as indicated. It is evident that the court undertook to try the case in accord with the equitable rule recognized in Hays v. Jordan, 85 Ga. 741, 11 S. E. 833, 9 L. R. A. 373, that where a seller of personalty, who had reserved the title, and had received partial payments of the purchase money, brings an action to recover possession of the property, he is, in equity and in good conscience, liable to account for the money actually received, less the value of the property for hire. The answer of the defendants, as we understand it, was intended to be framed in pursuance of this rule, though it lacked one essential element, viz. it did not allege a willingness to account for the hire, or even, in general terms, assert a readiness on the part of the defendants to do equity. We do not think, therefore, that they can justly complain of the admission of evidence which would surely have been pertinent had their pleadings been complete. They were seeking an equitable rescission, and, in order to obtain equity, it was incumbent upon them to offer to do equity. It must not be overlooked that the plaintiff was standing squarely upon its legal right to recover possession of the property on the strength of its title, which was undisputed, and which it had an undoubted right to assert, because of the breach of a contract which expressly stipulated that, in case of default in paying any installment of the purchase money as it fell due, the plaintiff should be entitled to retake the property. As the plaintiff was not seeking by its action to do more than this, and was not asserting any claim for hire, its right to recover was manifest, unless the defendants set up some reason, either legal or equitable, to the contrary. There was nothing, from the plaintiff's standpoint, requiring it to go into the equities between the parties; and as the defendants sought to do so, it was, to say the least, incumbent on them to set forth the equities pro and con, and abide by the result. The evidence in question was therefore not inadmissible because the plaintiff was not suing for hire, but strictly pertinent to the issues which the answer sought to raise, or at least ought to have raised in order to give the defendants a standing in court. The plaintiff was not seeking to prove the hire, with a view to recovering the same, but its purpose was simply to defeat, by the introduction of competent evidence, the alleged right of the defendants to demand a return to them of the purchase money which had been paid. This was perfectly legitimate; for, as above pointed out, the pleadings of the defendants, not those filed by the plaintiff, were incomplete and defective. As the evidence objected to was properly admitted, it follows, of course, that the instructions which the court gave in connection therewith were fully warranted; they being, in substance, correct.

3. The motion for a new trial also complains that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. In our opinion, there was ample evidence upon which to base the jury's finding. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

MAYOR, ETC., OF SANDERSVILLE v. HURST.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1900.)

CITY—DEFECTIVE BRIDGE—LIABILITIES.

A city is not liable for injuries resulting from the defective condition of a bridge over a road on private property, approached by a gate, and in no way controlled by the city or open to the public. This is true although the bridge is within the corporate limits of the city.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Washington county; John C. Hart, Judge.

Action by Winnifred Hurst against the mayor and council of Sandersville. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Rawlings & Hardwick, for plaintiff in error. Evans & Evans, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. According to the charter granted in August, 1872, the corporate limits of the city of Sandersville describe a circle with a radius of one mile. The charter gives the mayor and council power to open new streets and to condemn land for this purpose. From the record it appears that there was a private plantation road running through a portion of the city, and leading into the plantation of Mr. Rawlins. The city authorities adopted as a city street a portion of this road. The portion adopted extended to within 40 or 50 yards of a bridge which had been erected by private persons over a small stream. The street accepted and adopted by the city authorities terminated at a certain cross street. The balance of the road was never adopted by the city, and the owner of the premises, which were inclosed by a fence, had erected a gate across that part of the road which had not been accepted by the city, between the bridge and the city street. Mrs. Hurst, an old lady, walked along the street and the road until she arrived at the stream. The bridge had fallen into decay, and there were but two planks over which passengers could cross. Mrs. Hurst undertook to walk over these planks, when they tilted, throwing her into the stream and breaking her ankle. She brought suit against the city, and the jury returned a verdict in her favor. A motion for a new trial was made and overruled. The city excepted.

The principal question argued here was whether the city was liable, under the facts stated, for the injuries sustained by the plaintiff. There was no evidence that the city authorities had ever accepted, by ordinance or otherwise, this part of the road on which the bridge was situated. There was no evidence that it had ever worked that part of the road, or had erected or maintained this bridge. On the contrary, the evidence showed that the city authorities had refused to recognize that part of the road as a street of the city. Application was made to them to furnish lumber to rebuild the bridge, and they refused to grant it. It also appeared that this bridge was on the private property of Mr. Rawlins, and that he had fenced it in and erected a gate near to the place where the city street terminated, and between that point and the bridge. There is nothing in the charter of the city which compels the city authorities to open and keep in repair all roads within the corporate limits. The charter leaves that question to the discretion of the municipal authorities. The evidence showed that these authorities had never received, accepted, or adopted as a street that part of the road on which the bridge was situated. Therefore the city was not bound to keep either the road or the bridge in repair, and the city cannot be held liable for injuries received by a person in consequence of the defective condition of the bridge. See Parsons v. Trustees, 44 Ga. 529; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) § 1017. For the above reasons, we think the court erred in refusing a new trial. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

GOETTE v. LANE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1900.)

DEED—CONSTRUCTION—CONVEYANCE OF TIMBER—REMOVAL—REASONABLE TIME—USAGE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Relatively to the character and extent of the estate conveyed in the timber described in the conveyance involved in the present case, and to the length of time within which that estate would be determined, this case falls within the ruling made in the case of McRae v. Stillwell (decided at the present term) 36 S. E. 604.

2. Inasmuch as the question of what would be a reasonable time for exercising the privileges granted in the deed involved in the present case is one of fact, to be determined in the light of all the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction, and inasmuch as the same would necessarily be widely variant in different cases, it cannot be determined with reference to any local custom or usage, unless such custom or usage was so general and universal as to have become necessarily, by implication, a part of the contract, which would not arise unless the custom was one which could be reasonably applied to the particular transaction under investigation. (a) The charge of the court relating to the subject of custom was not warranted by the facts in the present case.

Error from superior court, Emanuel county; B. D. Evans, Judge.

Action by E. W. Lane against J. G. Goette. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he brings error. Reversed.

A. C. Wright, for plaintiff in error. Henry R. Daniel, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Lane sued Goette in an action of trespass, alleging that the defendant had entered upon the premises of the plaintiff, and taken and carried away therefrom timber belonging to the plaintiff. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and, the defendant's motion for a new trial having been overruled, the case is here upon a bill of exceptions sued out by him, assigning error upon the judgment of the court refusing to grant him a new trial.

1. At the trial it appeared that the plaintiff had conveyed to one Preston "all the pine timber suitable for sawmill purposes" on various tracts of land, including the tract described in the petition, which was one containing 1,841 acres. The grantee and his heirs and assigns were to have the right to enter upon the land described "for the purpose of boxing the said timber for turpentine purposes, and of cutting, manufacturing, and hauling and taking away said timber and turpentine, or such portion of it as he may wish, at any time in reason, and also the exclusive right and privilege of having sites for sawmills and turpentine stills" on the lands, as well as the right to build and operate roads, tramroads, and railroads for the purpose of hauling the timber, logs, lumber, merchandise, and all other freight, so long as the grantee, his heirs and assigns, might see fit to use or occupy the same, with the privilege of removing all such property from the land, as well as the right to the quiet and peaceable possession of the lands at any and all times for the purpose of turpentining, cutting, manufacturing, hauling, and taking away the timber and trees. In the warranty clause of the deed it was stipulated that the plaintiff would forever warrant and defend to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, "the timber and turpentine privileges, and all other of said rights and privileges above mentioned." No definite time was specified in the deed within which the grantee was to exercise the rights and privileges conferred. The defendant in the present case is the successor in title of Preston. In the case of McRae v. Stillwell, 36 S. E. 604, it was held that a deed containing provisions very similar to those in the one under consideration in the present case conveyed to the grantees, their heirs and assigns, all the timber suitable at the date of the instrument for the purposes indicated, and that it was incumbent on the grantees and their successors in title to cut and remove such timber within a reasonable time from the date of the conveyance, and that upon failure so to do their interest in the timber ceased and determined. The principle ruled in the case just referred to is peculiarly applicable in the present case. It was there ruled that the deed would be construed as having embraced within it a stipulation that the timber should be removed within a reasonable time. In the present case the parties have inserted in the deed itself such a stipulation; the deed, in terms, providing that the grantee shall have the right to enter upon the land for the purpose of boxing the timber for turpentine purposes, and of cutting, manufacturing, hauling, and taking away the timber and turpentine, or such portion as he may wish, "at any time within reason." The parties have, in terms, agreed that the grantee's right to use the land for turpentine and sawmill purposes shall be exercised within a reasonable time. But, even if the words "at any time within reason" were not embraced in the deed, the decision in McRae v. Stillwell would be controlling here. Counsel for plaintiff in error in the present case was also counsel for the defendant in error in the case just referred to, and at the argument of the present case he was heard upon a motion for a rehearing in the former case. Upon a careful review of the decision in that case, we adhere to the rulings therein made, and the motion for a rehearing has been denied.

2. What time should be allowed the defendant within which to utilize the timber for turpentine purposes and remove the products of such use from the land, and what additional time should be allowed for the defendant to avail himself of the use of the sawmill privileges, and the removal of the timber or the product of the sawmill from the land, are questions to be passed upon and decided by a jury under instructions that they must take into consideration all the facts and circumstances of the case, and the conditions surrounding the parties at the time of the execution of the contract, as well as all other facts and circumstances which would throw any light on the questions to be determined. After the jury have considered all these facts and circumstances, it is for them to say what would be a reasonable time to be allowed to the defendant to exercise the rights and privileges granted in the deed under which he claims. See McRae v. Stillwell, supra. This rule requires that the time fixed shall be reasonable. In cases where there may be a doubt as to whether one or the other of two periods of time would be reasonable, generally the jury should resolve the doubt in favor of the grantee, giving him the longer period of time, for the simple reason that the grantor's right rests upon a forfeiture, which a court of law will enforce, but always in such a manner that the injury to him whose rights are the subject of the forfeiture will be the least that the nature of the case will reasonably admit of. What would be a reasonable time will, of course, depend upon the peculiar facts of each case, and will be widely variant in different cases. For this reason a local custom or usage, although its existence is proven with the strictness required by law, would not ordinarily be relevant or material evidence in determining what is a reasonable time to be allowed in such cases. Certainly such a custom would have no bearing upon the case unless its observance was shown to be so general and universal that there could be no escape from the implication that the parties intended to contract in the light of the same. Especially would a local custom or usage not be applicable when the time fixed thereby might be such a short period of time as not to be at all reasonable when applied to the facts and circumstances of the particular case. The charges in reference to local custom and usage which were the subject of complaint in the motion for a new trial were erroneous, for the reason that the evidence did not establish the existence of such a custom,—at least, it did not establish the existence of a custom of such universal observance as that it was necessarily to be inferred that the parties contracted in the light of the same. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

SHEEHAN v. SOUTH RIVER BRICK CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1900.)

BUILDING CONTRACTS — ACCEPTANCE — MECHANIC'S LIEN—ALTERATIONS—REMEDY OF DEFECT IN BUILDING.

1. When one who contracted to erect a building did so in substantial compliance with the terms of his contract, turned it over to the owner, received full payment for his services, and was discharged by the latter, the relation of owner and contractor between the two was at an end, whether the building in all respects conformed to the plans and specifications agreed upon or not.

2. After such relation ceased, the contractor no longer had authority to represent or bind the owner in any manner or for any purpose, and consequently could not, because of a complaint, made before the owner had accepted the building, by an architect then representing the latter, give an order for additional material to be used in remedying a defect in the building, and thus afford to the person furnishing such material a basis for asserting a material man's lien on the realty improved.

3. Though, in such a case, the additional material was in fact used upon the building, if the same was done without the owner's knowledge or consent the lien did not arise.

4. Applying what is said above to the facts of this case, it follows that the verdict of the jury was unwarranted and should have been set aside.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by the South River Brick Company against Mrs. Elizabeth Sheehan and another to establish a mechanic's lien for materials furnished after completion of a building. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant Sheehan brings error. Reversed.

T. R. Corrigan and S. A. Atkinson, for plaintiff in error. Culberson & Willingham, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. The South River Brick Company brought an action against F. W. Pierce and Mrs. Elizabeth Sheehan for the purpose of establishing and enforcing a material man's lien. Pierce filed no answer, but Mrs. Sheehan made a vigorous defense. The jury found in favor of the plaintiff, and she brings here for review a judgment overruling her motion for a new trial. The evidence is voluminous, and in many particulars conflicting. After a careful examination and study of it, we find that the following presents the most favorable view of the facts from the standpoint of the plaintiff: In the spring of 1895 Mrs. Sheehan made a contract with Pierce for the erection of a brick building on Piedmont avenue, in the city of Atlanta, the same to be completed by the 1st day of July, according to certain plans and specifications prepared for her by R. L. Jones & Co., architects. Pierce made an oral agreement with the South River Brick Company, under the terms of which that company undertook to furnish him what brick he "needed for the erection of that building." At the time this contract was entered into, no definite number of brick was specified, but the parties estimated that the quantity required would be between 250,000 and 300,000. On various dates up to and including the 27th of June, the brick company furnished Pierce some 294,000. It furnished no more until the 4th day of November, 1895, when it delivered upon his order 250 brick, which were used by him in raising to a greater height some of the chimneys upon the building, which had not previously been carried up to the height called for by the plans and specifications. Some time in September, R. L. Jones, a member of the firm of architects above mentioned, who was superintending the work for Mrs. Sheehan, complained to Pierce that some of the chimneys were not of the height specified in his contract with her. To this complaint Pierce at the time paid no attention. On the 19th of October, Jones & Co. addressed to him a letter of which the following is a copy: "Atlanta, Oct. 19, 1895. Mr. F. W. Pierce, City—Dear Sir: We note, by reference to the plans, that you have not carried the chimneys of the tenements of Mrs. Sheehan as high as they should be, and we therefore notify you to carry same up, or we will have same done at your expense after a reasonable time has elapsed in which you fail to do so, and we will not accept the houses as complete until this and other defects are remedied. Respectfully, R. L. Jones & Co., Archts." It does not appear that Mrs. Sheehan had any knowledge of the complaint made by her architects to Pierce with reference to the chimneys, or that she was informed that they had addressed to him the letter above quoted. Indeed, it does not appear that she even knew the chimneys had not been built according to contract. On the 2d day of November there was a meeting in the office of her attorneys, at which she, Pierce, and R. L. Jones were present. Pierce was then endeavoring to obtain a final settlement with Mrs. Sheehan. Nothing was said on that occasion with reference to the chimneys, or any other part of the brickwork on the building. She did, however, make complaint that the house had not been completed according to contract, because of the failure of Pierce to put up certain window blinds. Pierce contended that under the specifications he was not required to furnish these blinds, and in this contention was sustained by Jones. Another matter of dispute between Mrs. Sheehan and Pierce was as to how much he had forfeited by reason of his failure to complete the building within the time limited by the contract. This difference and that relating to the window blinds were adjusted, and Mrs. Sheehan then and there, by Pierce's direction, paid to Curtis & Craig, to which firm Pierce was indebted for other material, the full amount due him according to the settlement agreed upon. Thus the matter between Mrs. Sheehan and Pierce was finally and definitely closed. On the 4th day of November (two days later), Pierce, who had previously taken no action with regard to the letter of October 19th, above set forth, delivered the same to the brick company, and gave it an order for 250 brick, which were on the same day, under Pierce's order and direction, placed upon the chimneys of Mrs. Sheehan's building. This additional work was, however, done without her knowledge or consent. On the 18th of November the brick company addressed and sent to Mrs. Sheehan a written notice, which she received on the 21st, to the effect that Pierce was indebted to that company a balance of $420.26 for brick furnished for the erection of her building on Piedmont avenue. Subsequently the company recorded its lien, based upon its demand against Pierce for material furnished him.

The main contention of Mrs. Sheehan at the trial was that the plaintiff was not entitled to assert a lien upon her property, for the reason that it had failed, as required by law, to give her notice of its claim of lien within 30 days from the completion of its contract with Pierce. The question, therefore, upon which the case necessarily turns, is whether or not, upon the state of facts above recited, the brick company was entitled to a verdict establishing its alleged lien. In our opinion, it was not. It is clear that if Pierce, after the 27th of June, had given to the company no further order for material, notice to Mrs. Sheehan of its demand against him would have been unavailing if not served within 30 days from that date. In this connection, see section 2801 of the Civil Code, which declares that the notice therein provided for shall "be given within thirty days of * * * the furnishing of the material." Did the furnishing of the 250 brick on November 4th make that the date from which the 30 days should be computed? We think not. It is true that in New Ebenezer Ass'n v. Gress Lumber Co., 89 Ga. 125, 14 S. E. 892, this court held, in effect, that where material is furnished under "one and the same contract," but from time to time as required, the date to be considered in determining whether or not a material man has recorded his lien within the time prescribed by law is that upon which the last delivery of material was made. And it would seem that this rule should be held to likewise apply in a case where the question arises whether or not the notice prescribed by statute came too late. But, as will have been seen, the 250 brick which constitute the last item of the plaintiff's account against Pierce were not ordered by or delivered to him until two days after Mrs. Sheehan had formally accepted the building, settled with him in full, and finally discharged him as her contractor. Certainly, under these circumstances, Pierce had no semblance of authority to bind her by any further orders he might give for material to be used upon the building. The relation of owner and contractor is, in a case like the present, necessary, to support a material man's lien. This relation did not exist between Pierce and Mrs. Sheehan on November 4th, and therefore he cannot be said to have been in any sense her authorized agent at that time. He had made a final settlement with her on November 2d, after a substantial, if not a literal, compliance with the terms of his contract, and she had fully released him by unconditionally accepting the building. Accordingly he really "needed" no more brick to be used in its construction, and had no right, even under his contract with the brick company, to call on it for more. Clearly, had it declined to fill his order of November 4th, no court would be justified in holding it liable for a breach of its contract with him. If, at the time of making the final settlement above alluded to, Mrs. Sheehan had insisted that Pierce should thereafter, though paid in full, place additional bricks upon the chimneys, or if it had been tacitly understood between them that he was to do so, this case would wear an altogether different aspect. In that event she could not be heard to say he was on November 4th no longer her contractor or authorized to act in that capacity. But, as has been seen, no such understanding was had between them. On the contrary, it is evident that Mrs. Sheehan in good faith endeavored on the day of the settlement to bring about a final adjustment of every matter, with a view to discharging from her service, at once and for all time, her contractor. Indeed, there is something more than a suggestion in the record that upon the occasion referred to Mrs. Sheehan was very anxious to sever all business relations with Pierce. The mere fact that the additional 250 brick were not only ordered by Pierce, but actually placed upon the building belonging to Mrs. Sheehan, would not warrant a finding that the relation of owner and contractor continued after November 2d; for it affirmatively appears that these brick were delivered on Mrs. Sheehan's premises and used on the building without her knowledge and without her consent, express or implied. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

PORTER v. ROUNTREE.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — JUDGMENTS — COLLATERAL ATTACK — JUDGMENT AGAINST EXECUTOR—PERSONAL LIABILITY—DEVASTAVIT.

1. Where a judgment de bonis testatoris is obtained against an executor, execution issued thereon, a return of nulla bona made by the sheriff, and a suit brought on the judgment against the executor personally, suggesting a devastavit, the executor cannot, in his defense to the suit, make a collateral attack upon the judgment by showing fraud or mistake in its rendition; and this is true although the judgment was rendered by the same court in which the suit thereon is pending.

2. The modification of such judgment de bonis testatoris by the statement that it is not to be a personal judgment against the executrix does not preclude the plaintiff from bringing suit upon it against the executrix personally, suggesting a devastavit.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by D. W. Rountree against Mrs. F. L. Porter. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to defendant's answer, she brings error. Affirmed.

J. H. Porter, Jr., and Arnold & Arnold, for plaintiff in error. John T. Pendleton, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. It appears from the record that Rountree brought suit in the city court of Atlanta against Mrs. Porter, as executrix of her husband, and against Farrar and Williams. There was no defense to the action, but counsel for Mrs. Porter agreed in writing that a verdict and judgment be rendered against her de bonis testatoris, adding to such judgment a stipulation that it should not be a personal judgment against the executrix. Execution was issued, and a return of nulla bona made thereon by the sheriff. Thereupon Rountree brought an action upon the judgment, seeking to make the executrix personally liable for a devastavit. To this action the executrix filed an answer, setting up that the judgment sued on was obtained by fraudulent representations, and by mistake on the part of her counsel in signing the consent verdict and judgment. Various allegations were made in this answer as to the fraudulent representations and the manner in which the mistake was made. These it is not necessary, in the view we take of the case, to set out here. The court sustained a demurrer filed by the plaintiff to this answer. The defendant excepted.

1. It is well settled that a judgment regular on its face, and rendered by a court having jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, cannot be attacked collaterally by the defendant for any errors or irregularities entering into the judgment or inducing its rendition. The only way to have such a judgment set aside is by appeal or writ of error, or by a direct attack on it. In the present case the judgment against the executrix was rendered in April, 1898. No exception was taken, and the judgment stands to-day unreversed. When the plaintiff filed against the executrix a suit predicated upon this judgment, the executrix filed the answer above mentioned. This was, in our opinion, making upon the judgment a collateral attack, which the law does not permit. This is true, although the same court which rendered the judgment was that in which was brought the suit upon the judgment. If the defense set up was true and had any legal merit, the defendant's remedy was to file an equitable petition in the superior court to have this judgment set aside as fraudulent (Civ. Code, § 5370), and to enjoin the present suit, inasmuch as the city court had no right to grant affirmative equitable relief until the merits of her case could be properly inquired into. Or, if she preferred, she could have moved in proper time in the city court to have the judgment set aside, and thus have had the merits of her case passed upon. Id. § 5373. There is an allegation in the answer that the defendant had filed an equitable petition in the superior court to have this judgment set aside, but it is not stated what was the judgment of that court upon this petition. Nothing is disclosed by the record tending to show that any motion was made in the city court to set aside the judgment which was rendered by that court. Whatever may have been or may be the result of the petition in the superior court, we are clear that the executrix has no right to attack the judgment in the indirect way employed by her in the present case. It was nothing more nor less than a collateral attack, which, as we have said, she is not permitted to make. For these reasons, we think the trial judge was right in sustaining the demurrer of the plaintiff.

2. It is claimed by counsel for the plaintiff in error that, inasmuch as the judgment against the executrix stated that it was not to be a personal judgment against her, the plaintiff in the court below could not maintain on it a suit to make it binding upon the executrix personally. Section 3508 of the Civil Code provides that, in a suit against an administrator or executor in his representative capacity, the judgment shall be de bonis testatoris, except where certain pleas are filed and found against him, when the judgment shall be that the plaintiff recover the debt and costs, to be levied in the first place upon the property of the deceased, if any such property is to be found, and, if none be found, then to be levied upon the property of the defendant. In the present case the addition to the judgment now under consideration, that it was not to be personal against the executrix, must be construed to mean simply that the judgment was not to be binding on the executrix personally; she not having filed pleas to justify a personal judgment against her. It was, however, not a waiver of the right of the plaintiff to bring an action against the executrix for a devastavit when it appeared from the return of the proper officer that the executrix had wasted or mismanaged the assets of the estate. It appeared from the verdict and judgment that there were assets of the estate in the hands of the executrix at the time of the rendition of the judgment. That she had no such assets at the time of the return of the sheriff is shown by that return. The conclusion must follow that she had in the meantime made way with the assets. When the executrix consented to the judgment de bonis testatoris, she admitted assets in her hands. As it was ascertained from the sheriff's return that no assets of the estate could be found, we think the provision that the judgment was not to be personal against the executrix would not preclude or estop the plaintiff from bringing his action against the executrix, suggesting a devastavit by her, and seeking to obtain a judgment binding upon her personally. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

COCHRAN v. WARLICK.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1900.)

DIRECTING VERDICT.

Though the plaintiff apparently made a prima facie case entitling him to a recovery of the land in dispute, by showing constructive possession by his grantor under color of title for more than seven years, yet, as it was, under all the evidence, a question for determination by the jury whether or not this constructive possession was overcome by the weight of evidence, or whether or not defendant had shown a good prescriptive title by actual adverse possession under a claim of right for more than 20 years before the bringing of the action, the court ought not to have directed a verdict for the plaintiff, but should have submitted the case to the jury.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Campbell county; J. S. Candler, Judge.

Action by J. W. Warlick against M. B. Cochran. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

J. F. Golightly and J. H. Longino, for plaintiff in error. Dorsey, Brewster & Howell and L. S. Roan, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. This was a complaint for land, brought in the superior court of Campbell county by J. W. Warlick against Mrs. M. B. Cochran; the land being a town lot in Fairburn, designated as No. 11 in block A. The abstract of titles attached to the petition was: (1) Deed from Richard Moore, Alfred Austell, and Nathan Camp, conveying to Atlanta & La Grange Railroad Company, now the Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company, dated and executed November 5, 1850, lots of land Nos. 66, 52, 47, 53, and the east half of 51, all in the Ninth district of originally Fayette, but now Campbell, county, Ga.; (2) deed from Atlanta & West Point Railroad Company, formerly the Atlanta & La Grange Railroad Company, to James C. Warlick, dated and executed December 21, 1896, conveying lot of land No. 11 in block A in the town of Fairburn,—said lot being part of lot No. 52 in the Ninth district of originally Fayette, but now Campbell, county. There is no proof in the record that the grantors of the Atlanta & La Grange Railroad Company ever had any title or possession of the land conveyed. Plaintiff therefore amended his petition, claiming that his predecessors in title paid for the land and held uninterrupted and peaceable possession of it, including the premises in dispute, under color of title, for more than seven years. The defendant answered, denying such possession and title in the plaintiff; alleging that, if the railroad company ever owned the land in dispute, it parted with its title to the same; and averring that she in good faith purchased the land, paid for it, and held actual, adverse possession of it for more than 20 years prior to the bringing of this suit. After hearing the evidence, the court instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff, which they accordingly did. Defendant made her motion for a new trial on the general grounds, and on the further ground that the court erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiff. Upon the judgment overruling this motion, error is assigned in the bill of exceptions.

The plaintiff below introduced the deeds, an abstract of which was attached to his petition. It is clearly inferable from the evidence in the record that in 1850 the railroad company purchased several large tracts of land, including lot known as No. 52, and directly thereafter constructed its road, which ran through lot No. 52, and upon that lot erected its depot buildings, and had been in possession and use of this property (that is, the track and the depot buildings) from that time to the present. There is no evidence that it was ever in actual possession of the lot in dispute. It is inferable from the testimony that this was not then a town, but simply open land, when the railroad bought, and that, after the construction of its track and the location of its depot, the town of Fairburn by degrees grew up, and was built mainly upon this lot No. 52. Plaintiff's witnesses admitted that there had been for years a number of houses built on this lot, occupied as residences and business houses by private citizens, and some of them were located on lot No. 52, between the railroad depot and lot No. 11, in controversy. How the owners of these improved lots acquired possession of the same does not appear from the record, but the probability is that the railroad, after buying the lots, sold them off to individuals to occupy and improve. Upon notice, defendant's deed was introduced, which covered on its face only lot No. 9, upon which the dwelling house occupied by her was erected. This lot adjoined lot No. 11, the property in dispute. Testimony was introduced in her behalf to the effect that about the year 1852 these lots (Nos. 9 and 11) were occupied by one Smith, who built the dwelling thereon in which defendant lived, and that he placed in one inclosure by a fence both of these lots, and for years cultivated, used, and occupied lot No. 11 as well as No. 9. The two lots thus surrounded by one inclosure, with the dwelling thereon, evidently presented the appearance of a single residence lot. There was no evidence showing the indication of any line whatever between lots Nos. 9 and 11. It was shown that several other occupants went into possession of the land after Smith vacated; that they used and occupied both lots, 9 and 11, keeping up the one inclosure around both, until the year 1876. The defendant's husband during that year died, and his brother, according to the testimony, bought both lots for the defendant, paying his money therefor, taking deed to himself at the time, stating that he would collect money due his deceased brother's estate, and reimburse himself for the sum thus expended, and would make deed to the defendant. After this purchase, in 1876, he placed her in possession of the dwelling and the two lots, 9 and 11, which were then inclosed by a fence, and told her that she owned both of them, pointing them out to her. After this, it seems, he made her a deed, which included only lot No. 9. She did not read the deed. She thought there was really one lot in the entire inclosure, knowing nothing about the division of the town lots. She went into possession, repaired the fence that inclosed the two lots, planted an apple and peach orchard on the same, honestly believing that she owned both lots, having paid a consideration for both, to wit, over $200. She cultivated lot No. 11, in dispute, and several years during her occupancy of same rented it out, and received rents therefor from her tenants. Upon this lot was erected a barn by one of them, with the privilege of his removing it if he desired, but he finally gave her the building. A stable was also built thereon. This is, briefly, an account of her occupancy from the time she moved on the place in December, 1876, down to the bringing of this action, more than 20 years thereafter. It does not appear from the evidence that the railroad company made any claim to this land, or interfered with the possession and use thereof by the defendant, until the spring or summer of 1896, when it sent agents there to inquire into this title to the land occupied by the defendant, including the property in dispute. She readily showed them the deed that her brother-in-law had given her, and the agents then informed her that it covered only lot No. 9. These agents testified that she made no claim to lot No. 11 at the time, and, when they offered to sell, said she was not able to pay for same. She testified that, while she did say that she was not able to pay for it, she said she had been in possession of it for 20 years, and they told her that did not make any difference; that did not give her title. This was the first time she knew that the deed only covered a part of the property she had purchased. One of the agents offered to sell it to her for $50, and, in his testimony, gave as one reason for such a low offer that he wanted to avoid this identical trouble that they were now going through with in this case.

We have carefully read the testimony in this case, and the above is a fair report of it, in substance. Now, when the plaintiff closed his testimony, he perhaps made out a prima facie case, upon the doctrine that where one buys a tract of land, and receives therefor a deed, accurately describing it by metes and bounds, and goes into possession thereof, using and occupying a portion of the tract thus conveyed, he has constructive possession of the remainder, and it ripens into a prescriptive title if it be thus held for seven years under color of title. We do not mean to say that when his testimony was closed a prima facie case was not made out for the plaintiff, but it was only prima facie, and subject to be rebutted by proof. If an action, therefore, be brought by such a claimant of land, against a party holding the property in dispute adversely, two defenses can be set up: First, that the plaintiff never had such possession, either actual or constructive, as would ripen into a title; and this could be shown by proving adverse possession in some other party, although defendant would fail to make out any title for herself or for such other persons holding adversely. Plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title, and, if such proof as that were offered in defense to his suit, it would show a want of prescriptive title in him; that is, a want of the necessary possession, either actual or constructive, as could possibly ripen into title. Another defense would be that the defendant had, prior to the bringing of suit, been in bona fide, peaceable, and adverse possession of the property, in good faith, as her own, for 20 years; and this would show her title paramount to that of the plaintiff, even if the plaintiff and those under whom he claims ever showed any title to the premises prior to her possession. It is true that from the testimony of the agents of the railroad company, who inquired into the deeds of defendant, it might have been inferred that while she was in possession she virtually acknowledged ownership in the company, or at least not in herself. This would, perhaps, have been a legitimate inference, if what the agents said was all the testimony in the case. The jury, however, might have believed her version of the matter. The defendant gives a different explanation of the conversation with these agents from what they related,—that when they spoke about her title she informed them of her 20 years' possession, and then it was they told her that would not avail her. If she was thus misled, and induced to use language which could be construed into a quasi admission that she was not holding bona fide, it would by no means follow that the same was absolutely conclusive that her possession was not bona fide and under a claim of right, the more especially when she continued to hold adverse possession.

As the case goes back for a new trial, of course we do not mean to express any opinion in regard to the weight or preponderance of this evidence on either side; but we call attention to the above, with the view of demonstrating that the judgment of the court deciding that the evidence demanded a verdict for the plaintiff was, in our opinion, erroneous, and that he should have submitted the case for consideration by the jury, giving them in charge the principles of law herein embodied. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

UNITED BEN. SOC. OF AMERICA v. FREEMAN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1900.)

INSURANCE—ACCIDENT POLICY—NOTICE OF INJURY—FAILURE TO SERVE—WAIVER.

1. Where a contract of insurance between a benefit society and one of its members, which, among other things, covered accidental injuries, expressly stipulated that "written notice from the member or his representative, and a certificate from the attending physician, each stating the time, place, manner, and nature of injury, * * * must be received at the principal office of the society * * * within ten days after the date of injury, * * * as conditions precedent to recovery," and the insured sustained such injuries, but failed to give the prescribed notice thereof within 10 days from the date of the accident,—it not having been impossible for him to have done so,—the society, in the absence of a waiver on its part of the time limit as to such notice, incurred no liability in consequence of such accident.

2. The facts in this case do not show that it was impossible for the insured to have given the prescribed notice within the time limited. It is therefore unnecessary to decide whether impossibility of giving the notice within 10 days from the date of the injury would be a sufficient excuse for a failure to do so within that period.

3. One cannot be held to have impliedly waived a defense of the existence of which he had no knowledge at the time he did the act which is relied upon as a waiver thereof.

Error from city court of Griffin; E. W. Hammond, Judge.

Action by W. T. Freeman against the United Benevolent Society of America on an accident policy. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant brings error. Reversed.

Shepard Brown, for plaintiff in error. Lloyd Cleveland, for defendant in error.

FISH, J. The application of the plaintiff for membership in the United Benevolent Society of America contained the following language: "I also understand that benefits will be allowed only while I am under the care of a duly-accredited physician, and that I must notify the society at the home office, in writing, within ten days from the commencement of disability, in order to entitle me to benefits." The written contract of insurance sued on was expressly made "subject to conditions on the back hereof." On the back of the same, underneath the headline, "Conditions under Which This Certificate is Issued and Accepted," were 14 numbered paragraphs, stating the conditions. The first of these was: "Written notice from the member or his representative, and a certificate from the attending physician, each stating the time, place, manner, and nature of injury, sickness, or death, must be received at the office of the society in Atlanta, Georgia, within ten days after the date of injury, commencement of sickness, or death, as conditions precedent to recovery. Benefits for which the society is liable shall be payable only after satisfactory, direct, and affirmative final proofs have been received by the society in Atlanta, Georgia." As the giving of the prescribed notice within 10 days from the date of the injury was expressly made a condition precedent to the liability of the insurance society, it inevitably follows that, if this notice was not given within the specified time, the society, in the absence of a waiver of the time limit on its part, would not be liable, unless, perhaps, the circumstances following the injury rendered it impossible for the notice to be given within the 10 days. No written notice of any kind of the injury was given to anybody within 10 days from the date of the injury, and no notice, either verbal or written, was given to any officer or general agent of the defendant corporation until after the 10 days had elapsed. On the day the plaintiff was accidentally hurt, he went to Griffin, to a doctor's office, to be treated, and while there sent for Slaton, the local soliciting agent and collector of the defendant, "and told him to notify the company that [the plaintiff] was hurt," which Slaton promised to do. Slaton, however, forgot to notify the society until more than 10 days had elapsed since the plaintiff received the injury; and when he did notify it he neither stated the time, place, nor the manner and nature of the injury. Even if the notice which he, acting for the insured, gave the insurance society, could be held sufficient in other respects, it was not given within the prescribed time, and therefore could not avail the insured, unless the society waived compliance with the condition as to time. The plaintiff does not contend that the verbal request which he made of Slaton was notice to the defendant corporation of his injury, and it is evident that notice to the mere local and collecting agent of the society at Griffin would not be notice to the society at its home office in Atlanta. The effect of the request which the plaintiff made of Slaton was that Slaton should act as his agent in notifying the society. Slaton failed to so act until the time prescribed within which to give the specified notice had expired. So a condition upon which the defendant's liability was dependent was not complied with.

2. The plaintiff contends that, notwithstanding this, the defendant is liable, for two reasons: First, because "plaintiff was totally incapacitated, on account of the accident, from attending to any business, or from writing to the company to give them any notice of the injury, for more than ten days, and did write them and furnish proofs as soon as he was able to do so"; second, because "the defendant company waived any notice of the injury within the ten days by sending out proofs to be filled after the ten days had expired." We deem it unnecessary to determine whether or not impossibility of giving the notice within the time limited would be a sufficient excuse for a failure to do so, for we do not think that the evidence is sufficient to show that the plaintiff could not have given the notice within the prescribed time. It probably would have been inconvenient for him to have done so, and, in order to have done so, he might have had to get some one else to write for him; but that he was, as contended by his counsel, for more than 10 days after the injury, totally incapacitated to give the notice to the defendant, does not appear from the testimony. On the very day that he received the injury he went from his home into the city of Griffin, and to a physician's office, in order to be treated, and while there sent for Slaton and told him to notify the insurance society that he was hurt. He had not lost the use of his mental faculties, for he realized both the necessity for getting medical treatment and the necessity for promptly notifying the defendant corporation of his injury, and he went to the office of the physician of his choice to be treated, and while in the doctor's office sent for Slaton, and asked him to notify the society of the injury which he had sustained. After this he sometimes went from his home to Griffin to see the physician, and sometimes the doctor went out to see him. He testifies that he "did not forget to notify the company," but "notified Slaton, and relied on him to notify the society"; that he "understood that [he] was required to give written notice, but expected Slaton to do it for" him. We think this testimony shows that he failed to notify the society within the time prescribed, not because it was impossible for him to do so, but because he relied upon and expected Slaton to do it for him. True, he did testify: "I was prostrated from my injury. I was not in mental or physical condition to think about giving the company notice in writing of my injury. I gave the notice as soon as I was able to do so." But the first part of this statement is inconsistent with the fact that he went to his physician's office in order to be treated, and the latter part of it is inconsistent with the fact that he actually did think about giving the notice, and sent for Slaton, and asked and expected him to give the written notice for him. The fact that the accident caused him to temporarily lose the sight of one eye, and rendered it for a time imprudent and probably dangerous for him to use the other, did not render it impossible for him to give the requisite notice to the insurance society during the time that he was thus disabled. He could have had some one else to write for him. Probably he could have got his physician to do this for him, especially as, by the conditions of the contract, a certificate from the attending physician containing the same information as that to be given in the notice from the insured was required. If the accident had resulted in the total and permanent loss of the sight of both eyes, the necessity for giving the prescribed notice would still have existed. Many accident insurance policies provide for the payment of a specified sum of money for the total loss of sight, and yet require written notice of the injury to be given the insurance company within a certain period of time. So, granting that it was impossible for the insured to use his eyes at all during the 10 days, we do not think this fact would be sufficient to excuse a noncompliance with the condition as to giving the notice during that period of time. The evidence was not sufficient to support a finding that it was impossible for the plaintiff to give the notice to the society within 10 days from the date of his injury.

3. Under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, did the society, by sending out the blank forms to be filled out by the plaintiff and returned to it, waive the giving of the required notice within 10 days from the date of the injury? There is undoubtedly much excellent authority for holding that if the society, with full knowledge of the facts, required the beneficiary under the contract of insurance to do some act or incur some expense or trouble which was inconsistent with the claim that the contract had become inoperative, in consequence of a breach of the condition as to the time within which the notice should be given, then it impliedly waived this defense. But certainly no one can be held to have impliedly waived a defense of the existence of which he had no knowledge at the time he did the act which he relied upon as a waiver thereof. One cannot be held to have waived something of the existence of which he was ignorant. "Acts ordinarily amounting to a waiver of a forfeiture will not have that effect, in the absence of knowledge of the forfeiture." 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 527. In Bennecke v. Insurance Co., 105 U. S. 359, 26 L. Ed. 290, Wood, J., said: "A waiver of a stipulation in an agreement must, to be effectual, not only be made intentionally, but with knowledge of the circumstances. This is the rule when there is a direct and precise agreement to waive the stipulation. A fortiori is this the rule when there is no agreement, either verbal or in writing, to waive the stipulation, but where it is sought to deduce a waiver from the conduct of the party." It does not appear from the evidence that the society, at the time that it sent to the plaintiff the blank forms for the prescribed notice, knew that 10 days had elapsed since the accident occurred. So far as appears from the evidence, the only information which it had in reference to the accident was that contained in the letter from Slaton to its secretary. In this letter Slaton simply stated that "W. T. Freeman received a very bad accident several days since, and requested me to notify you, but the matter escaped my mind until now," and requested the secretary to "kindly send [Freeman] a preliminary blank." Upon receipt of this letter the letter from the society to Freeman, inclosing the blank forms, was written. Information that the accident had occurred "several days since" was not tantamount to information that 10 days had elapsed since its occurrence. The expression "several days" might have meant 2 or 3 days, or any number of days less than 10. When the letter from the society to Freeman was introduced in evidence, there appeared upon it the following memorandum, written with a lead pencil, "Notice late." The plaintiff contends that this memorandum shows that the society knew when this letter was written that the time within which the notice required by the contract should have been given had expired. We do not think so. The memorandum was no part of the letter, and it did not appear when or by whom it was made, nor whether it was on the letter when the same was received by the insured or not. Even treating it as a part of the letter, its meaning is by no means clear. It does not necessarily mean that the writer of the letter knew that 10 days had elapsed since the date that Freeman was injured. From Slaton's letter, the secretary of the society knew that Slaton had not promptly complied with Freeman's request to notify the society of the injury which he had sustained, and the purpose and meaning of the memorandum might have been simply to let Freeman know that the reason why the society had not sooner sent him the blank forms was because Slaton had delayed in notifying it of the injury. So, even admitting that this memorandum was made by the official of the society who wrote the letter, we do not think it is sufficient to show that the society then knew that the time limit had expired before it received Slaton's letter. It certainly does not seem sufficient to show that the insurance society had full knowledge of the fact that the time for giving the notice under the contract had elapsed, and without full knowledge of this fact there could be no implied waiver of the time limit. He who invokes the doctrine of implied waiver carries the burden of showing the existence of the facts necessary to constitute such a waiver. In this case, for the reasons stated, we are of opinion that the plaintiff failed to successfully carry this burden. Judgment reversed.

FLETCHER v. AMERICAN TRUST & BANKING CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1900.)

EXECUTORS—POWERS UNDER WILL—LOAN—LIABILITY OF ESTATE.

1. Under a will giving the executor power, should it be necessary, to raise in such way as it seems best to him a sufficient amount of money to pay the debts of the testator, the executor is authorized to borrow money for the purpose of paying such debts, and to secure the loan by mortgage or security deed.

2. Where money is borrowed under such power, it is not incumbent on the lender to ascertain whether there are debts of the testator or not; the loan being made within a reasonable time after the death of the testator and the probate of the will.

3. If, under such power, the executor borrows more money than is necessary to pay the debts, the estate is liable to the lender for the full amount, where there is no fraud or collusion between the executor and the lender, and where the latter has no notice of the amount of the debts. The legatees must look for reimbursement to the executor individually.

4. Under the will and the commercial practice in this state, the authority to raise money as above indicated necessarily implies the power, in borrowing money, to contract to pay attorney's fees in the event it should be necessary to collect the debt by suit; such contract being, however, enforceable only when the person making the same files a plea and fails to sustain it.

Error from city court of Atlanta; A. E. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by the American Trust & Banking Company against A. A. Fletcher, executor. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

P. F. Smith and R. R. Shropshire, for plaintiff in error. W. D. Ellis and Gray, Brown & Randolph, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. In August, 1892, Mrs. Fletcher made and executed a will. She died and the will was probated in October of the same year. In her will she appointed her husband, A. A. Fletcher, her executor. The first item of the will was as follows: "I desire that all my debts, should I owe any, be paid as soon as practicable by my executor after my death. He is authorized to use any money that I may leave for this purpose, or, should it be necessary, to raise a sufficient amount of money for this purpose in such way as seems best to him." By another item of the will the executor was given general power and control of the estate, with full authority to invest funds, change investments, make new investments, sell property, and buy other property. He was not to be required to make an inventory of the estate or to make returns as executor, and he was authorized to execute any of the powers conferred, "without order of court and privately, without publication or public sale, and as to him seems best for the beneficiaries." Fletcher qualified as executor, and as such applied to the American Trust & Banking Company for a loan of money with which to pay off the debts of the estate, representing to the officers of the company that the debts amounted to $4,700. The company on February 16, 1894, loaned him the money, taking his note, as executor, for $4,700, due February 16, 1899, and also a number of coupon interest notes, with agreement that, upon a failure to pay any of these interest notes upon maturity, the entire indebtedness should become at once due. The notes also stipulated for the payment of 10 per cent. attorney's fees in the event the notes had to be collected by suit. To secure these notes the executor, as such, executed a deed to certain land in the city of Atlanta. The interest note falling due in August, 1897, was not paid at maturity, and in February, 1898, suit was brought in the city court of Atlanta against the executor upon the principal note and upon the unpaid interest notes. The plaintiff prayed a general judgment against the executor, binding the estate, for a special lien upon the land conveyed by the security deed, and for attorney's fees. The executor, answering the petition, admitted the execution of the notes and deed, but denied that the estate of his testatrix was liable for the debt. He claimed that the debt was his individual debt, and that the plaintiff had no right to a special lien on the land, or to a judgment against the estate for attorney's fees. The case was submitted to the trial judge without a jury, and he passed upon all questions, both of law and of fact. The executor, in his testimony, admitted borrowing the $4,700 from the plaintiff, but testified that when he obtained the money the estate owed but $3,400. One of the officers of the company testified that the executor represented to him, when the money was loaned, that the estate owed debts to the amount of $4,700. The court rendered judgment against the estate for the principal, interest, attorney's fees, and costs, and set up the special lien on the land. The executor moved for a new trial. The motion was overruled, and the executor excepted.

Three questions are involved in this case: (1) Did the executor have power under the will to borrow money, and secure the debt by deed or mortgage? (2) Having such power, could he borrow more than the amount of the debts of the testatrix, so as to make the contract binding upon the estate, not only to the amount of the debts, but to the full amount borrowed by him? (3) Was he authorized to contract for the payment of attorney's fees in the event it should be necessary to collect the debt by suit? We have no doubt but that all these questions may be answered in the affirmative, under the rules governing the power given the executor by this will.

1. The will is clear and explicit that the executor had power, in case it was necessary, to raise money in such way as seemed best to him, for the purpose of paying the debts of his testatrix. When the executor, in the administration of the assets of the estate, ascertained that it was necessary to raise money to pay the debts of the estate, he had full power to do so. It is a well-recognized principle of law that, where power is given to raise or borrow money, the power to secure the loan is necessarily implied. The will having given power to the executor to raise money to pay the debts of the estate, he had also the power to secure the loan by deed or mortgage; otherwise, he might have been unable to successfully execute the power expressly given him by the will. The executor had, therefore, not only the power to raise money for the purpose of paying the debts of his testatrix, but also the power to secure the loan by deed or mortgage.

2, 3. The question next arises, how much could the executor borrow, and to what extent would the estate be bound where he exceeded his authority? We agree with counsel for the plaintiff in error that the executor had power to borrow no more money than was necessary to pay the debts,—that his power was restricted to the exact amount of the debts. We do not, however, agree with him that as the estate owed but $3,400, and the executor borrowed $4,700, the estate was liable for $3,400 only, the balance being the individual debt of the executor. Were this the correct view of the law, it would put upon every lender of money to an executor with similar powers, and upon every purchaser from an executor who had power to sell to pay debts, the burden of inquiring into the amount and the validity of the debts of the estate. The law does not cast such a burden upon lenders or purchasers dealing with executors who have powers such as those given in this will. Where such powers are given, the testator constitutes the executor his agent to borrow or to sell, and binds his estate for the acts of the agent or executor done within the scope of the business intrusted to him. He alone knows the amount and validity of the claims against the estate, and where the money is borrowed or the sale made a short time after the probate of the will, and within the statute of limitations of notes, accounts, or specialities, nearly all the authorities agree that it is not incumbent on the lender or purchaser to make inquiry as to the amount or validity of the claims against the estate. If the contract or transaction is free from fraud and collusion, and the purchaser or lender has no notice of the amount of the debts, the estate is bound. Of course, if the lender or purchaser colludes with the executor, or has notice of the amount of the debts, and enters into the transaction to defraud the estate, or lends more money or purchases more property than is necessary to pay the debts, the estate is not bound. As early as the first volume of the reports of the decisions of this court, in the case of Bond v. Zeigler, 1 Ga. 324, we find a recognition of this principle. There the executrix, under a power authorizing the sale of property to pay debts, sold certain property to Bond & Murdock, who were creditors of the estate. The amount of their debt was allowed them, and, the property having sold for more than this amount, the balance was paid in cash. The property was afterwards levied upon by other creditors of the estate, who contended, among other things, that the purchasers were bound to ascertain the amount of the debts due by the estate. This court held (page 344) that in such cases purchasers are not "required, before buying, to look into the accounts of the executor to ascertain that he is faithfully administering his trust. The law presumes this in his favor." It is true that the sale was of personal property, and it may be said that the executor, having title thereto by virtue of his office, could have sold it, even without the power given by the will; but we find the same principle recognized in cases where the sale was of real property. In 2 Perry, Trusts (5th Ed.) § 809, it is said: "The purchaser need not inquire into the necessity of a sale. Even express notice of the entire contents of a will cannot affect a purchaser of a chattel; for a purchaser of real estate under a power of sale to pay debts is not bound to investigate whether there are debts, nor to see to the application of the purchase money. And, as all personal property is bound for the payment of debts, a purchaser is not bound to know whether there are debts or not, nor to see to the application of the purchase money." In Larue's Heirs v. Larue's Ex'rs, 3 J. J. Marsh. 157, the executors "were only authorized to sell so much land as was necessary to raise funds to pay the debts." They transcended these powers, and sold more land than was necessary to pay the debts. The court said: "The will * * * gave them authority to sell for the purpose of paying debts. If they abused or transcended their authority, they are responsible to the heirs or devisees; but bona fide purchasers from them or their vendees cannot be affected, unless they have notice of the improper conduct of the executors. What debts [the executor] owed, or how much land it was necessary to sell to pay them, were matters of which the executors should judge, and upon which they alone were competent to decide. The testator reposed confidence in them and gave them authority to act, and thereby strangers were invited to entertain confidence. It would therefore be unjust to permit strangers, who purchased in good faith, to sustain injury from the frauds of the executors." In Rutherford's Heirs v. Clark's Heirs, 4 Bush, 27, it was said: "When a will directs the sale of real estate, if necessary, for the payment of all the testator's debts or legacies, a purchaser at any such sale, not being presumed to know, or to be able by reasonable diligence to know, the condition of the estate or the extent of its indebtedness or of its assets, should be protected in his purchase, whenever made in good faith, without notice, actual or constructive, of the latent fact that there was no necessity for the sale, and consequent want of authority to make it. If this were not so, prudent men would not bid a fair price at such sales." In Garnett v. Macon, 6 Call, 308, Chief Justice Marshall said (page 362): "The purchaser [of chattels] is not bound to make any inquiry. The general power of the executor to sell protects him in buying, but, if he buys with notice that the sale is a breach of trust, the property remains charged with it. I feel much difficulty in resisting the application of this principle to freehold estates charged with the payment of debts. It would seem to me as if the inquiry must always be into the fact. The question must always be, is the sale, taking its object into view, a breach of trust? And are the circumstances such as to charge a purchaser, having express notice, with a participation in the breach? The purchaser of a chattel from an executor, with notice that no debts are due, or in payment of his own debt, seems to me to present the same questions." And it was held by Brett, L. J., in Re Tanqueray-Williaume, 20 Ch. Div. 465, 482: "The question whether the purchaser's title [to real estate charged with the payment of debts] would be bad if there were not in fact any debts, supposing the time which has elapsed not to be too long, is determined by Stroughill v. Anstey, 1 De Gex, M. & G. 635, which is an authority for saying that, if there is a charge of debts upon the property, then, if the purchaser has no knowledge that there are no debts, he has, except under peculiar circumstances, a right to assume that there are debts, and that his title is good, whether there are or are not debts in fact. So far, therefore, from its being prudent in him to ask this question, it is imprudent to ask it, unless there has been sufficient lapse of time to call upon him to make that requisition." See, also, Smith v. Henning, 10 W. Va. 566, 640; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d. Ed.) p. 1053, and notes. These authorities clearly show that this principle applies as well to the sale of land charged with debts as to the sale of personalty. The cases cited deal with sales by the executor, but there is, in our opinion, no difference as to this matter between a sale under a power to sell to pay debts, and a mortgage given to secure a loan under a power to raise money to pay debts. It is incumbent on the lender to ascertain the power of the executor under the will, and, if the will gives the power to raise money to pay debts, it is not necessary for the lender to inquire into the amount of the debts, or into the validity of the claims against the estate. Where the loan is made a long time after the death of the testator, so that there arises a presumption that the debts have all been paid, the estate is not bound beyond the amount of the debts actually owed. The expiration of a long period of time after the qualification of the executor would be sufficient to put the lender upon inquiry as to whether there are debts. In the present case the loan was made within 18 months after the probate of the will, and no fraud or collusion or notice of the amount of the debts on the part of the mortgagee was intimated in the record. The executor had the power to borrow the money to pay the debts of the estate, and the lender had the right to presume that this power was properly exercised. Not only was the executor the sole judge of the amount of the debts, but he alone knew of the amount of funds of the estate which were available to pay those debts. In order to determine the necessity for the loan, it was necessary to know, not only the amount of the debts, but also the amount of funds already on hand which were available to pay the debts. Into these matters we think the lender was under no duty to inquire. He was protected, having loaned the money in good faith and without notice, although, as matter of fact, the amount loaned exceeded the amount of the debts of the estate.

4. The power of the executor to raise money necessarily implied authority to secure the loan. We think it also necessarily implied the authority to make a contract to pay the lender 10 per cent. attorney's fees in case the debt had to be collected by suit. Contracts to pay attorney's fees have been held good by this court, and are recognized by our Code (Civ. Code, § 3667). They are, however, not enforceable unless the party, when sued, files a plea and fails to sustain it. This court has held that the insertion of a stipulation for the payment of attorney's fees does not destroy the negotiability of a promissory note. It seems now to be the general practice in this state for the borrower of money to insert in his note or contract an obligation to pay attorney's fees in case the debt has to be collected by law. The power given the executor in the present case implied authority to raise the money in any proper and usual way, and the agreement to pay attorney's fees was not improper or unusual. We therefore hold that the executor, having power under the will to raise the money in such manner as seemed best to him, had authority to contract for the payment of attorney's fees if the note given had to be collected by suit. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

RAY v. ATLANTA TRUST & BANKING CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1900.)

EXECUTION—CLAIMS OF THIRD PERSON—DELAY—DAMAGES.

1. Where, upon the trial of a claim case, after evidence has been introduced, the claim is withdrawn, and the plaintiff in fi. fa. tenders an issue asking damages against the claimant for having made the claim for delay only, and this issue is tried, and a verdict given against the claimant for damages, the court cannot consider complaints, in the motion for a new trial of the damage case, of rulings made in the trial of the claim case. When the claim is withdrawn, and the new issue made up of whether the claim was interposed for delay only, the latter is separate and distinct from the former.

2. In the trial of this issue of whether the claim was made for delay only, it was not error to refuse to allow counsel for the claimant to testify as to what would have been the testimony of his client in the claim case if the court had allowed the case to be reopened and such evidence introduced.

3. In the trial of such issue, evidence that the claimant had in two other cases filed claims to different tracts of land, levied on by different parties, and had afterwards withdrawn those claims, is not admissible, although such tracts of land were embraced in the same deed under which she claimed in this case.

4. In the present case there was no evidence to authorize a charge that "if the claimant made this claim in the first instance in the honest belief that her title was good, and afterwards became convinced that it was not good and ought not to prevail, but did not withdraw her claim as soon as such discovery was made and the forms of law would admit, she would be liable for damages, just as though the claim was made for delay only in the first instance."

5. The plaintiff failed in the present case to show affirmatively that the claim was filed or prosecuted solely for the purpose of delay, and a verdict awarding damages was contrary to law.

HUDSPETH v. HALL et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 18, 1900.)

PUBLIC FERRY—FRANCHISE—EXCLUSIVE PRIVILEGES—PRIVATE FERRY—INJUNCTION.

1. The right to establish and maintain a public ferry is a franchise, which, in this state, can only be granted by the proper county authorities. Such a grant carries with it no exclusive privileges, but such authorities may, under the laws of this state, grant the right to establish over the same stream such additional public ferries as the public convenience demands; and, if the first grantee is injured by the establishment and maintenance of another public ferry, he has no right of action to recover damages therefor. It is damnum absque injuria.

2. To lawfully establish and maintain a private ferry, no franchise is required. Such a right is incident to the ownership of land on both sides of a stream of water, to enable the owner to better use and enjoy his land. While the owner of a private ferry may lawfully charge and collect toll from persons incidentally crossing thereat, he cannot maintain the ferry for use by the public at large. If he does this, or if he seeks public patronage, or pursues the business of keeping up the ferry for the public, it loses its character as a private ferry. (a) The injunction in this case was not sufficiently comprehensive to protect the rights of the plaintiff. The defendant should have been enjoined from establishing a ferry designed to accommodate the public or any part thereof.

Error from superior court, Baker county; A. H. Hansell, Judge.

Suit by S. A. Hudspeth against R. L. Hall and others. From a judgment granting an injunction, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed, with directions.

B. B. Bower and A. L. Hawes, for plaintiff in error. D. H. Pope & Son, for defendants in error.

LITTLE, J. Mrs. Hudspeth exhibited a petition against Baker county and the board of commissioners of roads and revenues of Baker county, joining with them certain private individuals, and alleged that she was the owner of a public ferry across the Flint river at the town of Newton, and that she and those under whom she claims have controlled and continuously operated said ferry, without interruption, for more than 70 years; that recently, on the petition of some of the defendants, the county commissioners of Baker county granted an order establishing a free ferry across Flint river within 200 yards of her ferry. She prayed for an injunction restraining the defendants from establishing or operating the ferry so authorized, or one at any other place on said river within 3 miles of the location of her ferry. On presentation of this petition a restraining order was issued, and pending a hearing for injunction the plaintiff amended her petition, and, by way of amendment, alleged that one R. L. Hall, since the filing of the petition, and not a party thereto, had begun and was operating in his own name a ferry, by means of a batteau, across said river, at the place where the county commissioners had authorized the establishment of the ferry which she sought to enjoin, and prayed that Hall should be made a party defendant to her petition as amended, and that he be enjoined and restrained in the same manner as the original defendants to the petition had been restrained, and that he be permanently enjoined from establishing and operating said ferry. At the hearing had on this amended petition, it was ordered that Hall be made a party defendant, and that he be restrained in the same manner and to the same extent as the original defendants had been restrained. By a subsequent amendment the plaintiff alleged that Hall did not intend to establish a private ferry, but that he was a merchant in the town of Newton, and, in collusion with other merchants of the same place, was seeking and intending to establish a public free ferry over the Flint river, near her own, although it was to be run ostensibly as a private ferry, by which, if he did so, plaintiff's franchise rights would be violated. She further alleged that Hall did not own the land on the east side of said river, where he proposes to put his ferry, and he therefore could not operate a private ferry, under the law, but that she owned the land on the Mitchell county side, where Hall intends to establish his ferry.

She also alleged that, even if Hall owned the land on both sides of the river, he had no legal right to establish a ferry within any distance of that of the plaintiff where it would hurt or injure her business in any way, because when she purchased the land she also purchased the exclusive ferry rights, franchises, and privileges, of which Hall had notice when he purchased. The defendants the board of county commissioners of Baker county answered the petition, and averred that, after having the legality of the contract they made passed on by counsel, they are advised that the same is not legal; that they accepted said advice, and on the 6th day of June, 1899, after the filing of the petition, rescinded their order previously granted to establish the ferry of which complaint is made. The other defendants, except R. L. Hall, in answering the petition admitted having joined in the petition for the establishment of a ferry by the county of Baker for the use of the public, but denied that they entered into any scheme to defraud the plaintiff of her ferry franchise, and they believed that the county authorities had a perfect right to establish such a ferry. They say that they have done no act towards the establishment or operation of a ferry at Newton, other than this, and that the county authorities have revoked the order establishing the ferry for which they petitioned. R. L. Hall answered that he had no connection with any of the schemes charged in the original petition. He denied that he had sought to deprive petitioner of the profits of her ferry, but said that he owns the land on both sides of the stream at the point named in the petition, and, being a merchant in the town of Newton, he did, before the original petition was filed, own and operate a boat, designated as a "batteau," across said stream for the benefit of his trade, and for the benefit and convenience of his customers, to whom he charged no toll, and that he had the legal right to operate said boat, and, being the owner of the land, he has the right to open and operate a free ferry across Flint river, under the laws of Georgia, or to charge toll for the same, and that the plaintiff has no exclusive right to operate a ferry; and he asked that the restraining order be dissolved, so that he could open and operate a free ferry or toll ferry across said river on his own land, just as he might desire, and as, under the law, he had a right to do. Further answering, he said that he is seeking bona fide and honestly to establish and operate a ferry at the place mentioned in the petition, for the accommodation of Mitchell county customers who come to the town of Newton to trade, and, if he is mistaken as to his ownership of the land on both sides of the stream, he will move down on his own land and establish a ferry, as it is not his intention to appropriate any of the land of the plaintiff for his purposes. He denied that the plaintiff purchased the exclusive ferry rights. On the hearing the judge denied the injunction as prayed, because, while the plaintiff had shown that she was the owner of an ancient ferry by prescription, that title by prescription did not carry with it any exclusive privileges; but inasmuch as it appeared that the plaintiff was the owner of four acres of land on which the approaches to the ferry were located, on each side of Flint river, he enjoined the defendant from entering on that land for ferriage purposes, either public or private, by batteaux or other boats. The plaintiff excepted to the refusal of the judge to sustain and recognize the plaintiff's exclusive ferry franchise, and to the refusal to grant an injunction prohibiting the defendant from establishing and erecting a private and free ferry at any point within three miles of the location of the ferry belonging to plaintiff, or within such close proximity thereto as to seriously and substantially interfere with the profits, value, and franchises of the same. By all of the answers to the original and amended petitions, all legal questions as to the right of the original defendants to establish a ferry are eliminated, and only the issues raised by the answer of the defendant R. L. Hall to the allegations of the original and amended petition are to be considered. Much evidence was introduced by both the plaintiff and the defendant. As, however, there seems to be no serious conflict between the parties, except as to the ownership of the land on both sides of the stream at the particular point where it was proposed to establish a ferry by the defendant, no reference is necessary to the evidence adduced, because, in our opinion, the application of certain legal propositions to the admitted facts will determine the rights of the respective parties to this controversy.

1. The claim by the plaintiff in error that she has an exclusive right to maintain her ferry at Newton, and that no ferry can be established within three miles up and down the stream from the location of her ferry, cannot be maintained. The right of a ferry is a franchise, and originally the power to grant it was in the legislature. The constitution of 1877, in paragraph 2, § 6, art. 6, declares that the courts of ordinary shall have such powers in relation to ferries as may be conferred on them by law; and by subsection 3 of section 4238 of the Civil Code the ordinary has been invested with original and exclusive jurisdiction in establishing, altering, or abolishing ferries in conformity to law. It must be understood that reference is had alone to public ferries. A consideration of the right to establish and maintain a private ferry will hereafter be had. It is not pretended that the plaintiff in error had a grant from the legislature or the county authorities to establish the public ferry which she maintained and operated at the town of Newton. It was very clearly shown, however, that she and those under whom she claims had maintained and operated a public ferry at the same place across Flint river for a period of time approximating 70 years, continuously and without interruption. In the case of Williams v. Turner, 7 Ga. 348, it was ruled that from 7 years' exclusive and continued possession and enjoyment of a ferry right in this state a grant will be presumed. So that, notwithstanding Mrs. Hudspeth had no direct grant of a franchise to operate a public ferry, a grant will be presumed because of her exclusive and continued possession and enjoyment of this ferry right, and, to all intents and purposes, her rights are to be fixed and determined under the same rules as if she had actually received a grant of such right; but a grant to establish and operate a public ferry does not carry with it any exclusive right. In the case of Shorter v. Smith, 9 Ga. 517, it was declared that the ancient doctrine of the common law that the franchise of ferry, although not declared to be exclusive, is necessarily implied in the grant, is inapplicable to both the local situation and political institutions of this country. Judge Lumpkin, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, said in relation to ferry rights, after referring to a declaration made by Chief Justice Taney, that a state ought never to be presumed to surrender its power, because the whole community have an interest in preserving it undiminished: "I may be allowed to add that the proposition which it establishes commands my entire assent and approbation, namely, that the grant of a public road, bridge, or ferry confers the right to construct the improvements only, and to receive certain rates of toll, but does not carry with it exclusive privileges, where none such are expressly given, and that by grants of this description the legislature or the inferior court, acting by their authority, are not deprived of the power of making other grants side by side with the former, and in the same line of travel, provided there be no express violation in the first grant." And in the case of Williams v. Turner, supra, it is the conclusion of Judge Nisbet, who delivered the opinion, that: "The legislature may grant as many ferry rights as it pleases. One grant to A. does not preclude another to B.; and, if A., being the first grantee, is injured by B.'s ferry, he has no right of action, for it is damnum absque injuria." As before observed, these principles of law apply alone to the establishment of public ferries. In the case last cited it was declared that if A. had a grant, and is injured by B.'s ferry erected on his own land without a grant, he is entitled to recover damages to the extent of his injury. We apprehend that the case of Dougherty Co. v. Tift, 75 Ga. 815, with the reasoning of which we do not entirely agree, was in some measure, at least, sought to be based on this latter proposition. But it is sufficient on this point to adopt the express adjudication of this court that the grant to establish a public ferry does not carry with it, under the law of this state, an exclusive right to a ferry franchise, and that, a ferry having been established for public convenience, it is entirely within the power, originally of the legislature, now of the county authorities, to authorize the establishment and maintenance of such other and additional public ferries on the same stream as may be considered necessary to subserve the public interests. In this connection, see, also, Wright v. Nagle, 48 Ga. 367. It is contended, however, that the provisions of section 613 of the Code, which declares that no private ferry charging toll shall be established on any water course within three miles of where public bridges are previously erected and kept up, applies in this case, and that under its terms no ferry can be established and maintained on the Flint river within three miles of the location of the ferry owned and operated by the plaintiff in error. This position is not tenable. This court, in the case of Greer v. Haugabook, 47 Ga. 285, in construing the act from which this section was codified, declared that it would be making, rather than expounding, law, to say that this provision of law referred to a public ferry, and that, if the legislature intended to include ferries in its provisions, it is only a fair presumption to suppose that they would have said so. So that this contention of the plaintiff in error must fail, and, as a matter of law, the plaintiff in error, by the grant (presumed) authorizing her to establish and maintain the public ferry, obtained no exclusive rights thereby, and it is perfectly competent for the county authorities to establish additional public ferries as the convenience of the public may demand.

2. Prior to the act of 1850 (Cobb, Dig. p. 958) the right to establish a private ferry was incident to the ownership of the land on both sides of the water desired to be crossed, but the owner of such private ferry was not entitled to charge and collect toll for crossing. By the act above referred to, which partly appears in section 616 of the Civil Code, any person who is the owner of land through which a stream passes may establish a ferry at his expense, and charge lawful toll for crossing. It will be observed that this act does not contemplate the establishment of a public ferry, but enlarged the rights of a landowner to establish a private ferry, by authorizing him to collect toll from persons crossing at his ferry. A difficulty arose in construing this act when considered with reference to other provisions of law, which were not repealed by its passage. On the one hand, the rights of the person having the franchise to operate a public ferry were to be protected. On the other, the convenience of individuals desiring to cross a stream in the immediate vicinity of the private ferry was to be considered. And this court, in the case of Greer v. Haugabook, supra, gave a meaning to the provisions found in this section which satisfactorily harmonizes the various provisions of law applicable to the subject.

In the opinion Judge McCay says that it was the duty of the court to reconcile the provision which declares that a public ferry is a franchise, and that the owner of the land does not have the right to establish a public ferry, and that which allows a landowner to establish and use a ferry and charge toll for crossing thereat. He says: "The solution which occurs to us is the distinction between a private and a public ferry. A man may have a flat on a stream, and may use it to carry over his own people, wagons, etc., and he may occasionally take over a neighbor, and take pay for it; yet it is not necessarily a public ferry, because he does not make it a constant, regular business. There is the same distinction between a carrier and a common carrier; between one who may on occasions hire out his horse, and a liveryman, or one who may at times take pay for a meal or bed from a traveler, and an innkeeper. Perhaps this, then, is the true meaning of these statutes, taken together. A public ferry is open to all. Regular fare is established. The ferryman is a common carrier. He is bound to take over all who come, and he is bound to keep up and in good order his ferry, and he is held to strict liability. Such a right exists, not as appurtenant to his land, but is a franchise which needs the grant of the proper public authority. A private ferry is mainly for the use of the owner, and, though he may take pay for ferriage, he does not follow it as a business. His ferry is not open to the public at its demand. He may or may not keep it going," etc. In a further reference to this act of 1850, this court, in the case of Whelchel v. State, 76 Ga. 650, said: "The act of 1850, codified in section 684 [now section 616], grants authority to the owner of any land through which a stream may pass, on both sides thereof, to establish a ferry or bridge and charge toll. But the act should be construed strictly, and cannot be extended to embrace any man who buys the right to land [to construct] a bridge or abut it on both sides of the river. It is a mere privilege given the owner to pass from one side of the river to the other on his own farm by a private ferry or bridge, and, as incidental thereto, to pass others across the stream upon the payment of toll." It thus appears that the right of establishing a private ferry, under the Code, is incident to the ownership of lands on both sides of the stream, and that the prime object in the establishment of a private ferry is to subserve the convenience of the owner of such lands; and, while the owner may lawfully charge toll for persons crossing thereat, it must follow, in order to give effect to the intention of the legislature, that the number and frequency of such crossings may serve to devest such ferry of its private character, and thus render its use unlawful, unless the owner receives from the authorities a grant to operate it as a public ferry. It cannot be held that one may lawfully establish a private ferry and seek the business of the public. The provision of law which allows the establishment of a private ferry will not be enlarged by construction so as to authorize the owner to enter into the business of carrying the public, or any considerable portion thereof, across the stream on which it is located. Its operation must be confined to the legitimate purposes for which it was authorized to exist, and when crossings are made by the public as a rule, and not as the exception, the ferry ceases to be a private one, under the statute, and cannot lawfully be operated without a grant from the public. It very plainly appears that the defendant Hall had no grant to operate a public ferry. It further appears by his answer that, notwithstanding this want of authority, he claims the right to establish and operate such a ferry; and, if this was not conceded, he further claimed the right to establish a private ferry for the express purpose of having a considerable part of the public to cross at such ferry. He had no right to establish a public ferry, nor a private one for the use of the public; and, while the judge restrained him from operating a public or private ferry at a particularly indicated place, the injunction should have gone further, and restrained the defendant not only from establishing and maintaining a public ferry, but also from establishing and maintaining a private ferry for the use of the public. The judgment is therefore affirmed, with directions. All the justices concurring.

FERST et al. v. BANK OF WAYCROSS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1900.)

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—PROMISE TO PAY DEBT OF ANOTHER.

If a debtor apply to his creditor for further credit for goods to be used in connection with his business, which the creditor refuses; and a third person, pecuniarily interested in the success of the debtor's business, agree to assume the debt if the creditor will extend further credit; and the creditor discharge the debtor from the debt, look to the third person for payment thereof, and extend to the original debtor further credit,—the promise by the third person to pay the original debt is not collateral, but an original undertaking, and need not be in writing.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Ware county; J. W. Bennet, Judge.

Action by M. Ferst's Sons & Co. against the Bank of Waycross. A demurrer to plaintiffs' petition was sustained, and they bring error. Reversed.

Toomer & Reynolds, for plaintiffs in error. Leon A. Wilson, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. In the petition of the plaintiffs, M. Ferst's Sons & Co., against the Bank of Waycross, substantially the following facts are alleged: In November, 1896, Lee was indebted to plaintiffs in the amount of $618.09. He was carrying on a railroad wood and cross-tie business, and applied to them for a further line of credit, which they refused. Lee was indebted to the Bank of Waycross in a large amount, and the bank was interested pecuniarily in Lee's business, for the reason that Lee had agreed to deposit his gross receipts with the bank in payment of his debt to it; the bank allowing Lee to draw from it only the amount actually expended in the conduct of his business, thereby retaining the balance as a credit on Lee's debt to it. The credit applied for by Lee was for goods and merchandise to be used in his business. When the plaintiffs refused to extend further credit to Lee, the bank, in order that Lee might carry on his business, agreed that, if the plaintiffs would extend further credit to Lee, it would pay them the debt owed them by Lee; the agreement being that Lee should draw his draft on the bank in favor of the plaintiffs, and that the bank should accept this draft. In accordance with this agreement, plaintiffs extended further credit to Lee, and sold him on credit goods to a large amount. They released Lee from his obligation, and looked solely to the bank for payment. Lee drew a draft on the bank in their favor for the amount of his original debt, and the bank refused to accept it. Since that time, Lee died, insolvent. This petition was demurred to upon several grounds,—principally upon the ground that the agreement relied upon was within the statute of frauds, and was void because not in writing. The demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiffs excepted.

We think that, under the facts above stated, the promise of the bank to pay to the plaintiffs the debt of Lee was an original, and not a collateral, undertaking. Lee had applied for additional credit, and it had been refused upon the ground that he had not paid the old account. Upon the success of his business depended the payment of the large debt he owed the bank. Unless he could get supplies to run his business, he would necessarily fail, and the bank lose its debt. In order to enable Lee to carry on his business, the proceeds of which were to go to the bank, the bank undertook to pay the antecedent debt if the plaintiffs would extend further credit to Lee. The plaintiffs agreed, and extended Lee further credit to the amount of several hundred dollars. They discharged Lee from the debt, and looked solely to the bank. Here, then, was a consideration moving to the bank, not for the benefit of Lee, but for its own benefit, enabling Lee to continue his business, and the bank to receive the proceeds of that business. There was, also, hurt or damage to the plaintiffs; for they relied upon the promise of the bank, extended further credit, and thus lost the amount for which Lee was credited. The consideration for the bank's promise was beneficial to the bank, and hurtful to the plaintiffs. In the leading case of Leonard v. Vredenburgh, 8 Johns. 29, Chief Justice Kent, after defining two classes of cases within the statute of frauds, said (page 39): "A third class of cases, and to which I have already alluded, is when the promise to pay the debt of another arises out of some new and original consideration of benefit or harm moving between the newly-contracting parties." This class, he said, is not within the statute of frauds. This case has been followed by a majority of the courts of this country, and the principle seems now to be well established. In the present case the promise made by the bank was not for the benefit of Lee, the debtor. According to the allegations of the petition, the bank made the agreement for its own benefit. In discussing this subject, the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Emerson v. Slater, 22 How. 28, 16 L. Ed. 360, said: "Whenever the main purpose and object of the promisor is not to answer for another, but to subserve some pecuniary or business purpose of his own, involving either a benefit to himself or damage to the other contracting party, his promise is not within the statute, although it may be in form a promise to pay the debt of another, and although the performance of it may incidentally have the effect of extinguishing that liability." In the case of Hopkinson v. Davis, 5 Phila. 147, Hare, J., said: "The weight of authority would seem to be that when a promise to be answerable for the debt of another is based not only upon a new consideration, but upon a consideration which moves to and benefits the promisor, by inducing delay in the institution of proceedings that might otherwise * * * break up a business in which he is interested, the obligation is in fact his own debt, notwithstanding its form, and consequently not within the statute of frauds." See, also, Reed, St. Frauds, § 69 et seq., and the able and learned opinion of Savage, C. J., in Farley v. Cleveland, 4 Cow. 432, where he reviewed many cases, and came to the conclusion that in all cases "founded upon a new and original consideration of benefit to the defendant, or harm to the plaintiff, moving to the party making the promise, either from the plaintiff or the original debtor, the subsisting liability of the original debtor is no objection to the recovery." In the case of Sext v. Geise, 80 Ga. 698, 6 S. E. 174, this court held, "If, while a house is building, the supply of lumber is about to stop because the contractor is not considered safe, and the owner of the building procures its continuance by promising to pay the bill, his undertaking is not collateral, but original."

Counsel for the defendant in error claimed that Lee does not appear to have been a party to this transaction, or to have agreed to it. We think there is enough in the petition to show that Lee was a party to the agreement. It is alleged that Lee applied for additional credit, that it was refused, and that "then and there" the bank, through its proper officer, made the promise to pay Lee's debt, agreeing to do so by accepting his draft upon it. It is also alleged that Lee did draw the draft, but that the bank refused to accept it. The drawing of the draft showed that Lee understood the contract, and was a performance of his part of it. It appears that on the same day, or shortly thereafter, he bought goods from the plaintiff and obtained credit by virtue of the contract with the bank. While nearly all the cases we have read hold that if the debtor is released the promise is a new and original one, and binding on the promisor, though not in writing, yet there are many cases holding that an oral promise may be binding even where the original debtor is not released. In the case of Green v. Collins, 36 Ga. 581, it was held, in substance, that where, in consideration of the agreement of the guarantor or promisor, the creditor loses the means of enforcing his claim against the original debtor, it is not usually material whether the original debtor remains liable or not. However this may be, we think that the petition in the present case sufficiently shows that Lee agreed to the arrangement by which the bank was to assume his debt, even if it were granted that his drawing the draft was not a ratification. In the case of Brown v. Harris, 20 Ga. 403, Benning, J., said (page 406): "In our opinion, 'a mere substitution by plaintiff of Rogers & Meara as debtor in the place of Brown & Harris' would, of itself, have abrogated the debt as to Brown & Harris. That, as we conceive, would be the necessary effect of such a substitution." It would seem from this that if the contract was as set out in the petition now under consideration, and the bank was to be substituted for Lee as debtor, this would of itself be a discharge of Lee from liability, whether such discharge were expressly mentioned or not. The allegations would seem to show that Lee was present, in which event there can be no doubt in regard to the matter. See, also, Anderson v. Whitehead, 55 Ga. 277; Goolsby v. Bush, 53 Ga. 353; Davis v. Tift, 70 Ga. 52.

It was also insisted in the argument here that such a promise by the bank was ultra vires and not binding. That question is, in our opinion, a matter for plea, and not for demurrer. As the case comes here on demurrer, we cannot say whether the act was ultra vires or not. The charter of the bank is not before us, and we do not know what powers are by it given to the bank or to the bank's president. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

McIVER v. FLORIDA CENT. & P. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 31, 1900.)

DISMISSAL OF ACTION—SECOND SUIT—EJECTION FROM RAILROAD TRAIN.

1. Though the plaintiff in a suit which had been properly removed from a state to a federal court having concurrent jurisdiction of the cause of action on which the suit was founded was nonsuited, or voluntarily dismissed his case in the United States court, it was, nevertheless, his right to bring another suit on the same cause of action in the state court at any time within the statute of limitations applicable to such an action. The above is true, notwithstanding in the second suit the damages were laid in an amount which would prevent another removal to the federal court.

2. The petition set forth a cause of action as against the demurrer filed to the same.

3. When a suit is commenced in a state court and removed to a federal court under the law of congress, not only the case, but the cause of action, is removed; and, after dismissal or nonsuit in the federal court, it cannot be renewed in the state court for the same cause of action, though the damages are laid in an amount of which the federal court has no jurisdiction. Per Simmons, C. J., and Little, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Brunswick; S. C. Atkinson, Judge.

Action by Priscilla McIver against the Florida Central & Peninsular Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Garrard, Meldrim & Newman and D. W. Krauss, for plaintiff in error. Crovatt & Whitfield, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Priscilla McIver brought an action against the Florida Central & Peninsular Railroad Company, alleging in her petition, which was filed on January 17, 1899, in substance as follows: The defendant, a railroad corporation, damaged her in the sum of $1,999, in that on July 17, 1897, her minor son, with a companion, had, with the consent of a negro train hand, boarded a freight train of defendant to go from one station on the road of defendant to another. They paid to a train hand the sum of 90 cents as fare, the latter agreeing to see the conductor in reference to the matter. Her son and his companion first went into a box car, and afterwards left the same and got on a flat car. While on the latter car, and the train was in rapid motion, a white man, having on the uniform usually worn by the employés of the company, "who petitioner believes and charges was the conductor in charge of the train, together with two negro train hands, one of whom was the party to whom" the 90 cents had been paid, came upon the flat car and demanded to know where they were going, to which a reply was made that they had paid their fare to one of the train hands present. One of the train hands asked if they had any money, to which a reply was made that they had, whereupon he demanded the same, and upon the refusal of the companion of petitioner's son to deliver the money the train hand attempted to take the same, and "did then and there brutally, cruelly, and inhumanly assault and beat your petitioner's said son, and did then and there force and hurl him from said rapidly moving car and train, thereby instantly causing his death." The injuries resulting in the death of her son were inflicted by the "defendant, its agents, servants, and employés." At the time of the death of her son he was 17 years of age, and had been earning $1 per day. He was unmarried, left no wife and child, and petitioner was dependent upon him, and he contributed to her support. One of the paragraphs of the petition was as follows: "Your petitioner further shows that at the May term, 1898, of the city court of Brunswick, in and for said county, she instituted her suit against the said defendant company for the homicide of her said son, which suit was subsequently removed to the United States circuit court for the Eastern division of the Southern district of Georgia, when, on the 16th day of January, 1899, and during the November term, 1898, of the said circuit court, after the evidence for the plaintiff in said case had been concluded, upon her motion the said case of your petitioner was discontinued and dismissed from said court; and the plaintiff now, within less than two years from the accruing of said cause of action, comes and reinstitutes her said case against said defendant in conformity with law." To the petition the defendant filed a demurrer, which was, in substance, as follows: (1) The injuries alleged do not appear to have been caused by defendant, or any one acting with its permission, or under its command, or in its behalf, within the scope of the duty imposed upon such person. (2) It does not appear that the relation of passenger and carrier existed between plaintiff's son and defendant. (3) It appears that plaintiff's son was engaged with his companion in an undertaking to violate the rules of the defendant and defraud it of its revenue. (4) It appears that the train was a freight train, and not a passenger train, and it is not alleged that such train was accustomed or authorized to carry passengers. (5) It appearing that another suit on the same cause of action had been brought in the city court of Brunswick, in which the damages were laid at $10,000, and removed to the United States court, and there discontinued and dismissed, the city court of Brunswick has no jurisdiction to entertain the present suit, and the laying of damages in this suit at $1,999 is an attempt to deprive the United States court of a case solely within its jurisdiction by virtue of the removal referred to. The demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiff excepted.

1. The last ground of the demurrer will be first dealt with. When one brings an action in a court having jurisdiction to determine the same, and is nonsuited or voluntarily dismisses the case, such nonsuit or dismissal does not determine in any way the merits of the controversy; and as a general rule the plaintiff may, if not barred by the statute of limitations, institute a similar suit in the same court, or in any other court having jurisdiction of the action, or he may adopt a different remedy appropriate to the cause of action, and enforce it in the court in which the first suit was brought, or in any other court having jurisdiction to enforce the same. In the language of one writer, a nonsuit "is but like the blowing out of a candle, which a man at his own pleasure may light again." 1 Freem. Judgm. § 261, citing March, Arbitraments, 215. See, also, 3 Bl. Comm. 296; Bucher v. Railroad Co., 125 U. S. 555, 8 Sup. Ct. 974, 31 L. Ed. 795; Homer v. Brown, 16 How. 354, 365, 14 L. Ed. 970; Smith v. Floyd Co., 85 Ga. 420, 11 S. E. 850; Phipps v. Alford, 95 Ga. 215, 22 S. E. 152; Civ. Code, § 5043. The question raised by the ground of the demurrer now under consideration is whether the removal of a case to a federal court from a state court which has concurrent jurisdiction of the same, and the entering of a judgment of nonsuit or the allowance of a voluntary dismissal in the former court, prevents the bringing of another suit on the same cause of action in the state court, when at the date the latter suit is filed the cause of action is not barred by the statute of limitations. An action brought in a court of this state, and there nonsuited or voluntarily dismissed or discontinued by the plaintiff, may be renewed in any court having jurisdiction of the cause of action, upon payment of costs. Id. If the cause of action was not barred by the statute of limitations when the suit was originally brought, the action may be recommenced at any time within six months after the dismissal or nonsuit, notwithstanding it may have become barred while the first suit is pending. Id. § 3786. The city court of Brunswick and the federal court had concurrent jurisdiction of the cause of action on which the first suit was founded, the damages being laid at $10,000. The suit was originally brought in the former, and regularly and lawfully removed to the latter, court, and there voluntarily dismissed by the plaintiff. The plaintiff then sought to bring another suit, in which the damages were laid at $1,999, on the same cause of action, in the city court. If the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations at the time such new suit was filed, then the case would have been properly dismissed, as it has been held by this court that when a case has been removed to the federal court, although there may be no adjudication in the federal court on the cause of action, if the same becomes barred while the case is pending in the latter court the action cannot be renewed in the state court within six months, under the provisions of the section above quoted. Cox v. Railroad Co., 68 Ga. 446. The same is true where the suit was originally brought in the federal court. Publishing Co. v. De Laughter, 95 Ga. 17, 21 S. E. 1000. There is certainly nothing in either of the cases just cited to call for a ruling that no action could ever be brought in the state court merely because of the removal of the former suit to the federal court, if the cause of action is not barred by the statute of limitations. The only point necessary to be decided in the Cox Case was, whether the law contained in the section of the Code above cited had any application to a case removed to the federal court. In that case the suit had been brought in a state court, and had been properly removed to the federal court, and while there a period of time had elapsed which would have the effect of barring the plaintiff from bringing another suit based on the same cause of action. It was held that the case could not be recommenced in the state court, as the six-months statute above referred to did not prevent the bar of the statute of limitations from attaching to a cause of action removed to the federal court. There is some language, both in the headnote and in the opinion, which would seem to indicate that the case could not have been recommenced in the state court, notwithstanding it was not barred by the statute of limitations; but such language went further than the facts of the case justified, and what is thus said is not binding as authority. The last sentence of the first headnote, that "section 2932 of the Code (Civ. Code, § 3786) does not apply to such a case," is significant, as indicating the real question involved in that case. Moreover, the court passed upon the merits of the case, and held that the plaintiff failed to make out his case. The case might well, therefore, have been put upon that ground.

The case of Kern v. Huidekoper, 103 U. S. 485, 26 L. Ed. 354, cited in the opinion in the Cox Case, does not decide the question presented by the present record. All there ruled (and there are a number of other rulings of that court to the same effect) is that, when a case has been removed from a state court to a federal court, any action taken by the state court while the case is pending in the federal court is coram non judice and void. We do not for a moment question the correctness of these decisions. When a case has been removed from a state court to the federal court, the latter court certainly has complete and exclusive jurisdiction of that particular case. The state court is ousted of all jurisdiction over the action, and any action taken by it after such removal would, of course, be void. If the supreme court of the United States has ever ruled that a case which has been nonsuited or disposed of in the federal court without a decision upon the merits cannot be recommenced in a state court of concurrent jurisdiction, if permitted by the statutes of the state, we have, after a most diligent search, been unable to find it. The supreme court of Ohio, in the case of Railroad Co. v. Fulton, 58 N. E. 265, 44 L. R. A. 520, which is cited on the brief of counsel for defendant in error, has made a direct ruling upon the question now under consideration. That case is, so far as we can ascertain, sui generis. The case of Cox v. Railroad Co., 68 Ga. 446, is cited to sustain the view therein expressed, but we think the Ohio court has entirely misapprehended the ruling in that case. A writer in the law magazine, Case and Comment, of July, 1899, has this to say in reference to the Ohio case and the Cox Case: "The right to bring a new action in a state court after dismissal of a prior action on the same demand by a federal court into which the cause had been taken by removal is denied by the Ohio supreme court in the case of Railroad Co. v. Fulton, 53 N. E. 265, 44 L. R. A. 520. This court declares that the jurisdiction of the federal court in case of removal extends to 'any suit thereafter brought on the identical cause of action after the former suit has been dismissed by it until the cause of action has been extinguished by a judgment on the merits.' The case of Cox v. Railroad Co., 68 Ga. 446, is cited as a precedent, but that was a materially different case, in which the decision was that after nonsuit in a federal court a renewal of the action in the state court was not a part of the original case, or 'on the same footing with it' with respect to the statute of limitations. The possibility that a plaintiff might improperly permit the dismissal of a cause after removal, for the purpose of beginning again in the state court, and thus compel the defendant to remove the cause again or else submit to the state court, is one ground of the Ohio decision. But the unnecessary trouble caused to a defendant by dismissing an action and suing anew is not confined to cases that have been removed from a state court. It does not in other cases prevent the plaintiff from commencing a new action after dismissing the former one, and the difference in respect to actions removed into a federal court is only in degree. The distinction between reinstatement of an action and the bringing of a new action does not seem to have been much considered in this case. Because a case can be reinstated only by the court that dismissed it, it is said that, 'by parity of reasoning,' a state court cannot pass on the right of the plaintiff to recommence an action after it has been dismissed by a federal court. But commencement of a new action, although for the same cause, is not a reinstatement, but a distinct and independent case. Exclusive jurisdiction of an action is a very different thing from exclusive jurisdiction of all possible actions for the same cause. An election to bring an action in one of two courts of concurrent jurisdiction is not usually irrevocable. After dismissal of the first one, the plaintiff has the same choice between the courts that he had originally. There seems to be no reason why this should not apply where the concurrent jurisdiction is in state and federal courts. If bringing an action originally in the federal court does not give it such exclusive jurisdiction of the entire cause of action as to prevent bringing any action therefor in a state court after the federal suit is dismissed, why should this be the result of removing a suit from a state court into a federal court? In either case it is difficult to see why, after an action has been dismissed without prejudice to the right to bring a new action, the plaintiff has not the same election that he had in the beginning with respect to jurisdiction." The writer of the above-quoted article thoroughly apprehends the true relation of the Cox Case to the question now under discussion, and his reasoning not only demonstrates the correctness of the conclusion reached by us, but also that there is nothing in the Cox Case really in conflict with the present ruling, and that the Ohio case is not based upon sound reasoning. There being no authority which would bind this court on the question under consideration, the case should rest solely upon principle. If an action had been brought in one of the courts of this state, and there nonsuited, or voluntarily dismissed or discontinued by the plaintiff, no one would contend that it might not be recommenced within due time in the same court, or in another court of this state having concurrent jurisdiction of the action. If a suit has been begun in the federal court, and there nonsuited or discontinued, another suit on the same cause of action could certainly be brought in a state court having jurisdiction of such an action. The superior and city courts of this state are courts of concurrent jurisdiction with the circuit court of the United States of the district embracing the county where such superior or city courts are located, as to certain cases; and there is no good reason why the rule applicable to state courts should not apply, merely because one is a state and the other a federal court. The act of congress provides that certain cases may be removed from the state court to the federal court, but this does not mean that the cause of action is removed. The act refers in terms to suit, and not cause of action. Until the state court is absolutely deprived of jurisdiction of a particular cause of action, it may take jurisdiction of and pass upon the same, with the exceptions above noted,—that when the federal court has taken jurisdiction the state court cannot take any action in connection with the same so long as the cause is pending in the federal court. But when that court denies to the plaintiff a hearing, or fails for any reason to pass upon the sufficiency of his cause of action, he may bring the same again in the state court, and invoke an adjudication of that court. And the fact that the new suit is for an amount which will prevent another removal to the federal court will not invalidate the suit. If the plaintiff in the new suit voluntarily abandon a portion of his claim for damages, it does not seem that the defendant should complain. The policy of the laws of the United States is to compel persons having claims of small amounts to litigate in the state courts, and voluntarily giving up a portion of his claim for damages, and being content to accept a sum less than the federal court would entertain jurisdiction of, would not seem to be contrary to the laws of the United States and its established public policy in reference to the jurisdiction of its courts. The court had jurisdiction of the cause, and the ground of the demurrer raising objection to the jurisdiction was not well taken. See, in this connection, Willson v. Milliken (Ky.) 42 L. R. A., and notes on page 459 (s. c. 44 S. W. 660).

2. The petition set forth a cause of action as against the demurrer filed to the same. The petition, in effect, alleged that one of the train hands, in the presence of the conductor, and impliedly with his consent, attempted to commit a robbery upon the companion of plaintiff's son, and while so engaged did hurl plaintiff's son from a rapidly moving train, from which he received injuries causing his death. Under such circumstances, the defendant would be liable, whether the plaintiff's son was upon the train lawfully or unlawfully, and without regard to what was the character of the train. See Higgins v. Railway Co., 98 Ga. 751, 25 S. E. 837; Smith v. Railway Co., 100 Ga. 96, 27 S. E. 725; Railway Co. v. Godkin, 104 Ga. 655, 30 S. E. 378, and cases cited. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., and LITTLE, J., who dissent.

LITTLE, J. I cannot concur in the ruling made in this case by a majority of the court. In my opinion, when a suit is commenced in a state court, and removed to the federal court under the law of congress, not only the actual case pending, but the cause of action upon which it is founded, is also removed, and, after dismissal or nonsuit in the federal court, another suit on the same cause of action cannot be entertained by the state court, although in the second action the damages are laid in an amount less than the limit fixed by the act of congress to entitle a defendant to a removal when there is diverse citizenship. As was said by Mr. Justice McLean in the case of Gordon v. Longest, 16 Pet. 97, 10 L. Ed. 900, "One great object in the establishment of the courts of the United States, and regulating their jurisdiction, was to have a tribunal in each state presumed to be free from local influence;" and it was doubtless the purpose of congress, in providing for the removal by a nonresident defendant of a case brought against him in a state court, to protect such nonresident, in the trial of his case, from the local influence which might exist in favor of the resident plaintiff in the state court. This purpose would be entirely defeated, if, after a plaintiff has instituted an action to recover damages for an injury which she claims to have sustained by reason of the wrongful act of the nonresident defendant, as in this case, and has named a particular amount as the proper measure of her damage, and, exercising the right conferred by the congress, the defendant by lawful proceedings stays the jurisdiction of the state court, and brings the action before the federal court for determination, and when that case has been dismissed in the federal court, the plaintiff may again bring and maintain her action against the same defendant for the same causes for which she first complained in the state court, by arbitrarily fixing her damages in the second suit at a less amount, so as to place the last case brought out of the jurisdiction of the federal court. The amount involved in the controversy is, under the act of congress, an incident. Congress had for its object in providing for the removal of causes the better protection of aliens and nonresidents. The state court would be no less competent to deal with a cause involving $2,100 than it would be to deal with a cause involving $1,900. While the right of removal exists only in a case where the sum involved is not less than that named in the statute, yet the consideration which moved the minds of the lawmakers to authorize the removal rested in the purpose to provide a trial free from local influence which was thought might be prejudicial to the defendant's cause, and not on the particular amount involved, except in so far as the importance of the case to the defendant was concerned. In other words, the prerequisite to removal, that a case should involve not less than $2,000, was required because of the intention to limit such removal to cases which were deemed particularly important on account of the amount involved. As to those cases not deemed particularly important, the right of removal on account of diverse citizenship was not granted. Hence, in our opinion, the amount involved in a suit is to be considered only with reference to the question whether it may be removed. If it has once been removed, that cause, that controversy, stays removed. When it is taken out of the jurisdiction of the state court, that same cause between the parties cannot again be assumed by it, not because of the amount involved, but because, being a case which was authorized by law to be removed as originally brought, the removal has the effect of vesting jurisdiction of that cause, in all its phases, in the federal court, which can alone finally adjudicate the controversy existing between the parties on the issues made by the pleadings. In Kern v. Huidekoper, 103 U. S. 485, 26 L. Ed. 354, it was said, "The suit and the subject-matter of the suit are both transferred to the federal court by the same act of removal," etc. In my opinion, the right of a plaintiff, after the removal of a case has been legally effected, to renew the action in the state court after a dismissal in the federal court, is not an open question in this state. It was ruled by this court in the case of Cox v. Railroad Co., 68 Ga. 446, that, when a case has been removed from a state court to the circuit court of the United States, the jurisdiction of the former ceases, and after nonsuit in the federal court the case cannot be renewed in the state court within six months, so as to avoid the statute of limitations. By a provision of our state law, a case which has been dismissed may within six months be renewed, and the statute of limitations can only be made to apply to time and the date at which the first suit was begun, in determining the question whether the last suit is barred by the lapse of time. The plaintiff in the Cox Case, supra, sought to make this rule apply to the renewal of his case in the state court from which it had been originally removed to the federal court, and he was there nonsuited. In delivering the opinion of the court, Chief Justice Jackson said that: "The act of removal ipso facto transfers the jurisdiction of the cause to the circuit court of the United States, and devests that of the state court. * * * Therefore, when it appeared that the plaintiff himself proved, in order to take his case without the statute of limitations, that it had been removed and adjudicated by the United States court, he removed himself out of court, and was properly nonsuited." It is said in the opinion of the majority that the exact question under discussion was not involved, and that the language used by the chief justice was obiter dicta. On the contrary, I conceive the case affords a direct ruling on the question involved. The point in question has also been expressly decided by the supreme court of Ohio in the case of Railroad Co. v. Fulton, reported in 53 N. E. 265, 44 L. R. A. 520. That court ruled the question in the following language: "Where a case that may be is duly removed from a state to a federal court, the jurisdiction of the state court over the cause at once ceases, and it can take no further step therein; and, if thereafter the case is disposed of in the federal court otherwise than on the merits, the plaintiff cannot recommence the action in the state court, although under like circumstances he might have done so had the cause not been removed." The reasoning of the court seems to me not only to be sound, but conclusive. It is based on the proposition that the federal court, having acquired jurisdiction of the action by its removal from the state court, must, on principle and the reason of the statute, retain it for all purposes,—for the purpose of determining whether it should be reinstated, or recommenced after it had been dismissed or stricken from its docket, as well as for its determination on the merits. It was also stated in the opinion rendered in the case that the jurisdiction of the federal court "in such case does not merely embrace the suit brought and removed, but any suit thereafter brought on the identical cause of action after a former suit has been dismissed by it, until the cause of action has been extinguished by a judgment on the merits." The Chief Justice agrees with the views above expressed, and we both think that the judgment of the court below should have been affirmed.

BELL v. SAPPINGTON et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1900.)

CONTRACT—CONSIDERATION—STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

1. A contract made by a parent with her daughter and the latter's intended husband, to the effect that if the contemplated marriage is solemnized, and the husband will expend the necessary amount of money in building a dwelling house upon a vacant lot belonging to the mother, she will convey the lot to the daughter, is supported by a sufficient consideration.

2. When such a contract, though resting entirely in parol, has been performed by the solemnization of the marriage and the improving of the lot at the son-in-law's expense, as agreed, it is taken out of the operation of the statute of frauds.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Action by T. H. Sappington and S. K. Sappington against Lucy M. Bell. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

P. F. Smith and R. R. Shropshire, for plaintiff in error. Abbott, Cox & Abbott, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. The material averments of the petition in the present case are as follows: The petitioners are T. H. Sappington and Mrs. S. K. Sappington, and the defendant is Mrs. Lucy M. Bell, the mother of Mrs. S. K. Sappington. Petitioners are husband and wife, having intermarried in February, 1898. In contemplation and consideration of such marriage, petitioners and the defendant entered into a tripartite contract, by which it was agreed among them that the marriage should be solemnized, and that T. H. Sappington should furnish material necessary to build a dwelling house upon a one-acre lot belonging to the defendant, and that the defendant after the house was built would make to Mrs. S. K. Sappington a deed in fee simple to the lot. It was understood between the parties that the money expended by T. H. Sappington for the material to be used in erecting the house was "in equity to be considered as paid and furnished" in behalf of his wife. Petitioners fully and in all respects performed and carried out their part of the contract, T. H. Sappington buying and furnishing the material necessary to build the house. During the time the house was being built petitioners gave their time and attention to the building of the same. On November 24, 1898, defendant asked petitioner T. H. Sappington to have a deed to the lot in question prepared for her to make and deliver in accordance with her contract. This deed was prepared and submitted to the defendant, and she recognized and stated that it properly described the lot in controversy, and promised that she would sign and deliver it at once. Shortly after the house was built the petitioner Mrs. S. K. Sappington moved into the same without any objection being made by the defendant, who also moved into the house, and remained there until May, 1899. At that time she removed, and left petitioners in exclusive possession, T. H. Sappington having moved into the house, and they have remained in possession until the present time, and have given time, care, and labor to the preservation, protection, and taking care of the premises, treating it as the property of Mrs. S. K. Sappington, and paying the taxes thereon. Shortly after she left the premises the defendant placed the property in the hands of real-estate agents for sale, and has attempted to sell the property, defendant claiming that petitioners are tenants at sufferance of hers. Petitioners have requested defendant to at least pay back the money expended in building the house, and for taxes on the same; but she has refused either to do this, or to make the deed as she agreed to do. Petitioners pray—First, that defendant be decreed to make and deliver to Mrs. S. K. Sappington a fee-simple deed to the premises in dispute; second, that, if for any reason this cannot be done, the defendant be decreed to pay to Mrs. Sappington the sum expended in building the house, besides interest, and the amount expended by petitioners as taxes on the property, this amount to be reduced by the value of the premises for rent during the time petitioners have been in possession; third, that until the hearing an injunction be granted restraining defendant from alienating, incumbering, or "in any wise putting a cloud upon the title" of the property, or changing the status thereof in any way. The defendant demurred to the petition on various grounds, among them being that there was no equity in the petition; that the contract sought to be enforced was not in writing, as required by the statute of frauds; that there was no consideration for the promise of defendant flowing from S. K. Sappington; that, the only possible consideration being the contemplated marriage, the subsequent marriage was not such part performance as took the case out of the statute of frauds. The court overruled the demurrers, and granted the injunction as prayed, and to each of these judgments exception was taken by the defendant.

We do not think there was any error in overruling the demurrers to the petition. There was equity in the petition, and the same does not seem to be subject to any of the objections set up in the special demurrers. In dealing with the case, however, we will refer only to such questions as were insisted on in the argument. It was contended that the petition was defective, because there was no distinct allegation that the contract was made with any particular person. It was distinctly alleged that the petitioners and the defendant entered into an agreement whereby, upon the performance by T. H. Sappington of the undertaking therein provided for, the defendant was to make and deliver to Mrs. Sap-pington a deed to the lot in question. These allegations, fairly interpreted, mean nothing less than that there was an agreement between Mrs. Bell and her daughter that the latter should be entitled to a conveyance of the property upon the performance by the husband of certain acts. Mrs. Sappington was the real party to the agreement, and the one to be benefited by its being carried into effect, and her husband, although he was not to receive any direct benefit from the agreement, was the person from whom the consideration was to move. If there is a valid consideration for the promise, it matters not from whom it moved. The promisee may sustain his action, though a stranger to the consideration. Civ. Code, § 3664.

Treating the petition as one setting up an agreement between Mrs. Bell and her daughter, did it set forth a cause of action as against the objections that the agreement relied on was within the statute of frauds, and that there was no consideration moving to Mrs. Bell to support the alleged promise made by her? Performance of a parol contract for the sale of land will be decreed if it be so far executed by the party seeking the relief, and at the instance or by the inducements of the other party, that if the contract be abandoned he cannot be restored to his former position. Id. § 4037. As a general rule, equity will not decree the specific performance of a voluntary agreement or a mere gratuitous promise. To this general rule there is, however, an exception. If possession of land has been given under such an agreement, upon a meritorious consideration, and valuable improvements have been made upon the faith of the agreement, a court of equity will decree a specific performance of the agreement. Id. § 4039. In the case of Mims v. Lockett, 33 Ga. 9, 20, Judge Lyon says: "It has been settled that when a parol agreement is clearly proved, in consequence of which one of the parties has taken possession and made valuable improvements, such agreement shall be carried into effect. We see no material difference between a sale and a gift, because it certainly would be fraudulent in a parent to make a gift which he knew to be void, and then entice his child into a great expenditure of labor, of which he meant to reap the benefit himself." In that case there was a parol agreement between a father and his son-in-law that the former would give to the latter certain land upon his moving upon the same, and upon the faith of this parol promise he did move upon the land, cleared the same, and made valuable improvements. It was held that the gift was good, and would be enforced in equity; that the taking possession and making valuable improvements was such a part performance as took the case out of the statute of frauds. See, also, Porter v. Allen, 54 Ga. 623; Hughes v. Hughes, 72 Ga. 173; Floyd v. Floyd, 97 Ga. 124, 24 S. E. 451; Looney v. Watson, 97 Ga. 235, 22 S. E. 935; Ogden v. Dodge Co., 97 Ga. 461, 25 S. E. 321; Causey v. Causey, 106 Ga. 188, 193, 32 S. E. 138. In a case like the present it is not necessary that there should be any valuable consideration moving to the person undertaking to convey the property, for the reason that, if the transaction be treated as a gift, it will be upheld, and a specific performance of the undertaking decreed, where the parties to the transaction are parent and child; the undertaking of the parent being thus supported by the meritorious consideration required by law. While it is necessary, in order to authorize a specific performance, that the donee should go into possession of the property, and make valuable improvements thereon, it is not essential to the right of the donee to demand performance that the improvements should be paid for by him. As between the donor and the donee, the only thing necessary to be determined, so far as this matter is concerned, is whether the donee has, relying upon the gift, made improvements which were valuable and of a substantial and permanent nature. Especially would the donee not be deprived of the right to a specific performance on account of not having himself paid for the improvements where the agreement, as in the present case, distinctly provided that such improvements should be paid for by another person. Under the facts alleged, Mrs. Sappington is entitled to a decree requiring her mother to convey to her the land in controversy, and the court did not err in overruling the demurrers.

The bill of exceptions also assigns error upon the granting of the injunction. As the petitioners were in possession of the property, and as the filing and diligent prosecution of this suit would be notice to all persons of their rights in the land, an injunction to restrain the defendant from selling or incumbering the land was not absolutely essential to the protection of their interests in the property. See Edwards v. Banksmith, 35 Ga. 213; Smith v. Malcolm, 48 Ga. 343; Clay v. Clay, 86 Ga. 359, 12 S. E. 1064. In the last two cases this court held that it was no abuse of discretion to refuse to grant an injunction restraining the defendant from selling or incumbering the land, for the reason that the plaintiff was amply protected under the doctrine of lis pendens. Where, however, the court sees proper to grant the injunction restraining the defendant from doing anything to complicate the title while the case is pending, this court will not interfere, unless in an extreme case, with his discretion in so doing. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

PERRY v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 31, 1900.)

CRIMINAL LAW — OPINION EVIDENCE — HOMICIDE—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE —INSTRUCTIONS.

1. A medical expert, after describing a wound and its location, and giving his opinion as to the character of the weapon by which it was caused, may testify to the opinion that the blow came from the rear of the injured person. Any witness, after examining a physical instrument, may testify to the opinion that it is a deadly weapon.

2. It is competent, in a trial for murder, to prove that shortly after the mortal wound was inflicted the accused made declarations and did acts evidencing malice towards the injured person, or indifference to his fate.

3. The law of circumstantial evidence is not, without qualification, applicable in a case where the state proves a positive confession of guilt.

4. It is not erroneous to refuse to charge requests which are inapplicable to the issues involved. An inaccuracy in charging which could have resulted in no injury to the losing party is not cause for a new trial.

5. There is, in a trial for murder, no error in rejecting evidence offered merely to affect the action of the jury on the question of punishment.

6. The verdict was warranted, and the record discloses no cause for a new trial.

Little, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Wilkes county; S. Reese, Judge.

Fred Perry was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

H. M. Holden and A. W. Stephens, for plaintiff in error. R. H. Lewis, Sol. Gen., Harrison & Bryan, and J. M. Terrell, Atty. Gen., for the State.

LUMPKIN, P. J. At the last term of this court the cases of Will Taylor and Fred Perry, who had been jointly tried and convicted of the murder of Jep Dennard, were here on separate writs of error, upon each of which the judgment below was reversed. See 108 Ga. 384, 34 S. E. 2. At the next ensuing term of the trial court the accused were tried separately. Taylor was found guilty, and, under the recommendation made by the jury, sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for life. This ended his case. Perry was convicted without recommendation, and sentenced to be hanged. He made a motion for a new trial, to the overruling of which he excepted, and his case is again before us. The evidence warranted a finding of the following facts: Dennard, the deceased, in the capacity of "guard," had charge of a number of persons who had been convicted of misdemeanors and sentenced to work upon a chain gang. They were not, however, employed, as they ought to have been, upon public works, but, under Dennard's supervision, labored upon a private farm, and were not under the management or control of the county authorities. Taylor, Perry, and several others composed the gang. When not at work they were kept in one room of a house, the only remaining room of which was occupied by Dennard. There was no door between these two rooms. All of the convicts except Taylor, Perry, and two others were confined to a large chain. The two named were whispering to each other most of the afternoon of Sunday, January 8, 1899, and neither of them conversed with any other convict. While, under the rules promulgated by Dennard, all conversations had to be carried on in a low voice, there was no rule requiring the convicts to talk in whispers. The whispering between Taylor and Perry was an unusual occurrence. Late in the afternoon mentioned, Dennard, from his room, directed them to bring to him some articles which he needed. They went into Dennard's room, and remained there one or two minutes. There was a scuffle in the room, and a noise as if something had fallen. While these men were in Dennard's room, he received upon the head a mortal wound, from which he soon became unconscious, and as a result of which he died the next day. The wound was inflicted with a stick of wood, which was a weapon likely to produce death. The indications were that the blow came from Dennard's rear. Immediately after he was struck, Taylor and Perry returned to the room of the convicts, the former in advance, having in his possession Dennard's gun, pistol, and watch, and Perry following closely with an ax in his hand. Neither said anything as to what had happened to Dennard until Perry, upon being asked the direct question, "Where was he sitting at when you all hit him?" replied, "He was sitting by the fire when us hit him." Taylor took the ax from Perry, and with it broke the lock on the large chain, thus releasing from it all the convicts whose shackles were thereto attached. They all went out of doors. Dennard, who was standing near the house, asked, "What's the matter here?" and spoke no more, being in a dazed and helpless condition. Referring to him, Perry said: "Put him in there [meaning in the house], God damn him! and let's go." He and Taylor then placed Dennard in the house, and fastened the door so that it could not be opened from the inside. All the convicts then fled from the place, Perry taking with him Dennard's gun. About two hours later, from a place of concealment by the roadside, they saw a physician who was going to Dennard's relief. Perry proposed to kill the doctor, and, when one of his companions remonstrated, threatened to kill the latter.

To the foregoing, which is a condensed but accurate statement of what the jury could legitimately conclude took place on the day of the tragedy, it is proper to add what follows: Perry, after his arrest, admitted that he was in Dennard's room when the fatal blow was inflicted, and, without charging the crime upon Taylor or confessing or denying his own guilt, simply said he did not know who struck the blow. In his statement to the jury he denied being in Dennard's room at the time the crime was committed, and protested that he had nothing whatever to do with the homicide. He also stated that, a few days before the day of the crime, Dennard had given him a severe flogging, and on that day had not allowed the convicts enough to eat. Taylor, who had already been convicted and sentenced as above stated, was sworn as a witness for Perry, and testified positively that he (Taylor) struck the blow which killed Dennard, because Dennard threatened to whip him and was about to do so; that Perry was not present at the time, and had nothing whatever to do with it; and, further, that there was no conspiracy or understanding of any kind between Perry and himself to kill or harm Dennard. He explained the "whispering" by stating that it related to another matter, the particulars of which he undertook to relate. There was absolutely nothing in Taylor's testimony to the effect that he struck Dennard in order to escape from custody. Indeed, there was not a syllable of evidence that the blow was struck for any such purpose. On the contrary, Taylor testified positively and unequivocally that the crime would not have been committed if Dennard had not tried to whip him, and gave no other reason for striking Dennard. He used the expression, "I struck through fear," manifestly meaning the fear of a beating. He did testify he had been told that it was an unlawful chain gang, but said nothing in this connection about escaping therefrom. He mentioned the character of the chain gang merely as a justification for freeing the other convicts after he had struck Dennard, and gave as an additional reason for setting them at liberty that he thought his chances for avoiding capture would be better if many convicts were at large at the same time. For the purpose of impeaching Taylor, the state proved that after his arrest he repeatedly stated that Perry struck the fatal blow, and also that he (Taylor) did not know who struck it. We will now consider the grounds of the motion for a new trial:

1. It is alleged that the court erred in allowing the physician to testify that in his opinion the mortal blow was inflicted from Dennard's rear, and in allowing another witness to testify that the stick of wood with which the blow was struck was a weapon likely to produce death. There was no error in admitting any of this testimony. The physician was not only an expert, but based his opinion upon the facts which he stated; and certainly any witness, after describing an instrument, may express under oath the opinion that it is capable of causing death.

2. Error is alleged in admitting the testimony relating to Perry's proposition to kill the doctor, and his threat to kill the person who protested against his so doing. This testimony was admissible. It tended to show declarations and conduct on Perry's part evidencing malice against Dennard, or indifference to his fate. Such declarations and conduct are in the nature of incriminating admissions of the existence of malice.

3. The court was requested to charge upon the law of circumstantial evidence, the request being evidently based upon the theory that there was no direct evidence of Perry's guilt. We cannot say the request was improperly refused, for there was evidence of a confession that Perry actually participated in the killing, and such evidence is not circumstantial, but direct. Eberhart v. State, 47 Ga. 599.

4. Several requests to charge were presented to the judge, with the object of having the jury instructed that, if Perry conspired with Taylor merely to commit an assault and battery upon Dennard for the purpose of effecting an escape, he would not be chargeable with the homicide, or that even if Perry entered into a conspiracy to kill Dennard, or himself killed Dennard, for the purpose of escaping from the chain gang, it being an unlawful one, he would be guilty of manslaughter only. Error is assigned upon the refusal of the court to give these requests to the jury, and also upon a charge that "where men combine to do an unlawful act, and one goes a step beyond the rest, and does acts which they did not perform, each and all are responsible for the act." There was no evidence tending to show a conspiracy merely to beat or disable Dennard. If there was any conspiracy at all, it was murderous in its character, and there was not a particle of evidence that the attack upon him was made with a view to escaping from the chain gang. Perry did not, in his defense, set up either that he co-operated with Taylor in a design to merely commit an assault and battery on Dennard, or that his object, whatever may have been the nature of the assault, was simply to effect an escape. The sole theory of his defense was that he was absolutely guiltless of any participation whatever in the attack upon Dennard. He, therefore, has no just cause of complaint of the court's refusal to charge as requested. The requests were not pertinent to the issues actually involved, and, even if the charge excepted to was not technically accurate, it could not, under the circumstances, have been injurious to Perry. There was no contention on his part that he and Taylor conspired to do one act, and that the latter did an act more criminal, in the design of which he (Perry) did not participate. So far as the requests related to the unlawful character of the chain gang, it is to be noted that no assault of any kind upon Dennard was in the least degree essential to an escape by either Taylor or Perry from the chain gang. They had absolute control of their own movements, and had only to leave whenever they chose to do so. In view of the undisputed facts, the theory of assaulting or killing Dennard in order to escape has no foundation whatever, and it follows that the question of the lawfulness or the unlawfulness of the chain gang is, in the case as now presented, an entirely immaterial issue.

5. The jury trying Perry knew that Taylor had been convicted. He so testified. Counsel for Perry tendered in evidence the verdict against Taylor, for the purpose of showing that he had been recommended to mercy. The court declined to allow this. It is alleged that this was error, for the reason that, if the jury had been informed that Taylor had escaped the death penalty, they might have recommended Perry to mercy. In other words, a new trial is asked because of the exclusion of evidence which might have affected the punishment of the plaintiff in error. "If the courts ever begin to grant new trials solely with reference to the question of changing penalties, they will embark upon a wide ocean of uncertainty. What evidence, other than such as would be pertinent to the question of guilty or not guilty, would be appropriate? An answer to this inquiry is suggestive of endless irrelevancy." Thus we dealt with this question in the case of another Perry v. State. See 102 Ga. 379, 30 S. E. 903. Even if we entertained a different view of it, we do not see how the course pursued by one jury, with reference to punishment, on the trial of one man, could aid another jury, trying another man, in fixing his penalty. The evidence, though relating to the same transaction, could not possibly be the same on both trials, and therefore what the first jury did could afford no lawful guide or criterion to the other; and, besides, each jury had to act on its own responsibility.

6. Complaint is made that the verdict is contrary to the evidence. We cannot sustain this contention. We do not, of course, mean to say that the evidence demanded a finding of the particular facts which we said above was warranted. It is obvious from the foregoing preliminary statement, as a whole, that the jury might have made a very different finding; but, in dealing with the question whether or not there is sufficient evidence to support a verdict, we are constrained to treat as duly established all such facts as are warranted by testimony, and to give the prevailing side the benefit of every inference favorable to it which is fairly and legitimately deducible from those facts. Following this course, which is the only one we can properly pursue, we cannot say the evidence was insufficient to satisfy the jury, to the exclusion of all reasonable doubt, that Perry was guilty. Thus viewing the case, there was mysterious and unusual whispering between him and Taylor. At the first opportunity thereafter, they went into Dennard's room. Almost immediately he received a mortal blow from the rear. They came out of his room at about the same moment. Perry made no protestation that he was innocent of the terrible deed, which would have been most natural, had he been guiltless of Dennard's blood. On the contrary, he voluntarily said, "Us hit him." This was a direct confession of guilt. He cursed the helpless man, assisted in fastening him up in the house, and remorselessly left him to his fate. He carried away Dennard's gun, proposed to kill with it a physician who was going to his relief, and threatened to kill a fellow convict who protested against the murder of the doctor. Later, Perry admitted being present when the wound was given, and did not even then claim to be innocent, but merely professed ignorance of who the murderer was,—ignorance which could not have been real, if what he admitted was true. In his statement at his trial he disclosed reasons for entertaining malice against Dennard, viz. that the latter had flogged him and refused to give him enough food. It was, under all the circumstances, certainly remarkable that Taylor should, under oath, take all the blame upon himself; and, if the jury had believed his testimony, they would surely have acquitted Perry. But they did not believe Taylor, and with good reason; for he was involved in such serious self-contradictions that no man could help feeling he was totally unworthy of credit. Our remark when this case was here before, that the evidence against Perry "was exceedingly weak and unsatisfactory," would not apply to the present record. The state's case is much stronger than it was then. The charge of the court was full and very fair to the accused. As a whole, it was an admirable presentation of the law applicable to the issues upon which the jury were to pass. After a patient and careful examination and study of the record, we find no reason which would justify us in holding that Perry's last conviction was unlawful. It does seem anomalous that he should suffer the death penalty, while Taylor, confessedly guilty and swearing to Perry's innocence, escapes with life imprisonment; but for this condition of things no responsibility rests upon us, or his honor of the trial court. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except LITTLE, J., dissenting.

LITTLE, J. (dissenting). I base my dissent from the ruling of the majority in this case on the two grounds that the evidence does not sustain the verdict which was rendered, and that the court erred in admitting the evidence of Dr. Quinn, who testified, "I think Mr. Dennard [the deceased] must have been sitting, and his assailant must have made the attack from behind." There has been no attempt to reproduce the evidence. It is voluminous, and I shall not give any part of it in detail. It is sufficient to say that there was no eyewitness to the homicide; that no one saw the accused enter the room where Dennard was slain; he says he was not there. Taylor, who had been previously convicted of the homicide, admitted that he alone killed Dennard, and swore on the trial that Perry was not in the room at the time he struck the blow that caused the death of Dennard. Circumstances strongly corroborated this evidence. Immediately after Dennard had been stricken, Taylor entered the room where the other prisoners were confined, having in his possession a gun, pistol, and watch belonging to Dennard, all of which were in the room where the blow was stricken. It is true that Taylor was followed into that room by Perry, who had an ax in his hand. It was not shown that the ax was in the room where the homicide was committed, but most likely it was in the yard, where Taylor says Perry was at the time Taylor says he struck Dennard. Evidence of a conspiracy between the two to kill Dennard, in view of the conviction of the plaintiff in error, I must characterize as being to me painfully absent. In my opinion, it must rest alone on the fact that he had an ax in his hand after Dennard had been stricken, and when he entered the room where the other prisoners were confined. For aught that appears, we are not authorized to conclude that he had it at the time of the homicide. As a matter of fact there was but one blow inflicted on Dennard, and that was not with an ax. He was, according to his own statement and the evidence of Taylor, out in the yard when Dennard was killed; having, as they say, asked and received permission of Dennard to go into the yard previously to the difficulty. That he had an ax in his hand when he followed Taylor into the room where the prisoners were confined was certainly a circumstance to create suspicion,—would very strongly do so if it had not been shown to what use the ax was put. After Perry entered the room with the ax, Taylor took it from him and broke the lock on the large chain to which they were confined, thus freeing all the prisoners. Was it likely, if Taylor and Perry had conspired to kill Dennard, that they would not have acted together in overpowering him? What might have been a dangerous act to one alone would have been reasonably safe for two. Again, is it reasonable to believe, if Taylor and Perry were together in the room when Dennard was slain, and his gun, his pistol, and his watch taken, that Perry would not have gotten one of the articles? Yet Taylor came out with all of them. These facts add considerable weight to the positive evidence of Taylor that Perry was not in the room, and had nothing to do with the homicide. Very much of the testimony was derived from persons confined on the chain gang at the time. None of them, however, went to the extent of testifying to any facts which would of themselves authorize a conviction. If the evidence of Taylor that Perry had nothing to do with the homicide and was not in the room at the time it was committed is to be doubted, when all of this testimony went directly against his own interest, because he was a negro convict, why should credence be given to the testimony of other negro prisoners, serving their country in a like capacity?

I do not think that the evidence of Dr. Quinn, who testified, over the objection of plaintiff's counsel, that "I think Mr. Dennard must have been sitting, and his assailant must have made the attack from behind," should have been admitted. It is said by Mr. Justice LUMPKIN, in the foregoing opinion of the majority, that the physician was not only an expert, but based his opinion upon the facts which he stated. In my judgment, one sensible, observant man, who is not a physician, could have just as readily known that Dennard was sitting, and that he was struck from behind, as another such, who was a physician; and yet I do not think it can be doubted that neither one of them would know much about it. This character of evidence does not come within the domain of expert evidence. Because a man happens to be a physician, he is not thereby invested with any special power to know accurately what was the position of the parties when a homicide was committed, not within his presence. Of course, if Dr. Quinn did give the facts upon which his opinion was based, his evidence was admissible, and so would have been the evidence of a layman. But I do not think he did. Dr. Quinn testified that: He was called to see Dennard about 18 hours before his death. He was perfectly unconscious, in a profound stupor, caused from a blow inflicted upon his head, causing a fracture, or, rather, several fractures. The doctor thought the weapon with which the blow was inflicted must have been about three inches in diameter,—a round instrument. There was a central fracture, and then a surrounding fracture, and the instrument must have had a knot on it, and the central fracture must have been produced by that knot. He thought it was a piece of wood. Adjoining that was another fracture of less degree, and the diameter of the fracture was about three inches wide and about three and a half inches long. The fracture was on the right side of the head. It produced paralysis of the left side,—the opposite side,—and unconsciousness. The flow of blood was caused from a rupture of some of the cerebral vessels. The direction of the wound was about on a level. "I think Mr. Dennard must have been sitting, and his assailant must have made the attack from behind. I think the wound was nearly on a level. I mean, it was straight across the head above the ear. I think the wound was about on a level with the pinnacle of the ear, but posterior some two inches, perhaps. I mean the wound was about two inches in rear of the ear, nearly on a level." While I have not attempted to give all of the further description of the wound, made by Dr. Quinn, the above is what precedes the testimony which was objected to; and to me it appears that this testimony was admitted as expert evidence, because the description given of the wound, preceding the testimony to which objection was made, would not of itself seem to afford any reason for the opinion that the person who was stricken was sitting at the time, and that the person who inflicted the blow was in his rear. But, aside from this, the admission of the testimony did not seem to have been based so much on the reasons given for the opinion, as that it came from an expert. The evidence was very harmful to the plaintiff in error, if the jury believed that there was a conspiracy between Taylor and himself to kill Dennard. As I do not think that the evidence can be brought in the class of expert testimony, I think it should not have been admitted, unless some distinct reason had been given for the opinion. For the reasons above stated, I have been unable to concur in the opinion of the majority of my Brethren. I think a new trial should have been granted.

COOLEY v. ABBEY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1900.)

ATTACHMENT—TRAVERSE—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. There was no error in ruling that a denial of the truth of the ground of the attachment, made in a petition to remove the attachment, was a traverse of such ground, in contemplation of law.
2. A conveyance of property by an insolvent mother to her daughter and the husband of the latter is not necessarily fraudulent, and when the jury was authorized, under the evidence, to find that such conveyance was made in good faith and for a proper and legal consideration, the verdict, in the absence of any error of law on the part of the judge, ought not to be set aside.
3. There was no error in the charge.
4. The evidence sought to be introduced was not material in this case, and there was no error in excluding it.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Action by J. L. Cooley against F. D. Abbey. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

C. D. Maddox, for plaintiff in error. C. J. Simmons, for defendant in error.

LITTLE, J. Mrs. Cooley filed a petition, and presented the same to the judge of the superior court of the Atlanta circuit, in which she alleged that Mrs. Abbey had made a fraudulent sale of all of her property, and prayed that an attachment should issue under the provisions of our Code. After considering the same, the attachment was ordered to issue, and was levied on certain furniture and household goods, as the property of the defendant in attachment. Subsequently Mrs. Abbey, under the provisions of the Code regulating attachments of this character, filed a petition praying that the levy of the attachment so issued should be removed. On a hearing, the prayers of this last petition were denied. No further steps were taken until the case was called for trial in the superior court. It was then insisted on the part of Mrs. Abbey that the petition for removal which had been filed was a traverse of the grounds of the attachment, and raised an issue as to the truth of the grounds therein stated. The court so ruled, and refused a motion, which had been filed, to dissolve the attachment. The plaintiff then excepted pendente lite. Treating the petition as a traverse of the ground of the attachment, the case proceeded to trial, and resulted in a finding by the jury in favor of the defendant on the issue made by the traverse. A motion for a new trial was made, which was denied, and the plaintiff excepted.

1. The first question which arises is whether the petition for removal of the attachment was properly treated as a traverse of the grounds of the attachment. By section 4543 of the Civil Code it is provided that whenever a debtor shall sell or convey or conceal his property liable for the payment of his debts, for the purpose of avoiding the same, or threaten or prepare to do so, his creditor may petition the judge of the superior court, distinctly stating his grounds of complaint, and pray for an attachment against the property of the debtor, supporting his petition by affidavit or testimony, if he can control the same. By a subsequent section (4545) it is provided that on this petition the judge may grant an attachment, which shall be executed under existing laws, and subject to existing laws as to traverse and other modes of defense. Under the provisions of this section, the judge may also, if he deems it proper, before granting an attachment, appoint a day, and hear both parties as to the propriety of granting the attachment, and may then grant or refuse it. It is provided, also, in section 4546, that the party whose property has been attached without a hearing, if he desires to do so, may apply to the judge, setting out his grounds of defense, and show why the attachment should not have been issued or should be removed. Having heard the same, the judge may then, upon a review of the law and facts, make such order in the premises as is consistent with justice, and either totally or partially remove the attachment, or refuse to do so. It is further provided that, when such attachments are issued and served, they shall be returned and disposed of as attachments are now returned and disposed of, and be subject to the same defenses. Civ. Code, § 4547. To the decision granting or refusing the attachment a writ of error lies to this court. Id. § 4548. It is provided by section 4558 of the Civil Code, under the title of "Pleading and Defenses in Attachment," that the defendant may appear by himself or attorney at law, and make a defense, at any time before final judgment is rendered against him; and by section 4560 it is provided that in all cases of attachment the defendant may traverse the truth of the affidavit in relation to the ground upon which the attachment issued, at the return of the attachment, and issue formed on such traverse shall be tried by a jury at the first term, unless for good cause. The attachment which was issued in the case at bar under the order of the judge of the superior court was dated September 29, 1897, and was returnable to the March term, 1898, of the superior court of Fulton county. The petition to remove the attachment was filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Fulton county on the 25th of October, 1897. This petition to remove in terms denied all the material allegations of the petition for attachment; that is to say, it expressly denied the truth of the ground upon which it was sought to have the attachment issue. The prayer to remove the attachment was refused at a hearing prior to the March term of the court. It nevertheless became a part of the record in the case, and, besides expressly denying that the ground of the attachment was true, this petition closed with a prayer that it should be used and considered as a traverse of the ground of the attachment. While it is admitted that the defendant might traverse the truth of the plaintiff's affidavit on which the attachment issued, it is contended that such traverse must be separately made and filed at the term to which the attachment is made returnable, and it seems to us that this is very much the better mode of practice, and that the contemplation of the statute in relation to filing a traverse is that there shall be a separate denial of the truth of the affidavit on which an attachment is issued, filed at the return term; but, nevertheless, the object of the statute is to give to a defendant the right of having an attachment which has issued against him dismissed if the grounds upon which it issued are not true in fact, and we do not see, in this case, how any damage accrued to the plaintiff because of the fact that a traverse was filed in advance of the term to which the attachment was made returnable. It is true that the petition for removal is lengthy, and contains a great many allegations not necessary, in good pleading, to have been made, and contains very much more than a mere traverse; but it contains, nevertheless, a distinct denial of the truth of the grounds on which the attachment issued. It is true also that when the case was called this denial was a part of the pleadings in the case, as they then stood, and there was then a distinct prayer in the pleadings that the denial in the petition to remove the attachment be considered a traverse of the truth of the ground of the attachment. So that the ground was denied specifically, and such denial was filed before the case was called. While, as we have stated, the better practice is to file a separate traverse, yet we are confident that, considering the object of the statute, the denial of the petition for removal was sufficient to cause an issue as to the truth of the grounds to be made and tried.

2. It is contended that the verdict of the jury was contrary to law and to the evidence in the case. We do not think so. On the contrary, we are of the opinion that the verdict of the jury was fully authorized by the evidence. It is true that fraud was charged, and it is also true that by the conveyance which was attacked for fraud the defendant sought to pass title of the property to her daughter and son-in-law. Nevertheless, it appears to us that the reason for the conveyance, as well as the consideration moving the defendants, was fully and satisfactorily explained, and under the evidence the jury were authorized to find that such conveyance was made in good faith. It is not true, as matter of law, that the defendant could not in good faith sell and convey her property to her married daughter and her husband. Such conveyances are always regarded with suspicion, but, while so regarded, they will stand, unless shown to be fraudulent; and while, in determining whether the conveyance is fraudulent or not, slight circumstances may have weight, yet it is entirely within the province of the jury to determine the fact as to whether the fraud existed. The evidence warranted them in finding that it did not in the present case, and the verdict ought not to be disturbed unless some error of law was committed in the trial of the case.

3. It is complained that the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "The pleadings of the parties are not evidence, but are merely their written contentions, and are not to be taken by the jury as evidence of the facts alleged in them." This charge, abstractly considered, is a sound legal proposition, and is totally distinct from the rule of law in relation to admissions in judicio. Pleadings are the mutual altercations between the parties. The plaintiff sets out the facts upon which he relies for a recovery. The defendant either admits or denies the several alleged facts, or sets up extraneous matter as a bar to recovery. It is a legal truism that these pleadings are not evidence, and are not to be taken as such, but another rule of law holds a party to any admission which he has made in his pleadings. If any such are made, they are to be taken as true, because they are asserted by the party himself; and, while he may withdraw them formally from the pleadings, he cannot by a mere withdrawal avoid the effect of the admissions made. Medicine Co. v. Gibbs (Ga.) 33 S. E. 945. There was no request that the judge should charge the jury in reference to admissions made by the defendant in her pleadings. It appears from a note that during the trial counsel for the defendant insisted on the proposition that an admission made in pleadings was not evidence, and invoked an instruction to the jury to that effect, following which the charge complained of was made. There was no error in the instructions given, and, if the plaintiff desired any instructions in reference to admissions made in the pleadings, she should have requested that they be given. She failed to do so, and the fact that the presiding judge did not find it necessary, in the absence of a request, to refer to the subject of admission, in no way renders the charge as given illegal or inapplicable.

4. Another assignment of error is that the court rejected testimony to the effect that the defendant came to witness after the alleged sale and made application for credit, and that she stated to him that she was in good financial standing, and agreed to settle her account every two weeks; that she owed no one anything, etc. The statement which it was sought to prove that the defendant made did not, under the explanation of the presiding judge, have any relevancy to the issue being tried. He excluded it on the theory that the insolvency of the defendant was never denied, nor was it ever in issue. This being true, proof of the fact that she made application for credit in the purchase of provisions, and stated that she was in good financial standing, and promised to pay her accounts, could not affect any question involved. The theory of the plaintiff was that the sale of all the furniture of the defendant to her daughter and son-in-law was fraudulently made, and they proved, as was claimed, that she continued in the possession of the goods which she had ostensibly conveyed; and this fact, they contended, was a badge of fraud. It seems that the defendant had been keeping a boarding house on Pryor street. Her business had not been successful, and she conveyed all of her furniture to her daughter and her daughter's husband. Subsequently the furniture was removed and placed in another house, on another street; and plaintiff contended that it was still the establishment of the defendant; that she was conducting the house there, and using the same furniture; and that these facts tended to show that the original sale was fraudulent. However this may be, we are confident that, if the insolvency of the defendant was not denied, the mere fact that while residing at her new place she desired credit in the purchase of provisions, and stated that she did not owe anybody, would have added nothing to the contention made. Ordinarily, this evidence would have gone in for whatever of value it might have had on the question of her solvency, but we do not see how it could have any further application. It was her undoubted right to purchase these goods on a credit, if she could do so. Such articles were necessary for her maintenance, whether she had fraudulently conveyed the goods or not, and, under the issues then being tried, they were immaterial. There was no error in rejecting the evidence. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

UNDERWOOD et al. v. THURMAN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1900.)

PROBATE OF WILL — CONTEST — GROUNDS OF OBJECTION—UNDUE INFLUENCE —EXECUTION.

1. Grounds of objection to the probate of a paper propounded as a will are not, though separately set forth in the caveat, "pleas," in the sense in which this word is used in section 5330 of the Civil Code; and consequently it is not the right of the propounder to demand that, if the verdict be one denying probate, it shall show upon which one or more of such grounds it is based.

2. That the execution of an instrument purporting to be a will was procured by the exercise of undue influence upon the alleged testator cannot be proved by his declarations made after he signed the paper.

3. When the attestation clause to such an instrument recites all the facts essential to its due execution as a will, and it is shown that the alleged testator and those whose names appear thereon as witnesses actually affixed their signatures to the paper, a presumption arises that it was executed in the manner prescribed by law for the execution of wills; and this is so though there may be on the part of one or more of the witnesses a total failure of memory as to some or all of the circumstances attending the execution.

Error from superior court, Fulton county: J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Petition of Florence A. Underwood and others for probate of the alleged will of F. D. Thurman. M. G. Thurman, widow, filed a caveat in the superior court. On appeal, judgment was rendered for Thurman, and the proponents bring error. Reversed.

Smith, Hammond & Smith, N. J. & T. A. Hammond, J. T. Pendleton, and King & Spalding, for plaintiffs in error. King & Anderson and L. W. Thomas, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. A paper purporting to be the will of F. D. Thurman, in which no one was named as executor, was by Mrs. Florence A. Underwood, a "person interested," offered for probate in solemn form in the court of ordinary of Fulton county. Other persons interested were afterwards made parties, and joined in the prayer for probate. Mrs. Mary G. Thurman, the widow and sole heir of the alleged testator, filed a caveat, based on three grounds, viz.: (1) that the paper was not executed in the manner prescribed by law; (2) that F. D. Thurman was not, at the time of its execution, of sound and disposing mind and memory; and (3) that he was induced to sign it because of undue influence on the part of Mrs. Underwood. The ordinary adjudged that the paper was entitled to probate, and Mrs. Thurman entered an appeal to the superior court. On the trial therein a verdict was returned in her favor, and the propounders moved for a new trial. Their motion contained four general and thirty-six special grounds. As the case is to be tried again, we shall say nothing concerning its merits. This, for the time being, disposes of the four general grounds. The three dozens of special ones present but three units of questions with which we consider it necessary to deal specifically. In the remaining three and thirty, various points are made upon rulings, charges, and refusals to charge. We do not undertake to say that, as to all of the matters thus complained of, the trial judge was entirely free from error; but, conceding that some of the grounds to which we are now referring do show that he made some mistakes, we are quite sure that none of them were sufficiently serious to require the granting of a new trial. We agree with him that in a case like this it would be strange, indeed, "if astute lawyers, after a microscopic examination and diligent preparation, extending through about eight months since the trial, and apparently reviewing every sentence, every phrase, even every word, of the judge, could not discover something which seemed to them a flaw or error of more or less magnitude"; and we think it would be something wonderful if any judge—even one so able and painstaking as he—could try a case involving so many questions without falling into some slight errors, either of omission or of commission. Our Brother below, while frankly conceding that he may have done so, did not think that there was any error on his part which demanded a judgment setting the verdict aside. Being unable to agree with him to this extent, we feel constrained to order a new trial.

1. Several grounds of the motion distinctly present the question whether or not it was the right of the propounders to have the jury, in case they found that the paper was not the will of F. D. Thurman, specify in their verdict upon which ground or grounds of the caveat their finding was based. The judge held that the propounders had no such right, and as to this matter our judgment coincides with his. We do not think, as was contended, that the question should be resolved against the propounders merely because the ultimate issue in the case was simply devisavit vel non,—will or no will. It frequently happens that in the trial of ordinary actions there is a main and controlling issue, viz.: "Shall the plaintiff recover, or shall he not?" And yet, in deciding this issue, it may become necessary for the jury to determine a number of other issues, presented by different pleas, each setting up a distinct ground of defense, a finding on any one of which favorably to the defendant would defeat the plaintiff's action. So, here, a finding in favor of any one of the grounds of caveat would be fatal to the case of the propounders. If, then, the plaintiff in the ordinary action is, on principle, entitled to be informed by the verdict itself, when adverse to him, on what plea or pleas it is based, we see no reason why, on principle, the propounders of a testamentary paper, met with a caveat containing separate and distinct grounds, should not have a similar right. But the question is not one to be decided by inquiring what the law ought to be, but what it is. It turns at last upon the construction to be given to section 5330 of the Civil Code, which provides: "If there are several pleas filed by the defendant, a verdict for the defendant must show upon which of the pleas the verdict is rendered. The jury may render such verdict upon all the pleas, if they see proper so to do. And the judges of the superior courts of this state, upon request of the jury, in the trial of all civil cases, shall furnish said jury with written instructions as to the form of their verdict." If this section did not form a part of our statute law, it would not, we are sure, be seriously contended that the propounders had the right upon which they insisted. So the real question is, does this section apply to will cases? We do not think so. The word "pleas" is not, in its usual and ordinary signification, applicable to the grounds of a caveat to the probate of a paper propounded as a will, and there is nothing in the section which remotely suggests that this pregnant word should be understood in any other sense than that generally ascribed to it. This being so, the courts should treat this word, as used in this section, as meaning pleas proper. A plea is "a formal answer made by a defendant to a demand or charge." And. Law. Dict. Obviously, this definition would not apply to a caveat filed in probate proceedings. Much was said in the arguments of counsel and in their briefs in support of the contentions that the propounders were "plaintiffs," that the caveatrix was a "defendant," and that the several grounds of her caveat were "pleas," but we think all these contentions are answered in what has been said above. Doubtless the three terms just quoted have sometimes been loosely used in dealing with will cases, but this affords no aid in arriving at the true meaning of the Code section under consideration. The first two sentences of this section, which are the only portions thereof with the construction of which we are now concerned, became a part of our written law long prior to the uniform procedure act of 1887, which abolished all technical forms of pleading; that is to say, at a time when papers filed in the course of legal procedure were called by their right names, and nothing which was not in point of fact a plea was recognized as such. See Code 1861, § 3480. Accordingly the term "pleas" is to be regarded as having been used advisedly and deliberately in the precise sense in which it was then understood. It was argued that, in the absence of a requirement to frame the verdict as the propounders insisted it should be framed if against them, it was possible that the verdict denying probate might have been rendered without the assent of all of the jurors to the truth of any one ground of the caveat. For instance, it was urged that four, only, of them might have believed the paper was not duly executed; that another four, and they only, might have believed the alleged testator was of unsound mind; and that the remaining four, and they only, might have believed the execution of the paper was procured by undue influence. Conceding to this argument all the force it deserves, we have only to say that, if the law as it stands affords no adequate remedy for an evil of this kind, the power to correct it is in the legislature, and not in the courts. A verdict in the form demanded by the propounders in case the caveat should be sustained is analogous to "a special verdict of the facts only," as provided for in section 4849 of the Civil Code; but the propounders can derive no aid from that section, because it is expressly limited in its application to trials of "proceedings for equitable relief." The cases of Browne v. Browne, 22 Md. 103, and Withee v. Rowe, 45 Me. 571, relied on by counsel for plaintiffs in error, are not in point; for it seems that both of them were tried in pursuance of a practice derived from statutes authorizing or requiring the submission of special issues to the jury. We have, in cases like the present, no such practice, nor any statute which would authorize it.

2. One ground of the motion for a new trial alleges error in refusing to give in charge a written request to the effect that "undue influence" could not be proved by evidence of declarations made by the alleged testator after the execution of the paper propounded as his will. This request was not covered by any instruction contained in the general charge. We think it should have been given. Such declarations are not competent evidence to show that the statements of facts therein embraced are true, and cannot be regarded as furnishing even the slightest proof that there was any undue influence. As to that matter, they should be treated as nothing but mere hearsay; for certainly it would never do to allow a will to be in this manner set at naught. See Mallery v. Young, 94 Ga. 804, 22 S. E. 142; Jones v. Grogan, 98 Ga. 552, 25 S. E. 590; and authorities cited in each.

3. The attestation clause of the alleged will, and the signatures thereon, are as follows:

> Signed, sealed, published, and declared in our presence by F. D. Thurman as his last will and testament; and in his presence, and in the presence of each of us, we subscribe the same as witnesses.
> F. D. Thurman. [L. S.]
> Witness:
> P. L. Mynatt.
> B. F. Abbott, Jr.
> J. W. Bridges.

At the trial P. L. Mynatt testified that he recognized his signature upon the paper; that, in his opinion, the word "Witness," appearing above the names of the witnesses, was in his handwriting; and that he remembered nothing whatever as to the execution of the instrument. B. F. Abbott, Jr., testified that at the request of Mynatt he signed the paper as a witness, but he did not know its character, and was unable to state whether, at the time he so signed, F. D. Thurman was present or not. There was evidence showing that prior to the trial this witness had, in a letter written by himself, positively stated that when he signed the paper Thurman was not present. The testimony of J. W. Bridges, taken by interrogatories, was sufficient to prove that the paper was duly executed as a will, but an effort was made to impeach him by showing that in answer to a previous set of interrogatories he had sworn that the paper was typewritten; the fact being that it was in the handwriting of Thurman.

Error is assigned upon the court's refusal to give in charge to the jury a written request to the effect that, inasmuch as the attestation clause to the paper propounded was in due form, a presumption that it was duly executed as a will arose. In determining whether or not this request should have been given, it is of the utmost importance to keep clearly in mind the fact that there was no dispute at all that the signatures upon the document were the genuine signatures of Thurman and the three witnesses. Therefore, under the circumstances, the request could not, as was insisted, fairly be said to invoke an instruction that the bare fact that the attestation clause was in due form raised a presumption of due execution; but its real meaning was that, in view of the fact that Thurman and the witnesses undoubtedly affixed their signatures to the paper, and of the further fact that the attestation clause recited all the essentials of due execution, such a presumption did arise. Treating the request as having this meaning,—and, in the light of what is stated above, it could not be fairly said to have had any other,—we think it was pertinent and appropriate to the case as it stood at the close of the testimony, and, accordingly, that the refusal to give it in charge was erroneous. An attestation clause, appearing upon a testamentary paper, and containing a recital of all the facts essential to its due execution as a will, as was the case here, raises a presumption that such paper was executed with all the requisite legal formalities pertaining to wills, if it be shown, as was done in the present instance, that the alleged testator and the witnesses actually affixed their signatures to the instrument; nor does it matter that as to two of the witnesses there was such a failure of memory, as that above indicated. "If a will purports to have been duly signed, attested, and witnessed, on proof of execution the court will presume, in the case of the death of the witnesses, or in case they do not remember the facts connected with its execution, that the law was complied with." 1 Jones, Ev. p. 89, § 44. On this subject Greenleaf says: "If the subscribing witnesses to a will are dead, or if, being present, they are forgetful of all the facts, or of any material fact to its due execution, the law will in such cases supply the defect of proof by presuming that the requisites of the statute were duly observed." 1 Greenl. Ev. (16th Ed.) § 38a. From 1 Redf. Wills (4th Ed.) *238, we extract the following: "It seems to be well settled that, in the absence of all proof, the witnesses being deceased or not in a condition to give testimony, the presumption omnia rite acta will arise, as in ordinary cases. So, also, where the attestation is general, not enumerating the particulars, it will be presumed the will was duly executed, unless the contrary appear. And, where the attestation clause contains all the particulars of a good execution, it will always be prima facie evidence of due execution, and will often prevail over the testimony of the witnesses who give evidence tending to show that some of the requisites were omitted." The distinguished author also says that "the mere forgetfulness of the witnesses of the facts certified in the attestation clause is not regarded as an obstruction to granting probate of the will," and, after referring to a case where probate was allowed even where the witnesses deposed that the legal requirements were not complied with, adds that it has been held that the presumption of due execution "will only be made where the will, upon its face, appears to have been duly executed, or, being lost, proper evidence is adduced of such having been the fact." Id. *239. To the same effect, see 1 Jarm. Wills (5th Am. Ed.) 219, 220. With reference to the utility and probative force of attestation clauses, Schouler says: "The advantage of an attestation clause with suitable recitals is shown in many of our decisions relating to the proof of wills. Where, indeed, there is nothing but a formal attestation clause on one side, and the testimony, decidedly adverse, of both subscribing witnesses on the other, probate of a will has been refused. But, with the aid of a proper attestation clause to contradict such persons, or possibly without it, wills have been established in proof against the concurring statements of both subscribing witnesses, or the statement of either, that the legal requirements of execution were not fully complied with. And whenever these witnesses fail to recollect, and give no positive testimony, or cannot, both or all, be produced in court, the clearer the recitals of an attestation clause, the stronger becomes the presumption that the will was executed in all details as the law requires. It matters little, under such circumstances, that subscribing witnesses cannot testify affirmatively to the facts thus recited; that the memory fails; that details are not orally shown with clearness. And, though the attesting witnesses were all dead or beyond the reach of process, proof of their handwriting would in general make out a prima facie case of due execution, which, if aided by the recitals of a full attestation clause, would afford a very strong presumption, unless the contrary appeared on the face of the will. But in no case will the presumption of compliance with all statutory formalities arise unless the will appears on its face to have been duly executed. And any such presumption is rebutted by clear proof to the contrary." Schouler, Wills, § 347. See, also, 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 199–202; Chaplin, Wills, 281 et seq. All of these text-books support the doctrine announced by reference to numerous authorities, an examination of which cannot fail to remove all doubt of its correctness. Indeed, it is no longer open to serious question. Certainly this is so in this state; for in Deupree v. Deupree, 45 Ga. 415, a majority of the court, at the January term, 1872, held that under the circumstances of that case a presumption of the due execution of a paper testamentary in character, and shown to have been signed by the alleged testator, arose from an attestation clause which did not recite that the witnesses signed in the presence of the testator; and all the members of the court agreed that, if the attestation clause had so recited, it would, when the signatures of the testator and the witnesses were proved, have raised a presumption of law that the paper was duly attested as a will. Nothing to the contrary was laid down in this case when it was again here at the July term, 1873 (49 Ga. 325); nor has this court, so far as we have been able to ascertain, ever held that a presumption of due execution did not arise in such a case as the one now before it.

It was further insisted that "the presumption stated in the request would not arise if the attesting witnesses gave affirmative evidence of the want of due execution," and "would only arise if they failed to remember or were dead." In this connection it was argued that the testimony of the subscribing witnesses in effect negatived due execution. The brief summary of this testimony appearing above will show that this last position is untenable. As to two of the witnesses, there was certainly lack or failure of memory, and the testimony of the other afforded positive proof of due execution. Even if Abbott and Bridges were so impeached as to break down their credibility, nothing more could result than the elimination of their testimony from the case. It is palpably true that their impeachment would not furnish proof that the paper was not duly executed as a will. We cannot, therefore, agree with counsel for the defendant in error that there was on the part of any of the attesting witnesses affirmative evidence that there was a want of proper execution; and, accordingly, we could, for the purposes of this case, fully concede the correctness of their assertion that the presumption of due execution arises only where the witnesses fail to remember or die. We are, however, by no means prepared to admit that the rule should be thus restricted. See, in addition to the authorities above given, those cited in Gillis v. Gillis, 96 Ga. 1, 23 S. E. 107, 30 L. R. A. 143.

The point was also made that no presumption of due execution could arise in this case, because the attestation clause was not itself in due form, for the reason that the appearance of the word "Witness" under that clause, and above the names of the witnesses, showed that at least one of them did not know the contents of the attestation clause, but merely supposed he was attesting some ordinary instrument, such as a contract. The fact that this word was written on the paper might be accounted for in many conjectural ways. We do not care to go into them. That it was so written is a circumstance altogether too trivial to affect the real merits of the question in hand.

Another attack on the attestation clause was based on the fact that the signature of the alleged testator was below, and not above, this clause. So far as we can gather from the copy in the record, Thurman, in selecting the place for his signature, did not depart to any great extent from what is customary in such cases. See what Lord Campbell said about such matters in Roberts v. Phillips, 4 El. & Bl. 450, 30 Eng. Law & Eq. 147.

In view of the two errors discussed above, and more especially of the latter, the seriousness of which in its bearing upon the case as it stood will have been perceived, we think there should be another trial. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

GRAY v. MAYOR, ETC., OF GRIFFIN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1900.)

CITIES—MAINTAINING PRISON—NEGLIGENCE—LIABILITIES.

1. In erecting and maintaining a city prison a municipal corporation is exercising a purely governmental function, and is, therefore, not liable in damages to a person arrested and imprisoned therein by its police officers, for injuries sustained by him, while so confined, by reason of the improper construction or negligent maintenance of such prison.

2. A municipal corporation is not liable for the illegal arrest of a person by its police officers, nor for his consequent imprisonment.

3. Nor is a city liable in damages because its mayor required of a person charged with a violation of a city ordinance a larger bond for his appearance than the law authorized, even if the failure of such person to give bond and his consequent confinement were occasioned thereby.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Spalding county; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by William E. Gray against the mayor and council of Griffin. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Jas. Flynt and Lloyd Cleveland, for plaintiff in error. Wm. H. Beck and O. H. P. Slaton, for defendant in error.

FISH, J. Taking the allegations of the plaintiff's petition to be true, as we must do upon demurrer, he certainly has just and great cause to complain of the needless hardships and suffering which he endured while confined in the city guard house. But, however strongly the story of his sufferings may appeal to our sentiments of humanity, the law affords him no redress against the municipality. The general rule is well established that a municipal corporation is not liable in damages for injuries sustained by reason of the negligent or improper exercise of a purely governmental power. The preservation of the public peace, quiet, good order, etc., of a community, is a governmental function. Where the legislative authority of a city passes ordinances for such purposes, it is clearly exercising a governmental power. When, for the purpose of enforcing such ordinances, the city erects and maintains a prison wherein to confine offenders, for the purpose of punishment, or those charged with offenses, for safe-keeping until they can be tried, it is exercising the same power. The enactment of such ordinances, and the provisions made for their enforcement, belong to the police power, which is purely governmental in character. In Love v. City of Atlanta, 95 Ga. 129, 22 S. E. 29, this court held that as "the duty of keeping the streets clear of putrid and other substances offensive to the sense of smell, and which tend to imperil the public health, devolves, under the charter of the city of Atlanta, upon the board of health of that city, and the functions of this department of the city government being governmental, and not purely administrative, in their character, it follows that if, in the exercise of such functions, and in the discharge of the duties devolving upon this department thereunder, a private citizen is injured by the negligence of one of its servants in and about such work, no right of action arises against the city." In the opinion, Mr. Justice Atkinson said: "The principle of nonliability rests upon the broad ground that, in the discharge of its purely governmental functions, a corporate body to which has been delegated a portion of the sovereign power is not liable for torts committed in the discharge of such duties, and in the exercise of such powers." In Bartlett v. City of Columbus, 101 Ga. 300, 28 S. E. 599, it was held that "a municipal corporation is not liable, in an action for false imprisonment, for damages alleged to have been occasioned to the plaintiff by reason of his imprisonment under a judgment rendered against him by a municipal court for the violation of an ordinance; and this is true though such judgment may have been irregular, erroneous, or even void." In Nisbet v. City of Atlanta, 97 Ga. 650, 25 S. E. 173, it was held that "a municipal corporation is not liable in damages for the death of one convicted in a corporation court and sentenced to work upon the public streets, although his death was occasioned while the convict was engaged in such work, and resulted from negligence on the part of the foreman who had been placed by the municipal authorities in charge thereof, and from the failure of such foreman to provide the convict, after his injury, with proper medical attention and treatment." In the opinion Mr. Justice Lumpkin said: "Neither the law of master and servant, nor the doctrine of respondeat superior, applies" in such a case, "because in such matters the municipal corporation is exercising governmental powers and discharging governmental duties, in the course of which it, of necessity, employs the services of the officer in question." In the case of Brown's Adm'r v. Town of Guyandotte, 12 S. E. 707, the supreme court of West Virginia held that "a town is not liable for damages for the death of a person caused by the burning of its jail while such person was confined therein for a violation of its ordinances, though such fire was attributable to the wrongful act or negligence of the officers or agents of the town." Brannon, J., in the opinion, said, "I think the duty and function of keeping a jail, and confining therein offenders against the municipal ordinances of a town, are plainly purely governmental in character." In La Clef v. City of Concordia, 41 Kan. 323, 21 Pac. 272, it was held that, "where a person is confined in a city prison upon conviction for disturbing the peace and quiet of the city, the city is not liable for damages for injuries sustained by reason of the bad character of the prison, or the negligence of the officer in charge of the same." This decision was followed in City of New Kiowa v. Craven, 46 Kan. 114, 26 Pac. 426, where an administratrix sought to recover from a city damages for the death of her intestate husband, alleged to have been caused by his confinement and exposure in an unhealthy, uninhabitable, and filthy prison. In Gullikson v. McDonald, 62 Minn. 278, 64 N. W. 812, it was held that "a municipal corporation is not liable for negligently maintaining its lockup in a defective and unfit condition, by reason of which a prisoner confined therein is injured." In Blake v. City of Pontiac, 49 Ill. App. 543, a case in which damages were sought for injuries alleged to have been sustained by reason of the confinement of the plaintiff in an improperly constructed and negligently maintained city prison, it was held that the municipal corporation was not liable, and that "the building of the calaboose, and the establishing of regulations for the detention of prisoners therein to answer to charges of violating the ordinances of the city, are clearly within the police power of municipal corporations, and are not in their nature corporate acts." So, in Kelly v. Cook (decided by the supreme court of Rhode Island, Oct., 1898) 41 Atl. 571, it was held that "a demurrer to a declaration was properly sustained where it was alleged that complainant was negligently cared for while temporarily confined in a police station, as such negligence did not render the city liable, since in caring for persons under arrest the city discharged a public duty." The precise question under consideration was decided in another recent case, in New York, and the court held that "where a person was arrested for violation of a village ordinance, and imprisoned in a place negligently permitted to become and remain so dilapidated that in consequence of the exposure he contracted a disease which caused his death, the village was not liable for the omission of its duty in the exercise of its governmental functions." Eddy v. Village of Ellicottville, 35 App. Div. 256, 54 N. Y. Supp. 800.

In support of their contention as to the liability of the municipal corporation for the injuries sustained by the plaintiff while confined in the city guard house, his counsel cite Moffitt v. City of Asheville, 103 N. C. 237, 9 S. E. 695, and Shields v. Town of Durham (N. C.) 21 S. E. 402, in each of which cases the allegations of the respective plaintiffs were of a similar character to those in the present case. In each of those cases, however, the court held that the municipal corporation sued was not liable in damages, as it had complied with the law of North Carolina in the construction of its prison and the furnishing of the necessary supplies, etc., therefor, and the plaintiff's injuries were sustained in consequence of the neglect of the jailer or attendants, of which notice had not been brought to the city before the injuries were received; and the court recognized and upheld the general rule, stated by Avery, J., in the Asheville Case, that "when a city or town is exercising the judicial, discretionary, or legislative authority conferred by its charter, or is discharging a duty imposed solely for the benefit of the public, it incurs no liability for the negligence of its officers, unless some statute, expressly or by necessary implication, subjects the corporation to a pecuniary responsibility for such negligence." These cases are doubtless cited because they do recognize the principle which obtains in North Carolina, which, as stated in the same opinion from which we have just quoted, is that towns and cities "are liable in damages only for a failure to so construct their prisons, or to provide them with fuel, bedclothing, heating apparatus, attendants, and other things necessary, as to secure to the prisoners committed to them a reasonable degree of comfort, and protect them from such bodily suffering as would injure their health." But this principle is derived by the supreme court of North Carolina from the constitutional and statutory law of that state; the case in which it was first involved and ruled being that of Lewis v. City of Raleigh, 77 N. C. 230, in which a municipal corporation was held liable in damages for the death of a person, the jury having found that his death was "accelerated by the noxious air of the guard house" of the city, in which he was confined. The decision of the court was expressly based upon the wise and humane provision of the constitution of the state, which provided that "it shall be required by competent legislation that the structure and superintendence of penal institutions of the state, the county jails and city police prisons, secure the health and comfort of the prisoners," and upon certain provisions of the Code of that state with reference to furnishing necessary supplies to jailers, and the care to be taken by sheriffs and jail keepers of prisoners and the rooms in which they are confined. And in the opinion in Moffitt v. City of Asheville, supra, Avery, J., said that when the aldermen of Asheville, who were vested with authority to erect a city prison, "built the police guard house in the exercise of their power, the city became as fully amenable for its proper construction and superintendence, as the general assembly was required by the constitution to make it answerable by competent legislation." But he further said, "The defendant, in the discharge of its judicial duties, could not have incurred any liability, in any view of the case, but for the express provisions of the constitution and laws." For the sake of humanity, we can but regret that there are no such express provisions in the constitution and laws of our own state in reference to municipal prisons. The only case that we have found in which a municipal corporation has been held liable in damages for injuries sustained by a person confined in its prison, in consequence of its unwholesome condition, where there was no express constitutional or statutory provision upon which to base the decision, is that of Edwards v. Town of Pocahontas (C. C.) 47 Fed. 268, in which District Judge Paul held "that a town which used a jail of its own was liable for injuries to the health of a prisoner caused by its filthy condition, since, under section 927 [of the Code of Virginia], and a special provision of its charter, it might have used a county jail, subject to inspection and control." In view of the decisions of this court in reference to the nonliability of a municipal corporation when exercising governmental functions, and the overwhelming weight of outside authority in cases similar to the one we have under consideration, we are constrained to hold that the defendant is not liable to the plaintiff for any injuries which he may have sustained while confined in the city guard house, by reason of its improper construction and unwholesome condition, or by reason of the failure of the municipal authorities to provide the means by which he could have protected himself from the inclemency of the weather during his imprisonment.

2. We think that the municipal corporation was not liable for another reason. The petition alleges that the plaintiff "was without just cause arrested by the police officers of the city of Griffin without a warrant, and was placed in a certain place, called the 'guard house' of the said city"; that "he was not drunk or disorderly, and no reasonable cause can be assigned for such conduct on the part of the city government, and he was not guilty of any violation of law whatever." If he was arrested without just cause, was not drunk or disorderly, was not guilty of any violation of law whatever, and no reasonable cause can be assigned for the conduct of the police officers in arresting and imprisoning him, then, clearly, his arrest and consequent imprisonment were the result of the tortious acts of the police officers, and for such acts committed by its policemen a municipal corporation is not liable. Section 744 of the Political Code provides that "a municipal corporation is not liable for the torts of policemen or other officers engaged in the discharge of the duties imposed on them by law." "A municipal corporation is not liable to an action for damages for the illegal arrest of a citizen by one of the police officers of the city." Cook v. Mayor, etc., 54 Ga. 468; McElroy v. City of Albany, 65 Ga. 387. Nor for the consequent imprisonment of the person arrested. Harris v. City of Atlanta, 62 Ga. 290. In Attaway v. Mayor, etc., 68 Ga. 740, the plaintiff alleged that the marshal and a policeman of the city, "in executing the commands of the said mayor and aldermen, did arrest and imprison him for the space of ten days in the calaboose of the said city, without lawful warrant, and without the authority of law; that the said imprisonment was wanton, inhuman, and brutal, because of the size, ventilation, and filthy condition of said calaboose"; and "that by reason of said unlawful imprisonment he became sick." In the court below there was a demurrer to the declaration, which was sustained; and this court affirmed the judgment upon the ground "that the city is not liable for the illegal acts of police officers," the court citing the three cases last above cited.

3. The defendant corporation was not liable for the act of the mayor in requiring the plaintiff to give a larger bond than the law authorized. In fixing the amount of the bond, the mayor acted in a judicial capacity, and for an error committed in the exercise of judicial authority a municipal corporation is not liable. Pol. Code, § 748; Bartlett v. City of Columbus, supra. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

KRUGER et al. v. WALKER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1900.)

CREDITORS' SUIT—PARTIES—PLEADING—VENUE.

1. An equitable petition wherein the plaintiff declares upon a dormant judgment, and whereby he seeks to subject to the satisfaction of his claim property alleged to be that of his debtor, whose title thereto, by reason of a conspiracy between him and another, has been covered up and concealed by fraudulent conveyances, is not demurrable for want of equity, or on the ground that the plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law.

2. The person with whom the debtor defendant made the alleged fraudulent conspiracy is a proper party defendant to such an action.

3. Such a petition is not multifarious, and is maintainable notwithstanding the plaintiff has no existing lien upon the property of the main defendant.

4. The objection, raised by demurrer, that the plaintiff's petition failed to show that the dormant judgment declared upon was binding upon the individual assets of the partners composing the firm against which such judgment was alleged to have been rendered, was fully met by an appropriate amendment.

5. There being in the petition a prayer for substantial relief against the debtor, the action was properly brought in the county of his residence; and, his alleged co-conspirator being a proper party defendant, the superior court of that county had jurisdiction of the case, irrespective of the latter's residence.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Action by B. F. Walker against L. V. Kruger and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant Kruger brings error. Affirmed.

J. C. Jenkins and Mayson & Hill, for plaintiff in error. Westmoreland Bros., for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. An equitable petition was filed in the superior court of Fulton county by B. F. Walker, the portions of which now material are, in substance, as follows: On the 28th day of June, 1890, the plaintiff obtained a judgment against the partnership of Chambers & Co., then composed of R. Chambers, who has since become a nonresident of this state, and George B. Nazerenus, who then resided and still resides in Fulton county. Both partners were served. In 1892 and 1893 Nazerenus, with his own funds, purchased a number of described lots in said county from S. A. Inman and others. He fraudulently had the titles made to himself as trustee for Mrs. Laura V. Kruger, his daughter, who now resides in Coweta county; his purpose in so doing being to hinder, defraud, and defeat the plaintiff in the collection of his judgment. Each of the trust deeds embraced a power authorizing Nazerenus to sell and convey the property therein described without an order of court. The title to these lots is really vested, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, in Nazerenus in his individual capacity, as the deeds were made for his benefit, and were taken, as stated, merely as a subterfuge "to hide property from his creditors." Mrs. Kruger was a party to this fraudulent scheme to defraud the plaintiff, and is collecting the rents on the property, and holding the title deeds thereto, without ever having paid any part of the consideration therefor, being purely a volunteer. The alleged fraud was not discovered by the plaintiff till August, 1897. He then caused an execution issued upon his judgment to be levied, when a claim was filed by Mrs. Kruger. On the trial thereof he offered in evidence "the said fi. fa., with the indorsements thereon," but, objection being made thereto "on the ground that said judgment and execution were dormant, —the entries of the sheriff of nulla bona never having been entered by the clerk of the court in the general execution docket of said county,"—and the court sustaining this objection, plaintiff had no recourse but to dismiss the levy; it appearing from an examination of "the said execution docket," which was produced in court, that the same "did not disclose that said nulla bona returns had been so entered." There is no property, other than the realty described in the trust deeds, out of which the plaintiff can make his money. The petition, among other things, prayed (1) for service on Chambers, Nazerenus, and Mrs. Kruger; (2) for a judgment against Chambers & Co.; (3) that the title to the lots above mentioned be declared to be in Nazerenus, and that the same be subjected to the plaintiff's judgment; (4) that Nazerenus and Mrs. Kruger be enjoined from conveying the property; (5) that a receiver be appointed; and (6) for general relief. Mrs. Kruger filed a demurrer, which presented for adjudication the questions discussed below. The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the case as to her, but subsequently, during the same term, rescinded this action, and passed an order overruling Mrs. Kruger's demurrer, to which order she excepted.

1. The first two grounds of the demurrer were that there was "no equity in the complaint," and that the plaintiff had a complete and adequate remedy at law. That these points are without merit is settled by the decision in the case of De Lacy v. Hurst, 83 Ga. 223, 9 S. E. 1052. It was in that case held, "The former rule that courts of equity would not entertain a bill as long as the plaintiff had a common-law remedy, and that he must allege and prove that he had sued his claim to judgment, and had an execution issued thereon, on which a return of nulla bona had been made by the sheriff, before equity would take jurisdiction and aid him by setting aside fraudulent conveyances, etc., has been abolished since the passage of the uniform procedure act of 1887, which confers upon the superior courts jurisdiction to hear and determine all causes of action, legal or equitable, or both."

2. The next point presented by the demurrer is that there is a misjoinder of parties defendant. It was argued here that Mrs. Kruger was not a proper party to the case. A complete answer to this contention is to be found in the case of Conley v. Buck, 100 Ga. 187, 28 S. E. 97, wherein numerous authorities were cited to show that where one or more persons enter into a general conspiracy with a judgment debtor, and endeavor, by means of fraudulent conveyances, to hide out his property, in order that the same may not be reached by his creditors, each and all of such conspirators may properly be joined as parties defendant to an equitable petition filed with a view to setting aside such fraudulent conveyances and establishing the right of the plaintiff to subject to the payment of his demand the property thus sought to be placed beyond his reach. The petition now before us, as will have been seen, distinctly alleges that Mrs. Kruger was a party to a fraudulent scheme entered into between herself and Nazerenus with a view to defrauding the plaintiff and defeating the collection of his judgment.

3. Other grounds of objection to the plaintiff's petition raised by the demurrer are "that there is a misjoinder of two or more separate and distinct causes of action in this complaint," and that "the plaintiff has not reduced his claim to judgment, and has no lien upon which to base his prayers for relief." The contention that the petition is multifarious is predicated upon the idea that it seeks a judgment based on the dormant judgment against Chambers & Co., and at the same time prays that the property described in the petition be made subject to the satisfaction of such judgment, when obtained. In other words, the complaint made is that the petitioner not only prays for a judgment founded upon his legal cause of action, but also that Mrs. Kruger be affected thereby, to the extent of rendering subject thereto property the legal title to which is in her trustee, and not in Nazerenus in his individual right. We hold, upon the authority of De Lacy v. Hurst, cited above, that neither this contention, nor the one setting up that the plaintiff has not reduced his claim to judgment, is well taken.

4. Still another point presented by the demurrer is that the petition fails to show that the judgment sued on is against Nazerenus individually, or that it was a judgment binding his individual assets. This objection was met by an amendment to the petition setting forth the record of the plaintiff's original action against Chambers & Co., from which it affirmatively appears that both of the partners were served, and that a judgment binding upon the individual property of each was accordingly entered up, agreeably to the provisions of section 2638 of the Civil Code.

5. The ground of the demurrer mainly insisted upon here was that the superior court of Fulton county had no jurisdiction over Mrs. Kruger, for the reason that she was a resident of Coweta county. In this connection it was urged that there was "no prayer for substantial equitable relief against any other defendant." We have already undertaken to show that it was proper to join Nazerenus and Mrs. Kruger as co-defendants to the plaintiff's action. If, therefore, the petition prayed for substantial relief of any kind against Nazerenus, this was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction over Mrs. Kruger. The constitution of this state declares that "equity cases shall be tried in the county where a defendant resides against whom substantial relief is prayed." Civ. Code, § 5871. In section 4950 it is provided that "all petitions for equitable relief shall be filed in the county of the residence of one of the defendants against whom a substantial relief is prayed, except in cases of injunctions to stay pending proceedings, when the petition may be filed in the county where the proceedings are pending." Unquestionably, substantial relief was prayed against Nazerenus. Nothing could be more substantial than to convert a dormant judgment without a lien into a living judgment binding upon specific property. The prayers in the present case, so far as they relate to the question of jurisdiction, are not materially different from those in the De Lacy and Hurst Case, and the ruling therein is direct authority for the one now made.

In addition to what is said above, we need only to further remark that while counsel for the plaintiff in error argued here that the petition was defective, in that the persons who conveyed to Nazerenus by trust deeds were not joined as parties defendant, there is no ground of the demurrer even vaguely presenting for determination any question as to this matter. Judgment affirmed.

PHINIZY v. GUERNSEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1900.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—LOSS BY FIRE —RIGHTS OF PARTIES—INSURANCE —ABATEMENT OF PRICE.

1. Where a binding executory contract for the sale of improved realty has been made, and the improvements are destroyed by fire before the vendor is in a position to convey the legal title, and before the vendee obtains possession, the loss is that of the vendor.

2. If, in such a case, the property was insured, the vendor is entitled to collect the insurance money in his own right, and does not hold the same in trust for the vendee.

3. Though, under section 4041 of the Civil Code, it might not, in such a case, be the right of the vendor to compel a specific performance by the vendee of the original contract, yet, under the provisions of that section, the vendee may compel specific performance; and, to this end, a court of equity will allow him such an abatement of the contract price as is just and reasonable in view of the changed condition of the property.

4. The rule for determining the amount of such abatement would be to ascertain if there was any difference, on the day the contract became binding, between the market value of the entire property and the contract price. In case there was no difference, then the purchaser would be entitled to a decree requiring the seller to convey him the property upon payment of a sum equal to the market value of the lot, without the building, on the day the contract was made. If at the date the contract became effectual the market value of the property was greater than the contract price, a sum representing this difference should be deducted from the market value of the lot without the building, and the balance remaining would be the amount which the plaintiff should be required to pay for a conveyance of the land. In this way the purchaser would obtain the benefit of his bargain. If the contract price exceeded the market value, the purchaser should pay, in addition to the market value of the lot without the building, the difference between the market value of the property at the date of the contract and the contract price. In this way the vendor would be given the benefit of his bargain.

Error from superior court, Richmond county; E. L. Brinson, Judge.

Action by Leonard Phinizy against C. H. Guernsey and others. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

J. R. Lamar, for plaintiff in error. Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. This was an action brought for the purpose of compelling the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land. According to the allegations of the petition, the defendants, who were the owners of a city lot upon which was situated a building, entered into a written agreement to sell the same to the plaintiff for the sum of $16,000, of which $5 was paid when the writing was signed, and the balance was to be paid when the vendee should satisfy himself that the vendors' title to the property was good. The plaintiff had agreed to take the property, but, though it is not affirmatively stated in the petition, it is clearly inferable therefrom that he never entered into possession. The written agreement to sell the property was signed on January 28, 1899. A conveyance of the property was delayed while the plaintiff was investigating the title, and after this investigation a further delay was occasioned by the fact that the defendants could not have canceled a security deed which they had given to the property, for the reason that the holder thereof refused to cancel the same until his bond for titles was surrendered, and that paper had been lost by the defendants. Pending this delay, on June 8, 1899, the building on the bargained premises was destroyed by fire through no fault of the defendants. There were at the date of the fire in full force policies of fire insurance for amounts aggregating the sum of $10,000. The plaintiff avers his desire to comply with the contract of sale, so far as it is possible, in the changed condition of affairs, to carry the same into effect. He alleges that he is willing to take the land, and that the amount to be paid by him should be ascertained by the application of equitable principles. There was no agreement between the parties with reference to the ownership of the policies of insurance prior to the actual conveyance of the property, though it was agreed that when the property was conveyed in accordance with the terms of the contract the policies of insurance should be assigned to the plaintiff. The prayers of the petition were that the defendants be decreed to make to plaintiff a conveyance of the land under the terms set forth in the contract of sale, the court to make an abatement in the purchase price to the extent of the value of the improvements destroyed by fire, and for general relief. By amendment, prayers were added that, in the event the court should be of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to an abatement of the purchase money by reason of the destruction of the improvements, a decree should be entered that upon payment of the purchase money the defendants should be required to make to plaintiff a deed to the land, and turn over to him the insurance money collected. There was a demurrer to the petition on the ground that the facts set forth did not entitle the plaintiff to the relief prayed, and that on account of the changed condition in affairs a specific performance of the contract was impracticable. The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition, and to this ruling the plaintiff excepted.

1. "When a binding agreement is entered into to sell land, equity regards the vendor as a trustee of the legal title for the benefit of the vendee, while the latter is looked upon as a trustee of the purchase money for the benefit of the former." Bisp. Eq. (5th Ed.) § 864. This rule, however, is not applicable unless there is an ability as well as a willingness on the part of the vendor to convey; the purchaser not being considered as the owner from the date of the contract unless the vendor is prepared to convey a clear title and is not in default. 1 Warv. Vend. p. 195. In the case of Mackey v. Bowles, 98 Ga. 730, 25 S. E. 834, it was held that if, after the parties had entered into a binding executory contract to sell, the property was damaged before the vendor was in a condition to convey, the loss fell upon the vendor, and not on the purchaser. The loss in that case arose out of the destruction by fire of a building situated upon the land which was the subject-matter of the sale. See, also, in this connection, Kinney v. Hickox, 24 Neb. 167, 38 N. W. 816; Thompson v. Gould, 20 Pick. 134. Applying the principles above alluded to to the present case, as the vendee had not gone into possession before the fire, and the vendors were not, prior to that occurrence, in a position where they could make to the vendee an unincumbered title to the property, they were the owners of the property at the date the fire occurred, and the loss resulting therefrom must fall upon them. If the contract has been so far completed that the vendee is to be treated as the owner of the premises, then the loss falls upon him, as was the case in Paine v. Meller, 6 Ves. 349, where it was held that when there was a contract for the sale of houses, which, on account of defects in the title, could not be completed,—the treaty, however, proceeding upon a proposal to waive the objection upon certain terms,—and the houses were burned before the conveyance, the purchaser was bound if he accepted the title; and the fact that the vendor allowed insurance on the houses to expire on the day on which the contract was originally to have been completed, without notice to the vendee, makes no difference.

2. The next question to be determined is, who was entitled to collect the insurance? As has been seen, the loss occasioned by the fire fell upon the vendors, and it would seem that the indemnity against loss should belong to them. This is, we believe, the rule in such cases. If the contract of sale had been so far completed that the vendors would have held the legal title as trustees for the vendee, then they would likewise have held title to the policies in the same capacity. But, as they were the owners of the property to the extent that the loss occasioned by the fire fell upon them, they will also be treated as owners of the property so far as the right to the insurance on the building is concerned. In Poole v. Adams, 33 L. J. (N. S.) 689, it was held that a purchaser of property insured, which was destroyed by fire, does not by the mere fact of purchase acquire a right to the insurance money. It has been held in some cases that, where a contract of sale is so far completed that the vendor is to be treated as the trustee of the vendee, the vendor would also hold in trust for the vendee a policy of insurance which was on the property at the time the contract was made, and that, if a loss by fire occurred between the date of the contract and the time fixed for the delivery of the deed, the vendor would be compelled to account to the vendee for the insurance money collected on the policy, as he was in equity the owner of the property at the time of the fire, and the loss fell upon him. Reed v. Lukens, 44 Pa. St. 200. See, also, Insurance Co. v. Updegraff, 21 Pa. St. 513; Williams v. Lilley, 67 Conn. 50, 34 Atl. 765, 37 L. R. A. 150; Grange Mill Co. v. Western Assur. Co. (Ill. Sup.) 9 N. E. 274. The rule is thus stated by the supreme court of Ohio in Gilbert v. Port, 28 Ohio St. 276 (Syl., point 8): "As between vendor and vendee under a valid and subsisting contract of sale of real estate, covered by a policy of insurance, where a loss insured against occurs after the date of the contract and before conveyance, the true test for determining for whom the money recovered on the policy belongs, in the absence of stipulations governing, is to determine who was the owner, and which party actually sustained the loss." As in the present case the loss fell upon the vendors, they were entitled to collect and hold the money due by the insurance companies on the policies issued on the property.

3. When there has been a binding agreement to sell improved real estate, and before the property is conveyed the improvements upon the property are destroyed by fire without the fault of the vendor, will a court of equity compel, at the instance of the vendee, a specific performance of the contract? Section 4041 of the Civil Code declares: "The vendor seeking specific performance must show an ability to comply substantially with his contract in every part, and as to all the property; but a want of title, or other inability as to part, will not be a good answer to the vendee seeking performance, who is willing to accept title to the part, receiving compensation for the other. If the defects in the vendor's title be trifling or comparatively small, equity will decree at his instance granting compensation for such defects." The section quoted is but a modification of the general rules recognized by courts of equity in reference to application for the specific performance of contracts. "It is settled that immaterial deficiencies will not deprive the vendor of his right to have the contract performed as against the vendee, provided that the deficiencies are such as may be compensated in money. Under such circumstances, the vendee may be compelled to take the property, and a suitable deduction will be made in the price. But, if the deficiencies are material and important, the vendee will not be compelled to take the property. He is entitled to have what he bargained for, and it would obviously be extremely unjust to force anything upon him which he had not designed or contracted to buy. If there is a failure in that which is an inducement to the purchase, he will not be compelled to take." Bisp. Eq. (5th Ed.) § 389. In Gould v. Murch, 70 Me. 288, it was held: When the owner of land with a building thereon agrees to convey it at a future day on payment of the purchase money, and before payment and conveyance the building is destroyed by fire without the fault of either party, the loss must fall upon the vendor; and, if the building formed a material part of the value of the premises, the vendee cannot be compelled to take a deed to the land alone, and pay the purchase money. See, also, Smith v. Cansler, 83 Ky. 367; Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514; Powell v. Railroad Co., 12 Or. 488, 8 Pac. 544; Kinney v. Hickox, 24 Neb. 167, 38 N. W. 816; Huguenin v. Courtenay, 21 S. C. 403. It may be stated as a general rule that, where property which is the subject of a contract of sale has been substantially damaged or materially changed between the date of the contract of sale and the time when the vendor offers to convey, the courts will not decree a specific performance of the contract at the instance of the vendor. The reason for this is apparent. The vendor has no right to force upon the vendee something which he has not agreed to buy. The rule is different, however, when the application for specific performance comes from the vendee. There is a manifest reason for this difference. The vendee has a right, if he sees proper to do so, to accept less than he bargained for, and compensation for the loss of that which he does not obtain. If, for any reason, the vendor cannot convey to the vendee substantially what the contract calls for, of course a specific performance of the contract according to its terms is impossible. Such obstacles to a specific performance may arise from a defect in the title to some portion of the premises bargained for, or from the fact that the interest of the vendor is different from that described in the contract, or the property may be subject to liens or incumbrances, or, if the subject of the contract is land, it may be deficient in quantity or quality or value. "In such a case there are only three possible alternatives for a court of equity to pursue: Either to refuse its remedy entirely; or to enforce the contract without any regard to the partial failure, compelling the purchaser to take what there is to give, and to pay the full price, as agreed: or to decree a conveyance of the vendor's actual interest, and allow to the vendee a pecuniary compensation or abatement from the price proportioned to the amount and value of the defect in title or deficiency in the subject-matter." Pom. Cont. § 434. In the same connection the author just quoted says: That the first alternative might often contravene the wishes and interests of both parties, and cannot, therefore, be taken as the universal rule. That the second one would be extremely unjust and inequitable, though it is occasionally resorted to when the vendee is not in a situation which entitles him to favorable consideration. That the third is based upon equitable principles. It endeavors to preserve the rights of both parties, and is therefore constantly resorted to and applied by courts of equity in aid of a vendee, and sometimes, although under more and greater restrictions, in aid of the vendor. But that there are circumstances under which even a vendee is not allowed to avail himself of the doctrine. In section 435 the same author says: "If the purchaser is willing and desirous to take the partial interest which the vendor can convey, and especially if he is the party calling upon the court for relief, there can be but little difficulty in granting him the remedy of performance, with a reasonable compensation for the defects." Mr. Bispham, in his work on the Principles of Equity, thus states the rule: "It may sometimes happen that defects exist which render the property less valuable than the contract price, but which nevertheless may not be of so vital a character as to induce the purchaser entirely to throw up his bargain. In such a case the equity of specific performance with compensation comes into play for the benefit of the vendee. He is entitled to have the agreement carried out, and yet at the same time to have an abatement or allowance made by reason of the defects." Bisp. Eq. (5th Ed.) § 390. See, also, Fry, Spec. Perf. (3d Ed.) §§ 1222, 1223; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. (13th Ed.) § 779; 2 Suth. Dam. (2d Ed.) § 589, p. 1311; 2 Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. §§ 624, 627; 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) pp. 942, 943; Harbers v. Gadsden, 6 Rich. Eq. 284, 62 Am. Dec. 390. The text-books and cases cited show that the doctrine of specific performance, with compensation for defects when the vendor cannot convey exactly what his contract calls for, is thoroughly established, and it is in rare cases where the court will refuse such relief at the instance of the vendee. It is true that in nearly if not quite all of the cases the inability on the part of the vendor to convey what the contract called for arose from some fact which was in existence at the time the contract of sale was made, such as defects in the title to a part of the premises, deficiency in quantity or quality or value of the property which was the subject-matter of the contract, and the like. There does not seem, however, to be any good reason why the principle should not be applicable where the inability of the vendor to convey a part of that which his contract stipulated for arose subsequent to the making of the contract, out of some transaction in which the vendee was not involved; and the fact that the vendor was himself without fault would not seem to be an obstacle which would prevent the application of the rule. Requiring a vendor to pay damages to his vendee for a failure to convey property which subsequent to the execution of the contract of sale was destroyed by fire is no greater hardship than requiring a vendor to pay damages on account of his having ignorantly, though honestly, and after the exercise of all possible diligence, bargained away something which he did not own, but which he believed was his own. That he would be required to pay damages in the latter case, no one will doubt. That he should be in the former case, ought not, it would seem, to be questioned, upon principle. In Lombard v. Chicago Sinai Congregation, 64 Ill. 477, which was a case of an executory contract for the sale of real estate, where the vendor was to furnish an abstract of title, and, if not satisfactory, he was to have the option of perfecting the title, or annulling the contract and returning the money paid, and the abstract failed to show title, and the vendor failed to exercise his option, after notice to do so, until after buildings thereon were destroyed by fire, the vendor still remaining in possession, it was held, on a bill by the vendee for the specific performance of the contract as to the land, and compensation for the buildings and property destroyed, that the contract was not so complete as to make the land the property of the vendee, so as to throw upon him the loss of the buildings, and that upon specific performance being ordered the vendee was entitled to compensation for the loss, to be deducted from the purchase money, and that the vendor was entitled to interest on the unpaid purchase money only from the time a good title to the property was shown, the vendor being entitled to the rents and profits up to such time. The case just referred to is the only one which has been called to our attention which is at all similar to the present case. Upon principle, however, we have no hesitancy in holding that the vendee in a case like the present is entitled to have a conveyance made to him of the land, and compensation for the loss of the building, provided the loss thus sustained is capable of computation. If the plaintiff sustains his allegations, a decree should be entered that the defendants convey to him the land which was the subject-matter of the contract, and that the purchase price be abated in such an amount as is just and reasonable in view of the changed condition of the property.

4. If the difference in value between the interest contracted for and the interest that can be conveyed is incapable of computation, of course the court will not undertake to enter a decree for specific performance, with compensation for defects. But, as has been said, in the light of many adjudicated cases, "It is conceived that the court will seldom now consider a difficulty of this kind insuperable." Fry, Spec. Perf. (3d Ed.) § 1240. We do not think the present case falls within the rule above referred to, as it seems to us that the amount which should be allowed to the plaintiff as compensation for the loss sustained by him in not obtaining a conveyance of the land with the building on it can be made the subject of exact computation. Let it be kept in mind that the plaintiff is entitled to be placed, so far as property and money will place him, in exactly the same position that he was in on the day that the contract of sale was entered into. If on that day the property was worth more than he agreed to pay for it, he is entitled to the profit on his bargain. If, on the other hand, the property was worth less than he agreed to pay for it, he must suffer the loss. Let it be ascertained what was the market value of the property with the building on it on the day that the contract was entered into. Let it also be ascertained what was the market value of the lot without regard to the building on that day. If the market value of the improved lot was more than the contract price, the difference between these two sums would be the profit that the plaintiff would have realized on his bargain. Deduct the amount of profit from the market value of the lot alone, and the sum remaining will be the amount which the plaintiff should be required to pay. If the market value of the property and the contract price are the same, then the plaintiff should be required to pay a sum which would equal the market value of the lot without the building. If the market value of the whole property was less than the contract price, then the plaintiff should be required to pay the market value of the lot without the building, and in addition to this the difference between the market value of the lot and building and the contract price, provided that in no event should the plaintiff be required to pay more than $16,000. While we find no rule for computing the amount of compensation in such cases, we think the above rules are in accordance with equitable principles, and are deducible from the general rules which seem to have been recognized by the courts and text writers. See, in this connection, Smith v. Kirkpatrick, 79 Ga. 410, 7 S. E. 258; 2 Suth. Dam. (2d Ed.) pp. 1311, 1312; 2 Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. § 629; Wilcoxon v. Calloway, 67 N. C. 463; Fry, Spec. Perf. (3d Ed.) § 1239. The prayers of the petition were broad enough to authorize relief along the lines above indicated. The court erred in sustaining the demurrer, and the case should be tried in the light of what is here laid down. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

WALKER v. EDMUNDSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1900.)

TENANT HOLDING OVER—DEFENSES—STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

Where a landlord sues out a warrant to eject a tenant on the ground that he is holding over and beyond his term, and the tenant, in his counter affidavit, denies these allegations, and alleges that he had made a contract with the plaintiff whereby he rented the premises for the term of two years at a specified monthly rental, and purchased a stock of goods from the plaintiff (the goods being in one of the houses on the premises), and in the same contract the plaintiff agreed and stipulated that the defendant might, at any time within two years from the date of the contract, purchase the premises, with a specified number of acres of land, at a specified price per acre for the land, and the cost of the material of which the houses were built, held, that the defense was not demurrable on the ground that it did not allege whether the contract was oral or in writing, nor on the ground that it failed to allege any sufficient consideration for the contract, and showed that the same was unilateral, nor on the ground that it set up a contract too indefinite to be enforced.

Error from superior court, Johnson county; B. D. Evans, Judge.

Action by W. E. Walker against J. S. Edmundson. From a judgment overruling a demurrer to defendant's counter affidavit, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

A. F. Daley and J. L. Kent, for plaintiff in error. V. B. Robinson, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. A warrant was sworn out by Walker for the purpose of dispossessing Edmundson of certain premises on the ground that Edmundson was a tenant who had failed to pay his rent, and who was holding over and beyond his term. Edmundson filed a counter affidavit, denying that he had failed to pay his rent, and alleging that he had made a contract with Walker whereby he had rented the premises for two years at five dollars per month, and in the same contract purchased from Walker a certain stock of goods in one of the houses on the premises; that in the same contract Walker agreed that Edmundson might purchase the premises, with 25 acres of land adjoining, at five dollars per acre for the land, together with the value of the material of which the houses were built. He alleged that this contract of rental expired on April 29, 1899, and that on April 22, 1899, he had informed Walker of his acceptance of the option to purchase, and had tendered him the full amount of the purchase money agreed upon; that he had caused a survey of the land to be made, and that, instead of containing 25 acres, as stated in the contract, the tract contained less than 20 acres; that Walker had refused to receive the money tendered, and had threatened Edmundson with violence if he renewed the tender. The tender was renewed in the counter affidavit, which also alleged that Walker, to defraud the defendant and place a cloud upon the title to the land, had made a deed to his minor daughter. There were prayers that this minor daughter be made a party and the deed to her canceled, and that specific performance of the contract be decreed; the defendant paying the amount agreed upon, and Walker conveying him the premises. To this counter affidavit Walker demurred on the ground that it "did not set forth any valid and legal defense, and did not deny the expiration of the term of rent, but undertook to set up the right to exercise an option to buy under a contract without consideration, and which was unilateral in its terms, and too indefinite in its terms to be susceptible of enforcement by judgment of the court for specific performance." The court overruled this demurrer, and the plaintiff excepted.

There was no error in refusing to sustain any of the grounds of the plaintiff's demurrer. If the allegations of the defendant's counter affidavit are true, he has a good defense to the warrant seeking to eject him. He denies the indebtedness for rent, and denies that he is holding over as a tenant, and, to sustain these allegations, sets up facts which constitute a good defense. If the defendant made a contract with the plaintiff to rent the place for two years, with an option given him to purchase within that time, and he gave notice in time to the plaintiff that he would purchase, and, having paid up his rent to that time, tendered the purchase money agreed upon, then, of course, he was not indebted for rent, or holding over as tenant. When he had exercised his privilege and had tendered the purchase money, he ceased to be a tenant, and became, in law and equity, the owner of the premises. It was claimed in the court below and in the argument here that the contract for the sale of the land was within the statute of frauds, and that, inasmuch as the counter affidavit did not allege that it was in writing, the demurrer should have been sustained. We do not agree with plaintiff's counsel in this contention. The rule is well settled that it is not necessary to aver in pleadings that contracts required by the statute of frauds to be in writing are in fact so. When a contract of this kind is set up, the court will presume that it was in writing, unless the pleadings show to the contrary. Where the contract is alleged, without stating whether it is written or oral, the pleading is not demurrable because silent on this question. This point has been recently passed upon by this court and discussed in an elaborate opinion by Mr. Justice Lewis in the case of Draper v. Dry-Goods Co., 103 Ga. 661, 30 S. E. 566, in which the decisions of this court and many other authorities are reviewed and discussed. In that case it was held that a petition was not demurrable because it failed to allege that a contract which was within the statute of frauds was in writing. This ruling was followed and approved by a full bench in the case of Bluthenthal v. Moore, 106 Ga. 424, 32 S. E. 344, and it is unnecessary to further elaborate the subject here.

Nor was the contract in the present case without consideration. It will be remembered that the contract of rental of the premises, of sale of the merchandise, and of giving an option on the land, was all one. Edmundson agreed to rent the place and buy the goods, and Walker agreed to sell the land at any time within two years that Edmundson desired to purchase it. We think the promise of Edmundson to pay rent for the place, and the payment by him of the purchase price of the goods, was sufficient consideration for Walker's promise to sell him the land. In all probability, Edmundson would not have agreed to rent the place and buy the goods at the agreed terms if Walker had not given the option as a part of the contract. It is probable that Edmundson was induced to buy the goods for a larger price by this opportunity to obtain the stand or location for merchandising, in the hope of continuing business there. Certainly he did have this option included as a part of the contract, and the consideration of the contract supports its every part, it being entire. Nor was the contract unilateral. One party agreed to pay rent and buy the goods, and the other promised to allow the use of the rented place, to sell the goods, and to sell the land, at the option of the first. True, Edmundson had an option, and was not bound to purchase the land; but when he exercised his option, by offering to buy, the contract of sale then became binding on both parties. Upon these questions see the opinion of Mr. Justice Little in the case of Black v. Maddox, 104 Ga. 157, 30 S. E. 723.

We think that the contract set up by Edmundson was not too indefinite to be susceptible of specific enforcement. It was clearly alleged that the plaintiff agreed to sell the defendant two houses and a 25-acre tract of land, at five dollars per acre, together with the value of the material of which the houses were built. Here, then, is a contract which specifies the land involved, its exact location and boundaries, and that the price is to be five dollars per acre. It is true, the counter affidavit alleges that there is a deficiency in the number of acres; but as the contract provided for payment according to the number of acres, and not for a fixed price for the whole, there is no difficulty in ascertaining the exact number of acres to be paid for by the defendant. In such a case the vendee can enforce specific performance of the contract, abating the price on account of the deficiency. See Phinizy v. Guernsey (this term) 36 S. E. 796. The value of the material of the houses could be easily ascertained, and the fact that the price of it was not definitely fixed by the contract would not render the agreement so uncertain and vague as to defeat a proceeding to have it specifically enforced.

For these reasons, we think that the judge did not err in overruling the demurrer filed by the plaintiff to the defendant's counter-affidavit. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

MOORE v. KELLEY & JONES CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1900.)

CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT—WRONGFUL DISCHARGE—ACTION FOR SALARY—PLEADING.

1. A declaration alleging that the plaintiff and defendant had, after certain correspondence, entered into a contract of employment, under which the plaintiff was employed by the defendant for one year at a specified salary, which was payable monthly; that, after he had performed his services for several months, he was wrongfully discharged by his employer; that he was ready and willing to perform the services, but the employer refused to accept them; that he had recovered a judgment for a part of his salary; and that this action was for the recovery of the balance,—sets forth a cause of action.

2. The recital in the declaration of the correspondence which led up to the contract finally made was mere surplusage, and need not have been set out in full in response to a special demurrer based on the ground that it was not so set forth. So likewise with the recital of the judgment for a part of the plaintiff's salary.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Action by one Moore, doing business as V. A. Moore & Co., against the Kelley & Jones Company. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Culberson & Willingham, for plaintiff in error. C. D. Maddox, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. Suit was brought by one Moore, doing business under the firm name of V. A. Moore & Co., against the Kelley & Jones Company for the balance of plaintiff's salary under a contract of employment for one year at a salary of $200 per month. The petition contained many allegations which were useless and superfluous. The defendant demurred generally and specially, some of the grounds of demurrer being as useless and superfluous as the allegations of the petition just referred to. The plaintiff amended his petition by striking therefrom some of the allegations, and thus reduced it to substantially the following: The defendant company is indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $1,000 for salary covering the period from September 12, 1898, to February 12, 1899, inclusive. This indebtedness arose in the following manner: In January, 1898, plaintiff received a letter from defendant, seeking plaintiff's services as sales agent; the letter concluding with a request for statement of what salary per year, payable monthly, plaintiff would require. Plaintiff replied January 29, 1898, that he would take business at $3,000 per annum, payable $250 per month, and discontinue some smaller lines he had already. Defendant replied February 4, 1898, that it could not pay amount asked, but would pay at the rate of $200 per month, and, if the sales justified, even more. Defendant wired plaintiff to come to Pittsburg, Pa., which plaintiff did. Defendant then renewed proposition to employ plaintiff as sales agent for certain states for one year, at a salary payable monthly, at rate of $200 per month, beginning February 12, 1898. This proposition plaintiff then and there accepted, and he returned to Atlanta, and at once entered faithfully upon the discharge of his duties under said contract. Plaintiff was notified in May, 1898, that owing to the dullness of the trade his services must be dispensed with after June 12, 1898. Plaintiff refused to consent to this termination of the contract, as he was employed by the year, and insisted on a compliance by defendant with the terms of the contract. Plaintiff continued to take orders, but defendant refused to fill them. Defendant would then write to parties giving orders, and tell them that any orders sent directly to defendant would be filled. Plaintiff was ready at all times to comply with contract, and so notified defendant, which persistently refused to accept any services from plaintiff. Plaintiff has obtained judgment against defendant for the amount due him up to September 12, 1898, and now sues for $1,000, the amount due under his contract up to February 12, 1899; that is to say, for his salary due him for the months ending, etc. The demurrers were renewed, and the court sustained them and dismissed the action.

1. We think that the petition set out a cause of action. If the contract of employment was for one year, at a stipulated salary, payable monthly, and the employer wrongfully discharged the employé, the latter can bring his action at the expiration of each month for the amount of his salary for that month; there being a partial breach of the contract each time the monthly salary is refused. In the case of Blun v. Holitzer, 53 Ga. 82, it was decided that "where the plaintiff was employed for one year, at a stipulated sum per month, but was discharged before the expiration of his term, and thereupon sued and obtained a judgment for the amount due up to the time of such discharge, he is not thereby estopped from instituting proceedings to recover the balance due him for the remaining portion of the year." In the case of Isaacs v. Davies, 68 Ga. 169, it was held, "If a servant be employed for five months at a specified rate per month, payable monthly, and pending the employment he be wrongfully discharged, he may, in his option, sue at the end of each month, and a recovery for one month will be no bar to a suit at the end of the next month." From these decisions it is clear that an employé is not obliged to sue for the breach of the contract as soon as he is discharged, nor is he compelled to await the expiration of the term of his employment before he brings his action.

2. The allegations in the petition that there had been a correspondence between plaintiff and defendant as to the terms of the employment, setting out the substance of the correspondence, may be treated as surplusage, inasmuch as the petition shows that the contract was not made in this correspondence, but in a personal interview between plaintiff and defendant; the correspondence merely leading up to this personal interview. As the action is not predicated upon this correspondence, it was not necessary, in response to a special demurrer, to set out in full the letters referred to in the petition. As it was unnecessary to allege that there had been any correspondence, such an allegation will be treated as surplusage, or as mere matter of inducement. The same reasons will apply to the grounds of the demurrer which were based on the failure to set out the record and judgment in the former suit to recover salary for the other months. It was not necessary to recite this former recovery of a portion of the salary, but what was alleged in reference to it was simply to show the reason the suit was not for the whole amount of the salary from the time of discharge. Viewing the declaration as it stands after amendment, we think it sets out a cause of action good against all the demurrers filed, and that the court erred in dismissing it. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

DAVIS v. MILLEN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1900.)

GARNISHMENT—TAX EXECUTION.

Where a tax execution has been by the tax collector transferred to a private person, such transferee cannot base upon it a garnishment proceeding against a debtor of the defendant in execution.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Tattnall county; B. D. Evans, Judge.

Action by J. T. Millen against C. P. Davis and one Swain, garnishee. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant in execution brings error. Reversed.

E. T. Davis and Jas. K. Hines, for plaintiff in error. E. J. Giles, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. A tax execution was issued against Davis. It was afterwards transferred to Millen, who sued out on it a summons of garnishment before a justice of the peace, and had the summons served on Swain. At the trial the defendant objected to the summons of garnishment as issued. The magistrate overruled the objections, and gave judgment against the garnishee. The defendant took the case by certiorari to the superior court, where the certiorari was overruled. The defendant in execution excepted.

Summons of garnishment can, in this state, issue in but three classes of cases: (1) Where there is a suit pending (Civ. Code, §§ 4549, 4705); (2) where a judgment has been rendered by a court having jurisdiction (Id. § 4705); and (3) where a tax collector has issued an execution, has it in his hands, and, being unable to find any property of the defendant, makes an entry of nulla bona thereon (Pol. Code, §§ 895, 896). Process of garnishment issued in any other case or upon any other ground is without authority of law, and a judgment based upon it is binding upon no one. "As [garnishment] proceedings are purely statutory, and cannot be extended to cases unprovided for, without mischief, the courts have no discretion to enlarge the remedy, or hold under it either persons or property not made subject to the process. Writs of garnishment can issue only in the cases enumerated in the statute. To entitle the plaintiff to the benefit he claims, he must show that his case is one clearly contemplated by the statute, for the remedy cannot be extended to doubtful cases." Rood, Garnish. § 13. In the present case no authority for the issuance of the garnishment can be derived from the power given to tax collectors by section 895 of the Political Code; for no effort was made to comply with its provisions, and the execution was not in the hands of the tax collector. There is no general statute allowing garnishment proceedings, other than as mentioned above, and we think that there was no authority for the present proceeding. A tax execution is not founded upon any judgment rendered by any court, and therefore cannot be the foundation of a garnishment proceeding. The Code requires the garnishment to be returned to the court in which the suit is pending or in which the judgment was rendered, except that, where a tax collector issues a summons of garnishment, it shall be returned to the superior court. This clearly shows that the statute contemplates that, except where the tax collector issues the summons, garnishment proceedings must be based upon a suit pending in some court, or upon a judgment rendered by some court. In the present case the justice's court had no jurisdiction to issue the summons of garnishment, and had no jurisdiction to try any issue made thereon. The judgment was, therefore, necessarily void, and the judge of the superior court should have so declared upon the hearing of the certiorari. Where a justice's court, without jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit, renders a judgment, and the case is taken up by certiorari, the superior court should reverse the judgment. If the superior court affirms the judgment of the justice's court, this court will reverse the judgment of the superior court. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

GUNN v. WILLINGHAM.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1900.)

INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—FELLOW SERVANTS—DEFECTIVE MACHINERY—NOTICE.

1. One who is engaged with others in raising, by means of a derrick, timbers which are being used in the construction of a house, and whose particular duties are to stand on a scaffold and receive and detach such timbers from the derrick when they are sufficiently elevated for the use intended, is a fellow servant of one who stands on the ground and operates the machinery which elevates such timbers, when the persons so engaged are under one common employment, receiving orders from another as superintendent of the entire construction; and this is so even if the person operating the derrick is invested with authority to direct how and when the elevation of the timbers shall be made.

2. Even if, in a given case, it be shown that the machinery and appliances furnished by the master for the prosecution of the work in hand were defective, he is not liable to a servant for an injury occasioned by defects of which the latter had knowledge before he was injured, if, with such knowledge, and without calling attention to the defects, he continued in the work carried on by the use of such machinery. Nor is he entitled to recover on the ground that the master negligently employed an incompetent fellow servant, unless it be made to appear not only that such fellow servant was in fact incompetent, but that this was known, or ought, in the exercise of due diligence, to have been known, to the master at the time of the employment, or else that the master negligently retained such fellow servant in his service under circumstances warranting a finding that he knew, or was fairly chargeable with knowledge, of such incompetency.

Error from city court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by J. H. Gunn against E. G. Willingham. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Hoke Smith and H. C. Peeples, for plaintiff in error. Westmoreland Bros. and Culberson & Willingham, for defendant in error.

LITTLE, J. Gunn instituted an action against Willingham by which he sought to recover damages which it is alleged he sustained by reason of the negligence of the defendant while the relation of master and servant existed between them. The petition and answer raised the issue whether the master had provided reasonably safe appliances in the work being performed by the plaintiff and those engaged with him in a common business, and also whether the master was negligent in the employment of an incompetent servant, who was handling the machinery at the time the plaintiff was injured. It is alleged that the master was negligent in each of these particulars, and that the plaintiff was free from negligence, and was engaged in separate work from that connected with the handling of the machinery, which was the proximate cause of his injury. It appears from the evidence of the plaintiff, who was a witness in his own behalf: That he was an experienced carpenter in the employ of the defendant in July, 1897, when he was injured. That the defendant was a contractor engaged in the construction of a large building to be used for manufacturing purposes. In the construction of the building a derrick something near 75 feet in length was being used. It was constructed by lapping pieces of timber together, and having them heavily spiked and bolted. It also appears that the plaintiff and one other employé of the defendant constructed the derrick, which was used for hoisting heavy timbers to the top of the work as it progressed. Originally this derrick was operated by one Carey, who, the plaintiff testified, had experience in that business; and the witness, who had knowledge of such matters, was satisfied with the manner of the construction of the derrick, and the way in which Carey handled it. The base of the derrick was originally placed on the ground floor of an old building which stood on the same site, and which had been previously used for the manufacture of commercial fertilizers. On the day previous to the time when plaintiff was injured, the derrick was put in charge of one Brantley, and Carey had charge of the landing of the timbers. The plaintiff, Brantley, Carey, and others were building the house together. When Brantley took charge of the derrick, he cut off a part of it, and took it out of the cellar or pit and placed it on a bank, supporting it as it was supported before,—by three guy ropes which were attached to stakes driven in the ground 15 or 20 feet from the mast of the derrick. At the time he was injured the derrick was being used to carry heavy timbers to the top of the building. Plaintiff was on a scaffold, helping to receive the timbers brought up by the derrick, and was 50 feet above the ground. While the heavy timbers were being brought up, one of the ropes broke, and the derrick was overthrown, striking the scaffold and precipitating plaintiff to the ground. The guy ropes were being used in the same way that they had been theretofore used, and were fastened in the form of a triangle, with the mast of the derrick as the apex. The guy ropes were new at the beginning of the work, but they were small,—about an inch or three-quarters of an inch in diameter. Witness had seen larger guy ropes used to elevate timbers of that character, but these had sustained similar loads up to that time without being broken. Plaintiff knew that these ropes were being used, and that the ropes were too small, but did not consider it his business to suggest that fact. He thought the ropes were liable to break, using them so long, and he considered it dangerous work, anyway. At the time the ropes gave way and caused the derrick to fall, Brantley himself was managing the derrick. There was acid in the cellar, and before the derrick was removed the guy ropes often got in the acid, because it was banked up in the cellar. At the time plaintiff was hurt the building was almost completed, and the derrick was taken out of the cellar in order to carry the timbers which were necessary to complete it to the top of the building. Plaintiff had known Brantley ever since he was a boy. They had worked together before the superintendent hired the plaintiff and Brantley to engage in this work. Brantley's business was that of a carpenter and wood workman. Plaintiff did not know of any experience he had in the management of derricks. Previous to the time when Brantley took charge of the derrick, he was engaged at work on another building, and when that was finished he came to this one. There was testimony, also, tending to show that the derrick was not properly managed by Brantley; and one witness testified that, while he had known Brantley to handle smaller derricks, he had never before known him to handle a derrick of that size, and that a failure by Brantley to follow the instructions of Carey caused the derrick to fall. Evidence was also introduced tending to show that one of the guy ropes of the derrick was fastened to a tree, another under the railroad iron, and the other to a stake driven in the ground; that the derrick was in a leaning position, against the line which was fastened to the stake, which caused the stake to be pulled out of the ground. When the stake was pulled out of the ground the weight was thrown on the rope, which broke. The stake was driven in the ground two feet,—sufficiently, in the opinion of the witness, to have held the rope. At the time of the fall, Brantley was directing the operations. Another witness, who stated that he had experience in such matters, testified, among other things: That he saw the derrick after it was fixed. That there was nothing about it sufficient to call attention that anything was wrong. Jim Brantley was doing the work with a squad of men. Jim Brantley was under William Brantley, and William was under Padgett, and Padgett worked for the defendant. Padgett, the superintendent, was there frequently, as was also the defendant. On the conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiff, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was granted, and the plaintiff excepted.

1. It is insisted here that the nonsuit was improperly granted, and that the evidence showed that the ropes used to support the derrick were too small; that the superintendent in charge of the derrick managed it improperly; that he was incompetent, that the master knew all this, or ought to have known it; and that the plaintiff received his injuries because of the defective ropes and the improper handling of the derrick by the incompetent foreman, while the plaintiff was in the discharge of his duty, using due care. Our Civil Code (section 2610) declares that, except in case of railroad companies, the master is not liable to one servant for injuries arising from the negligence or misconduct of other servants about the same business. There certainly cannot be any serious contention but that Brantley, who was operating the derrick, and the plaintiff, who was receiving the timbers which the derrick carried to the top of the building, were engaged about the same business. They and the others with them were engaged in the construction of a house. In order that the necessary timbers might be taken to the top of a building, it was important that a derrick should be used. In using it, it was necessary that some one should so direct its movements that the necessary timbers should be fastened to this lifting power, and also necessary that when such timbers had reached the proper height they should be received and detached. It was the business of Brantley to do the one, and of the plaintiff the other. This court ruled in the case of McGovern v. Manufacturing Co., 80 Ga. 227, 5 S. E. 492, that a workman engaged with two others, and having the direction of the work in the picker room of a factory, as foreman, was not the general superintendent of the corporation operating the factory, so as to render it liable for his negligence in starting a machine, whereby another employé was injured. And in case of Ellington v. Lumber Co., 93 Ga. 53, 19 S. E. 21, where a number of previous cases ruling on the question as to who are fellow servants are referred to, quoting from Mr. Wood in his treatise on the Law of Master and Servant, the court said: "It is subjection to the same general control, coupled with an engagement in the common pursuit, that affords the test." And, without further reference to this or the great number of other adjudicated cases which elaborate the law declaring who are fellow servants, it is sufficient to say, under this test, that Brantley, the foreman of the squad, and the plaintiff, were fellow servants. They were engaged in one common employment, which was placing timbers on a house in process of erection. One gave the orders, the timbers were attached to the machine, the foreman then raised them by the application of machinery, and the plaintiff received them. It was a common pursuit. Both were subject to another Brantley, that Brantley to Padgett, and all to the defendant, Willingham. They were, in our opinion, fellow servants.

2. While the master is not liable for injuries arising from negligence or misconduct of other servants about the same business, he is liable for the failure to exercise ordinary care in the selection of his servants, and of their retention after he has knowledge of their incompetency. He must also exercise the same degree of care in furnishing machinery equal in kind to that in general use, and which is reasonably safe for all persons who operate it with ordinary care and diligence. Civ. Code, § 2611. These are but the rules of the common law, and the principle upon which they are founded is that one man is not to be held liable for the negligence or misconduct of another, unless that one owes to the person injured by such misconduct or negligence a duty; and, in an issue arising between master and servant, that duty must be shown. The burden of proving negligence upon the part of the master is on the servant, and he is bound to show that the injury arose from defects known to the master, or which he would have known by the exercise of ordinary care, or that the master has failed to observe precautions essential to the protection of the servant which ordinary prudence would have suggested. Wood, Mast. & S. § 368. And no presumption of negligence on a master's part is raised from the mere fact that an injury results to a servant from a latent defect in machinery or other appliances used in a particular business. There must be evidence of negligence connecting him with the injury. Id. So that, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover in this case, the burden was upon him to show this negligence. It is insisted first that the evidence was sufficient to carry this case to the jury; that the master was negligent in not furnishing proper ropes by which the derrick was to be upheld. We do not think so. The only evidence relating to that subject is as to the size of the rope, and that it had been stretched in a cellar, where there was an accumulation of acid. It was not shown that the rope had been affected by the acid. At best, it leaves only an inference that it might have been. Nor was it shown of what size a rope should have been, to have been safely used in carrying necessary timbers to the building which was being erected. It is true that the plaintiff says that the rope used was too small, and yet, according to his own evidence, he does not know anything more than that one of the ropes broke. The manner of the breaking is explained by another witness for the plaintiff, who, in giving an account of the accident, says that a stake to which one of the ropes was attached, in consequence of the strain upon it, was drawn from the ground. If this be true, the rope bore the strain sufficiently to draw up the stake without breaking, and the fault would seem to have been that the stake had not been sufficiently fastened. The same witness, testifying as to the breaking of the rope, says that after the stake was drawn from the ground the derrick pressed against another rope, and by its weight caused it to break. So, therefore, it does not appear at all that the rope was broken because of the strain of operating the derrick. But suppose we assume that the rope was too small for this use, and even go further, and assume that the rope was injured by its contact with acid, which does not appear; a sufficient reply to the plaintiff's right of recovery is that he knew of both facts preceding the occasion of his injuries, and with this knowledge continued the work. It is declared by section 2612 of our Civil Code that a servant assumes the ordinary risk of his employment, and is bound to exercise his own skill and diligence to protect himself. In suits for injuries arising from the negligence of the master in failing to comply with his duties, it must appear that the master knew, or ought to have known, of the defects or danger in the machinery supplied, and it must also appear that the servant injured did not know, and had not equal means of knowing, such fact, and, if he exercised ordinary care, could not have known thereof. The liability of a defendant in a case like this arises from the fact that he was the cause of the injury, by employing the servant in a particular work when he knew or ought to have known that the machinery by which he carried on the work could not be safely used for that purpose, and that its use was accompanied by extra risk and danger. Loonam v. Brockway, 28 How. Prac. 472. But the rule is universal that he is not liable for injuries occasioned by such machinery if the servant has the same knowledge of its defects, or the danger incident to its use, as the master, in the exercise of due care, possesses, and at or before the time the accident occurred there was nothing to indicate any danger, such as demanded or suggested precautions which were omitted; nor, if the instrumentalities of the business are suitable, and proper precautions are adopted, is the master liable for an injury that results from an improper or imprudent use of the same by a co-servant. Wood, Mast. & S. § 371; Summersell v. Fish, 117 Mass. 312; Pitts v. Railroad Co., 98 Ga. 655, 27 S. E. 189. See, also, Ingram v. Lumber Co., 108 Ga. 190–197, 33 S. E. 961.

It is, however, contended that there was evidence showing that Brantley, who was operating the derrick, was incompetent, and that the master was chargeable with a knowledge of such incompetency at the time he was employed, or during the progress of the work, before the injury. It was shown, even by the plaintiff himself, that, as to general carpenter work, Brantley was a good workman. It was shown, also, by another witness for the plaintiff, that Brantley had experience in the operation of derricks. It is true that the last witness testified that Brantley's experience had been confined to derricks of smaller size, but nevertheless the fact remains that he had experience in the business of using a derrick to elevate material. This evidence was not sufficient to establish even that Brantley was incompetent. He might have been careless in the particular instance where the plaintiff was injured. He may not have observed proper precautions, and, had this been the issue, under the evidence the case ought to have gone to the jury. But that fact would not be sufficient to charge the master with liability. The burden in all such cases is upon the servant seeking a recovery to establish the fact that the injury resulted to him because the master did not exercise reasonable and proper care in the employment of the servant, and this must be established as a fact in the case, and cannot result as an inference from the circumstance that the servant causing the injury was even in fact incompetent. Baulec v. Railroad Co., 59 N. Y. 356; Moss v. Railroad Co., 49 Mo. 167; Davis v. Railroad Co., 20 Mich. 105. The question, therefore, relates to the want of care on the part of the master in employing the servant, even when it is shown that the injury occurred by reason of the negligence or inefficiency of such servant; and, taking all of the evidence of the plaintiff, we do not find that it contains anything which would have authorized the jury to determine that the defendant was negligent and failed to use proper care in the employment of Brantley. Indeed, the plaintiff himself testified that he had known Brantley a great many years, and knew that he was a good workman; and, while his testimony is to the effect that Brantley improperly managed the derrick, he did not testify to any fact from which it could be inferred that the defendant was negligent in employing him. The plaintiff was undoubtedly severely injured, but pecuniary compensation does not follow every personal injury. The work in which he was engaged was a dangerous one. He recognized that it was, and so testified. He was fully acquainted with the machinery that was being operated, and the appliances used to operate it. He knew his fellow servant Brantley,—knew his general capabilities. If he was in fact incompetent to manage the derrick, it was not shown that it was generally known; and the fact that he managed it improperly in a particular instance is not sufficient, of itself, to support the charge against the master of negligence in the employment of Brantley. The rule of liability in such a case is well fixed. The evidence did not make a case which would support a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, from any point of view, and there was therefore no error in granting the nonsuit. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

WATKINS v. BRIZANDINE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1900.)

ACTION—DISMISSAL—REINSTATEMENT—LACHES.

1. A motion to reinstate a case, made after the expiration of the term at which the order of dismissal was entered, stands, as to excuses for delay, upon the same footing as an "extraordinary" motion for a new trial.

2. There being in the present case no sufficient excuse for failing to make the motion to reinstate at an earlier term than that at which it was filed, the court erred in sustaining it.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Columbia county; E. L. Brinson, Judge.

Application of C. R. Brizandine for dower. Sarah Watkins, a creditor of the deceased husband of applicant, filed a caveat. Application dismissed. From an order granting a motion to reinstate, Watkins brings error. Reversed.

E. H. Callaway and Lawson & Scales, for plaintiff in error. Thos. E. Watson, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. On January 10, 1896, Mrs. C. R. Crawford, who was then the widow of William P. Crawford, but who afterwards intermarried with one Brizandine, made an application to the superior court of Columbia county for dower. Commissioners were appointed, who made their return to the March term, 1896, of that court, at which term Mrs. Sarah Watkins, a creditor of the estate of William P. Crawford, filed a caveat. The presiding judge being disqualified, counsel for the parties entered into a written agreement to try the case before an attorney at law, to be thereafter selected, as judge pro hac vice; the trial to take place in the city of Augusta after three days' notice to each of the parties. No attorney to act as such judge was ever agreed upon, and at the September term, 1897, of Columbia superior court, the application for dower was dismissed for want of prosecution. At the March term, 1899, of that court, Mrs. Brizandine filed a motion to reinstate the case, and also a separate motion to set aside the judgment of dismissal. Both motions were at the following September term heard and disposed of together by his honor, Judge Brinson, who passed an order setting aside the judgment of dismissal and reinstating the case. To this action of the court, Mrs. Watkins excepted.

A considerable amount of evidence was introduced at the hearing before Judge Brinson. This evidence warranted a finding that Mrs. Brizandine was justified in not appearing at the September term, 1897, for the purpose of giving attention to her case. As a reason for not taking steps at the March term, 1898, to have the same reinstated, she showed that she had prior to that term employed Mr. Thomas E. Watson to prepare the necessary motion, and that he was absent therefrom under leave of the court, on account of sickness in his family. It further appeared that Mrs. Brizandine was herself present at the September term, 1898, but was too ill to give attention to business. It did not, however, appear whether Mr. Watson was or was not also present at that term; nor is any reason disclosed why he did not then move to reinstate the case. The question is, did the judge err in passing the order of which the plaintiff in error complains? While, as above stated, two separate and distinct motions were filed, they were in essence the same, and amounted to simply an effort to have the case reinstated. Assuming that up to the September term, 1898, there had been no lack of diligence on the part of Mrs. Brizandine or her counsel, we are constrained to hold that no excuse is shown for failing to move at that term. In Austin v. Markham, 44 Ga. 161, it was distinctly ruled that "a motion to reinstate a case, made at a term subsequent to that at which the judgment of dismissal was had, stands on the footing of a motion for a new trial, and requires the same excuses for a delay as are required in motions for new trial after the term has passed." In the opinion Judge McCay said, in effect, that whether the dismissal was apparently proper, or the result of an error of law, "there ought to be the same excuses for delay as are required to excuse delay in a motion for a new trial." Applying the rule laid down in the case cited to that before us, we think it clear that the judge erred in reinstating the case. If the motions made by Mrs. Brizandine stand upon the same footing, relatively to the question of delay, as would an "extraordinary" motion for a new trial, it is obvious that she moved too late. There is not the semblance of an excuse for failing to present her motions at the September term, 1898. There may be some good reason why Mr. Watson did not do so, but, if so, the record affords not even a hint of it. The fact that Mrs. Brizandine was indisposed at that term does not, of itself alone, justify the action taken by the judge; for it does not appear that her counsel required any assistance from her in preparing a proper motion, or was for any other reason unable, because of her illness, to properly attend to the matter. For aught that the record before us discloses, her motion to reinstate could and ought to have been filed at that term, and, if there was any good reason why the same could not then be heard, it would, of course, have been proper to move to postpone the trial thereon. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

SANDS v. DURRENCE et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1900.)

APPEAL—REVIEW.

No material error of law was committed, and the evidence authorized the verdict.

Error from superior court, Tattnall county; B. D. Evans, Judge.

Action between J. J. Sands and F. B. Durrence and others. From the judgment, Durrence brings error. Affirmed.

W. T. Burkhalter and H. D. D. Twiggs, for plaintiff in error. J. P. Moore and Jas. K. Hines, for defendants in error.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed.

DUN et al. v. WEINTRAUB.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1900.)

LIBEL—WHAT CONSTITUTES—SPECIAL DAMAGE.

1. To publish of a merchant that he has given a mortgage upon his stock of goods, though the same does not appear of record, is not actionable, without allegations of special damage.

2. To publish of a merchant that he has not "succeeded in obtaining the implicit confidence of local people," and that "he is looked upon locally as an itinerant trader, of small financial responsibility and of uncertain prospects," is, if false, libelous per se.

3. Any disparaging words, spoken or written of a merchant, which are false and productive of special damage, flowing naturally and immediately therefrom, will support an action.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Richmond county; E. L. Brinson, Judge.

Action by Sigmund Weintraub against R. G. Dun & Co. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Irvin Alexander and E. H. Callaway, for plaintiffs in error. Russell & Rosenfield and E. B. Baxter, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Weintraub sued Dun & Co. The petition alleged that the plaintiff was a merchant, and the defendants carried on the business of a commercial agency, which undertook to give ratings of all persons engaged in trade, and also give such other information as would be desired by one to whom application had been made for credit by a trader. On February 2, 1898, the defendants published and circulated among their patrons a writing in reference to plaintiff which, among others, contained the following statements: "His stock and bills receivable amount to $1,975; owes for merchandise, $150; closed by notes, $200; insurance on stock, $1,000. Said to have a capital of $1,200, of which $200 is said to be borrowed. The capital is represented almost entirely by stock of goods on hand. Those in a position to learn state that he has given a mortgage to secure the $200.00 liability, though same does not appear of record." Though he "has paid his debts since he has been here, he does not seem to have succeeded in obtaining the implicit confidence of local people, however. He is looked upon locally as an itinerant trader, of small financial responsibility and uncertain prospects." It is alleged that the statement that he had given a mortgage to secure the $200 liability was false and malicious. It is further alleged that the purport of the statement in reference to the mortgage, and the intention of the defendants in making the statement, was to charge that the plaintiff was embarrassed and compelled to give a mortgage to secure his creditor, and was colluding with him to keep the same from record in order that the goods of others might be brought in and made subject to the mortgage whenever the mortgagee should see proper to record the same, and that the language, in effect, charged the plaintiff with being a common cheat and swindler. It was also alleged that the language in reference to plaintiff's not having obtained the implicit confidence of local people, and as to how he was looked upon by local people, was false and malicious, and the purport and intended effect of the language was that he was not entitled to the confidence of persons from whom he might seek to buy; it being a well-established principle of trade that, without local confidence, credit was not easily obtainable in other places,—the effect of the language being to charge that, from want of business ability or lack of honesty, he had failed to obtain the confidence of the business community in which he lived. It was further alleged that, after the publication of the statements above referred to, the plaintiff's credit was destroyed, and numerous items of special damage alleged to have resulted from the publication of the statements were set forth in the petition and amendment. To this petition the defendants filed demurrers, both general and special. The court sustained some of the special demurrers in so far as they related to designated paragraphs of the petition, which were stricken. The other special demurrers and the general demurrer were overruled, and the defendants excepted.

1. To write of a merchant that he has given a mortgage on his stock is not libelous per se. Newhold v. Bradstreet, 57 Md. 38; Dun v. Maier, 27 C. C. A. 100, 82 Fed. 169. Nor is it libelous per se to publish of a merchant that a judgment has been recovered against him. Woodruff v. Bradstreet Co. (N. Y.) 22 N. E. 354, 5 L. R. A. 555. The statements made in the financial report which is the subject of the plaintiff's complaint, so far as they relate to the mortgage which he is said to have given, contain nothing which is discreditable to him either as an individual or as a merchant. For a merchant to secure his creditor by mortgage upon his stock is neither discreditable nor dishonest, and there is nothing in such an act which is calculated to hold the merchant up to public ridicule or contempt. It might be otherwise if the charge had been that the plaintiff had made a fictitious mortgage, or that he had executed a mortgage to a bona fide creditor, and had colluded with him to withhold the same from record, in order that the goods of others might be fraudulently brought under the lien of the mortgage, or if it had been stated that he had given a mortgage for the purpose of giving a preference in violation of the bankrupt law. To execute a mortgage, which was founded upon no consideration, with the understanding that the same was to be used by one to whom the person purporting to be the mortgagor owed nothing, would, if used to the detriment of creditors or others, amount to a gross fraud. Withholding from record a mortgage taken in good faith for the purpose of misleading those to whom the debtor will apply for credit is a badge of fraud. Under the bankrupt act of 1898, the transfer by a debtor, while insolvent, of any portion of his property, to one or more of his creditors, with the intent to prefer such creditors from other creditors, would be an act of bankruptcy. Fost. Fed. Prac. § 72. But, even if charging any of these acts would make the publication a libel, there is nothing in the language used in the present case which would justify an inference that it was the purpose of the defendants to charge any of these acts.

2. Was the statement that the plaintiff did not seem to have succeeded "in obtaining the implicit confidence of local people," and that he was "looked upon locally as an itinerant trader, of small financial responsibility and uncertain prospects," libelous per se? Whether it would be libelous to say of a merchant that he is an itinerant trader, we will not stop to inquire, as, under the view we take of the present case, it is unnecessary to decide this question. To say of a merchant that he has not succeeded in obtaining the implicit confidence of his neighbors, coupled with the statement that he is a man of small means and of uncertain prospects, would be, to say the least of it, placing the individual thus spoken of in a position which is neither enviable nor desirable, and would be calculated to injure him in the estimation of the business men of other communities with whom he might be compelled to come in contact. The words imply that he has made an effort to secure the confidence of his neighbors, and for some reason has failed to attain this end, and that on this account, coupled with the fact that he is man of small means, his future success is doubtful. Such statements in reference to a merchant could have but one effect upon his business, and that is to seriously injure, if not destroy, his credit in those markets where the character thus given to him precedes his applications for credit. Such statements in reference to a merchant, when false, are libelous per se, as we understand the law. The Code declares that charges made of another in reference to his trade, office, or profession, calculated to injure him therein, are slanderous, without proof of special damage. Civ. Code, § 3837. And as said by the present Chief Justice in Hardy v. Williamson, 86 Ga. 557, 12 S. E. 876, "If this be true as to mere slander, much more is it true as to written defamation." See, also, Brown v. Holton (Ga.) 34 S. E. 717; 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) 314; Newell, Defam. (2d Ed.) pp. 74, 193; Odgers, Lib. & Sland. p. 77; Price v. Conway, 134 Pa. St. 340, 19 Atl. 687, 8 L. R. A. 193.

3. It is alleged that, by reason of the publication of the statements above referred to, plaintiff has sustained special damage, the items thereof being set forth in the petition. If the publication in reference to the giving of the mortgage was, as was alleged, false and malicious, and special damage resulted therefrom, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the items of special damage, though the language be not libelous per se. This is also true of any other statement set out in the petition, if it was falsely and maliciously made. If the plaintiff has sustained special damage by reason of the publication of the statements referred to in the second division of this opinion, he is entitled to recover for such damage in addition to the general damages he may recover by reason of the publication. See, in this connection, Odgers, Lib. & Sland. pp. 289, 309; Newell, Defam. (2d Ed.) p. 849, § 17. In reference to special damages the author last cited lays down the following rules: (1) They must be "actual and substantial; (2) they must actually have accrued at the time of the commencement of the suit; (3) and must be the immediate consequence of the defamatory words." Page 851, § 19. See, also, 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) 436. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

ALLEN v. HIXSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1900.)

INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—VOLUNTARY SERVICES —CAUSE OF ACTION.

1. An employé who, as a mere volunteer, does an act entirely outside of the scope of his employment, and in consequence receives personal injuries, cannot hold his master liable therefor.

2. No cause of action arises from a failure to perform an act of humanity, if such failure involves no breach of a duty imposed by law.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Richmond county; W. F. Eve, Judge.

Action by Agnes Allen against William P. Hixson. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report.

The plaintiff was a young woman employed in the defendant's laundry as an operative of a mangle, which consisted of an upright frame, holding two horizontal metallic rollers, covered with divers layers of cloth, and an uncovered hollow metallic bar between said rollers, and a lever or appliance on one side of said frame for the purpose of bringing the rollers in close proximity to the bar, and on the other side of the frame was an arrangement of bandwheel and cogwheel for receiving and conveying steam power to the rollers. The method of operating the mangle was to put the rollers in motion by the appliance of steam power through said arrangement of bandwheel and cogwheel, and then bring the rollers in close proximity to the bar by the use of the lever. When steam power was so applied, the rollers would revolve parallel to each other and to the bar, but with an interstice between them sufficient to allow the introduction of a hand; but when the lever was used for the usual operation of the mangle the rollers would be brought into such close proximity to the bar as only to admit of the passage between them of a collar, cuff, or other article to be laundered. After the application of steam power it was the duty of plaintiff to bring the rollers into close proximity to the bar by the use of the lever, and then to insert the articles to be ironed. One morning, on coming to work, she found that the power had been applied, and that the rollers were revolving, but she observed that they were not revolving in their usual and proper manner, namely, upon axes parallel to each other, but converged obliquely, so that at their right-hand ends, facing the machine, they were closer together than at the other ends. She further observed that the cloth layers on the rollers were not firmly wrapped around them in their usual manner, so as to remain firmly in position, but they appeared to be loose and loosening, so as to be unwinding from the rollers, the unwound portion lying in front of the rollers, and extending out upon the shelf in front of them. The lever had not been so applied as to bring the rollers into close proximity, nor did she apply it. Seeing that the machine was not in its usual condition, she did not attempt to use it, but reported that fact to Pickett, the representative, general superintendent, and master mechanic of defendant in said business; it being her duty to make such report to him and to obey his orders. He came to inspect the mangle. The unwrapped cloth concealed from view the condition of the rollers, and, in order to show Pickett such condition, she, using her right hand, took hold of the unwrapped end of the cloth, then lying on the shelf, in order to raise the cloth and allow an inspection of the rollers. The cloth could and would have been handled by her with perfect safety, but for a hidden defect in some other part of the machine, of which defect she had no warning or knowledge; but at the instant she so took up the cloth a sudden, violent, and unexpected jolt of said other part of the machine caused the rollers to come into violent contact with said bar, and at the same instant, and before she could drop the cloth or withdraw her hand, drew the cloth and her hand and wrist with great force and velocity between one of the rollers and the bar, crushing her hand and wrist. She alleges that the injury was directly caused by the defendant's negligence in having the machine in an unsafe and dangerous condition, which condition was known to defendant, she being unable, from her ignorance of the constructing and operating details of machinery, to state the mechanical cause of this condition; that she was not negligent, and could not, by ordinary care, have avoided the consequences to herself of defendant's negligence; and that defendant negligently allowed her hand and wrist to remain between the roller and bar for half an hour, thereby grievously aggravating her agonizing suffering, which she describes in detail. She also alleges her age, earnings, etc. A general demurrer was sustained, and she excepted.

F. W. Capers and Salem Dutcher, for plaintiff in error. Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. The bill of exceptions alleges error in sustaining a general demurrer to the plaintiff's petition, the substance of which appears in the official report. Assuming as true the plaintiff's allegations, we agree with the trial judge that she did not set forth a cause of action. It affirmatively appears that it was her duty to feed the machine by which she was injured, and it is a legitimate inference that it was also incumbent upon her to inform the superintendent that this machine was out of order. Beyond this, it cannot be gathered from her petition that anything more was required of her. It is therefore clear that she was not injured while in the performance of any duty growing out of the service in which she was engaged. It follows that the master was under no duty of protecting her against injuries received while she was, as a mere volunteer, endeavoring to accomplish something entirely outside the scope of her employment. The act which caused her injury was certainly one of this kind; for, in taking hold of the unwrapped cloth for the purpose of showing the superintendent the condition of the machine, she volunteered to perform a service not required of her, and therefore necessarily acted upon her own responsibility and at her own risk. It makes no difference that the machine had a defective part of which she was ignorant, for its existence could not, on the occasion referred to in her petition, have been the source of injury to her, if she had confined herself to the performance of the duties pertaining to the service for which she was employed. As will have been seen, the plaintiff was an adult, and actually knew when she first approached the machine that it was out of order. Recognizing the danger of attempting to operate it in that condition, she prudently refrained from so doing, and made a prompt report to the superintendent in regard to the matter. Unfortunately, however, she did not continue to exercise the same degree of prudence when she went outside the scope of her duties, and, without any direction or request on his part, volunteered to assist him in ascertaining precisely the extent and character of the derangement which had brought about the condition in which she had found the machine.

As to so much of the petition as claims damages because the "defendant negligently allowed petitioner's hand and wrist to remain between said roller and bar," or because of the defendant's "negligently failing * * * to effect her release," we do not think a good cause of action is set forth. When an employé, without fault on the master's part, becomes placed in a dangerous or painful situation, the master is under no positive legal duty of exercising all reasonable care and diligence to effect such employé's speedy release. Being in no way responsible for the unfortunate occurrence, the master cannot be said to be guilty of a tort if he does not promptly take active steps in coming to the rescue. The only duty arising under such circumstances is one of humanity, and for a breach thereof the law does not, so far as we are informed, impose any liability. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. EDWARDS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1900.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT—MASTER'S LIABILITY—PROXIMATE CAUSE—NONSUIT.

1. An employé who has suffered a physical injury cannot maintain therefor an action against his master merely because there may have been on the part of the latter negligent acts or omissions, which, though they may to some extent have contributed to bringing about a dangerous situation, in which the employé did an act from which the injury directly resulted, were not themselves the cause of the injury.

2. The only alleged act of negligence on the part of the defendant which could in the present case have been fairly found to have been a contributing cause of the injury not having been shown to be in fact an act of negligence, it was error not to have granted a nonsuit.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Effingham county; Paul E. Seabrook, Judge.

Action by H. L. Edwards against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant brings error. Reversed.

Lawton & Cunningham, for plaintiff in error. Twiggs & Oliver, for defendant in error.

LITTLE, J. It appeared from the petition of Edwards, who instituted an action against the plaintiff in error to recover damages for a personal injury which he sustained, that he was an employé of the Central of Georgia Railway Company, as brakeman on a freight train, at the time he received his injuries; that the train consisted of an engine and about 50 freight cars, besides one caboose. The plaintiff alleged: That on the day he was injured the train was running 40 minutes behind its schedule time, because of a defective driving rod, and of the large number of cars which were attached to the engine. That, owing to its delayed schedule, the train upon which he was employed was forced to enter a siding at Brewer, a station on the Central road, to clear the main line for the passage of a passenger train going in the same direction as the freight train. That sufficient side tracks for the passage of trains had not been provided, because the east switch of the side track had been temporarily removed, and it was necessary for the freight train to pass entirely beyond the west switch of the side track, and then back onto such siding. As the freight train was passing over the west switch at about the speed of 7 or 8 miles per hour, the plaintiff was standing on top of a car about 10 or 12 car lengths behind the engine. The conductor of the train was also standing on the top of a car, a few car lengths behind the plaintiff. That, when the train was passing over the west switch, the conductor, wishing to put his train on the side track as soon as possible in order to avoid a collision with the passenger train which was following, ordered the plaintiff to jump off of the freight train, for the purpose of changing the switch as soon as it became clear. That in obedience to the order the plaintiff, alleging that he was in the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care, proceeded to alight from the train, and, when he jumped from the ladder of the car on which he had been standing, was unable clearly to see the ground beneath him, and consequently his right foot, when he reached the ground, became fastened in the frog of the switch,—such frog not having been blocked so as to prevent the foot of the plaintiff from becoming fastened therein,—and the wheels of the car crushed and mangled his foot so that he never can have free use of the same, and that his left leg was badly broken, and is now one inch shorter than its natural length, and the ankle of the left foot is stiff and useless. The acts of negligence on the part of the railroad company, its officers, and servants, are alleged to be as follows: First, in allowing the driving rod and other machinery of the engine to get into a condition of disrepair, and thereby to cause the train to run behind its schedule time; second, in overloading with 50 cars the engine of said train, and thereby to cause said train to run behind its schedule time; third, in not maintaining and allowing to remain where it had been placed the switch at the east end of said track, and thereby to have avoided the necessity for the plaintiff to jump from the moving train, even though a collision was imminent, and in failing to protect said train so as to have avoided the imminence of a collision; fourth, in maintaining and using a switch, the frog of which was not properly blocked and guarded for the prevention of like casualties. That there was in use among railway companies, known to the defendant, a simple device, efficient and sufficient for the blocking and guarding of the switch frog, so that, had the frog been blocked and guarded by such device, the plaintiff would not have suffered the injuries described, and that the defendant knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care should have known, that the frog was not blocked and guarded. Plaintiff alleges that when he received such injuries he was entirely without fault, and in the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care. The defendant answered, denying each and every allegation of every paragraph of the petition. The plaintiff, after having shown the fact that he was very seriously and permanently injured, testified in his own behalf: That he was employed as brakeman on the freight train, which had about 50 cars, half of them loaded, and that such a great number of cars was unusual. That the train was late, on account of the crank pin of the driving rod being hot. That Guyton was five miles from Brewer, where he was injured. That there was a side track there sufficient to have held the train. That Egypt was the passing point for the freight and passenger, but that in fact on that day these trains passed at Brewer, because the freight was overtaken by the passenger at Brewer. That when the freight train came to Brewer the plaintiff was on top of a box car about seven cars from the engine. That the conductor was on top of a box car several car lengths behind him. That he looked back to the conductor for signals, and when the train was near the west switch the conductor signaled plaintiff, and pointed down to the switch and back to the passenger train. Plaintiff looked, and saw that the passenger train was about the length of the freight train behind. The conductor pointed as if he desired the plaintiff to get down at once on the west end of the side track. That the east switch had been taken up, and had it been there the train would have stopped and pulled in, and it would not then have been the duty of the plaintiff to change the switch. At the time he jumped he thought he had passed the switch. The frog was not blocked at the time of his injury, but afterwards was blocked with wood, so that it was impossible for a person to get his foot into the frog. This was the first time that he ever remembered to have seen one of the switches on the Central Railroad blocked that way, but now all the switches which he has seen since are blocked. The side track also, after his injury, was put in perfect condition, and, if a switch had been on the east end of the side track on the day his injury occurred, the train would have gone into the side track over it, and he would not have been injured. Before he was hurt he thought the frogs were in good condition and not dangerous, and did not know that they were liable to catch his foot. To ascertain that they were so, he would have had to make an examination. For this he had no time, and it was not his business to examine the switches. Plaintiff had been running on the railroad for five years, and had seen the switch where he was injured perhaps as many as three times a week. Plaintiff had seen one switch blocked with steel on the Plant System before he was injured. Had never seen any other. Had never heard of a blocked frog before he saw that on the Plant System of railroads. At the time he jumped from the car he did not know that he was jumping in the frog, because he could not see it. He looked as best he could under the circumstances. At the time plaintiff jumped from the train, it was moving six or seven miles an hour. He could not see anything that was under him, on account of the dust. That his object was to get off as quickly as possible, and he trusted to luck. His object in getting off quickly was to avoid a collision, and put the switch in order for the freight train to back in on the side track. If he had seen the hole or the frog, he would have gotten off if he could, but would not have jumped into them. The switch blocks are generally used on the Plant System, and are effective in keeping one's foot out of a frog. Witness did not know that the blocked frogs were used all over the Central Railway at that time. Had seen several. By another witness the plaintiff proved that an unblocked frog was dangerous; that a man could get his foot hung in it. By this witness it was proven that he had seen two or three of these blocked frogs on the Central Railroad. Another witness for the plaintiff testified: That he had worked for the Plant System and another railroad for seventeen years as a locomotive engineer, and that it was a part of his business to observe switches and frogs. That the Plant System had been using several kinds of frogs in the past five years. These will prevent the foot of a man from getting caught in the frog. A number of the rules governing employés of the Central Railway Company were also introduced, and the plaintiff closed his case. At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence the defendant moved the court to grant a nonsuit. The motion being overruled, the defendant excepted pendente lite, and had its bill of exceptions certified and put on record. The case proceeded to trial, and a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff. The defendant made a motion for new trial on several grounds, which was overruled, and it excepted, assigning error to the ruling of the court in refusing to grant the nonsuit and in overruling its motion for a new trial.

We think the court erred in overruling the motion for a nonsuit. Under the allegations made in the petition, the negligence of which the plaintiff complained that the railroad company, by its officers and servants, was guilty, consisted in the following acts: (1) In allowing the machinery of the locomotive which was pulling the train on which he was employed to get out of order, and so causing the train to run behind its schedule time; (2) in overloading the engine, thus causing it to run behind its schedule time; (3) in not maintaining and allowing to remain a switch on the east end of the side track at Brewer, so as to avoid the necessity which caused the plaintiff to jump from the moving train in order to set a switch at the west end of the side track; (4) in maintaining and using a switch, the frog of which was not properly blocked and guarded. Neither the fact that the machinery of the locomotive was out of order, nor that the engine had attached to it too many cars, nor the fact that there was no switch at the east end of the side track in Brewer, was the proximate cause of the injury which the plaintiff sustained. If these were causes at all, they were too remote as a basis for a recovery. Without entering into a discussion of the doctrine of proximate and remote causes of injury, it is only necessary to refer to the provisions of our Civil Code, in sections 3912 and 3913, declaring the rule on this subject. In the first of these it is declared that if the damages are only the imaginary or possible result of the tortious act, or if other and contingent circumstances preponderate largely in causing the injuries, such damages are too remote to be the basis of recovery against the wrongdoer; and in the latter the rule is stated to be that damages which are the legal and natural result of the act done, though contingent to some extent, are not too remote to be recovered, but that damages which are traceable to the act, but not its legal or material consequence, are too remote and contingent. The reasoning by which it is sought to charge the defendant company with the negligence which caused the injury to the plaintiff must be as follows: If the crank pin had not been allowed to get too hot, the freight train upon which the plaintiff was employed would have been able to make its schedule time; and, if it had made its schedule time, then there would have been no imminence of a collision at Brewer; and, if there had been no imminence of a collision, there would have been no necessity on the part of the plaintiff to jump from the moving train in order to set the switch. But the crank pin was allowed to get too hot to make the schedule time, and there was imminence of a collision, and because of such imminence the plaintiff jumped off from the car, and, as he was injured in such jump, he was entitled to recover because the crank pin was allowed to get too hot. Or, take the other proposition that, if there had been a switch on the east end of the side track at Brewer, the train would have entered said side track, and it would have become the duty of another brakeman to set such switch, and therefore there would not have been any necessity on the part of the plaintiff to jump from the moving train, and consequently he would not have been injured. However logical these deductions may be, they fail to establish a right of recovery in the plaintiff for the injuries which undoubtedly he sustained. To constitute an actionable tort, there must be damage to the plaintiff, and negligence by the defendant, causing the injury. Railroad v. Freeman, 75 Ga. 331; Mayor, etc., v. Dykes, 103 Ga. 847, 31 S. E. 443. See, also, Railway Co. v. Price, 106 Ga. 176, 32 S. E. 77, 43 L. R. A. 402, and numerous cases cited in the opinion on page 178, 106 Ga., page 78, 32 S. E., and page 403, 43 L. R. A. The direct and proximate cause of the injury which the plaintiff sustained was caused by his jumping from the train, and, if he is entitled to recover damages from the defendant company therefor, it is because of some negligence on the part of said company which caused either the jump from which the injury resulted, or negligence in not protecting the place where in fact he did jump. As we have seen, it is not charged in the petition that the railroad company was, through its conductor, negligent in directing the plaintiff to jump from the car at the time he did. Therefore, discarding these remote causes, so particularly set out in the petition, as in themselves not giving to the plaintiff a right of action, there must remain but one question, and that is whether or not the company was negligent in not protecting or blocking the frog in which the foot of the plaintiff became fastened, and from which fastening his serious injury was a consequence. By section 2611 of the Civil Code it is declared that the master is bound to exercise ordinary care in furnishing machinery equal in kind to that in general use, and reasonably safe for all persons who operate it with ordinary care and diligence. In the case of Whatley v. Block, 95 Ga. 15, 21 S. E. 985, our present chief justice quoted approvingly the rule which governs this subject, taken from 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 903, 904, in the following words: "A custom with reference to the adoption of certain safeguards in a given business must be so general that it is presumed that the defendant had knowledge of it, in order to make him liable for neglecting to provide the same." No general custom of any character was shown to exist in relation to blocking the frogs of a switch on a railroad track, either at the time the plaintiff sustained his injuries, or at the time of the trial. The evidence of the plaintiff on this subject only went to the extent of showing that since he had sustained his injuries certain particular frogs on the Central Railroad had been blocked, and that on the Plant System of railroads there existed a number of different kinds of blocks to such frogs. But the master, while bound to exercise due care in protecting his servant in the use of these frogs, cannot be bound to provide a particular contrivance until it is shown primarily that such a contrivance is a safeguard, to some extent, at least, against such injuries, and that it is a general custom among other persons engaged in the same character of business to employ them. The evidence entirely failed to show that the employment of these blocks was even a custom among railroads. Whether they are or not, we do not know; and, while the evidence of the plaintiff contained in this record is sufficient to show that they are a protection, it does not show that they were or are in such general use by the railroads of the country as to make the railroad company in this case responsible for their nonuse; and inasmuch as this general custom was not shown, and this being the only point set out in the petition as showing negligence on which a recovery could have been had if satisfactorily proven, it follows that a nonsuit should have been awarded. Because of so ruling, it is unnecessary to pass on the error alleged to have been committed in overruling the motion for a new trial. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

BROWN et al. v. EVERETT-RIDLEY-RAGAN CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 18, 1900.)

COMPROMISE WITH CREDITORS — SECRET AGREEMENT—VALIDITY—RES JUDICATA.

1. When one of several creditors of a common debtor who is in failing circumstances ostensibly agrees with the other creditors and the debtor upon a compromise and settlement of all their claims at a specified per cent. on the dollar, and the creditor first referred to, by a secret arrangement with the debtor, of which the other creditors are kept in ignorance, obtains from him money and promissory notes in addition to what is paid under the terms of the general settlement, this latter transaction is in law fraudulent, the notes given in pursuance thereof are void, and the debtor may recover the money paid in pursuance of the secret preference thus given.

2. The debtor may, in defense to an action upon notes so given, not only set up that they are void, and defeat a recovery thereon, but may, by way of cross action, claim and obtain a judgment against the plaintiff for the money paid in pursuance of the illegal supplemental agreement, if the amount claimed in the cross action is within the jurisdiction of the court.

3. When there are several of such notes, and the plaintiff brings two separate actions thereon and the defendant makes the same defense in each as to the validity of the notes, and also in each of his answers prays for a recovery of the money paid to the plaintiff under the illegal contract, a verdict rendered for such money in his favor on the trial of one of the actions would bar a recovery thereof in the trial of the other action.

4. The rulings and charges complained of in the present case were, in the light of what is above laid down, erroneous.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Washington county; John C. Hart, Judge.

Actions by the Everett-Ridley-Ragan Company against Brown & Franklin. The cases were consolidated, and judgment for plaintiff, and Brown & Franklin bring error. Reversed.

Rawlings & Hardwick and Evans & Evans, for plaintiffs in error. Phillips & Phillips, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. The Everett-Ridley-Ragan Company brought two suits in the county court of Washington county against Brown & Franklin and H. M. Franklin,—one on a promissory note for $100, and the other on two promissory notes of $100 each, besides interest. These cases were appealed from the county court to Washington superior court, and were there consolidated and tried together before a jury before his honor, John C. Hart, judge presiding. The answer to each case involved the identical issues for trial. To the petition the defendants filed answers admitting the execution and delivery of the notes sued upon. They denied any indebtedness on the notes, stating, in substance, that shortly before their execution the Brown & Franklin Company, a corporation duly chartered under the laws of Georgia, and then engaged in the mercantile business at Tennille, Ga., and composed of the following incorporators, to wit, C. E. Brown, H. M. Franklin, and B. W. Franklin, became very much involved financially, and failed, being indebted to many different creditors in amounts aggregating many thousand dollars. One of the creditors was the plaintiff in this case, the amount of its claim being $1,087.81. After the Brown & Franklin Company had failed, a meeting of its creditors was held at Macon, Ga., on or about October 27, 1894, and there were present or represented at that meeting many different creditors, representing claims that aggregated many thousand dollars. Among those present, and among the most active of the creditors in getting up this meeting, was Ragan, a member of plaintiff's firm, with full authority to act for plaintiff. At the meeting he advocated an acceptance of a compromise of 50 cents on the dollar by the creditors, which settlement was agreed to by them and by H. M. Franklin, who was acting in behalf of the Brown & Franklin Company. The meeting then adjourned, with the understanding that the settlement was agreed to if carried into effect by the Brown & Franklin Company within the next few days immediately thereafter; but after this adjournment Ragan took Franklin off privately, and threatened to break up the settlement unless his firm (plaintiff herein) got 100 cents on the dollar, assuring Franklin that, unless his firm did get 100 cents on the dollar, he (Ragan) could and would break up the settlement; and he promised Franklin that if he would give him notes for $300, and pay him the balance of the 50 cents (amounting to $243.90) in money, thus making the entire 100 cents on the dollar for plaintiff, he (Ragan) would assist him in carrying out the settlement with the other creditors, and would keep the giving of the notes and the payment of this money, in excess of the compromise agreed on, secret from them, and help him in every way possible in the matter. Franklin, being very anxious to settle up the entire business, and being alarmed at the threats of Ragan about breaking up the settlement, was forced to comply with the demands of Ragan, and in accordance therewith did give to plaintiff the notes sued on, and pay to it $243.90 in money, which belonged to H. M. Franklin and C. E. Brown individually and jointly. These were the notes sued on in this case. The payment of the money was kept secret from all the other creditors both by Franklin and Ragan. Defendants alleged that Ragan continued to use his influence with the other creditors to get them to stand to their promise, still concealing from them the fact that his firm was to get 100 cents on the dollar. A few days after the giving of the notes and payment of the money, the settlement was carried into effect; plaintiff still making it to appear to the other creditors that the Everett-Ridley-Ragan Company were only getting 50 cents on the dollar, like the balance, and still keeping secret the existence of these notes and the payment of the money. On account of these facts it was claimed in the answer that the notes sued on were absolutely fraudulent and void, and they further prayed to recover back the cash paid to the plaintiff. An oral demurrer was made by plaintiff's counsel to strike that part of defendants' plea in which they pleaded as a set-off the cash paid plaintiff over and above the demand of plaintiff against them; and this demurrer the court sustained, to which judgment defendants filed their exceptions pendente lite, and allege error thereon in the main bill of exceptions.

The case then proceeded to trial, and the following is substantially the testimony introduced in behalf of the defendants: On September 26, 1894, the Brown & Franklin Company made an assignment to J. M. Brown, assignee. On October 18, 1894, there was a receiver appointed by the United States court to take charge of the assets of this concern and wind it up. The company was indebted to the Everett-Ridley-Ragan Company, of Atlanta, in the sum of $1.087.81; and Willis Ragan, of plaintiff's firm, came down to see defendants after the receiver had been appointed, and suggested a settlement. The case was set for a final hearing about November 26th of the same year. After Ragan went back to Atlanta, H. M. Franklin, of the defendant corporation, went to Atlanta and saw him there, and Ragan agreed to accept 50 cents on the dollar for his claim. Franklin found he could raise the money to pay 50 cents. The final meeting of the creditors was had in Macon about October 29th, in the office of Hardeman, Davis & Turner, and all the other creditors agreed to accept 50 cents on the dollar for their claims. After the adjournment of the meeting, Ragan took Franklin aside, and told him that he would not accept 50 cents on the dollar, but had to have 100 cents on the dollar for his claim. He advocated the settlement publicly, but he said he would have to have 100 cents on the dollar, or he would break up the settlement. Defendants were not familiar with the practice in the United States court, and Franklin, who was acting for the company, had a dread of that court, and feared, if he did not pay to Ragan what he asked for his firm, it would break up the other settlement, and very much against his will he accepted his proposition and agreed to it,—gave him a check for the cash, $243.90, and three notes, of $100 each, for the balance, which were sued on in this case. Franklin further testified that he paid plaintiff's attorneys, Hardeman, Davis & Turner, the 50 per cent. agreed upon in the compromise by the creditors. Hardeman, Davis & Turner represented the other creditors also. They got 50 cents on the dollar for all their other creditors. Ragan had telegraphed to the witness Franklin to come to Atlanta, and this was the reason he went there to see him. Ragan advised the creditors to take 50 cents on the dollar for their claims, and told them he was only getting 50 cents on the dollar for his. The creditors had another meeting at the office of Hardeman, Davis & Turner, and Ragan made at this meeting a statement to everybody, publicly, that he was getting 50 cents on the dollar. He did not say anything in Atlanta about getting these notes, but told witness that after getting to Macon. "He said, if we would give these notes, he would help us in the settlement." Another witness, C. E. Brown, testified: That he was interested in the concern of the Brown & Franklin Company. Was present when Ragan came to Tennille. Ragan was the first man to mention settlement, and said he would settle at 50 cents on the dollar. He said, if the Brown & Franklin Company would pay that, he would do all he could to get the other creditors to accept it. There was also testimony that the accounts against these defendants after the settlement were transferred to J. D. Franklin, but it does not appear that he knew anything about it, and there was evidence to the effect that there was no consideration therefor. Another witness, B. D. Evans, testified: That in the fall of 1894 he was counsel for the Brown & Franklin Company. That, after the filing of the bill in the United States court, negotiations for settlement were opened up by H. M. Franklin with plaintiff's attorneys in that case. At his instance, witness went with him to Macon, and had an interview with Hardeman, Davis & Turner, at their office, respecting the settlement of the pending litigation. Ragan was in Macon at the time, and witness thinks he was present at the settlement, representing his firm. One Leonard was also present, representing Inman, Smith & Co. The minds of all parties met, and it was agreed that the litigation should be settled upon the payment by defendants of 50 cents on the dollar and the court costs. The 50 cents was to be received by creditors in full settlement of their claims. The parties to this settlement, as witness remembers, were Ragan (representing the Everett-Ridley-Ragan Company), Leonard (representing Inman, Smith & Co.), Hardeman, Davis & Turner (representing the plaintiffs in the bill), Franklin, and witness. Witness saw Ragan and Franklin have several interviews. Ragan, by his actions, impressed witness as assisting in bringing about the settlement, and he understood that the Everett-Ridley-Ragan Company was to receive in settlement of its claim the same as all the other creditors. He did not know any better until the Everett-Ridley-Ragan Company sent him the notes for collection, and witness told them he was disqualified from representing them. There was testimony introduced in behalf of plaintiff, and some conflict in the evidence of Ragan and the witness Franklin; Ragan claiming that he told Franklin when he came to Atlanta that he would not take less than 100 cents on the dollar for his claim. There was testimony tending to show he was not a party to the compromise agreement with the creditors. He admitted, however, that he did not inform his own attorneys that he had received anything at all on his claim in addition to the 50 per cent. that had been paid to his attorneys, and he thought they understood he was getting only 50 cents on the dollar.

After the close of the evidence and charge of the court, the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff for $300 and interest, costs of suit, and attorney's fees, whereupon defendants made a motion for a new trial, and to the judgment of the court overruling this motion they except.

1, 2. We think the court erred in sustaining the demurrer of counsel for plaintiff below to defendants' plea seeking a recovery of the cash paid to plaintiff over and above the amount agreed upon in the alleged composition had between the creditors. It will be seen from the above recital that there was testimony in this case to the effect that a composition was entered into among various creditors of the defendants below; that a member and representative of plaintiff's firm was active in bringing about this settlement, advised a compromise of 50 cents on the dollar, used his influence with other creditors to get them to accede to it, was present at the public meetings had by these creditors at Macon, and left the impression on their minds that he was willing to accept 50 cents on the dollar for the claim of his firm. After that settlement was agreed on, according to defendants' testimony, he saw one of them, who was representing his company, and gave him to understand that, if he was not paid 100 cents on the dollar, he had it in his power, and he would so act as, to break up the settlement. This representative of defendants became alarmed, fearing the litigation in the United States court, and it was developed by the evidence that that litigation sought to set aside a deed of certain property this member of the company had made to his wife, the evidence on this subject showing that the deed was made long before any insolvency of the company; and, laboring under this restraint and fear, he finally agreed to pay plaintiff 100 cents on the dollar, and accordingly gave the notes sued on in this case, and paid besides that the cash money set up in the plea of offset, and in addition to that paid plaintiff's attorneys the 50 per cent. agreed upon in the composition by the creditors. It seems that plaintiffs even kept the getting of the money and the notes, in addition to the 50 per cent. paid under the compromise, secret from their attorneys. Under this state of facts, this agreement had between plaintiff and defendants was manifestly null and void as between the parties themselves. It is contended, however, by counsel for defendant in error, that these parties, in negotiating a settlement with the plaintiff by which they received more than the amount agreed upon and accepted by other creditors, so far as the cash payment was concerned, were in pari delicto, and that therefore defendants were not entitled to recover back this money they had paid to plaintiff; but we do not think this transaction falls within the general principle of law that when parties are in pari delicto a court of law or equity will leave them where it finds them. The influence brought to bear upon defendants, under their testimony, was in the nature of duress; the defendants being at a great disadvantage, and being reluctantly forced, as it were, to accede to plaintiff's demands. While we do not know that this identical question has been made before this court in the history of its adjudications, yet we think, under well-established authority, that these transactions are void between the parties themselves, and that the debtor in such a case can recover back even money paid by him in furtherance of such a fraudulent scheme. In 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 394, it is declared: "Any advantage obtained by any creditor in any agreement of composition without the knowledge and consent of all the other parties to the composition is a fraud on the other creditors, and renders the composition void as to those innocent creditors." A vast amount of authority is cited upon that principle. But the same principle has been announced by our court in Woodruff v. Saul, 70 Ga. 271 (Syl., point 1). On pages 396 and 397 of the same volume of the Encyclopedia of Law it is declared: "Any agreement for such a secret preference of any creditor is void, and will not be enforced by the courts, on the ground that such agreement is fraudulent, and to enforce it would be against public policy. Notes and securities given under such secret agreement are void between the original parties and third parties who take them subject to equities. Money paid under a secret agreement as an inducement to the creditor to sign, or in excess of his claim under the composition, may be recovered back by the debtor, as the law regards the payment as having been made under duress." Under each of the principles the author cites a large number of authorities from England, Canada, and many states throughout this Union. In Sternburg v. Bowman, 103 Mass. 325, it was held: "Promissory notes given by a debtor to his creditor for twice the amount really due, for the purpose of enabling that creditor to obtain a larger dividend under a composition deed between the debtor and all his creditors, are void as between the parties to them." In Willis v. Morris, 63 Tex. 458, it was held: "When a composition agreement has been made between a debtor and all his creditors, to pay them each in discharge of his debt a specified per centum of the amount owing, in a designated time, and there is a secret agreement between the debtor and one of the creditors that the debtor shall execute his note for the unpaid balance of his original debt, and such note is executed, its payment cannot be enforced, for it is tainted with the fraud of the secret agreement." See the same principle announced in Morrison v. Schlesinger, 10 Ind. App. 665, 38 N. E. 493. In the opinion in that case, on page 669, 10 Ind. App., and page 494, 38 N. E., it is announced: "It is also the law that the debtor himself may set up the fraud in defense of an action on the secret agreement." A number of authorities are therein cited to sustain this proposition. See, also, Russell v. Rogers, 10 Wend. 479. In Bean v. Brookmire, 2 Dill. 108, 2 Fed. Cas. p. 1132, it was decided: "Secret preferences paid as inducements to obtain signatures of creditors to composition deeds can be recovered by the debtor himself, or by injured creditors, or by an assignee in bankruptcy who represents both debtor and creditor. Such recovery may be at law or in equity." In the opinion in that case, on pages 115, 116, 2 Dill., and page 1134, 2 Fed. Cas., it is announced: "The rules of law respecting the good faith to be observed by all who unite in a composition agreement are well known and well settled, and rest upon the soundest policy and upon the clearest principles of equity, commercial morality, and fair dealing. The temptation to obtain undue or secret advantages is so great that the necessity for the severe rules which have been declared by the courts to repress it is undeniable. All must be open and fair. If a creditor, appealed to by his debtor, makes it a condition of his uniting in a composition that he shall have any advantage not enjoyed or made known to the others, the transaction cannot stand either at law or in equity. It is a fraud upon creditors, and they can avoid it. It is treated as oppression or duress towards the debtor, and he may defend against any promise to pay made under such circumstances, or, if he has actually paid, he may recover back the amount, as the law does not consider the parties as being in pari delicto, nor regard the payments thus made as voluntary, and allows such recovery on grounds of public policy." Quite a number of authorities are cited to sustain these principles. See, also, Bradshaw v. Bradshaw, 9 Mees. & W. 28; Crossley v. Moore, 40 N. J. Law, 27, where the same principle was decided, and where it was held that money paid by the debtor under such an agreement, where a composition has been made by creditors, in excess of the due proportion of such creditor's debt, may be recovered back, unless it be paid under such circumstances as to be regarded in law as a voluntary payment. The jury in that case found that it was not a voluntary payment, and the court held that they were justified in this finding; that the money was obtained by coercion exercised by means of the situation of the parties, in fraud of the other creditors; and that the money was paid under the same compulsion. The testimony in the present case introduced in behalf of defendants we think certainly makes out as strong a case of coercion. The court therefore erred in sustaining the demurrer to that portion of the answer which seeks a recovery back of money thus paid by the debtor to the creditor, the amount claimed being within its jurisdiction.

3. Comment is unnecessary on the proposition announced in the third headnote, as its correctness will bear truth upon its face.

4. One among the grounds in the amended motion for a new trial is the following: "Because the court committed error in charging the jury as follows: 'The court charges you that merely an agreement on the part of a creditor to receive less than his debt is not a binding agreement; that is, if the Everett-Ridley-Ragan Company had stated that they would take fifty cents on the dollar, they would not be bound by that agreement.' Movants allege that this charge was erroneous: (1) Because it was entirely inapplicable to the facts of this case. (2) Because its tendency was to confuse and mislead the jury as to the real issue involved. (3) Because it is not a correct statement of the law; the law being that the Everett-Ridley-Ragan Company would have been bound to accept fifty cents on the dollar if they by their actions induced other creditors to accept fifty cents on the dollar, and had publicly agreed to enter into composition for that amount." We think the criticism of counsel on the charge of the court is entirely just. It is true, as a general rule of law, that a creditor is not bound by an agreement to take less than his debt, unless it has been executed by the payment of the money, or the giving of additional security, or the substitution of another debtor, or some other new consideration. This question was thoroughly discussed in Stewart v. Langston, 103 Ga. 290, 30 S. E. 35. See opinion of the writer, on page 292 et seq., 103 Ga., and page 36, 30 S. E. While this principle was in that case recognized as a general rule of law, it was further announced: "It is equally as well established that a contract is binding when it forms a part of a composition in which several creditors join, mutually agreeing, on account of the embarrassed or insolvent condition of their common debtor, to forbear pressing their claims to the full amount, and to release their debtor on payment of a certain portion of his indebtedness. The new consideration which enters into and supports such an agreement is the undertaking of the other creditors to give up a portion of their claims." See authorities therein cited and quoted. That was a case involving a composition agreement between creditors and their common debtor. It was there held that "an offer by the debtor to pay one of the creditors the amount due him in accordance with the agreement, after all the others have received their pro rata part in full settlement of their claims, constitutes a legal tender of the debt due such creditor." It does not follow that all the creditors of a debtor should necessarily enter into such composition, but all who do so are bound by the agreement. See the quotation in that case on page 292, 103 Ga., and page 36, 30 S. E., from the case of Brown v. Farnham, 48 Minn. 317, 51 N. W. 377, where it is stated, "The composition deed is an agreement between the creditors and the defendant which involves rights and interests common to all creditors who join in it." In the present case there was evidence to show that all the creditors entered into the composition, though some testimony tended to show that a few did not. Evidently the bulk of the creditors entered into it, including all those who were parties to the suit in the United States court, which was the basis of the compromise and composition of the creditors, and which suit was dismissed in consequence of such settlement. We think the charge was not applicable to this case, and that the court should have submitted to the jury a determination of the question as to whether or not plaintiffs had, by their conduct and declarations made through their representative, entered into this composition which was had with the other creditors, or induced and persuaded the creditors to enter into it, and created the impression that they would enter into it themselves and settle at 50 cents on the dollar. He should have charged that such an agreement, notwithstanding it was an agreement to take less than the amount of their debt, was binding upon every creditor who entered into it, and a secret agreement to take more from the debtor, unknown to the other creditors, was a fraud upon them, and would render the notes sued upon void, as without consideration, and would entitle the defendants to recover the cash pleaded as an offset. Another ground in the motion excepts to the following charge of the court: "It is the contention of the plaintiffs in this case that he made no such misrepresentation, but, on the contrary, stated all along that he was entitled to one hundred cents on the dollar, and that it was finally agreed among himself and certain members of the Brown & Franklin Company that Ragan was to sell Everett-Ridley-Ragan Company's debt to Mr. J. D. Franklin, a kinsman of certain members of the Brown & Franklin Company, and that he was to receive one hundred cents on the dollar for the debt of the Brown & Franklin Co.,—a portion in cash, and these notes representing the balance. If you find that to be the truth of the case, then Everett-Ridley-Ragan Company ought to recover." Movants allege that this charge was erroneous: "(1) Because it had a tendency to confuse and mislead the jury as to the real issue involved. (2) Because it is not a correct statement of the law, for the reason that, if plaintiff would not have been entitled to recover in the event the accounts had been marked settled, then they would not have been entitled to recover, although the accounts were transferred to J. D. Franklin, if the transfer to Franklin was not a transfer for value and bona fide, and one on which Franklin could have successfully enforced the demand of plaintiffs against the Brown & Franklin Company. (3) Because the submission by the court of plaintiff's contention in this matter of the transfer to J. D. Franklin, without submitting the contention of the defendants in reference thereto, was misleading and was liable to confuse the jury, and was unfair to movants." It would seem from the allegations in the motion that the court very strongly stated the contention of the plaintiff, and in no part of his charge did he state the contention of the defendants upon the same issue. It is a well-settled rule of law, if the judge undertakes to state the contention of one party, he should also state the contention of the other; and, while it need not necessarily appear in the same connection, yet his charge ought somewhere to fairly state it. Railway Co. v. Findley, 76 Ga. 311 (Syl., point 3); Small v. Williams, 87 Ga. 682, 13 S. E. 589 (Syl., point 2). Another ground in the motion was that the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "If you were to find from the evidence in this case that Everett-Ridley-Ragan Company had deceitfully and knowingly deceived other creditors, and got them to accept less than Everett-Ridley-Ragan Company received, then I charge you that the law would estop him, for the reason that the law does not become a party to any deceit." Objection was made to this on the ground that it is not a fair statement of the law. We think the charge implies that Everett-Ridley-Ragan Company must be guilty of a moral fraud, and that it was calculated to mislead the jury by leading them to infer that the defendants were liable unless such moral fraud had been perpetrated by plaintiffs. Under the contention of the defendants, supported by their testimony, in view of all the authorities to which we have called attention, and the principles of law therein announced, we do not think the moral quality of the conduct of plaintiffs or their representative in the transactions complained of in the answer is necessarily involved. If they are guilty of the conduct claimed, they are guilty of legal fraud, which would effectually render null and void the entire transaction. For instance, as contended by counsel for plaintiffs in error, if the plaintiffs below, even without intention to deceive anybody, had changed their minds as to accepting the 50 cents on the dollar, but after notifying the other creditors that they would accept that much, and agreeing to the composition had by the others, failed to notify them of the change in their intention, by taking cash and notes for the balance of their debt, they would, nevertheless, under the law, be unable to collect the notes sued upon, and would be liable for the cash paid them over and above the 50 cents on the dollar. This, to say the least of it, would be a legal fraud, under the principles of law herein announced.

In the light of this record, and what is herein laid down as the principles of law applicable to the present case, we think these rulings and charges of the court necessitate the grant of a new trial. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except LUMPKIN, P. J., disqualified.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 16, 1900.)

JUDICIAL NOTICE—JUDGES—TERM OF COURT—JUDICIAL CIRCUIT—ORDER OF COURT—SIGNATURE—DISCRETION.

1. The court will take judicial notice that a certain person is the judge of a particular judicial circuit within the state.

2. The court will take judicial notice that a particular circuit judge was regularly assigned to hold court in a certain circuit within a state at a certain time.

3. The court will take judicial notice that a certain day was the first day for the holding of a session of court in a particular judicial circuit within the state.

4. The court will take judicial notice that a certain county within a state is embraced in a particular judicial circuit.

5. The fact that a presiding judge appends the words "circuit judge" to his signature to an order will not affect his jurisdiction.

6. The court has discretion to order a reference to take testimony pending a motion for the submission of the issues to a jury under a rule of court.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Charleston county; George W. Gage, Judge.

Suit by Joseph W. Barnwell, as trustee and individually, and as agent and guardian, and others, against Sophia Frances Sheppard Marion. From an order of reference to take testimony, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

For former opinions, see 32 S. E. 313, and 33 S. E. 719.

The order of reference is as follows:

"Due notice of the motion for an order of reference having been given in this case on September 20, 1899, and the time and place for hearing the same having been changed, by a consent order dated September 26th in said year, to this day and place: Now, on motion of plaintiffs' attorneys, no opposition being made thereto, it is ordered that it be referred to G. Harbert Sass, one of the masters of said court, to take the testimony in the above case preparatory to the hearing of the case on the merits, and that he report the same at the next term of said court; this order to be without prejudice to any of defendant's rights to another mode of trial of the issues first mentioned in the notice of motion served by defendant upon plaintiffs' attorneys on March 16, 1899, as to the commissions of the trustee and counsel fees under the mortgage mentioned in the complaint herein. And it is further ordered, in view of the expression of the supreme court in the opinion rendered in this case upon the last appeal therein, that the master do forthwith proceed to take such testimony, with a view to an early report,—at least ten days before the sitting of said court."

Defendant filed exceptions as follows:

"(1) His honor, Circuit Judge George W. Gage, being judge of the Sixth circuit, had no jurisdiction at chambers at Monks Corner, in the county of Berkeley, in the First circuit, on the 11th October, 1899, to pass the said order of reference to master; the judge of the First circuit being then within the limits of the First circuit, in Charleston county. (2) His honor, Circuit Judge George W. Gage, being judge of the Sixth circuit, had no jurisdiction at chambers at Monks Corner, in the county of Berkeley, in the First circuit, to pass the said order of reference to a master, while there was pending the motion of defendant, served March 16, 1899, for issues to jury under twenty-eighth rule of circuit court, to be heard before the court of common pleas for Charleston county under said rule. (3) His honor, Circuit Judge George W. Gage, erred in granting at chambers said order of reference to the master, while there was pending the motion of defendant, served March 16, 1899, for issues to jury under twenty-eighth rule of circuit court, to be heard before the court of common pleas for Charleston county under said rule. (4) His honor, Circuit Judge George W. Gage, erred in granting at chambers said order of reference to the master, and thereby compelling defendant to give her testimony on all issues before the master, while there was pending the motion of defendant, served March 16, 1899, for certain issues to jury under twenty-eighth rule of circuit court, to be heard before the court of common pleas for Charleston county under said rule."

Bryan & Bryan, for appellant. Langdon Cheves and J. W. Barnwell, for respondents.

McIVER, C. J. This is an appeal from an order granted by his honor, Judge Gage, at Monks Corner, on the 11th of October, 1899, and filed on the 12th of October, 1899. This order is set out in the "case," and should be incorporated by the reporter in his report of the case, together with the exceptions thereto. It seems that this order was made at the time and place mentioned in pursuance of a consent order previously made by Judge Gage on the 26th of September, 1899, upon the motion of Messrs. Bryan & Bryan, attorneys for defendant, with the consent of plaintiffs' attorneys, postponing the hearing of the motion for the order appealed from, on account of the absence of Mr. J. P. K. Bryan, who was especially charged with the conduct of the case, from the state, and ordering "that the hearing of the said motion be postponed until 10 o'clock a. m. on Wednesday, October 11, 1899, and be heard at the court house of Berkeley county, at Monks Corner, in state aforesaid, before me." It seems that on the 16th of March, 1899, the attorneys for defendant had given notice of a motion, under the provisions of section 274 of the Code, for the trial of certain issues of fact, to be tried by a jury, which motion was still pending when the order appealed from was granted. These issues of fact, as stated in the frame of the order accompanying the notice of the motion for the trial by a jury of such issues, are: (1) Whether the defendant "is liable for any sum for commissions of trustee under said mortgage mentioned in the complaint, and, if so, what sum?" (2) Whether the defendant "is liable for any sum for attorney's fees under said mortgage mentioned in the complaint, and, if so, what sum?" It may also be stated that it appears from the "case" that the action in this case was for the foreclosure of a mortgage on real estate situate in the county of Charleston, and was instituted in the court of common pleas for that county, and is now, and since the 2d of February, 1898, has been, docketed on calendar 2 of that court.

The first exception was manifestly taken under a misconception of the fact; for there is not only nothing in the "case" to show that Judge Benet was within the limits of the First circuit, where this case was pending, at the time the order appealed from was granted, but, on the contrary, the telegram from Judge Benet, printed in the "case," does show that he was not in the First circuit at that time; and, as counsel for appellant makes no allusion in his argument to the first exception, we presume it has been abandoned, but, whether abandoned or not, it certainly cannot be sustained.

The other exceptions raise but two points, which are thus stated in the argument of counsel for appellant: "(1) That his honor, Circuit Judge George W. Gage, being judge of the Sixth circuit, had no jurisdiction at chambers at Monks Corner, county of Berkeley, in the First circuit, on the 11th of October, 1899, to pass the order. (2) That the circuit judge, George W. Gage, could not compel the defendant to give her testimony on all the issues before the master while there was pending her motion for issue to the jury, under twenty-eighth rule of the court."

Before considering these points, it may be as well to notice the position taken by counsel for respondents, that the order in question is not appealable, for the purpose of avoiding any misapprehension, and preventing this case from becoming a precedent. In the first place, the order appealed from was practically a consent order. As is stated above, it appears in the "case" that, on the day appointed for hearing the motion for an order of reference to take the testimony, the order of the 26th of September, 1899, was granted, on the motion of Messrs. Bryan & Bryan, attorneys for defendant, with the consent of the attorneys for the plaintiffs, whereby the hearing of such motion was postponed until the 11th October, 1899, and it was ordered that the same be heard at the court house of Berkeley county, at Monks Corner; and to this order is appended a formal consent, in these words: "We consent. Bryan & Bryan." And it also appears in the order appealed from that when the motion was heard and granted, at the place and on the day thus appointed, it was recited that no opposition was made thereto. In the second place, the order was, simply, "to take the testimony in the above case preparatory to the hearing of the case on the merit," which decides nothing, and ordinarily was certainly not appealable. We are very much inclined to hold that the order is not appealable. But, as the appeal is based upon what are claimed to be jurisdictional grounds, we will waive this objection, and assume, for the purposes of this case only, that the order in question is appealable. We will therefore proceed to consider the two points presented by counsel for appellant in their argument here.

The first point rests upon two assumptions of fact: (1) That Judge Gage was the judge of the Sixth circuit; and (2) that the order was granted at chambers. And neither of these facts appear in the "case," as prepared for argument here. This alone would be destructive of appellant's first point. But we are unwilling to rest our conclusion upon that ground, for the reason that there are certain facts of which this court will take judicial notice, one of which is that his honor, Judge Gage, is, and was at the time he granted the order appealed from, the judge of the Sixth judicial circuit. But this is not the only fact of which this court will take judicial notice in this case. 1 Greenl. Ev. c. 2, § 4, where the general doctrine on the subject is stated. See, also, 3 Greenl. Ev. § 269. As is said in 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) p. 182: "The terms of subordinate courts and the extent of their jurisdiction, as provided by law, are judicially noticed by appellate courts having their authority within the same territorial limits. * * * Courts will also take judicial notice of their own record and officers, of the manner and extent of their jurisdiction, * * * whether a judgment was rendered in vacation, * * * the terms of courts," besides a great many other matters. So, in 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 173, it is said: "The court will take judicial notice of an almanac." And in one of the notes to that passage it is said: "The almanac in such cases is used like a statute, —not strickly as evidence, but for the purpose of refreshing the memory of the court and jury." See, also, to same effect, Wilson v. Van Leer, 127 Pa. St. 371, 17 Atl. 1097, as reported in 14 Am. St. Rep. 854, where the subject is discussed and the authorities are cited. Deriving our knowledge from these sources of information, this court will take judicial notice of the following facts: That Judge Gage was and is the judge of the Sixth judicial circuit; that in pursuance of the statute he was regularly assigned to hold the court of the First judicial circuit at the third session thereof in the year 1899; that the day on which the order in question was signed, to wit, the 11th of October, 1899, was the first day appointed by law for holding the court of common pleas for Berkeley county, at Monks Corner, during that month of that year; and that Berkeley county is one of the counties embraced in the First circuit. Under these facts, it is quite clear that, by virtue of the provisions of sections 2248 and 2249 of the Revised Statutes of 1893, Judge Gage had jurisdiction to make the order appealed from. —especially where, as in this case, the time and place for hearing the motion were fixed by consent of the parties. The point made in the argument as to the distinction between the "circuit judge" and the "presiding judge," even if properly raised by the exceptions, is not tenable. As we have seen, Judge Gage was the presiding judge of the court of common pleas for Berkeley county at the time the order was granted, and certainly the mere fact that he appended to his name the words "circuit judge" cannot have the effect of depriving him of jurisdiction to grant the order appealed from. The first point made by appellant must therefore be overruled.

The second point is that the defendant could not be compelled "to give her testimony on all the issues before the master while there was pending her motion for issues to the jury, under twenty-eighth rule of court." We are unable to see that this point presents any question of law. Both of the motions (as well that of the defendant as that submitted by the plaintiffs) were addressed to the discretion of the court, and the circuit court might, in the exercise of its discretion, take any course that might seem best calculated to promote the speedy and proper hearing of the case; and, so far from there being any abuse of discretion on the part of Judge Gage, we think the course he adopted was best calculated to promote the ends of justice, and no error can justly be imputed to him in so doing. Indeed, it seems to us that the case of Bank v. Fennell, 55 S. C. 379, 33 S. E. 485, cited by counsel for respondents, is conclusive of this case; for we are unable to appreciate the distinction sought to be drawn by counsel for appellant between that case and this. As we understand it, the only issues remaining to be determined in this case were as to the amount due on the debt secured by the mortgage sought to be foreclosed, and certainly the two issues which defendant asked to have submitted to a jury for trial both involved that inquiry. The judgment of this court is that the order appealed from be affirmed; and, in view of the fact that this is the third appeal in this case, all involving preliminary questions, and delaying a trial on the merits, the clerk of this court is hereby directed to send down the remittitur forthwith.

SOUTHERN FIRE INS. CO. v. KNIGHT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 10, 1900.)

INSURANCE — PROOFS OF LOSS — IRON-SAFE CLAUSE—INVENTORY—BREACH OF CONDITIONS—NONSUIT.

1. Where a policy of fire insurance set forth various requirements and conditions, a violation of which by the insured would operate as a forfeiture of the policy, and the same also contained a stipulation requiring the insured to furnish proofs of loss within 60 days after the fire, but did not make failure to do so a ground of forfeiture, and where, under the terms of the policy, the insurer was not liable to make payment until after 60 days from the receipt of such proofs of loss, the policy further providing that no suit thereon should be brought, unless commenced within 12 months after the fire, held that, if the insured furnished the required proofs of loss in time for at least 60 days to elapse between the date upon which they were furnished and the expiration of the 12-months limitation, the policy was not forfeited by a failure to furnish such proofs within 60 days after the fire occurred.

2. "An invoice of goods purchased is not an inventory of stock, to be produced under the iron-safe clause of a fire policy."

3. A policy of fire insurance, the consideration for which is a premium payable in a gross sum, is entire and indivisible, though the contract insures different classes of property in separate amounts. It follows from this that where such a policy insured both a building and a stock of merchandise therein contained, and provided that, in the event the insured failed to take an inventory of the goods at a time specified, "this policy shall be null and void from such date," a breach of this stipulation avoided the insurance on the building as well as on the stock of goods.

4. The plaintiffs' testimony showing affirmatively that they had failed to comply with the stipulation mentioned in the foregoing note, a motion to nonsuit should have been sustained.

Little, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Atlanta; A. E. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by M. A. & L. L. Knight against the Southern Fire Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

W. I. Heyward, for plaintiff in error. Jas. K. Hines, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. M. A. & L. L. Knight brought suit against the Southern Fire Insurance Company upon a policy of fire insurance. The case came on for trial, and at the conclusion of the testimony for the plaintiffs the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit, which the court overruled. The case proceeded to trial, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiffs. The defendant brings the case here upon a bill of exceptions assigning error upon the refusal of the court to grant a nonsuit.

1. The policy which was the foundation of the action contained a clause which provided that, "if fire occur, the insured shall give immediate notice of any loss thereby, in writing, to this company, * * * and within sixty days after the fire, unless such time is extended in writing by this company, shall" furnish proofs of loss, of a designated character. While it appears from the evidence that proofs of loss had been submitted to the company before suit was brought, they were not submitted until after the expiration of 60 days from the date of the fire, and the time for their submission was not extended by the company. The defendant contends that the failure on the part of the insured to furnish the proofs of loss within the time specified in the policy precludes a recovery thereon. It has been often held, and may now be considered as settled law, that if there is an express stipulation in a policy of fire insurance that the furnishing of proofs of loss within a specified time shall be a condition precedent to a recovery, or that a failure to submit the proofs within the time limited in the policy shall forfeit the same, such failure on the part of the insured will be fatal to his right to recover. See 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 328, notes 7 and 8. There is not in the policy involved in the present investigation either a stipulation that the furnishing of proofs of loss within 60 days shall be a condition precedent to a recovery, or that the failure so to do shall operate as a forfeiture of the policy. While the decisions of the American courts are not entirely uniform on this question, the current of authority seems to be that in the absence of a stipulation providing that the furnishing of the proofs within a designated time shall be a condition precedent to recovery, or that the failure to submit the proofs within such time shall work a forfeiture of the policy, the failure so to do will operate simply to postpone the right of the insured to bring a suit until after he has furnished the proofs of loss required by the policy. This results from the familiar rule that forfeitures are not favored, and that a contract will not be construed to work a forfeiture unless it is manifest that it was the intention of the parties that it should have that effect. Especially would this be applicable in the case of a contract of insurance which contains many conditions, a failure to perform which are expressly stated to operate as a forfeiture of the contract, and which is silent as to the effect to be given to a failure to perform the condition relating to the furnishing of proofs of loss within a specified time. The policy is prepared by the insurer, and therefore must be construed most strongly against him. Mr. Joyce, in his work on Insurance (volume 4, § 3282), thus states the rule with reference to the failure to furnish the required proofs within the time designated: "If a policy of insurance provides that notice and proofs of loss are to be furnished within a certain time after loss has occurred, but does not impose a forfeiture for failure to furnish them within the time prescribed, and does impose forfeiture for a failure to comply with other provisions of the contract, the insured may, it is held, maintain an action, though he does not furnish proofs within the time designated, provided he does furnish them at some time prior to commencing the action upon the policy. And this has been held to be true even though the policy provides that no action can be maintained until after a full compliance with all the requirements thereof." The above quotation and the decision made in the present case will be found to be supported by the following cases: Steele v. Insurance Co. (Mich.) 53 N. W. 514, 18 L. R. A. 85; Hall v. Insurance Co. (Mich.) 51 N. W. 524; Tubbs v. Insurance Co., 84 Mich. 646, 48 N. W. 296; Rynalski v. Insurance Co., 96 Mich. 395, 55 N. W. 981; Insurance Co. v. Brown (Ky.) 29 S. W. 313; Vangindertaelen v. Insurance Co., 82 Wis. 112, 51 N. W. 1122, 33 Am. St. Rep. 29; Flatley v. Insurance Co., 95 Wis. 618, 70 N. W. 828; Kahnweiler v. Insurance Co. (C. C.) 57 Fed. 562; Insurance Co. v. Downs, 90 Ky. 236, 13 S. W. 882; Insurance Ass'n v. Evans, 102 Pa. St. 281; Taber v. Insurance Co. (Ala.) 26 South. 252; Rheims v. Insurance Co., 39 W. Va. 672, 20 S. E. 670; Shell v. Insurance Co., 60 Mo. App. 644; Insurance Co. v. Mattingly. 77 Tex. 162, 13 S. W. 1016.

It not being indispensable to a recovery on the policy that the proofs of loss should be submitted within 60 days, the question arises as to what lapse of time will preclude the plaintiffs from furnishing proofs of loss and asserting a liability under the policy. The answer to this is that, if the plaintiffs failed within a reasonable time after loss to furnish the proofs of loss, their right to make the proof would be gone, and their right to recover on the policy would consequently be at an end. What would be a reasonable time is to be determined by the peculiar facts of each case, and in determining this question a valid stipulation in the policy that no suit should be brought thereon after the lapse of a given time should be taken into consideration. The policy sued on in this case provides that "no suit or action on this policy for a recovery of any claim shall be sustainable in any court of law or equity until after full compliance by the insured with all the foregoing requirements, nor unless commenced within twelve months after the fire." A stipulation of this character has been held by this court to be valid. Brooks v. Insurance Co., 99 Ga. 116, 24 S. E. 809, and cases cited; Graham v. Insurance Co., 106 Ga. 840, 32 S. E. 579. The policy contains a further stipulation that "the loss shall not become payable until sixty days after the" proofs of loss have been furnished. As each of these stipulations is valid, the insured must, in any event, have submitted their proofs of loss in such a time that at least 60 days would elapse between the date of the submission of such proofs and the time that suit should be brought, under the stipulation that suits to enforce the policy must be brought within 12 months from the date of the fire. In this connection, see Steele v. Insurance Co., supra; Insurance Co. v. Downs, supra; Insurance Co. v. Evans, supra; Rheims v. Insurance Co., supra. The proofs in the present case having been submitted more than 60 days before the expiration of 12 months from the date the fire occurred, the court properly refused to grant the nonsuit on account of a failure to submit the proofs within the time fixed in the policy, as it was a question for the jury whether a reasonable time for furnishing the proofs had elapsed between the date the fire occurred and the date that the proofs of loss were submitted.

This ruling is not in conflict with any former decision of this court. A number of decisions of this court can be found where the court dealt with the case as if the failure to submit proofs of loss within the time specified in the policy would preclude a recovery thereon, and there is in the language used in some of the opinions expressions which would indicate that the judges writing the same entertained the view that such a failure would bar a right of recovery; but a careful examination has failed to disclose any case decided by this court where this question was squarely presented for decision and necessary to be decided. Some of these decisions which are apparently in conflict with the ruling now made will be referred to, as well as others which are apparently in line with the present ruling, although, as has been said, none contain authoritative rulings on the question. In Insurance Co. v. Sparks, 62 Ga. 187, it was held that an amendment to the petition sufficiently alleged, as against a general demurrer, that an absolute refusal to pay was within the time limited for preliminary proof of loss; it being stated that no subsequent refusal would operate as a waiver of such proof. In speaking of the amendment, Mr. Justice Jackson says: "Besides, the effect and true intent thereof seem to be that the refusal was within the time, inasmuch as the allegation is that thereby the proofs were waived; these proofs having to be made in this time." It having been held that the allegation was that the refusal was within the 60 days, it was not necessary in that case to determine what would have been the effect of a refusal after 60 days, and therefore what is said on that subject is clearly obiter. In addition to this, an examination of the record in that case discloses that there was no time specified in the policy in which preliminary proofs must be submitted. The only reference in the policy to the phrase "sixty days" is that the policy shall not be payable until 60 days after notice and proof of loss, and the policy in terms provided that the proof of loss should be furnished "as soon as possible" after the fire. While in Insurance Co. v. Vining, 67 Ga. 661, the question now under consideration was not at all involved, some language of Mr. Chief Justice Jackson rather indicates that the ruling now made is correct. In referring to the two policies then under consideration, he says, in substance, that, even if nothing equivalent to an absolute waiver had occurred, there was nothing in the policies which required their forfeiture on account of failure to furnish preliminary proofs of loss. In Southern Home Building & Loan Ass'n v. Home Ins. Co., 94 Ga. 167, 21 S. E. 375, 27 L. R. A. 844, Mr. Justice Simmons, in referring to a stipulation in reference to preliminary proofs of loss, says that "it was a condition precedent to the payment of the loss that the proof of loss stipulated for should be made out and submitted to the insurance company, and within the time stipulated." The question as to whether the time stipulated in the policy was of the essence of the contract was not at all involved in that case; the sole question being whether a stipulation in a policy of fire insurance which declares, in substance, that no act or neglect on the part of the mortgagor would defeat the insurance, so far as the interest of the mortgagee was concerned, would dispense with the making of proofs of loss. In that case it did not appear that any proof of loss was submitted by either the mortgagor or the mortgagee, and it was simply held that the proofs of loss must have been submitted by either one or the other. In Insurance Co. v. Ellington, 94 Ga. 785, 788, 21 S. E. 1006, Mr. Justice Simmons says, "One of the conditions of this policy declared upon was that, if the property should be destroyed by fire, the insured should furnish the insurance company with proofs of loss within a specified time." The question as to the effect of the failure to furnish proofs within the time specified was not involved in that case, as, upon an examination of the facts of the case, it will be seen that it turned upon the effect of an absolute refusal to pay, which was held to waive the necessity for making any proofs of loss at all. In Insurance Co. v. Searles, 100 Ga. 97, 27 S. E. 779, it was held: "A statement made by such an agent to the insured, within the time during which the latter, under the terms of the policy, was allowed to furnish proofs of loss, that the company declined or refused to pay the loss, will amount to a waiver of such proofs; but, where proofs of loss were not furnished within the time stipulated, a subsequent refusal to pay would not be such a waiver." The question as to whether a failure to furnish the proofs of loss within the time specified in the policy would work a forfeiture of the policy was not directly raised in that case, and the decision was based merely upon the assumption that such was the law. In addition to this, as will appear from the language in the fifth headnote, the policy was construed as meaning that a failure to furnish the proofs within the time limited would vitiate the policy, which would make the decision directly in line with the present ruling; but the facts will show that this was not a proper construction to be placed upon the policy, as the language used in the policy in that case was exactly the same as the language in the policy involved in the present case. The case of Graham v. Insurance Co., 106 Ga. 840, 32 S. E. 579, does not conflict with the ruling made in the present case; it being simply held that when a policy stipulated that no suit should be brought thereon unless commenced before the expiration of 12 months from the date of the loss, and that the company should have 60 days after due notice and satisfactory proof of loss to pay the policy, there could be no recovery on such a policy when no notice of loss was given until such a time that 60 days would not elapse between the date of the notice and the expiration of the time for bringing suit on the policy. While not directly in point, the reasoning of the decision is in line with the reasoning upon which the present ruling is based.

2. The policy sued on contained what is commonly called the "iron-safe clause." That part of the clause which is material to the present investigation is in the following language: "The following covenant and warranty is hereby made a part of this policy: (1) The insured will take a complete, itemized inventory of stock on hand at least once in each calendar year; and, unless such inventory has been taken within twelve calendar months prior to the date of this policy, one shall be taken in detail within 30 days of issuance of this policy, or this policy shall be null and void from such date, and upon demand of the assured the unearned premium from such date shall be returned. In the event of failure to produce such * * * inventories for the inspection of this company, this policy shall become null and void, and such failure shall constitute a perpetual bar to any recovery thereon." It appears from the plaintiffs' testimony that they had not taken an inventory of the stock of goods which was covered by the policy within 12 months prior to the date of the policy, nor did they take one within 30 days after the date of its issuance. The plaintiffs introduced evidence tending to prove that the insurance was written on the very first day that they opened their store, and that they had on hand that day the invoices representing all purchases made by them, and that every article contained in the invoices was on that day in the store, and that they exhibited such invoices to the agent of the company who wrote the policy. It is contended by the plaintiffs that this was at least a substantial compliance with that portion of the iron-safe clause which required an inventory, and that, as loss occurred within less than 12 months from the date the policy was written, they are not precluded from recovering on the policy merely because they failed to take an inventory within 30 days. A clause of the character designated in the policy as the "iron-safe clause" has been held by this court to be valid, and to constitute a warranty, and not a mere representation. Insurance Co. v. Stubbs, 98 Ga. 754, 27 S. E. 180. In the opinion in that case Mr. Chief Justice Simmons uses this language: "This clause constitutes a promissory warranty. It binds the assured to do certain things for the protection of the insurer, and is important, as providing a check against fraud on the part of the assured, and a mode by which the insurer may ascertain for itself the extent of the loss; and the compliance of the assured with this part of the contract is a condition upon which, by the expess terms of the contract, the validity of the policy is made to depend." The precise question presented for decision is whether a collection of invoices covering every article embraced within a stock of merchandise on a given day is an inventory of such stock, within the meaning of the clause above quoted. In other words, was the insurer bound to treat these invoices, when exhibited to it, as an inventory of the goods? An inventory is "an itemized list of the various articles constituting a collection, estate, stock in trade, etc., with their estimated or actual values." Black, Law Dict. It is a "list, schedule, or enumeration in writing, containing, article by article, the goods and chattels, rights and credits, and, in some cases, the land and tenements, of a person or persons." Bouv. Law Dict. "An itemized list of goods or valuables, with their estimated worth; specifically, the annual account of stock taken in any business." Webst. Dict. "A list or catalogue of goods and chattels, containing a full, true, and particular description of each, with its value, made on various occasions, as on the sale of goods, decease of a person, storage of goods for safety, etc." Encyc. Dict. "Invoice" has been defined to be: "A statement on paper concerning goods sent to a customer for sale or on approval. It usually contains the price of the goods sent, the quantity, and the charges upon them made to the consignee." Encyc. Dict. "A list or account of goods or merchandise sent or shipped by a merchant to his correspondent, factor, or consignee, containing the particular marks of each description of goods, the value, charges, and other particulars." Black, Law Dict. "A list sent to a purchaser, factor, consignee, etc., containing the items, together with the prices and charges, of merchandise sent or to be sent to him." Stand. Dict. A single invoice is certainly not an inventory, and it would seem to follow that a collection of invoices would not be an inventory. It may be that a collection of invoices, accompanied with a written statement, signed by the insured, that the invoices embraced every article in the store, and the actual value of each, would be a substantial compliance with the stipulation in the policy; but, be this as it may, we are clear that the invoices alone are not sufficient. It is too late at the trial for the insured to show that the invoices contained all of the goods, with the actual value of each article, for the obvious reason that the insurer would have a right to decline to receive the invoices as a proper compliance with the terms of the policy; and this, of course, is the true test as to their sufficiency. An invoice is simply a writing showing the articles sold, with the selling price of each. This may vary greatly from the actual value of the articles. That property, including merchandise, is often bought and sold at prices which do not at all represent the actual value, is a well-known fact. The invoice price of an article is a circumstance to be considered in determining what is its actual value, but it is far from conclusive in the question. To take an inventory, in common parlance, is "to take stock"; that is to say, take an itemized list of every article in the store at the time of the inventory, with the actual value of each. The supreme court of Mississippi had before it a similar question, and from that decision the second headnote preceding this opinion is taken. Home Ins. Co. v. Delta Bank, 15 South. 932. Upon a careful examination of the facts of Roberts, Willis & Taylor Co. v. Sun Mutual Ins. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 48 S. W. 559, the ruling there made will be found, also, to support the decision in the present case. The failure of the plaintiffs to take an inventory as required by the policy prevents a recovery by them,—at least, so far as the right to recover the value of the merchandise lost by the fire is concerned.

3. The policy sued on in the present case insured both the stock of goods and the building in which it was contained. The premium due upon the policy was a gross sum. The question arises, therefore, whether the breach of a warranty relating solely to the goods, and which precludes a recovery for this loss, would also bar a recovery for the loss of the building. The stipulation prescribing that the insured must take an inventory of his stock provides that in case of failure so to do "this policy shall be null and void." What was the intention of the parties with respect to the question just above stated? If this intention is to be derived from the language used,—and it must be,—it would seem to be clear that the contract was entire and indivisible, and that the breach of a condition which would work a forfeiture would avoid the entire policy, and not simply a portion thereof. The parties contracted that "the policy" should be void in case of failure to comply with the iron-safe clause. The policy embraces insurance upon both the building and its contents, and the premium is payable in a gross sum. "If the consideration to be paid is single and entire, the contract must be held to be entire, although the subject of the contract may consist of several distinct and wholly independent items." 2 Pars. Cont. *519. It was competent for the parties to make two separate and distinct contracts, one covering the goods, and the other the building, but they did not see proper to do this. They combined the two, and made the consideration moving towards the insurer a gross sum. They further provided that the contract, not a part of it, should be void under certain conditions. It may perhaps seem to be unreasonable that, simply for a failure to take an inventory of the stock of goods, the plaintiffs should be precluded from recovering the value of the building. But this does not affect the question. The question is, what have they agreed upon? If there was any room to doubt as to the intention of the parties, that construction which is most reasonable and most consonant with justice would be applied. But there is none. The parties have deliberately chosen to enter into an agreement whereby the policy shall be forfeited if the insured fails to do certain things, and he has failed to comply with his agreement. In such a case there is but one thing for the courts to do, and that is to enforce the agreement as made. The question as to whether a policy of insurance such as is involved in the present case constitutes a separable or an entire contract is no new question. It has been the subject of numerous decisions by the courts in this country, and they are in hopeless and irreconcilable conflict. The weight of authority is to the effect that the contract is entire, and that the breach of a warranty which relates solely to one class of property will avoid the entire policy, if the contract so provides. Text writers of great learning and ability have, after reviewing the decisions on both sides of this question, reached the conclusion that the contract is indivisible. We quote the following from 1 Wood, Fire Ins. p. 384: "It is difficult to understand how it can be held that these contracts are several, when a gross premium is paid for the entire insurance. The court cannot say, as a matter of law, neither can the fact be shown, that the insurer would have been satisfied to take the risk separately at the same premium. By consenting to pay a gross premium for the insurance, the assured has signified his willingness to let the policy stand as an entire contract, subject in all its parts to the conditions imposed by the insurer; and there is neither reason nor equity in permitting the assured, after he has violated one of the conditions of the policy as to a part of the risk, to turn around and say that this condition only affected that portion of the risk to which the breach related." Mr. Ostrander, after an elaborate review of the decisions, reaches the conclusion that those which hold the contract to be entire announce the sounder and better rule. Ostr. Fire Ins. § 23 et seq. See, also, 2 Joyce, Ins. § 1931; 1 May, Ins. § 277. In support of the views herein announced, we find the courts of last resort of Maine, Wisconsin, Maryland, Minnesota, Virginia, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Vermont, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Michigan, Indiana, Arkansas, Iowa, Alabama, and Connecticut. It would not be profitable here to do more than cite the decisions of these courts. Reduced to their last analyses, they simply hold that the premium being for a gross sum evidences an intention on the part of the parties that the contract should be treated as entire, and that the intention of the parties, when ascertained, must be enforced. See Richardson v. Insurance Co., 46 Me. 394; Barnes v. Insurance Co., 51 Me. 110; Hinman v. Insurance Co., 36 Wis. 159 (Syl., point 7); Burr v. Insurance Co., 84 Wis. 76, 54 N. W. 22, 36 Am. St. Rep. 905; Insurance Co. v. Assum, 5 Md. 165; Bowman v. Insurance Co., 40 Md. 620; Plath v. Insurance Co., 23 Minn. 479; Moore v. Insurance Co., 28 Grat. 508; Baldwin v. Insurance Co., 60 N. H. 422; Friesmuth v. Insurance Co., 10 Cush. 587; Lee v. Insurance Co., 8 Gray, 583; Kimball v. Insurance Co., 8 Gray, 33; McGowan v. Insurance Co., 54 Vt. 211; Gottsman v. Insurance Co., 56 Pa. St. 210; Trustees of Fire Ass'n v. Williamson, 26 Pa. St. 196; Martin v. Insurance Co. (N. J. Sup.) 31 Atl. 213; Insurance Co. v. Resh, 44 Mich. 55; McQueeney v. Insurance Co. (Ark.) 12 S. W. 498; Garver v. Insurance Co. (Iowa) 28 N. W. 555; Assurance Co. v. Stoddard (Ala.) 7 South. 379 (Syl., point 5); Essex Sav. Bank v. Meriden Fire Ins. Co. (Conn.) 17 Atl. 930. It is true that none of the cases above cited dealt with a breach of the iron-safe clause, but in many of them the condition in the policy which was violated had no more connection with the property for which a recovery was sought than does the iron-safe clause to the building insured by the policy herein involved. In principle the cases are exactly in point. Opposed to this view are decisions of the court of last resort of Nebraska, Colorado, Kansas, and Missouri. See Insurance Co. v. Schreck (Neb.) 43 N. W. 340, 6 L. R. A. 524; Insurance Co. v. Fairbank (Neb.) 49 N. W. 711; Insurance Co. v. Barker (Colo. App.) 41 Pac. 513; Insurance Co. v. York (Kan. Sup.) 29 Pac. 586; Insurance Co. v. Saindon (Kan. Sup.) 36 Pac. 983; Loehner v. Insurance Co., 17 Mo. 247; Trabue v. Insurance Co. (Mo. Sup.) 25 S. W. 848, 23 L. R. A. 719. The courts of New York and Indiana seem to have been at different times on both sides of the question now under consideration. Smith v. Insurance Co., 25 Barb. 497; Kiernan v. Insurance Co. (Sup.) 30 N. Y. Supp. 892; Merrill v. Insurance Co., 73 N. Y. 452; Pratt v. Insurance Co. (N. Y.) 21 Ins. Law J. 146; Havens v. Insurance Co. (Ind. Sup.) 12 N. E. 137; Insurance Co. v. Pickel (Ind. Sup.) 21 N. E. 546. Our conclusion is that where an insurance policy is issued in consideration of a gross premium, and provides that the policy shall be void in the event of a breach of a certain condition therein named, and this condition is broken, no recovery can be had on the policy, though separate classes of property are therein insured, and though the stipulation violated relates solely to a matter which could have connection with but one of these classes.

4. As it affirmatively appeared from the evidence offered by the plaintiffs that they had broken one of the warranties in the policy, and as the breach thereof avoided the policy by an express provision in the same, the motion to nonsuit should have been sustained. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except LITTLE, J., who dissents.

LITTLE, J. Not being able to agree to the conclusion of law expressed in the third headnote, I dissent from the judgment rendered by a majority of the court.

LUTHER v. BANKS et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1900.)

CLERK OF COURT—NEGLECT OF DUTIES—LIABILITY OF SURETIES.

The duties which the law imposes on a clerk of the superior court in relation to the record of mortgages and entries of their cancellation constitute him, as to them, a ministerial officer, notwithstanding the performance of these duties requires, to some extent, the exercise of judgment and discretion. As a ministerial officer, the clerk and his sureties are bound to any person who is injured by the failure of such clerk to perform, as well as for the improper or neglectful performance of, such duties. Accordingly, when a mortgagor presents to such clerk an original mortgage of record, and an order to the clerk, purporting to have been signed by the mortgagee, to cancel such mortgage on the record, and the clerk has no knowledge of the invalidity of the order, nor any reason to suspect the same, the act of recording the order does not render the clerk and the sureties on his official bond liable to a person injured by such entry, notwithstanding the order was forged. The possession of the original mortgage, in the absence of any circumstances charging the clerk with the duty of making inquiry, is sufficient to free him from the imputation of neglect in the performance of his official duties in placing the entry in cancellation on the record.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county: J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Action by S. J. B. Luther against James Banks and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Candler & Thomson, for plaintiff in error. W. D. Ellis, C. J. Simmons, Arnold & Arnold, and Payne & Tye, for defendants in error.

LITTLE, J. The plaintiff in error instituted an action against the administrator of Strong and the sureties upon his official bond as clerk of the superior court of Fulton county. It is alleged that, having been elected clerk, Strong, with certain defendants named as sureties, made and executed the official bond required to be given by all clerks of the superior court, by which said principal and his sureties were bound in the sum of $3,000, subject to a condition named in said bond as follows: "The condition of the above obligation is such that whereas, the above-bound Cicero H. Strong was on the 5th of Jan'y, 1887, duly and legally elected clerk of the superior court, in and for said county of Fulton for the term of two years: Now, should the said Cicero H. Strong faithfully discharge the duties of said office of clerk of the superior court in and for said county during the time he continues therein, or discharges any of the duties thereof, then the above bond to be void, else to be in full force." It is alleged that, at the time Strong entered upon the duties of his office as clerk, there was of record in his office a mortgage from Knapp to McWilliams, dated January 2, 1884, and recorded February 25, 1884, on certain real estate belonging to Knapp in Fulton county, which mortgage was executed to secure a note of even date therewith, to be due one year after date, for $1,200, with interest and attorney's fees. It was further alleged that on the 30th day of March, 1887, Strong, as clerk, made upon the record of said mortgage an entry of which the following is a copy:

"The note for which this mortgage was given to secure has this 24th March, 1887, been satisfied in full, and the clerk of the superior court is hereby authorized to cancel said mortgage on the records for mortgages for Fulton county. [Signed] Robt. McWilliams.

"Entered March 30, 1887. C. H. Strong, C. S. C."

—Which entry, it was alleged, had the effect of canceling said mortgage of record. It was also alleged: That such cancellation was a wrongful entry, which should not have been made, and which would not have been made if the duties of said office had been faithfully discharged by said C. H. Strong; the name of Robert McWilliams having been forged, and the authority to cancel said mortgage, purporting to emanate from him, being a forgery, which should have been known, if it was not known, to the said Strong. That petitioner, desiring to purchase the property named in the mortgage, after said cancellation was made, to wit, on the 31st of March, 1887, had the records searched, and found this entry of cancellation thereon. That afterwards petitioner, relying upon said cancellation, and believing it to be valid and duly authorized, as it purported to be, purchased a certain part of the land described in the mortgage, and took a conveyance thereof, believing that she was getting a title unincumbered by the mortgage. That she would not have made such purchase, but for said wrongful cancellation. That afterwards McWilliams instituted a proceeding in Fulton superior court to foreclose said mortgage, and, he having died pending the proceeding, his heirs at law foreclosed the same, and a fi. fa. issued and was levied upon the property, to which levy petitioner interposed a claim; and, on issue having been joined thereon, it was determined against her, and the property found subject, on June 12, 1896, in consequence of which she was compelled to pay off the execution issued on such foreclosure proceedings, to her damage. To this petition a demurrer was filed, containing a number of grounds,—among them, the following: That the petition set out no cause of action; that it did not show a breach of said bond, or a breach of duty on the part of Strong in entering said mortgage canceled; and because the petition did not allege that Strong was aware or had any knowledge of the entry of satisfaction of said mortgage being a forgery, or that he recorded said entry of cancellation with any knowledge that the same was a forgery. On the hearing the demurrer was sustained and the petition dismissed, to which ruling the plaintiff in error excepted.

The question raised invokes a decision on the liability of a principal and sureties of the official bond of a clerk of the superior court, whose duty it is to record, in suitable books to be kept in his office, all mortgages, deeds, etc., which by law are required or entitled to be recorded under the statutes regulating the recordation of such instruments. It is provided by section 256 of the Political Code that every official bond is obligatory on the principal and sureties "for the use and benefit of every person who is injured, as well by any wrongful act committed under color of his office as by his failure to perform, or by the improper or neglectful performance of those duties imposed by law"; and, construing this section of the Code, it was ruled in Markham v. Ross, 73 Ga. 105, that, if a plaintiff has been injured and suffered damage in consequence of the neglect of the clerk of the superior court, he may sue him personally, or upon his official bond, and recover the amount of the damage sustained. It is alleged in the petition that the cancellation referred to was a wrongful entry, which should not have been made. In effect, this means that the act of entering the cancellation was wrongful, for which the plaintiff was entitled to recover. Even if it be assumed that the entry was wrongful, a recovery would not follow, under this provision of the Code, because by it the right of action accrues only for "a wrongful act committed under color of his office"; and, clearly, the allegations of the petition do not make a case against the clerk for recovery because of any act done under the "color of office," which is defined, "A pretense of official right to do an act, made by one who has no such right." Bouv. Law Dict. tit. "Color of Office." See, also, Griffiths v. Hardenbergh, 41 N. Y. 464. In order to ascertain whether, under the facts alleged in the petition, any liability on the part of the defendants exists, it is necessary, under the further provisions of this section of the Code, to ascertain whether a record of a forged cancellation is either a failure to perform an official duty, or is the improper or neglectful performance of a duty imposed by law. It is worthy of notice that the petition does not allege that at the time of the entry the clerk knew that the cancellation was forged. Had such an allegation been made, the case would have presented a different aspect, and there could exist no doubt but that the demurrer should have been overruled. The only language from which such knowledge might be even remotely inferred is found in the fourth paragraph of the petition, which says, "and the authority to cancel said mortgage purporting to emanate from him being a forgery, which should have been known, if it was not known, to the said C. H. Strong." Taking the allegations most strongly against the pleader, this petition does not charge that Strong had knowledge that the cancellation, or authority to cancel, was a forgery. It distinctly charges only that the fact that it was a forgery should have been known to him. Founded on the act of 1885, our Civil Code (section 2737) declares that "any mortgagor in this state, who may have paid off his mortgage, may present the same, together with the order of the mortgagee or transferee, directing that the mortgage be canceled and record the order across the face of the record, to the clerk of the superior court of the county or counties in which the same is recorded, and such clerk shall write across the face of such record the word 'Satisfied,' and the date of such entry, and sign his name thereto officially." It will be noticed that the authority is only given to the clerk to make this entry when the mortgagor presents the original mortgage, together with the order of the mortgagee or transferee, with directions for the cancellation to be made. It could hardly be doubted that a cancellation claimed to have been made by authority of this section, when the original mortgage was not presented, would be such an improper performance of the duty imposed upon the clerk by its provisions as would entitle a person injured thereby to have redress through the official bond of the clerk. Indeed, this has been distinctly decided. In the case of Appleby v. State, 45 N. J. Law, 161, it appeared that the clerk, who was the custodian of the registry of mortgages, without having produced to him the original mortgage, canceled, or with a receipt thereon signed by the mortgagee, entered upon the registry of a mortgage a minute of payment and redemption, when the statute required the production of the mortgage, canceled, or a receipt signed by the mortgagee entered thereon, and the supreme court of New Jersey ruled in that case, where it appeared that such receipt was invalid, that such entry was negligently and carelessly made, and that the clerk and his sureties were liable. The law relating to entry of cancellation of mortgages in the state of New Jersey is similar to that which exists in Georgia.

While it is not alleged distinctly in the petition that at the time the cancellation was made the original mortgage was presented with the order for cancellation, yet a fair reading of the allegation made in the petition in this respect, and of the copy of the order for cancellation set out therein, indicates that it was. In the order for cancellation it is recited, "The note for which this mortgage was given to secure has been satisfied," etc. It is therefore inferable from the petition that the order for cancellation was written upon the original mortgage itself, and, in presenting the order, the original mortgage necessarily accompanied it. We feel at perfect liberty to give this construction to the petition, not only because of these words of the order, which we find set out in full, but also from the fact that on the argument of the case counsel for defendants in error based his contention of nonliability on the fact that the mortgage was presented at the time of the cancellation, and no issue was taken thereon in argument. So construing the petition, the naked question is presented, whether, without knowledge, reasonable grounds of suspicion, or anything which could put the clerk upon inquiry whether the order of cancellation was forged, the clerk of the superior court, when the original mortgage is presented to him by the mortgagor, with what is apparently the order of the mortgagee for its cancellation on record, is liable on his official bond for entering such cancellation on the record of the mortgage, when, as a matter of fact, such order is a forgery; and this requires at our hands some reference to the nature of the official act of recording a written instrument authorized or required to be placed upon a public record, and whether such act is judicial or ministerial in its character, as well as the rule of liability which attaches. The rule that, in the performance of duties by judicial officers, no liability exists in favor of one injuriously affected by a decision, is of universal application, regardless of the correctness or incorrectness of the decision. As was said by Beardsley, J., in Wilson v. Mayor, etc., 1 Denio, 595: "No action lies in any case for misconduct or delinquency, however gross, in the performance of judicial duties. * * *; If corrupt, he [the judge] may be impeached or indicted, but the law will not tolerate an action to redress the individual wrong which may have been done." The reason for this is strongly given by Judge Cooley in his work on Torts (2d Ed., p. 448), in the following language: "Courts are created on public grounds. They are to do justice as between suitors, to the end that peace and order may prevail in the political society, and that right may be protected and preserved. The duty is public, and the end to be accomplished is public. The individual advantage or loss results from the proper and thorough or improper and imperfect performance of a duty for which his controversy is only the occasion. The judge performs his duty to the public by doing justice between individuals, or, if he fails to do justice as between individuals, he may be called to account by the state in such form and before such tribunal as the law may have provided. But, as the duty neglected is not a duty to the individual, civil redress, as for an individual injury, is not admissible." The same doctrine is so universally recognized that no good purpose could be subserved by a further elaboration of this rule, especially as it is clear from the nature of the duties imposed upon the clerk of the superior court, as a recorder of deeds and mortgages, that his acts are ministerial, and not judicial. It is true that in the exercise of such duties his official discretion is often involved, but this does not make the discharge of such duties judicial. The act is not necessarily taken out of the class of ministerial duties because the officer who performs it is required to judge whether the contingency has occurred in which he is authorized or obliged to do the act. Throop, Pub. Off. § 538. In the case of Grider v. Tally, 77 Ala. 422, Judge Clopton says that such is not the judgment or discretion which is an essential element of judicial action; and in the case of Spain v. Clements, 63 Ga. 786, Mr. Justice Jackson, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It has been argued that the exercise of his official duty in receiving and filing this bond is judicial, and therefore the clerk and sureties are not liable. The clerk is a ministerial officer. Every ministerial officer, in such matters as taking bonds, must to a certain extent judge, and thus be quasi a judicial officer," in passing judgment either on the legality or insufficiency of the bond taken. A "recorder of deeds" is defined by Mr. Mechem, in his Law of Public Offices and Officers (section 733), to be "a ministerial officer whose duties are owing chiefly to those particular individuals who have occasion to employ him, and to whom he usually looks for his compensation," supporting the text by a great many adjudicated cases. Mr. Throop, in section 724 of his work on the Law of Public Offices and Officers, declares that the rule of law is well settled that where an individual sustains injury by the malfeasance, misfeasance, or nonfeasance of a ministerial officer, acting or omitting to act contrary to his duties, the law gives redress to the injured person by an action for damages. So that, being a ministerial officer, an action would lie against the clerk for malfeasance, misfeasance, or nonfeasance, and on his official bond, in the language of our Code, for the "improper or neglectful performance of duty."

It is distinctly alleged that the order of cancellation which the clerk entered was forged, and it is contended that the entry was such an improper performance of the duty as gave a right of action. We have before adverted to the proposition that if the clerk knew that the order of cancellation was forged, and entered it of record, there could be no question of his liability. We might go further, and say that if he had reason to believe that the order was forged, and if there was anything in the order itself, or the circumstances under which it was presented, which would have put upon him a duty to inquire as to the genuineness of the order, the record of it without such inquiry would have been an improper discharge of his duty. In the case of Spain v. Clements, supra, it was held by Justice Jackson that "important matters—great rights—depend on the careful and faithful discharge of" his duties by the clerk; and he declares that "public policy demands that they [clerks] be held to the discharge of these duties, and their sureties bargain that they will see to it that these duties are discharged." Under the far-reaching effects of our law of registration, it cannot be questioned that the recording officer should and will be held to a strict account in the performance of the duties which the law has imposed upon him, and the rule that such officers are liable in damages to any one who is specially injured by their omission to perform the duties imposed, or for a negligent performance of such duty, is clear. On the subject of an illegal record, Judge Cooley, on page 457 of his work on Torts, declares that the recorder may be responsible for recording papers not entitled to record, provided the record, when made, may cause legal injury, and provided, further, that he is aware that the record is unauthorized. As we have seen, our statute makes it the duty of the clerk, when a mortgage has been paid off, and the original is presented, with an order of cancellation, to enter the fact of cancellation on the record of the mortgage. While agreeing entirely with the principle ruled in the Appleby Case, supra, it must be recognized that the fact of the presentation of the original mortgage at the time that the entry of cancellation is made is important, in determining whether the officer was negligent in entering the cancellation. The mortgagee, whose rights would ordinarily be alone affected by a false entry of cancellation, was entitled to the possession of the mortgage. Presumably, he would not deliver it to the mortgagor without payment of the debt which it was made to secure; and so much weight is attached to such a possession that in the case of Heyder v. Association, 42 N. J. Eq. 403, 8 Atl. 310, it was ruled that if a mortgagee permits the mortgagor to retain the mortgage, and the latter fraudulently cancels it of record, the mortgagee cannot enforce it as against a subsequent bona fide grantee, and this ruling was made on a comparison of the equities between the bona fide purchaser without notice and the mortgagee who negligently permitted the mortgagor to have possession of the mortgage. While construing the law which imposes official duties upon the clerk to hold him and the sureties on his official bond to a rigid accountability for any act of negligence in the record of instruments by which the rights of third parties are infringed, and while we think these duties must be exercised with care and diligence, we know of no rule which imposes on a clerk liability for the record of an instrument which is apparently genuine, and accompanied with evidence of a high character that it was proper that such record should be made. There are but few cases which adjudicate the direct question in issue, and these rule that the clerk, under such circumstances, is not liable. In the case of Sacerdotte v. Duralde, 1 La. 482, it was ruled that a recorder of mortgages had no discretion to exercise as to the validity or effect of the acts recorded. In the case of Ramsey v. Riley, 13 Ohio, 157, it was distinctly ruled that, to maintain a suit against a recorder for recording a forged receipt for money due on a mortgage, it must be shown that the recorder knew the character of the instrument and with corrupt intent entered it upon the record. While, under our statute, we may not go to this extent, we are yet clear that a negligent discharge of his duties on the part of the clerk is not shown by the mere fact that he entered a cancellation which, as it subsequently transpired, was a forgery. To maintain the petition presented in this case, it would be necessary to so rule. Taking, therefore, all the allegations in the petition, as we have construed it, to be true, notwithstanding the fact that the plaintiff suffered loss by the entry, we are of the opinion that the clerk is not responsible on his official bond for such loss, because the circumstances under which the entry was recorded do not show an improper or negligent discharge of duty. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

CITY COUNCIL OF AUGUSTA v. OWENS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1900.)

INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—PLEADING—VICE PRINCIPAL — NEGLIGENCE — FELLOW SERVANT—DANGEROUS PREMISES—POWERS OF CITY—DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The petition in this case sets forth a good cause of action, and therefore the court did not err in overruling the general demurrer thereto.

2. There was no merit in the special demurrer based upon the ground that the petition did not allege where the quarry was located. It was sufficient in this respect, because it informed the defendant of the time of the injury that occurred at this quarry, the name of defendant's superintendent of the work there, gave a general description of the quarry, and set forth such facts and circumstances as would leave no room for uncertainty or doubt in the mind of the owner, who was the defendant, as to what quarry was referred to in the petition.

3. Where a municipal corporation is engaged in operating a rock quarry which it owns, a person placed there by its authority as general superintendent of the work, with power to direct the movements of its laborers, not joining with them in the labor, and being as to this business the city's sole and only representative, is the vice principal, and not the fellow servant of the workmen under his charge; and this is so whether it was within the scope of his authority to engage the workmen or not.

4. Though the immediate cause of a physical injury to an employé may be the negligent act of a fellow servant, the master is liable, if the fellow servant did this act under and in obedience to an order given by a vice principal of the employer, if the giving of the order was itself an act of negligence as to the defendant.

5. There was no error in the court charging the jury: "It was the duty of the defendant to furnish a reasonably safe place for this man to work. It was the right of the plaintiff to assume that the place was safe when he was directed to go to it." In the light of the pleadings, testimony, and the entire charge of the court, the language quoted, which is, abstractly considered, a correct statement of a general rule of law, was not calculated to mislead the jury.

6. A request to charge on a defense not set up by the answer, either by affirmative statement, or by denial of any of the allegations in plaintiff's petition, was properly refused. There being an agreed statement of facts "that the tract of land on which this accident happened formerly belonged to the Augusta Canal Company; that the right to quarry was conveyed to the city council of Augusta, under the provisions of the act of 1849, and that the city council of Augusta has police jurisdiction over the tract; * * * that this tract comes within the provisions of the act,"—it was not ultra vires to operate the quarry for the purpose of obtaining material to repair the streets or a canal which the defendant had authority to own and operate.

7. The testimony in the present case showing that the operation by defendant of the quarry in question was a ministerial act on its part, and there being no evidence to indicate that the work in which the city was engaged was governmental in its nature, the court did not err in refusing a request of defendant's counsel to charge the jury on this subject.

8. A person whose capacity to labor has been permanently diminished by physical injury wrongfully inflicted upon him by another can recover damages therefor, notwithstanding there may have been no proof as to what such person's earnings were before or after the injury. Hence there was no error, in the light of the pleadings and the evidence in this case, for the court to charge the jury on the subject of the right of plaintiff to recover for his decreased capacity to work, if the jury found from the evidence that the injury received was permanent.

9. There being nothing either in the pleadings or the evidence which gave the jury a right to find any damages growing out of the diminished earnings of plaintiff for his labor resulting from the alleged injury, it was error for the court to charge the jury to inquire whether there would have been any increase in plaintiff's earning capacity if this injury had not occurred, and to say how much that was affected by the injury, and then allow what they believed would compensate him for that loss.

10. The above covers all the questions of importance made by the present record. While there are several other grounds in the motion for a new trial relating to requests to charge, after comparing them with the entire charge of the court actually given, they are not of sufficient merit to require notice. The charge, as a whole, except as specified in the ninth headnote above, was full and fair, and covered all the material issues between the parties. The judgment denying a new trial is reversed only because of the error therein indicated.

Error from city court of Richmond county; W. F. Eve, Judge.

Action by Benjamin Owens against the city council of Augusta. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Wm. H. Barrett, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Lamar and E. B. Baxter, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. Benjamin Owens instituted in the city court of Richmond county an action for damages against the city council of Augusta, substantially making by his petition the following case: Defendant in May, 1897, at the time of the injuries to plaintiff hereinafter mentioned, owned and operated a certain quarry, from which it was engaged in obtaining rock to be used by it in making improvements on its streets, in keeping the same in proper repair, and for other like corporate purposes, within the scope of its duty and authority. It had in its employ a large number of laborers, who were engaged in getting out rock from the quarry for defendant's use as aforesaid. On said date plaintiff was engaged as one of said laborers in defendant's employ. This work at defendant's quarry was conducted under the superintendence, supervision, and control of one John Joy, who directed the same; being clothed by defendant with full power and authority, as its representative and agent, over the actual conduct of the work at said quarry. His duties were those of supervision, direction, and control. Petitioner and all the laborers and employés were, while engaged in said work, amenable to his orders,—required to obey them, and to look to him, as their superior, for direction in said work. They were thus subordinated to him, as their superior or principal. He had authority to discharge them for cause. This quarry at the time mentioned, consisted of a large, level space or area, at the back of which rose almost perpendicularly, to the height of 80 or 90 feet, a wall of rock, from which, by blasting, drilling, and quarrying, rock was obtained for defendant's use, and from whose face the rock, when loosened, fell to said area, whence it was removed. On said date plaintiff went to his work as usual at the quarry, and during the early portion of the morning Joy ordered him, with two other laborers, to go to the foot of said quarry, the base of said wall or rock, and there drill a hole pointed out by said Joy, in order that a blast might be placed therein, which work was in the usual line of plaintiff's employment at the quarry; his duty being, in connection with drilling said hole, to drive the drill with a hammer. One of the other two laborers held the drill, while the third was engaged with plaintiff in driving the same. While being thus occupied for a short time, and when in the act of striking the drill, a piece of rock, falling from above, struck him upon the head, inflicting injuries hereinafter set out. At the time the order was given him by Joy, the said Joy, without warning to petitioner, negligently ordered two other laborers to go to a point on the face of the quarry wall almost directly over the spot where plaintiff was at work when struck, and about 75 feet above him, and there to quarry out some rock which had been loosened by a blast. One of said laborers, in obedience to said orders, after reaching the place designated by Joy, in ignorance of petitioner's position, in the usual and ordinary method, did, with a crowbar, loosen and move, without negligence, from its place, a large piece of rock; and the same rolled down the face of said wall, and in its course broke in pieces, one of which struck plaintiff on the head. It was charged: That the act of said Joy in sending laborers to quarry out rock almost above plaintiff's head was gross negligence, was in reckless disregard of the safety of plaintiff and those working with him, and was a violation of the duty which Joy owed plaintiff. That this improper and negligent conduct of Joy rendered plaintiff's position excessively and unusually perilous, and perilous in a manner and to an extent which plaintiff could not possibly have anticipated or foreseen, and that this conduct was the cause of plaintiff being struck by the rock and injured. Plaintiff did not know or suspect, nor could he by proper diligence have known or suspected, that said laborers were quarrying above him. That he was thereby subjected by defendant, acting through Joy, to a risk not reasonably incident to his employment, and when he was hurt he was exercising all due care and diligence. The blow rendered him unconscious, and he remained so for some time. Was carried to a hospital, where he remained for several weeks under the care of a competent physician. That his skull was crushed in by the blow. That a portion of same had to be removed, and that his brain is now protected at that point only by his scalp. As a result thereof, he is constantly exposed to danger of serious injury, and even death. That he is thereby caused great and constant distress and apprehension of mind. That said condition will be permanent. That he suffered great pain after the injury, has continued to suffer ever since, and will continue to suffer such pain as long as he lives. His capacity to labor and earn money has been greatly and permanently diminished, and this condition of impaired capacity will continue. He alleges his damages to be $5,000, for which he prays judgment.

To this petition a demurrer was filed—First, on the ground that there is no cause of action set forth in the petition; and, second, because there is no allegation in the petition showing where the quarry at which the accident occurred is located. This demurrer was overruled, to which judgment exceptions pendente lite were filed, and error assigned thereon in the main bill of exceptions. The defendant at the same time answered, and in its answer admitted the truth of the allegations as to owning and operating a quarry, from which it was engaged in obtaining rock for the purposes mentioned in the petition, but it does not admit that such work was within the scope of its duty and authority. It admitted that Joy was in charge, directing the work at the quarry; that petitioner and all the laborers and employés were, while engaged in said work, amenable to his orders; and that, in so far as these facts warrant the conclusion, said employés were subordinate to Joy,—but denies that Joy had authority to discharge said laborers. It admits the truth of the allegations in the petition which state that Joy ordered two laborers to go to a point on the face of the quarry wall to loosen and throw down rock, and that one of the rocks thus thrown down broke into pieces, and one of the pieces struck plaintiff in the head. It neither admits nor denies, for lack of knowledge, that one of the laborers, in ignorance of petitioner's position, in the usual and ordinary method, did, with a crowbar, loosen and move, without negligence, from its place, a large piece of rock, but denies that the order was given said laborers without warning to petitioner or given negligently, and denies that the spot where said laborers were directed to go was almost directly over the spot where plaintiff was at work when struck. It admits that plaintiff was struck in the head with a rock. The answer further avers that while it is true that, a plane running along the face of the wall of said quarry would be almost perpendicular to the surface of the area in front thereof, the quarrying has been so constructed as to leave along the face of the wall thereof wide ledges, running at an angle from near the top to the bottom thereof, somewhat as roads are built along the face of precipices; that these ledges were so constructed as to be used as slides or ways for rock quarried from the face of the quarry, and rolling along them to the bottom; that such ledges have been used for a long time for such purpose, and are still so used; that such use was safe and proper, was known to petitioner, was a regular incident to the work in which petitioner was engaged, and did not render the position of plaintiff unusually perilous. The answer further alleges: That on the day previous to the injury, and on the morning of the same day as the injury, rock had been loosened and thrown down from the same place whence the rock, a piece of which struck petitioner, was thrown, and petitioner and the other laborers were working in approximately the same place on the surface of the area below the wall as where petitioner was standing when injured. That such relative position of those working below and those quarrying above was usual, was known to petitioner, and was a regular incident of the work, and that the rock thus loosened or quarried from above had been descending along the ledge provided therefor, without any unusual danger or premonition thereof. The point from which the rock was being loosened was in full view of petitioner, and he did see, or could have easily, by the use of the slightest diligence, seen, the men working there. Petitioner knew the place whence the rock was being loosened, knew that the laborers had been sent there to do this work by throwing down rock, and knew as fully and as well as defendant or any of its agents the danger incident to his position. The injury to plaintiff was caused by an unforeseen accident, without fault or negligence on the part of the defendant, and this defendant should not be held liable therefor.

It is unnecessary to give in this report a synopsis of the evidence. Suffice it to say that the plaintiff by his testimony substantially made out the case alleged in his petition, and the defendant introduced testimony tending to establish the main elements of its defense. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $2,000, whereupon the defendant moved for a new trial, which was overruled, and upon this judgment error is assigned in the bill of exceptions.

1. We have no hesitancy in saying that this petition set forth a good cause of action, and that the court did not err in overruling the general demurrer thereto. The main charge of negligence which seems to be relied upon by the plaintiff in his pleadings is the conduct of defendant's superintendent of this work at the quarry in sending plaintiff to the particular place where he was hurt, and at the same time, without warning to him, sending laborers to a point almost directly over his head, some 75 feet above him, for the purpose of taking out rock that had been blasted, and tumbling the same down to the place below where plaintiff was stationed. One of the rocks thus loosened, and intended to be thrown down, doubtless, upon the ledge, broke; and one of the pieces struck plaintiff on the head, causing the injury. As to whether this was negligence, and shown to be negligence by the testimony to the satisfaction of the jury, is a question peculiarly for them to determine; and the court would have erred if it had sustained the demurrer upon the theory that the petition set forth no cause of action.

2. Nor do we think there is any merit in the special demurrer made in this case on the ground that the petition did not allege where the quarry was located. The petition does give a description of the quarry. It alleges that it was owned by the defendant (that is, the city of Augusta); that petitioner was in its employment, at work at the quarry. It further gives the name of the superintendent employed by the defendant to take charge of the work at the quarry, which was not denied. It describes the grounds, and wall of rock, and the character of the work engaged in at the quarry. It does seem that the owner of such an immense industry and enterprise as this would readily have known what particular quarry, even if it had more than one, the plaintiff was alluding to in his petition. In fact, the answer filed at the time of the demurrer shows upon its face that it knew exactly what quarry was referred to in the petition; and, even if there was any error in overruling this special ground of demurrer, it certainly worked no harm whatever to the defendant. In 6 Enc. Pl. & Prac. p. 368, this principle is announced, and the author cites a number of authorities to sustain the text. It is there said: "Although a demurrer may have been improperly overruled, yet, if the demurrant was not harmed by such ruling, judgment will not be reversed on account of the harmless error." Besides this, the principle that, in pleading, less particularity is required when the facts lie as much within the knowledge of the adverse party as in the party pleading, is so well established, and sustained by such abundant authority, that we think it useless to discuss or cite authority on the subject.

3. In the third ground of the motion for a new trial, exception is taken to the following charge of the court: "I charge you that if Joy was a foreman or boss of the city quarry where plaintiff was injured, in the sense that he had full control of the operations at the quarry, and full authority to give orders, and to direct and control, as superior, the movements and actions of the employés of the city working in the quarry; and if they were subject to his orders and directions therein; and if he took no part in the actual work at the quarry himself, but merely directed and superintended it; and if he had authority to suspend employés or discharge them, subject to the final action of a higher city official as to such discharge,—then Joy was not a fellow servant of plaintiff, but was the vice principal of defendant." The objection to this was that it took from the consideration of the jury the determination of the fact as to whether or not Joy was a fellow servant with the plaintiff, and shut out from consideration the fact that the city retained the general supervision of the quarry. We think, in the light of the pleadings and the testimony, the charge of the court complained of was entirely correct. It appears from the allegations and the proof that a municipal corporation, the defendant in this case, was engaged in the business of operating a quarry. Joy was placed there by the defendant as a general superintendent of the work, with authority to direct the movements of the laborers,—not joining with them in the labor,—and, as to this particular business, was the city's sole and only representative. It necessarily follows from the facts alleged and proved that the relation he sustained to the plaintiff was that of a vice principal, and not a fellow servant. If his duties, and the power with which he was clothed, did not constitute him a vice principal, then it would be an exceedingly difficult matter to conceive of how any municipality or other corporation could be held responsible for the acts and conduct of any agent employed to superintend and control its subemployés. It is complained that this charge excluded from the consideration of the jury that the city retained the general supervision of the quarry. In one sense, that is true; but not more so in this case than corporations have occupied in many other cases in which, under repeated adjudications of this court, they have been held responsible for the negligent acts of subbosses towards employés under their immediate control. This record fails to show that any other official, agent, or employé of the city than Joy had anything whatever to do with superintending the conduct of the work, and directing the laborers engaged therein. In Bain v. Machine Works, 75 Ga. 719 (Syl., point 2), it was decided: "Although two persons were employed by the same master, yet where one of them was employed as a blaster for the purpose of removing certain rocks on the master's property, and alone had charge of the work of blasting, and the other had nothing to do with it, but was employed as a wood workman in the foundry of the master, they were not fellow servants, in the legal sense of the term; and a charge based on that assumption was erroneous, though it may have been a correct abstract statement." In Blackman v. Electric Co., 102 Ga. 64, 29 S. E. 120, it was decided: "While the person occupying the inferior position is, in a broad and general sense, a coemployé, he is not a fellow servant with the person in authority over him, in the sense he could not recover for injuries sustained by him in consequence of the negligence of such person." See the opinion of Justice Atkinson, on page 68, 102 Ga., and page 122, 29 S. E., and following, and it will clearly appear from those facts that the person there who was regarded in the capacity of a vice principal did not occupy any more authoritative relation—even if as much—to the employé than did Joy in this case to the plaintiff. See, also, Cooper v. Mullins, 30 Ga. 146; Augusta Factory v. Barnes, 72 Ga. 227, 228; Krogg v. Railroad Co., 77 Ga. 214; Cheeney v. Steamship Co., 92 Ga. 726, 19 S. E. 33; Ellington v. Lumber Co., 93 Ga. 57, 19 S. E. 21, and authorities cited. The above disposes of the questions raised by the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth grounds of the motion for a new trial, in which error is assigned upon the refusal of the judge to give to the jury certain requests of counsel for the defendant. The thirteenth ground complains of error in refusing a request to charge the jury as follows: "If you believe that Joy had not power to employ or discharge, but that his duties were only to direct and act as a foreman and boss, directing the men where to work, and engaged in a common pursuit with Owens, you will be authorized to find that Joy and Owens were fellow servants. And if you so find that they were fellow servants, and even should believe that Joy was negligent, and that his negligence caused the injury to Owens, Owens could not recover." The court gave that in charge, with this qualification: "I give you that in charge, gentlemen, with this qualification: That if you find that Joy was not in control and had authority, but was simply a foreman with control of the work assigned them, and was engaged along with the others in the actual work, then he would not be a vice principal, but only a fellow servant, and negligence on his part would not render the city liable." We question very much whether the charge of the court, even with that qualification, was correct, under the testimony in this record; for there was no evidence that Joy was engaged in the same sort of service with this plaintiff. On the contrary, the plaintiff was a common laborer, whose business it was to handle tools, engage in manual labor, and work upon the rock. Joy was not engaged in any such service. He was simply the superintendent and supervisor of the work that was carried on by the laborers in the quarry. We are inclined to think that the testimony did not authorize the charge that was given, and, if there was any error in it, it was against the plaintiff, instead of the defendant. We do not, however, decide this, as no exception thereto was filed by the plaintiff.

4. In the fourth ground of the motion for a new trial it is alleged that the court erred in giving the following charge to the jury: "The employer is liable for injuries resulting from the unsafe condition of a working place, even though brought about by the negligence of a fellow servant or fellow servants of the employé, if such fellow servant acted under the orders of the employer, and such orders were negligent on the part of the employer as to the injured party, provided the injured employé was not guilty of negligence in going into the dangerous place." The objection to this was that it prevented the jury from arriving at a conclusion warranted by the evidence,—that the proximate cause of the injury to plaintiff was the negligence of his fellow servant Elliott. From a careful review of the evidence, we are not prepared to say that there was sufficient testimony to charge Elliott with any negligence. We do not decide that question, however, but, assuming that he was negligent, we think the charge was sound law; for the evidence shows that he was simply carrying out the instructions of Joy, for whose negligence the defendant was liable. In Railroad Co. v. Phelps, 19 S. E. 652, the supreme court of Virginia decided: "If an injury be caused by the concurring negligence of a fellow servant and a superior who is not a fellow servant, the master is liable." In Augusta Factory v. Barnes, 72 Ga. 227, 228, this doctrine is announced in the opinion of Justice Hall, which principle is embodied in the seventh headnote, on page 218. Referring to the case of Railroad Co. v. De Bray, 71 Ga. 406, the court says: "We carefully examined our previous decisions, together with the authorities in the text writers, and the cases from the English courts and the courts of this country, and came to the conclusion that, where the plaintiff used all ordinary care and diligence to avoid the injury occasioned by the negligence of the principal's other servants, with whom he was disconnected at the time, and where he was acting in obedience to the orders of another servant over him, and whose orders he was bound to obey, that he had a right to recover for the injury inflicted under such circumstances." See, also, Cheeney v. Steamship Co., 92 Ga. 726, 19 S. E. 33. This disposes of the sixth, seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, and twenty-third grounds of the motion for a new trial. Considering the requests to charge in the last grounds named in the light of the entire charge, there was no error in refusing them.

5. In the fifth ground of the motion, complaint is made that the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "It was the duty of the defendant to furnish a reasonably safe place for this man to work. It was the right of the plaintiff to assume that the place was safe when he was directed to go to it." The objection to this charge was that the overwhelming weight of evidence was to the effect that practically every place in the quarry was dangerous, and that any one working there was liable to be injured, and it was claimed that this charge was without evidence to support it. As an abstract proposition of law, the charge was correct, and we do not think that in the present case it was calculated to mislead the jury. There is evidence in the record of the dangers that necessarily attend the working of a quarry, ordinary and usual in their nature, and the jury doubtless clearly understood by the charge with reference to a reasonably safe place for a man to work that it meant such a place under the circumstances and conditions attending the operation of that business. There is testimony in behalf of plaintiff tending to establish the fact that when injured he was not in a safe place. He testified that on the day before, when engaged at work there, and when the work of removing rock above them began, plaintiff and others were ordered away from that place on account of this danger, and that he knew nothing about what was going on above him when he was hurt; and we fail to find any evidence that Elliott knew he was beneath him. We think, therefore, that this charge was warranted by the evidence.

6. In the ninth, tenth, and eleventh grounds of the motion, complaint is made of the refusal of the court to give certain written requests in charge, touching what powers a municipal corporation can exercise, and any powers exercised over and beyond those granted the corporation are ultra vires; that if the jury believed the city council of Augusta had no authority from the legislature, express or implied, or indispensable to the objects of the corporation, to conduct the quarry described in plaintiff's petition, such work would be known in law as "ultra vires" (that is, beyond the scope and powers of the corporation), and, to create liability on the city in a case of this kind, it is necessary that the act done which is injurious to others must be within the scope of the corporate powers as prescribed by charter or positive enactment,—in other words, it must not be ultra vires, We do not think there was any error in refusing these requests. In the first place, in its answer the defendant set up nothing, by way of defense, charging that the city was in the exercise of ultra vires powers in the operation of this quarry, either by affirmative statement, or by denial of any of the allegations in plaintiff's petition, except that in the second paragraph of its answer it simply states that it does not admit that such work was within the scope of its duty or authority. It nowhere alleges that it was ultra vires, and, even if it did, it should have shown by its plea the reasons why the city was acting outside of its authority, and that therefore it was not responsible for the negligence of its agents in pursuit of this particular business. Besides, we think this question is controlled by the agreed statement of facts in the brief of evidence, from which it appears that it was agreed by the parties that the tract of land where this accident occurred belonged to the Augusta Canal Company, and the right to quarry the same was conveyed to the city council of Augusta under the provisions of the act of 1849, and the city has police jurisdiction over the tract. It is admitted that this tract comes within the provisions of the act. Under the act approved December 27, 1845 (Acts 1845, p. 138 et seq.), of which the court will take judicial cognizance, the Augusta Canal was incorporated by the legislature. By the act approved February 7, 1854 (Acts 1853–54, p. 252), which amends the act of 1849, it is provided "that the city council of Augusta may, at any time hereafter, by purchase or otherwise, lawfully acquire and enjoy all the estate, privileges and franchises heretofore granted to the Augusta Canal Company," etc. From this it will be seen that there has been full legislative sanction given to the city council of Augusta to own and operate the quarry in question, and therefore in its operation it cannot be guilty of any ultra vires acts.

7. In the twelfth ground of the motion complaint is made that the court failed to charge the jury as follows: "There are two general characters of duties imposed on cities,—one public or governmental, and the other private or corporate. In the performance of the public or governmental duties the city is not liable for the negligence of its agents, officers, or employés. In the performance of its private or corporate duties it is subject to the same liability as are private corporations. If, therefore, you believe from the evidence that the work in which the city was engaged when petitioner, Owens, was injured, was governmental in its nature, the city cannot be held liable, whatever was the negligence of its officers or employés." We do not think the pleadings in this case involve this issue, and what we have said above on the subject of the exercise of ultra vires powers by the defendant will apply to this ground, also, in the motion for a new trial. There was some evidence that rock was also being gathered for the purpose of repairing the canal, as well as the streets of the city. It is contended by counsel for defendant that in the construction and maintenance of the canal the city was engaged in performing a governmental function, and therefore it cannot be liable in damages for any negligence whatever in connection therewith; that Owens, in getting out the rock, some of which might be for use on the canal, was at work in its maintenance and construction, and therefore cannot hold the city liable for its negligence. This question is settled in general terms by our Political Code (section 748), which declares: "Municipal corporations are not liable for failure to perform, or for errors in performing, their legislative or judicial powers. For neglect to perform, or for improper or unskillful performance of their ministerial duties, they are liable." The question then in this case is whether or not, when the city of Augusta was engaged in operating this quarry, it was exercising any legislative or judicial power, or whether it was engaged in the performance of mere ministerial duties. There can be no doubt about the proposition that, if the powers it was discharging were purely and exclusively of a governmental character, the city would then occupy the position as simply the agent of the general government to do things which devolved upon the general government. There is a vast difference in the decisions of different courts upon the subject of what does or what does not constitute governmental power; but, under the evidence in this case, we think there can be no question but that the operation by the city of the quarry which it owns is purely ministerial. It was held by this court in Love v. City of Atlanta, 95 Ga. 129, 22 S. E. 29: "The duty of keeping the streets clear of putrid and other substances offensive to the sense of smell, and which tend to imperil the public health, devolves, under the charter of the city of Atlanta, upon the board of health of that city; and the functions of this department of the city government being governmental, and not purely administrative, in their character, it follows that if, in the exercise of such functions, and in the discharge of the duties devolving upon this department thereunder, a private citizen is injured by the negligence of one of its servants in and about such work, no right of action arises against the city." That case was evidently based upon the idea that the city, in performing such duties, was in the exercise of a governmental power in administering to the general public health. It was exercising a governmental function of a corporation, and was therefore not liable. In Fuller v. City of Atlanta, 66 Ga. 80, it was decided: "The power granted by charter to a municipal corporation to raise or alter the grades of streets involves a legislative act. After this has taken place, the mere construction of the work is ministerial." We think the decision in the Fuller Case controls the principle in this case. Should the city decide when a street should be opened, closed, or repaired, or when a sewer should be built, it is clearly exercising legislative or judicial functions; but when it engages in the work of opening, closing, or repairing a street, or building a sewer, and is thus engaged in the physical execution of the work, it is evidently in the discharge of duties purely of a ministerial nature. If this be true, then, clearly, where a city owns a quarry, and is under obligation to keep its streets, canals, etc., in repair from material obtained from quarries, it has as much right to operate its own quarry as it would have to purchase such material from others engaged in the business; and, while so operating, it is in the performance of work purely of a ministerial nature. It is contended that the use and operation of the canal by the city were for governmental purposes; but, even if there were anything in this contention, that cannot affect the ministerial work of operating a quarry for the purpose of supplying rocks for the canal and streets. Besides, the evidence fails to show for what purpose this canal was used,—whether to extinguish fire, to supply citizens with water for private purposes, or to carry on manufacturing industries; and therefore there is nothing in the record to authorize the court to charge the request with reference to whether the city was exercising a governmental function in the operation of this canal. As above stated, however, we cannot see how the operation of a quarry for the purposes indicated by this evidence can constitute that enterprise anything but the exercise of a ministerial function. It has no reference whatever to governmental powers contemplated by the statute. There is no question in this case but that the city of Augusta was working this quarry for legitimate purposes, to wit, to repair its streets, and to furnish material for repairing its canal. Such work of repairs is certainly within the purposes and ends of the corporation. Now, it is not pretended that the powers and duties of Joy were conferred or defined by law,—either statute or common law. He was not a public officer, but his entire powers are conferred and duties defined by the city itself. It therefore necessarily follows that he was a mere servant or agent of the city of Augusta, and it was chargeable with the consequences of his acts within the scope of his authority. This principle is recognized and fully discussed in Wood, Mast. & S. (2d Ed.) §§ 457–460. A number of authorities are therein cited to sustain the text. See Grimes v. Keene, 52 N. H. 335, from which the author quotes extensively, and which is controlling upon this subject.

8. In the seventh ground of the motion, exception is taken to the following charge: "He would also be entitled to recover for his decreased capacity to work, if you find from the evidence that the injury received is permanent." The objection to this was that there was no evidence showing how much he had been earning at the time of the trial, nor was there any evidence to show that his ability to labor had been diminished. It invited the jury to enter upon an unilluminated field of damages, and put no rein upon the amount to be given, thus making the verdict excessive. Upon an examination of the evidence, we do not find that the position of counsel for plaintiff in error, that there was no evidence to show that plaintiff's ability to labor had been diminished, was sustained; for the plaintiff himself testified that his capacity to labor was diminished, that it pained him to work in the sun, and that, while he did labor after the injury, he had to do so to support his family, but that it was attended with pain. There was also evidence for defendant tending to show the character of service and labor that he performed after his injury, and it seemed about as hard and difficult as he did before he was hurt. It is true, there is no evidence as to his earnings before or after the injury. This charge we do not think authorizes the jury to have any reference to his diminished earnings, but it has reference only to his diminished ability to labor. But there is authority for the position that such permanent diminution of one's power to labor constitutes an element of damages, where it is the result of an injury sustained, though there may be no evidence that it had any effect upon the earnings of the injured party. See Powell v. Railroad Co., 77 Ga. 200, 3 S. E. 759, where the principle is laid down that one who has to live long in pain is more damaged than one who has to endure suffering but for a brief term. With reference to damages from pain, we quote the following from the opinion in that case: "It may be thought that the loss of ability to labor is not pain, but this is a mistake. There is no greater blessing of life than ability to labor, even though the proceeds may belong to another. It is better for happiness, as well as for virtue, to work for nothing, than to be idle. A physical injury that destroys the power of a human being to labor is one of the most serious injuries that it is possible to inflict. True, it is not to be measured by pecuniary earnings where the suit is by a married woman, for such earnings, as a general rule, belong to the husband, and the right of action for their loss is in him; but the wife herself has such an interest in her working capacity as that she can recover something for its destruction," etc. We do not see why this same principle would not apply to one whose capacity to labor has been diminished, and especially when such labor is attended with pain. We cannot, therefore, say that there was error in this charge which would necessitate a new trial, for both the petition and some of the evidence tend to show this effect of the injury received by plaintiff. As this was a question for the jury, we express no opinion thereon.

9. The eighth ground of exception, however, we think is open to serious objection. Complaint is made that the court erred in charging as follows: "So, gentlemen of the jury, if you find, under the evidence and the charge, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, you determine what amount you will allow for the pain and suffering endured by the plaintiff. Then, the amount of incapacity to work. Take into consideration, in determining that, what he has been making, and what he would likely have continued to make,—whether there would have been any increase in his earning capacity if this injury had not occurred, and also, as he grew older, what the natural decrease would be,—and say how much that was affected by this injury, and then allow what you believe would compensate him for that loss." The objection to this was that it was without evidence to support it; that it encouraged the jury to enlarge its verdict beyond what was proper and justified by the evidence; that it suggested for them a measure of damage, without there being any data on which to base it. We think the objection is well taken. While the petition alleges a diminished capacity to labor, it does not allege any pecuniary loss resulting to the plaintiff in consequence of the fact of diminished earnings from labor. It does not allege what he was making before the injury, nor what he has been able to make since, and there is not a particle of evidence in the record which throws any light whatever upon the subject. The error consists, therefore, in opening up to the jury the right to investigate a matter with the view of increasing damages, by suggesting a measure of damages upon which they have no data whatever to base any finding. The jury found a verdict for $2,000. We express no opinion whatever about its excessiveness, even in view of the pleadings and evidence that were before them; but we cannot say, as matter of law, that they would have found that amount regardless of this charge for pain and suffering alone. We are aware of decisions repeatedly made by this and other courts that a new trial will not be granted by a reviewing court for error in a charge which works no injury to the complaining party. But it must be perfectly clear that a correction of the error would not result in a change of the verdict. Where the error might have influenced the jury, a new trial should be granted. We cannot say that this was not a close case upon its facts, and therefore cannot say that the jury could not have been influenced by this erroneous charge. In Bazemore v. Davis, 48 Ga. 339, it was decided, "Material error having been committed by the court, a new trial will only be refused where the evidence demanded the verdict which was rendered." A number of decisions of this court could be cited sustaining the same principle, but this is unnecessary. In Furr v. Eddleman, 80 Ga. 661, 7 S. E. 167 (Syl., point 2), it was decided, "though an improper measure of damages be given in charge to the jury, if the verdict be for less than the damages, measured properly, would amount to, the finding need not be disturbed." But the damages involved in this case were necessarily, under the proof submitted to the jury, of a general nature, and cannot be accurately measured by the court upon any legal basis whatever. It is left almost entirely in the discretion of the jury to fix the amount of damages for pain and suffering, and their finding will not be interfered with, unless so excessive as to clearly indicate bias or prejudice. We, therefore, as matter of law, cannot say that the evidence in this case demanded a verdict for the amount found. For the erroneous charge hereinabove quoted, we feel constrained to grant a new trial.

10. The above covers all the questions of importance made by this record. There are a few other grounds in the motion for a new trial, relating principally to requests to charge; but, after comparing them with the charge of the court actually given, we do not think they are of sufficient merit to require discussion. The charge, as a whole, except as specified in the note just preceding, was full and fair, and covered all the important issues between the parties; and on account of the error in the charge hereinabove pointed out, only, the judgment denying the grant of a new trial is reversed. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

CLARKE v. HAVARD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1900.)

AGENCY—EVIDENCE—USURY.

1. One who received money from the owner thereof for the express purpose of lending it out at interest, and with authority so to do, either general or limited, and who afterwards did lend the money to another, taking therefor a promissory note payable to such owner, is to be regarded as his agent, although the borrower, at the time of executing the note or subsequently, signed a paper purporting to constitute the person with whom he dealt in the transaction his agent to obtain the loan.

2. When, in such a case, the agent exacted from the borrower a commission which, added to the stipulated interest, made an amount exceeding that which could be lawfully charged as interest, the transaction was usurious, if it was understood between the lender and the agent that the former was to pay nothing for the latter's services, and the circumstances were such that the lender must necessarily have known that the agent intended to charge the borrower, and did charge and collect from him, such commission for making the loan.

Error from city court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Agnes Havard against M. A. Clarke. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

This was a suit on a promissory note. In the court below a verdict was directed for the plaintiff. Judgment was accordingly entered for the amount sued for. The following evidence was introduced on the trial, to wit: T. A. Clarke, sworn for the defendant, testified as follows: "I am the husband of the defendant, and represented her in getting the money on the note sued on. Went to Mr. Barnett and asked for the money. He let us have six hundred and fifty-five dollars, and my recollection is that he took out fifteen dollars of that amount for searching the titles to the place. This was all I promised to pay. Can't read. Thought the note was for the amount I got, until the Georgia Loan & Trust Company wrote for the interest, and then the roocas began. Thought it was Mr. Barnett's money we were getting. He had his sign on his door, that he loaned money. Did not know the note was payable to the security and investment company until long afterwards. The note and papers were signed at the same time the money was paid. Defendant can't read. Mr. Barnett brought the papers to my wife, folded up, and told her to sign. She asked what amount she was getting, and he said $655. She then signed the papers, and that was all. They were not read over to her, and no bond for titles were given her. I signed the application for the loan in her name." Manda A. Clarke, defendant, testified as follows: "My husband, T. A. Clarke, made the arrangements for me to borrow the money. I went to Mr. Barnett's office and signed the papers for the money. Can't read. He did not read to me the papers signed. Money was paid over same time papers were signed. Never knew the note was for $750 until long afterwards. None of the papers were read to me. Mr. Barnett just brought the papers to me, folded up, and told me to sign. Never heard a word about having to pay Mr. Barnett ninety-five dollars commission." Samuel Barnett, sworn for plaintiff, testified as follows: "The defendant employed me to obtain the loan. She signed the application. Ninety-five dollars was paid me as commission for procuring the loan. I represented the borrower, and the payee of the note knew nothing of my commission. I did not know the defendant and her husband could not read. Neitner asked that the papers be read. I explained the matter to them, and did not prevent their reading. I did not notice that they did not read the papers. I am not the agent of the lender, and did not act as such. The Georgia Loan & Trust Company got thirty dollars of the commission I charged. They and I are brokers, and do not act as agents of any lenders. We obtain money from different capitalists at different times. The interest paid on the note was sent to the Georgia Loan & Trust Company, at Macon, Ga., as a matter of convenience, and is not a payment until it reaches the lender. I had nothing to do with collecting the interest. The security and investment company, the payee of the note, is a partnership. Don't know whether the members of the firm are stockholders in the Georgia Loan & Trust Company or not. Said Georgia Loan & Trust Company did not loan the money. It was sent them by the security investment company, payees of the note, who loaned the money. The security investment company got no commissions, and only seven per cent. interest." Plaintiff also introduced the application for loan. This contained a statement that S. Barnett was constituted the agent of the borrower (defendant) to procure a loan of $750, was addressed to S. Barnett, contained the statement that applicant had no other real estate, and was dated January 18, 1896. Indorsed, "Approved," by security investment company. Plaintiff also introduced in evidence the following statement: "Atlanta, Ga., January 20th, 1896. Amanda A. Clarke, in Account S. Barnett Loan Sec. I. Co., 5 years 6 mo., 7 per cent., $750.00; to commissions, etc., $95.00; net cash, $655.00. [Signed] Manda A. Clarke." T. A. Clarke, recalled, stated that he did not know the Georgia Loan & Trust Company had anything to do with the loan until they called upon the defendant for payment of interest. On the above evidence, the court, over the objection of defendant, directed a verdict for plaintiff, and verdict and judgment were entered for plaintiff for the amount sued for, and the defendant excepted.

R. O. Lovett and Humphries & Humphries, for plaintiff in error. S. Barnett, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. This case turns upon the questions dealt with below. It is an action upon a promissory note for the principal sum of $750, and three coupon interest notes thereto attached. The main note is dated January 1, 1896, and due January 1, 1901, with interest from date at 7 per cent. per annum, evidenced by ten coupon notes, including those sued upon, which were, on their face, overdue when the action was brought. The large note is payable to the order of the Security Investment Company of Bridgeport, Conn., and stipulates that, if default should be made in the payment of interest, it should, at the holder's option, become due and payable, regardless of the date of maturity. The smaller notes are payable to the investment company or bearer, and stipulate for interest after their maturity at 8 per cent. per annum. The plaintiff's petition contains an allegation that all of these notes were, directly after their execution, duly assigned to her. This allegation is not denied in the answer, but the defendant therein alleges that "the contract, as made by her, was that she was to borrow of the payee of said notes the sum of $655"; that this was the amount actually loaned to her; and that "she does not owe the amount claimed in said suit as principal, because there is charged as part of said principal the sum of ninety-five dollars, the same being charged against this defendant as commissions by officers and agents of the payee of said notes, and the same is illegal, being charged under the name of 'commissions' to avoid the laws against usury." The answer further states that the amount of the usury is $89.95, and sets forth in detail the facts and figures upon which this assertion is based. It seems to have been properly conceded that the defense of usury, if well founded in fact, was good against the plaintiff, though she became a bona fide holder for value before the maturity of the notes. See Angier v. Smith, 101 Ga. 844, 28 S. E. 167. At the conclusion of the evidence on both sides, the court directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount of the principal and interest claimed in the petition, and the defendant excepted. The evidence is fully set forth in the official report preceding this opinion.

1. The first question for determination is, did the evidence warrant a finding that Barnett was the agent of the investment company to make the loan? We think it did. The loan was certainly made for and in behalf of that company. Of necessity, it had to be represented in the transaction by some one acting as its agent. It could not possibly make a loan in any other way. There is no evidence tending to show that it was in fact represented by any one other than the Georgia Loan & Trust Company or Barnett. He and the Georgia Company were acting in concert. He testified that it did not loan the money, and that the investment company did. But how? On this particular point his testimony is not lucid, but the real meaning of it, when taken in connection with other things stated by him, is not difficult of ascertainment. He said: "The Georgia Loan & Trust Co. got thirty dollars of the commission I charged. They and I are brokers, and do not act as agents of any lenders. We obtain money from different capitalists at different times. The interest paid on the note was sent to the Georgia Loan & Trust Company, at Macon, Georgia, as a matter of convenience, and is not a payment until it reaches the lender." He further testified that the defendant employed him to obtain the loan; that he represented the borrower; that he was not the agent of the lender, and did not act as such. As will have been observed, the written application signed by the defendant, and purporting to constitute Barnett her agent to procure the loan, was dated January 18th, though apparently the note was executed on January 1st. Barnett stated facts and conclusions therefrom. The conclusions, however, were merely his own. Are they necessarily correct, and as such binding and conclusive upon the defendant? Would not these facts and the other facts in the case warrant other and very different conclusions? He obtained money from the investment company to lend out. For whom? Why, for the company, of course. At the time he received this money the defendant had not asked for a loan. It was on hand when she called. Up to that point, who, and who alone, was represented by Barnett? The answer is simple. Does it alter the actual facts of the transaction that the borrower signed a paper, bearing a date 17 days later than that of the note, stating that Barnett was thereby made her agent to borrow $750? Doubtless this discrepancy in dates is susceptible of explanation. Indeed, the defendant's receipt to Barnett for the money borrowed was dated January 20th. But what difference would it make that the note was dated back, which must have been the case if we accept as true the statement of the witness T. A. Clarke that "the note and paper were signed at the same time the money was paid." Could not the jury have found, and ought they not, in view of all the evidence, to have found, that the contract embraced in the application was purely colorable? The law cares nothing about the form of a transaction, but characterizes it according to its substance and results. What is the substance of this transaction? Manda A. Clarke, wishing to borrow money, applied to Barnett for a loan, supposing she was dealing exclusively with him. He had on hand money which had been sent to him by the investment company through the Georgia Company, his co-agent, to be loaned. He let the applicant have the money, taking her note payable to the investment company, after deducting $95 for commissions. The Georgia Company collected what was paid on the interest notes, and forwarded same to the owner. Against all this there is nothing to show agency for the borrower, except Barnett's statement of a mere conclusion, backed by the seemingly belated application for the loan. Certainly, it would not have required a strain to find that the loan was made by Barnett as agent of the investment company. What service did he render the defendant, as her agent, which was not directly connected with that he performed in behalf of the investment company, agreeably to his undertaking to effect for it a loan of money which it had previously sent to him for that purpose? How, under the circumstances, could it have been possible for him to do anything in her behalf in procuring the loan? He did not ask the investment company to make a loan to the defendant. All he had to do when she applied to him for the money was to let her have it. This he did, and in so doing rendered her no more service, save as to examining her titles, than every lender does when he loans money to a borrower on application. There is no question here as to Barnett's right to make a charge for examining the titles. This case is obviously different upon its facts from that of Merck v. Mortgage Co., 79 Ga. 213, 7 S. E. 265, and numerous others of its class, in which the lender received the borrower's application, passed upon it for himself, and for himself decided whether or not the security was good and the terms offered satisfactory. Here Barnett passed upon these and all kindred questions for the lender, manifestly with authority so to do, which was either general or limited by instructions not disclosed. If this does not amount to agency, we have no conception of what agency is. The trial court therefore could not properly have directed a verdict for the plaintiff on the theory that the evidence demanded a finding that Barnett was exclusively the borrower's agent, and in no sense the agent of the lender.

2. It is, however, contended that even if he was such agent, and even if he did exact a commission which, added to the stipulated interest, would make an amount exceeding the maximum legal rate of interest, the transaction was not usurious, for the reason that the lender did not receive any part of the commission, or know that a commission was charged. In this connection Barnett testified, "The payee of the note knew nothing of my commission." He did not testify that this payee was ignorant of the fact that it was his custom to charge commissions,—a custom which must inevitably pertain to the business of brokers who lend out money belonging to others. Everybody at all informed with reference to such matters knows that services rendered by such brokers are not, and in the nature of things cannot, on sound business principles, be, rendered gratuitously. The evidence in this case warranted a finding that the investment company knew Barnett was in the business of lending money; that it sent him its money to lend, and must also have known that he expected compensation for his labor. It is doubtless true, as Barnett testified, that it knew nothing of his commission; that is, it did not know the precise amount he charged when he made this particular loan. That this is really what he meant by the words, "The payee of the note knew nothing of my commission," is conclusively shown by what he says in his brief as attorney for the defendant in error. We quote therefrom: "The Security Investment Company did not know what commissions Barnett charged. They themselves received nothing,—only their 7% interest." That is, the company knew Barnett charged commissions, but did not know to how much they amounted. And, independently of the above-quoted expression, there is little room for doubting that the company, when it forwarded the money to be loaned, was not ignorant of the fact that Barnett expected to make something for placing it in the hands of a borrower. Affecting not to know this would be admitting a total disregard of the plainest principles of human nature. So, then, the jury might well have concluded that the investment company knew Barnett was to be paid, and also that it understood it was not to do the paying, and, further, that it must have known the borrower, when he came along, was to do so. They could therefore have found that the company occupied the position of at least tacitly authorizing its agent to exact such a commission on the loan as the borrower might be induced to pay. A money lender cannot, in this state, lawfully contract for or reserve any greater rate of interest than 8 per cent. per annum, and the prohibition is just as strong against doing so indirectly as it is against doing so openly and without pretense. It is now too well settled to admit of doubt that if the agent of a money lender, with his knowledge, charges the borrower a commission, it is the same thing in law as if the lender charged it himself. This is so because he gets a benefit from the agent's services, and because in such cases there is, as to this matter, no separation of principal and agent. The payment of a commission to the lender's agent, being a part of what the borrower expends for the use of the amount he actually receives, is in effect a payment to the principal, if he gives countenance to the exaction of such commission, and is in the nature of interest on the loan. If, then, the commission so paid and the stipulated interest together exceed the lawful interest, the transaction is usurious. These are familiar principles, and should be readily accepted as sound. It only remains to show that this court did not depart from them in the case of McLean v. Camak, 97 Ga. 804, 25 S. E. 493, and in so doing make clear the distinction between that case and the one now before us. The facts of these cases are widely different. Watson was Mrs. Camak's general agent to collect and invest her funds. She paid him for making collections, and it did not appear but that she expected to pay him, also, for his services in making investments. In this connection the writer, in speaking of the making by Watson of the loan then under review, said (page 813, 97 Ga., and page 496, 25 S. E.): "She paid him for making collections for her, and it is not improbable she expected to pay him for his services in making investments for her, as well. It appears, he did not consult her about the advisability of making this particular loan, and she knew nothing of it until some time after it was made. It is certain she did not authorize him to make it only on condition that he would look to the borrower for payment for his services, and would charge her nothing. That he did not charge her anything, and that she never agreed to pay him for his services in this particular instance, is true,—most probably, for the reason that he considered himself sufficiently compensated by the commission he received from the borrower, and therefore never called upon Mrs. Camak for payment, or rendered her a bill for his services." The defendant did not probe to the bottom the question whether Mrs. Camak did or did not expect to pay Watson for lending the money to Mrs. McLean, but chose to rely on the naked circumstance that she did not in point of fact pay, as conclusive upon the inquiry whether or not she really supposed she would be asked to pay. The verdict was in her favor, and was maintainable on the theory that the evidence did not demand a finding that she either directly or indirectly authorized or sanctioned the making by her agent of a contract infected with usury. It is in the present case, as already noted, obvious that the investment company never expected a bill from the Georgia Company or from Barnett for their services in making the loan to Clarke. The McLean Case is, at best, a close one, and the doctrine of it should not be extended beyond its peculiar facts. It was carefully considered, and the court, foreseeing the danger of going too far on the line then pursued, took occasion to remark (page 808, 97 Ga., and page 495, 25 S. E.): "We do not mean to say the borrower must show that the lender expressly, in so many words, authorized his agent, before the transaction was consummated, to exact a commission. If the lender be shown to have had actual knowledge of the agent's intention to charge a commission, and, before accepting or ratifying the contract of loan, became aware of the fact that a commission had been reserved, the law would imply assent to the agent's acts from the principal's silent acquiescence." The language just quoted applies to the case now in hand; for, if our reasoning is sound, there was ample evidence to warrant and support the inferences that the investment company understood perfectly well that no commission was to be charged against it; that it was fully aware of an intention on the part of the Georgia Company and Barnett to make a charge against the borrower for their services; that, when the note was returned to the investment company, it must, under all the circumstances, necessarily have known that a commission had been taken from the maker; and that, without prosecuting any inquiry as to the amount of the commission exacted, but choosing rather not to be too well informed as to this matter, it by "silent acquiescence" assented to Barnett's act in appropriating the same. In other words, it is fairly inferable from the evidence submitted pro and con that there was a tacit understanding between the investment company and its Georgia agents that they should undertake in its behalf to effect loans of the funds which it advanced to them, looking in each particular instance to the borrower alone for compensation, which was to be realized by the exaction of such commissions as he might be willing to pay under the guise of a written agreement, signed by him, purporting to constitute the particular agent of the company with whom he dealt his agent to apply for and negotiate in his behalf the desired loan. If so, such pretended collateral agreement between the lender's agent and the borrower would be but a thin and transparent cloak, ill concealing the real nature of the transaction it was intended to shield.

Before concluding, it is but fair to point out that it would have been perfectly legitimate and proper for the plaintiff to meet and overcome the defense sought to be established by introducing evidence, if available, to show that the investment company, although not agreeing to itself pay its Georgia agents anything for their services, nevertheless expressly limited their authority, in the matter of exacting commissions from borrowers, to reserving such a commission only as, added to the stipulated interest to be paid to the company, if less than 8 per cent., would not render any particular loan usurious. For illustration, if such was the limited authority of the Georgia Company and Barnett, they could not, without violating their duty to their principal, have charged the defendant a commission amounting to more than 1 per cent. per annum, for the interest which she agreed to pay on the loan was at the yearly rate of 7 per cent.; and it follows that if, without any secret understanding with or connivance on the part of the company, they proved themselves to be faithless to their trust, it would not be legally bound by any collateral agreement made between them and the defendant whereby she authorized them to reserve, as compensation for their alleged services to her, the large commission which they exacted. That this is sound reasoning will, we believe, be apparent, when considered in connection with the following extract taken from the opinion filed in the McLean Case (page 807, 97 Ga., and page 494, 25 S. E.): "It is a homely axiom that 'it takes two to make a contract.' Therefore, unless a borrower shows affirmatively that one who loaned him money at the highest legal rate assented to the exaction of a commission by the latter's agent, it cannot be said that the lender ever understood and agreed that the collateral agreement between his agent and the borrower should be considered and become a part of the contract of loan. The borrower has no right to assume that even a general agent has power to bind his principal by such an agreement; for, the same being illegal and prohibited by law, the borrower is put upon immediate notice that the agent is transcending his general powers, and going beyond the legal scope of his agency. Only by showing that the agent was in fact authorized by his principal to reserve the commission can the borrower claim immunity because of an act by the agent which he is bound by law to know was illegal and not binding upon the principal unless previously authorized or subsequently ratified by the latter. It is not enough to show that the agent reserved a commission, instead of turning over the entire amount of the principal sum which he undertook to loan in behalf of his principal, for the lender, in the absence of information as to the true state of facts, would have the right to assume that his agent would prove faithful to his trust; and, though the agent be a general one, the lender would be under no duty of anticipating that he would make an illegal contract, and consequently, if the agent actually made such a contract without the knowledge or consent of his principal, the latter would not be bound by it. * * * What we wish to be understood as holding is that, unless it be shown that the lender had knowledge of the illegal agreement between the borrower and the agent, the law will not imply any assent on the part of the lender thereto, but will treat him as authorizing and ratifying a loan on the terms communicated to him by the agent, and expressed in the instruments which the borrower has signed as setting forth the contract made by him with the agent. It certainly would seem that if, by executing and delivering these formal instruments, the borrower induced the lender to honestly part with his money in consideration of the undertakings on the part of the borrower therein set forth, the latter would be estopped from claiming that such was not the real contract assented to by the lender." In the present case it would seem that in the court below the plaintiff stood squarely upon the contention that Barnett was in no sense the agent of the investment company, but acted solely in behalf of the defendant, as evidenced by her written application for the loan. At any rate, it is certainly true that the plaintiff did not offer any evidence tending to show that the authority of Barnett in the matter of charging commissions from borrowers was in any wise limited by the company; and consequently the record before us contains no hint or suggestion that, in reserving the large commission exacted of the defendant, Barnett proved himself to be a faithless and unscrupulous agent. If the plaintiff desires to avail herself of such a contention, opportunity to do so will be afforded her by the judgment we now render, for we feel constrained to order another hearing on the ground that the trial judge erred in not submitting the case to the jury. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

FORD et al. v. THOMAS et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1900.)

WILLS—CHARITABLE DEVISE—IMPOSSIBILITY OF EXECUTION—DIVERSION OF OBJECT—TRUSTEES—RETURNS TO PROBATE COURT.

1. Where a testator in one item of his will devised his real estate to designated trustees, "the annual product thereof to be by them appropriated to the erection of a poor house" in a named county, "and for the support of its inhabitants forever," and in another item made a bequest to a free school located at the county site, and the trustees, after they came into possession of the property so devised to them, by petition represented to the court that the income was insufficient to support a complete poor house, and prayed that they should be allowed to use it in establishing and supporting "such a technological, textile, manual, or other school" as they might deem advisable, "to be at all times free to the citizens of the county," and the court at the hearing found that it was impossible and impracticable to establish and maintain a poor house with the income, there was no error in refusing to grant the prayer of the petitioners; the scheme proposed by them not being "next most consonant with the specific mode prescribed" by the testator for the execution of his charitable intent.

2. Trustees of the character above indicated are not, under section 3168 of the Civil Code, required to make returns to the court of ordinary.

3. It was, however, erroneous to direct the trustees to distribute the annual income among charitable institutions or organizations in Richmond county whose charity was limited to particular classes of indigent people, and the beneficiaries of which were not, and could not be, chosen by the agents selected by the testator to dispense his bounty; it not appearing that it was impossible to devise a scheme which would more nearly approximate the specific mode which the testator perscribed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Richmond county; E. L. Brinson, Judge.

Suit by De Saussure Ford and others, trustees of the Academy of Richmond County, against L. A. Thomas, Jr., administrator, and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

This was an equitable petition for the direction and the construction of a will. The petitioners alleged as follows:

"First. That they are resident citizens of the county and state aforesaid, and trustees of the Academy of Richmond County, which institution came into being pursuant to the constitution of February 5, 1777, and the act of the general assembly of this state of July 31, 1783 (Watkins, Dig. 283), under which commissioners were appointed to lay out the reserve land in the town of Augusta, and erect an academy or seminary of learning.

"Second. That by the act of February 13, 1797, § 13 (Watkins, Dig. 664), a majority of the trustees actually being and residing in the county of Richmond were thereby declared to constitute and form a board of trustees of the Academy of the Town of Augusta, with full and ample powers to do and transact all the business of the same, any law to the contrary thereof notwithstanding.

"Third. That by act approved January 31, 1798, the city council of Augusta was incorporated, and all municipal authority over the town of Augusta vested in that body.

"Fourth. That by act approved December 18, 1816 (Pub. Laws, p. 1072), the appointment of commissioners for the academies in this state was vested in the commissioners of the respective academies, and by act of December 21, 1819 (Pub. Laws, p. 28), the trustees of the Academy of Richmond County then in office, who were named in the act, and their successors, were authorized and empowered to have and use a common seal whenever acting as a corporate body.

"Fifth. That by the act of December 8, 1820 (Pub. Laws, p. 83), the justices of the inferior court of the county of Richmond were authorized to purchase a lot of land, not exceeding 100 acres, for the purpose of erecting a suitable building for maintaining and educating the poor of the county; that by act approved December 19, 1828 (Pub. Laws p. 55), the justices of the inferior court of Richmond county were authorized to establish an asylum for the invalid poor of the said county, which act, in section 3, enacted that after the establishment of the said asylum the said justices would be entitled to apply an adequate portion of the poor-school fund appropriated to the use of the said counties to the education of the poor children residing at or near said asylum, subject, however, to the same accountability that is provided by any general law on that subject.

"Sixth. That by deed dated July 6, 1829, the executors of Freeman Walker conveyed to the justices of the inferior court of Richmond county 197 acres of land on the Louisville and New Savannah road; that upon this tract of land were erected buildings in conformity to the authority delegated under the legislative acts aforesaid.

"Seventh. That at the passage of these local acts there was of force the act of December 18, 1792 (Cobb, Dig. 346), making permanent provision for the poor by the levying annually of a tax, which, by the act of November 24, 1818, was not to exceed one-eighth part of the general tax of the county; that under these general laws the justices of the inferior court were directed to appoint overseers of the poor.

"Eighth. That the records of the inferior court of Richmond county will show that on the 2d of November, 1829, a committee was appointed to erect the necessary buildings, with power to draft rules and regulations for the institution; that, upon the completion of these buildings, Holland McTyre was placed in charge as overseer; that subsequently, by deed dated May 6, 1833, the inferior court purchased other land adjoining the original purchase; and this was the then state of affairs in Richmond county, and both the general law and the local law were carried out as to support, maintenance, and education, pursuant to the requirements thereof, of the poor of said county.

"Ninth. That on the 1st day of July, 1833, Richard Tubman executed his last will and testament, and died testate November, 1836; that this was admitted to record in the court of ordinary of Richmond county, and letters testamentary granted to Emily H. Tubman, executrix, thereunder, a copy of which will is hereto annexed, marked 'Exhibit A,' to which reference is prayed as often as may be desired.

"Tenth. That the material portion of the eighth item of this will is as follows: 'And that all the real estate that I may die possessed of in the city of Augusta after the death of my wife be, and it is hereby, given to the trustees of the Richmond County Academy and their successors, the annual product to be by them appropriated to the erection of a poor house in said county, and for the support of its inhabitants forever;' that Emily H. Tubman, as executrix and life tenant under the will of the said Richard Tubman, remained in possession of the realty devised under the said will until June 9, 1885, when she died testate, and letters testamentary were issued to John M. Walton, as her executor.

"Eleventh. That the said John M. Walton, executor of Emily H. Tubman, qualified as the executor of Richard Tubman, and took into his possession the said realty passing under his said will, and proceeded to administer it in conformity therewith.

"Twelfth. That the justices of the inferior court of Richmond county purchased, February 25, 1868, from Alexander Deas, 125 acres of land beyond the limits of the city of Augusta, and established thereon a new county home, and kept the same in operation until the adoption of the constitution of 1868, which abolished the inferior court of the county and vested its powers in the ordinary, which continued to discharge them until the adoption of the constitution of 1877 and the act of the general assembly approved September 17, 1883 (Gen. Laws, 528), which vested the same in judge of the city court of Richmond county, as to whose conduct and management the grand jury of Richmond county, in their presentments at the April term, 1898, says: 'Everything on the place is in the best of order. The inmates are well cared for, their reasonable demands granted, and everything done to make them comfortable.' In speaking of the county farm attached to the institution, the grand jury says: 'After a visit thereto, it shows good management and careful attention at the hands of the superintendent, and the report thereto annexed shows that the institution is a source of profit.'

"Thirteenth. That after John M. Walton, as executor of Richard Tubman, had taken possession of the realty passing under his will, claims were asserted to the said realty—First, by the city council of Augusta, claiming to have been appointed trustee under the said will in the place and stead of the trustees of the Academy of Richmond County; and, second, by William F. Eve, county commissioner of Richmond county, claiming that he was the proper person to administer the trust set forth in the said will; and thereupon a bill for direction was filed by the said John M. Walton, executor of Richard Tubman, July 25, 1885, which came on to be heard upon its merits, and decree was entered June 28, 1886, directing him, as executor of Richard Tubman, to turn over to petitioner all the real estate of the testator owned at the time of his death.

"Fourteenth. That this decision of the court was excepted to by the city council of Augusta and by the county commissioners of Richmond county, and reviewed under a writ of error by the supreme court of Georgia, which, January 18, 1887 (see City Council v. Walton, 77 Ga. 517), affirmed the judgment of the court below; the court stating: 'It seems to us manifest that it was the object of the testator to knit this trust to the office of the trustees of Richmond County Academy, in order to make provision in that way for its permanent continuance, without the necessity of resorting to courts or other tribunals to supply vacancies when any happened. This power of selection and perpetuation was in the body appointing the trustees of the corporation. They were to designate the persons who were to discharge the duties it imposes.' That thereafter the property was turned over by the said executor of Richard Tubman to petitioners, and after its receipt the question arose as to the liability of the funds in their hands for taxation. Upon this question being submitted to the courts, it was held by the supreme court, in the case of Trustees v. Bohler (Nov. 15, 1887) 80 Ga. 159, 7 S. E. 633, that the entire estate was liable to state and county taxation; and this decision was subsequently extended by the court, December 22, 1892, in the case of Trustees of Academy of Richmond Co. v. City Council of Augusta, 90 Ga. 648, 17 S. E. 61, so as to make the corpus subject to municipal taxation in proportion to the relative number of the trustees who resided within the limits of the city of Augusta.

"Fifteenth. That after the receipt of the said realty the trustees deemed it advisable that it should be sold, and accordingly made application to this court, which rendered a decree April 22, 1887, authorizing such sale, which was subsequently confirmed and enlarged by the decree of June 26, 1890, to which, as they appear upon the records of this court, reference is hereby made as if copies were annexed hereto.

"Sixteenth. That under and by virtue of these decrees all the realty property in the city of Augusta has been sold, partly on time and partly for cash, and that, for the purpose of reducing the taxation on the corpus, investments have been made to a large extent in bonds of the state of Georgia; the residue of the estate consisting of bonds secured by liens on the property purchased, such as the Augusta Chronicle and the Commercial Club.

"Seventeenth. That after receiving possession of the realty in Augusta, and the making of the sales, the trustees resolved to purchase with the income a lot in or near the city, with a view of making that the situs of the institution; and, pursuant to this contemplated action, they, by deeds dated September 26, 1888, and October 13, 1888, purchased from Ellen Pike and Mary A. Newby tracts of land comprising 105 acres, more or less, which purchase has been made known to this court, and was confirmed by its decree of October 15, 1888, to which reference is made as if a copy was annexed hereto.

"Eighteenth. That, by the terms of the trust, petitioners were only authorized to use the income of the trust estate; that, on account that the same was annually reduced by "Nineteenth. That at the annual session of the board in 1894 a committee was appointed to investigate and report in reference to the extent and character of this fund,—as to what action should be had therewith by the board. This report was submitted to the annual meeting of 1895, and, there still not being in hand a sufficient amount to justify any decisive action, the matter lay over until the 23d of September, 1897, when the trustees met to take under consideration further action looking to active administration of the trust. That a committee was appointed to investigate and report as to the propriety of erecting upon the academy grounds or elsewhere a building in which a technological institute, free to all, could be established, and also whether or not the income arising from the entire trust fund held under the provisions of the will of Richard Tubman, if applied to the support and maintenance of the pupils in such school, would be sufficient to accomplish satisfactory results in conformity to the terms of the trust.

"Twentieth. That the committee was appointed, reported progress March 12, 1898, when the matter was recommitted, and at the annual meeting of the board, July 6, 1898, a further report was made, in which the committee expressed the opinion that the income now on hand and what might arise hereafter would be most judiciously expended in the establishment of a technological, textile, or manual school of such a character as may be hereafter determined upon, the same to be free to all, but that, as it might be looked upon as a departure from the strict terms of the bequest to the trustees, the committee presented to the board, who adopted it unanimously, a resolution that application be made to the next term of this court for direction to the trustees in the proper administration of the trust, and that express authority be asked for the establishment, from time to time, when deemed advisable by the board, and for the support and administration thereof, of either a technological, textile, or manual school, free to all; that for this purpose the board be authorized to apply all the accrued income now in their hands, and that which may arise from time to time, on the corpus, with authority to the trustees to discontinue the school, and make further and other application of the said income in their uncontrolled discretion, in the event the establishment of the school so adopted does not accomplish the results expected therefrom, a certified copy of which is hereto annexed, marked 'B.'

"Twenty-First. That according to the report made by the treasurer to the board at the annual meeting July 6, 1898, the entire estate aggregated the sum of $96,184.54, and the Pike and Newby places. Of this, $76,702.72 is the corpus; the income from July 1, 1897, to July 1, 1898, being $4,731.48. That a statement showing of what the estate originally consisted, and the manner in which it has been disposed of, is hereto annexed, marked 'C.'

"Twenty-Second. That your petitioners respectfully call attention to the fact that the supreme court of this state, in the case hereinbefore set forth (City Council v. Walton, 77 Ga. 522), says: 'The proper inference to be drawn from this provision of the will is, as it seems to us, that the testator deliberately passed by the county corporation, and the agents selected by it for the performance of this public duty, and conferred the power upon others, whom he preferred to dispense his charity. His expressed object was to establish out of his means, to be supported by the income of the property dedicated by his will to that use, an asylum for the poor of Richmond county. There was no direct gift to the county or to the authorities empowered to direct its municipal affairs, and we have seen that none could be applied from the terms of the bequests.' In the said case (Trustees v. Bohler) in 80 Ga. 162, 7 S. E. 605, the court says, when considering the question of taxation: 'In the case of a poor house the realty might embrace, besides the lands covered with the necessary buildings, grounds for recreation exercise, for pasture of the animals, and even a farm for the inmates to cultivate. The establishment as a whole might embrace all these, with articles of personalty to any needful extent for supplying the inmates with all the comforts of life, and keeping them in a healthy, virtuous, cheerful, and contented state of existence.'

"Twenty-Third. That by the act of December 18, 1817 (Prince, Dig. p. 430), a fund was created and established for the support of free schools throughout the state; that by act of December 21, 1821, provision was made for the division of $500,000 equally between the academies and free schools; that under the act of December 22, 1823, provision was made for the investment of the latter fund, and the distribution of the annual income, amounting to between twenty and thirty thousand dollars, among the counties, in proportion to their white population, for the education of the poor children, and in the payment of their tuition; that the act of December 23, 1862, specified what persons would be the beneficiaries of the fund, and such laws were of force at the making of the will by the said Richard Tubman; that after his death, by the act of December 23, 1836, there was set apart, as a permanent free school and educational fund, one-third of the surplus revenue, amounting to $350,000, and a joint committee of five in the senate and house of representatives was appointed to adjust a plan of common-school education best adapted to the genius, habits of life, and thoughts of the people of Georgia; that by the act of December 26, 1837 (Laws 1837, p. 94, § 9), the legislature amended and modified its report, and passed an act establishing a general system of education by common schools, to take effect in 1839, and by an act approved December 29, 1838, § 2 (Pub. Laws, p. 19), it was enacted that the governor was authorized to draw his warrant in favor of Alexander Cunningham, president of the board of trustees of the Academy of Richmond County, for all dividends on the academic fund due to the academy, and then in arrear.

"Twenty-Fourth. That the system of education so established under these laws continued in operation and without any material change until the adoption of the constitution of July 25, 1868. This provided for the establishment of a system of general education, to be forever free to all of the children of this state. After its adoption there was enacted, August 23, 1872 (Pub. Laws, p. 456), an act to regulate instruction in the county of Richmond, pursuant to which act and the amendments thereof the common-school system in this county is now in operation. That on the same day there was enacted (Pub. Laws, p. 4) an act to perfect the public-school system, and to supersede the existing school laws, section 37 of which enacted that the county board of education should have the power to organize in each county one or more manual labor schools, on such plan as shall be self-sustaining, provided that the plan be first submitted to and approved by the state board of education. That subsequently the present constitution of this state went into operation, December 21, 1877, which ordained that there should be a thorough system of common schools for the education of children in the elementary branches of an English education only, as nearly uniform as practicable, and that the existing local school system should not be affected thereby. That the legislation under this constitution, as it now appears in section 1379 of the Political Code of the state, the same enactment with reference to manual schools as the act of 1872, but none have ever been established in this county, as petitioners believe, because there was no demand therefor, and they were required to be self-supporting.

"Twenty-Fifth. That, in the opinion of petitioners, in order to provide a means of breadwinning for our youths, there exists a necessity of furnishing a class of education not provided for under the constitution and general laws of this state or the local laws of this county, and that the giving of such an education is the best charity that could be now extended to them.

"Twenty-Sixth. That the trustees of the academy of Richmond County are not sufficiently endowed for this purpose in its corporate capacity, but these petitioners believe that such an education can best be given them by applying to this purpose the income arising from the corpus now in their hands, held under the will of Richard Tubman, with the future income as it may from time to time arise and be payable."

At the trial the parties made and filed, under the approval of the court, the following agreement as to the facts of the case, to wit: "(1) It is hereby admitted that the facts set forth in paragraphs 1 to 26 of the petition are true, and that the exhibits annexed to the petition are true and correct copies of the originals, admissible for all the legal purposes, subject to their proper construction and legal effect by the court. (2) That the Widows' Home is a corporation created by the order of this court of April 17, 1899, in renewal of a previous corporation by the same name, having such powers as specified in the charter. That it is located on a tract of land donated by the city council of Augusta to certain individual ladies July 10, 1871; the deed stating it is 'for the erection of a suitable home for indigent widows, and, should said property cease to be used for this purpose, then the same is to revert to the city of Augusta, and the conveyance cease to have any effect or binding force on the grantor.' The work of this corporation is that set out in paragraph 8 of its intervention. (3) That the Medical College of Georgia is a corporate institution, part and parcel of the University of Georgia, located upon land the title to which is in the trustees of the Academy of Richmond County as a corporate body; this land having been granted to the college, with the sanction of the general assembly of Georgia, pursuant to the acts of December 20, 1833, and November 13, 1893 (Pub. Laws, p. 64). That, as an adjunct to the college, the hospital was created and enlarged, pursuant to agreement with the city council of Augusta; the city council furnishing a certain amount per annum for its support and the patients therein who are unable to pay, with the right on the part of the hospital authorities to charge all pay patients; the hospital having, particularly in its enlargement under the act of November 13, 1893, pay wards, from which it derives income. (4) That the Lamar or Freedmen's Hospital, in the city of Augusta, is an institution established pursuant to the will of Gasaway B. Lamar, of New York City, formerly of Augusta, Ga., who gave a money bequest to the city council of Augusta for the purpose of affording hospital facilities to the indigent and sick, and it derives its support from municipal gifts and such patients as may be able to pay for rooms therein. (5) The King's Daughters are an unincorporated society of ladies of all religious denominations, whose objects and work are to supply, as far as their means will allow, the poor persons of the community with the necessities of life, such as food, shelter, fuel, medicine, clothing, etc. They do not control a home or institution in which the objects of their charity are quartered, but these poor are visited by the members of the King's Daughters at their homes, and assistance rendered there. The King's Daughters have, among their work, one larger charity, called the 'Day Nursery,' which consists of the maintenance of furnished rooms, in charge of a matron, where the small children of the poor factory operatives and other day laborers are taken care of and fed during the day, while their parents work at their various duties. This special charity, with all the other

On the foregoing pleadings and facts the case was submitted to the court for its decree, and afterwards the court rendered its decree as follows:

"This cause, coming on to be heard, was set down for trial by consent of all parties, and all questions of law and of fact referred to the decision of the court without the intervention of a jury. It is thereupon considered, adjudged, and decreed by the court: (1) That at the death of Richard Tubman, November, 1836, the poor of Richmond county were provided for by law with an asylum for the invalids, and educated, free of cost, out of the poor-school fund of the state distributed annually amongst the different counties in proportion to the number of free white population in each county; no child being admitted who had been taught reading, writing, and the usual rules of arithmetic, or whose parents or estate paid a tax exceeding fifty cents over and above the poll tax. That this was the state of affairs which the testator sought to improve by his beneficence. (2) That since the death of Richard Tubman further and more ample provision has been made by the county for the support and maintenance of the invalid poor at the county home established and now existing in place of the old one, and education has been made free to all, pursuant to the constitution of 1868 and the local law of this county, so that for the support of the indigent poor, and the education of all the poor in the ordinary branches of an English education, ample facilities exist. (3) That on the 28th day of June, 1886, under a bill in equity filed in this court by John M. Walton, as executor of Richard Tubman, to which the city council of Augusta and the county of Richmond, through its county commissioner, and petitioners were defendants, a decree was rendered directing the executor of Richard Tubman to turn over to plaintiffs the real estate of the testator owned by him at the time of his death, passing under the provisions of his will; this consisting mainly of realty on the north side of Broad street, between Jackson and McIntosh streets, comprising lots 719 to 729 Broad street, and also 626 and 628 Reynold street, with two other lots, the title to which was in controversy. Also, certain funds in the hands of the executor, arising from the income of the property pending the litigation. That this decree was carried into effect, and that subsequently, pursuant to decree of the court of April 22, 1897, in suit of petitioners, to which John M. Walton, executor of Richard Tubman, was defendant, sales were made of all the realty, and the corpus of the trust estate now in the hands of petitioners aggregates the sum of $76,702.72. That, in the conduct and management of the estate by the trustees, it has been increased by the income received, and now consists of 48,000 state of Georgia 4½ per cent. bonds, 12,000 state of gert, aggregating $4,567.50, and the real estate in the county known as the Pike and Newby places, comprising 105 acres, more or less. That the amount of accrued income now in the hands of the trustees, without taking into consideration the premium paid for the bonds of the state, aggregates the sum of $19,476.82, and the said Pike and Newby places, purchased out of the income, at a cost of $5,000, by order of the court of October 15, 1888. That all of this income is now at the disposal of the petitioners, to carry out the trust created under the said will of Richard Tubman. (4) That the action set out in the petition as had by the trustees in the administration of the trust, with all the sales and reinvestments made by them, is hereby ratified and confirmed; and the said trustees, in addition to the authority given to them under the order of the court, April 22, 1887, which authorized investment in such bonds, not state or municipal, as the trustees, by resolution of a majority in number thereof, may indicate and determine to be to the best interest and welfare of the trust, for the production of income to be expended as directed by the said will, shall be authorized from time to time, whenever they shall deem it best, to sell, exchange, or reinvest these securities for others, or to make loans upon real estate, taking title thereto, and giving the debtor defeasances back, under such rules and regulations as may be from time to time prescribed by the trustees. (5) The court, in construing the bequest to said trustees under the will of Richard Tubman, a copy of which is annexed to the petition, marked 'Exhibit A,' holds the trust created to be one that attaches to the individuals who may from time to time hold the office of trustees of the Academy of Richmond County. That the testator intended to vest in these individuals, while holding the said office, the free and unlimited power to dispense his charity in the establishment of such a poor house for the poor of Richmond county as would, in the judgment of the trustees for the time being, be deemed by them to be best adapted to carrying out the object of the testator's bounty. That these trustees in the administration of the trust are authorized to establish such a school for the poor whites of the county as to them seems best, and are to maintain and keep the same separate and apart from any county organization whatsoever. (6) That the resolution adopted by the trustees July 6, 1898, a copy of which is Exhibit B to the petition, in the opinion and judgment of the court was authorized under the provisions of the trust, and its adoption is hereby expressly sanctioned and approved; and the court holds that the petitioners and their successors holding the office of trustees have the authority, under the will and sanction of this court, to expend all the income now on hand, or that which may hereafter lishment, support, and maintenance of such a technological, textile, manual, or other school as may by the petitioners or their successors be deemed advisable to establish or maintain from time to time, with the right to discontinue the same whenever, in their judgment, it ceases to be best adapted to carrying out the objects of testator's bounty. (7) That petitioners and their successors in office shall be authorized to purchase from time to time, in their names as trustees under the said will of Richard Tubman, any realty or personalty needful or necessary, in their opinion, for the establishment of such a school as may hereafter be determined upon by them, and the same to sell, exchange, or otherwise dispose of as to the petitioners or their successors may seem best from time to time, in the event of an enlargement, change, alteration, or discontinuance thereof. (8) That the said trustees shall have authority to prescribe rules and regulations for the said school, provide necessary professors and instructors therein, and generally to do whatever may be necessary to make effectual the charity created by testator's will. They shall also have authority from time to time to add such special features to the course or curriculum adopted, and to open such other departments of training and instruction therein, as they shall deem that the progress and advancement of the times require, and the income of the trust estate warrants. (9) The question of admission into the school, of any pupil, shall be left entirely to the discretion of the said trustees, as to number, qualification, sex, or otherwise, but that the same shall be free from any charge or tuition to those admitted. (10) That if the trustees of the Academy of Richmond County, as a corporate body, should indicate a willingness therefor, petitioners shall be at liberty to expend the income, or such portion thereof as may be deemed advisable, in the erection of the buildings, machinery, etc., requisite and necessary, on the academy grounds or other lots of that corporation, reserving the right of removal therefrom should the school be discontinued, or it is deemed advisable, in the progress of future events, to place them elsewhere. (11) That the realty owned by the trustees in the county of Richmond, known as the Pike and Newby places, conveyed to petitioners by deeds dated September 26, 1888, and October 13, 1888, from Ellen Pike and Mary A. Newby, are hereby authorized to be sold privately or publicly, in conformity to the decision of the trustees, and a deed in their name as trustees under the said will, countersigned by the finance committee and the president, shall pass to the purchaser a good and indefeasible title, without requiring him or her to see after the proper application of the purchase money; such sale to be made for cash or on time, for the whole or any part of the said tract, and the purchasers to be admitted into possession either under bond tees may seem advisable. (12) That, in conducting and carrying on the schools proposed to be established by petitioners, the purchase of property therefor, and the making of sales, reinvestments, or exchanges of the trust estate, the plaintiffs are not required to make any annual or other returns of their acts and doings in the premises; being only subject to the supervision of this court in the exercise of its chancery power, to which authority alone shall petitioners be amenable. (13) That the action of the trustees in presenting this petition is ratified and confirmed as an act not done from any excess of caution, but wise and prudent under the circumstances. And it is ordered that the costs and expenses attendant hereon be paid by the trustees out of the income in their hands."

To which decree exceptions were filed, which exceptions have been sufficiently stated in the opinion of the supreme court.

Frank H. Miller, for plaintiffs in error. J. R. Lamar and Irvin Alexander, for defendants in error.

FISH, J. 1. The facts of this case will be found in the reporter's statement. We shall not deal with all the assignments of error contained in the bill of exceptions, as the view which we take of the case renders it unnecessary to do so. In this view, the questions raised by the petitioners in reference to the intervention filed by the Widows' Home and certain citizens, and those in reference to the answer of the administrator of the estate of the residuary legatee, are not material. We shall deal first with the main question; that is, whether the court erred in rejecting the scheme proposed by the trustee for executing, by cy pres, the charitable intent of the testator. The testator provided "that all the real estate that I may die possessed of in the city of Augusta after the death of my wife be, and it is hereby, given to the trustees of the Richmond County Academy and their successors; the annual product to be by them appropriated to the erection of a poor house in said county, and for the support of its inhabitants forever." Representing to the court that the annual income accruing upon the fund in their hands "is absolutely insufficient to support and maintain a complete poor house," and that, "dealing with the situation as the trustees find it, no necessity exists for such an institution as a complete poor house in or near the city of Augusta, as that maintained by the public is sufficient to meet the demand," and "that, while the income in hand is not sufficient to support and maintain a poor house in all its branches, yet it is sufficient to establish and maintain some department of a poor house or work house, as defined by the lexicographers, and as generally exists," the trustees prayed the court to be allowed to establish free to the citizens of the county of Richmond,"—the same being, according to their contention, "one branch of a poor house." No evidence was introduced at the hearing for the purpose of showing that it was impossible, with the means at the disposal of the trustees, to establish and maintain a poor house, but the case was tried simply upon the pleadings; the allegations of the petitioners in reference to the inadequacy of the income for this purpose not being denied. It is to be observed, however, in this connection, that the only parties, other than the trustees, to the case, were the administrator of the estate of the residuary legatee, who was made a party defendant to the petition, and certain citizens, and the Widows' Home, who, by leave of the court, intervened and prayed that the trustees should be directed to pay over the income to that charitable institution, "under such terms and conditions as [might] be equitable and proper." The administrator simply contended that, if it was "undesirable or impracticable to devote the funds in the hands of the petitioners to the specific purpose expressed in the will of Richard Tubman, such funds could not and should not be applied to the support and maintenance of "a textile, manual, or other school of the character referred to in the petition," but that, according to the doctrine of cy pres, the fund should be devoted to the support of the Widows' Home, or, if that institution should be held not entitled to the benefit of the testator's charity, he suggested the city hospitals and a charitable organization known as the "King's Daughters." The petition was filed on the 27th of September, 1898, and it appears from the showing therein made by the trustees that the trust estate in their hands consists of the corpus, amounting to $76,-702.72, accrued income, amounting to $19,-476.82, and the Pike and Newby places, comprising 105 acres of land, which were purchased with income, at a cost of $5,000, and that the income from July 1, 1897, to July 1, 1898, was $4,731.48.

While we can understand how the trustees, from their point of view, may sincerely believe, as we have no doubt they do, that, with the limited means at their command, they can accomplish more good by establishing and supporting a school of the character which they propose than by erecting and maintaining a poor house, we must confess we are at a loss to see, from the showing which they make, how it is impossible and impracticable to establish and support a poor house, in which at least a limited number of destitute people could find a home and a support. There are, doubtless, many poor houses in this state, in each of which a number of indigent people are sheltered and supported, which have been erected and which are maintained with less means. But as the court below has this finding is not excepted to, the question whether there was any real necessity for invoking the doctrine of cy pres in this case is not before this court. As the case presents itself to us, this doctrine must be resorted to, and the question now to be determined is whether the scheme proposed by the trustees, and presented to the court for approval, is "next most consonant with the specific mode prescribed" by the testator for the execution of his charitable intent; for "if the specific mode of execution be for any cause impossible, and the charitable intent be still manifest and definite, the court may, by approximation, give effect in a manner next most consonant with the specific mode prescribed." Civ. Code, § 4007. In the petition and in the argument of the able and learned counsel for the plaintiffs in error much ingenuity has been displayed in endeavoring to demonstrate that "a technological, textile, or manual school" is, after all, but "one branch of a poor house"; and upon this argument is based the proposition that as it is impossible and impracticable to establish "a poor house, in all its branches," the proper thing to do, under the doctrine of cy pres, is to establish and maintain such "a branch of a poor house." While we are inclined to think that this argument, especially as applied to the poor-house system which existed in the testator's day, is more ingenious than sound, we will not stop to question its soundness here; for, whether it be sound or unsound, one thing we think is very clear, and that is that, when the testator undertook to provide for the erection of a poor house and the support of its inhabitants forever, his purpose was not to erect and maintain an institution for the technical education of the young, but to provide, in Richmond county, a home and support for those who, from their condition and circumstances in life, should be fit subjects to become the inhabitants of such an asylum as a poor house, and to be supported therein. A present home and a present support were what he intended. His intention was not that his benefaction should be used to prevent poverty or pauperism in the future, by qualifying the young to become breadwinners, but it was that it should be used for the purpose of providing shelter and support for those who should be already poverty stricken. To equip the young for the struggle of life would doubtless tend in some considerable degree to prevent poverty in the days to come, but it would not be providing for the present support of the indigent. The testator not only provided for the erection and maintenance of a poor house, but he clearly indicated the exact purpose for which he desired the poor house to be erected, and that was "for the support of its inhabitants forever." To make his intention unmistakably definite and clear, he directed that the income of the property should be for-come a time when the trustees would think it advisable to apply the income to some cognate purpose, he clinched his intention with the sweeping word "forever." "Forever to the support of the indigent" is the keynote to his charity. Can the court, under the doctrine of cy pres, take the income which he directed should be forever applied to the support of those who should be fit subjects to be sheltered and cared for in a poor house, and apply it to free education,—free to rich and poor alike,—so long as there are a sufficient number of people in the county of Richmond, outside of the county poor house, in absolute need of the necessities of life, who are worthy objects of charity, and for whose relief a proper scheme, under this will, can be devised? We think not. But there are other items in the will which, taken in connection with the one we are now considering, show that the testator's mind was not upon education of any kind when he made the devise in question. When his thoughts were turned to higher education he made a conditional bequest "to the University of the State of Georgia," and when free education was uppermost in his mind he made a bequest "to the Free School of the City of Augusta." But when he desired to secure the protection and support of those who, by reason of age, physical infirmity, or other cause, should be unable to obtain tne necessities of life, he undertook to provide for the erection of a poor house, and the support of its inhabitants forever. Clearly, to divert this last-mentioned charity from the support of the indigent to free education, even upon purely practical lines, would be to turn it and the bequest to the free school into the same channel. It would be to give both to free education, which the testator never intended, and which should not be done so long as it is possible to reach and relieve the necessities of that class of the inhabitants of Richmond county that the testator had in mind when he made the devise under consideration. If the trustees cannot establish and maintain a poor house, it seems to us that they can at least use the income of the fund in ministering to the necessities of such destitute people in the county of Richmond as they may deem most worthy of the bounty of the testator.

It is contended that, "dealing with the situation as the trustees find it, no necessity exists for such an institution as a complete poor house in or near Augusta, as that maintained by the public is sufficient to meet the demand, although the city has grown in population from 5,000 at the death of the testator to 50,000 at the present time; that, while the income in hand is not sufficient to support and maintain a poor house in all its branches, yet it is sufficient to establish and maintain some department of a poor house." This argument, if it proves anything, proves too much; for if there is no necessity for a complete cessity to establish and maintain any branch of a poor house, where is the necessity for establishing "some department of a poor house," if the poor house maintained by the county authorities is "a complete poor house"; that is, "a poor house in all its branches"? But, with all due deference to the trustees and the learned counsel who so ably represents them, we are unable to see much force in the argument that there is no necessity for establishing a poor house. The fact that there is a poor house in Richmond county, in which the county authorities undertake to provide for the wants of the most destitute people, does not make the circumstances now so different from those which existed at the death of the testator as to render it unnecessary for the trustees of this fund to use the income in supplying the necessities of life to people in need of the same who are not cared for in the county institution. The testator made the provision under consideration with full knowledge that such a county institution existed in his day, and, in the language of this court upon a former occasion, when this clause of the will was under consideration for another purpose, "the proper inference to be drawn from this provision of the will is, as it seems to us, that the testator deliberately passed by the county corporation and the agents selected by it for the performance of this public duty, and conferred the power upon others, whom he preferred to dispense his charity. His expressed object was to establish out of his means, to be supported by the income of the property dedicated to that use, an asylum for the poor of Richmond county." City Council v. Walton, 77 Ga. 522, 523. He was the judge of the necessity then; and it can hardly be that now, when the population of the city is 10 times as large as it was at his death, there is any less necessity for the particular charity which he designed than there was when he made his will. People of the same general class as those whom the testator intended to benefit are still in existence. They have been from "time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary," and, despite all the boasted advance of modern civilization, they are likely to be for an indefinite period of time in the future. They are in the city of Augusta, and doubtless elsewhere in Richmond county, as is shown by the existence there of the county poor house, and such praiseworthy private charitable organizations as the Widows' Home and the King's Daughters, and the existence and efforts of the latter two institutions show that they are not all cared for by the county authorities. So long as they do exist in Richmond county, and are in need of assistance, it seems to us that a scheme can be devised which will more nearly approximate the intention of the benevolent testator than the one proposed to the court by the trustees.

2. Another question presented for decision returns to the court of ordinary of Richmond county. The court adjudged that they were, most probably basing his ruling upon the provisions of section 3168 of the Civil Code. In this view we do not concur. That section, we think, applies exclusively to trustees charged with the management of estates of which private individuals are the beneficiaries. We do not think it was intended to embrace trustees, created by will or otherwise, whose duty it is to manage religious, charitable, educational, or other public trusts, and who, in the course of so doing, control and manage funds.

3. While the judge did right in rejecting the scheme submitted for his approval by the trustees, we think that there are two objections to the scheme set forth in the judgment which he rendered. He found that "the charities established and maintained by the Widows' Home, the city hospitals, and other like institutions, minister to the same objects of charity as are provided for in said will," and that "by appropriating the income of the fund to the objects aforesaid, and similar objects, the court can, by approximation, give effect in a manner next most consonant with the specific mode prescribed in the will," and therefore ordered the trustees to "appropriate annually the entire annual income of the fund in their hands, arising since the filing of this bill, to the assistance and support of such public and nonsectarian charities for the relief of the poor of said county as, in their discretion, they deem most suitable, among which the court [suggested] the Widows' Home and city hospitals, and similar institutions." One objection to this judgment is that it limits the scope and purpose of the testator's charity. The charity of the Widows' Home is limited to indigent women, and the young children of such women who may reside in the home with their mothers. The charity of the city hospitals is limited to poor people, while they are undergoing medical or surgical treatment, who are unable to pay for such treatment, and their support while they are inmates of these institutions. Each of these charities, and all other like institutions, which minister to the wants of only a limited class of the destitute, fall short of the broad scope and purpose of the charity designed and intended by the testator. The charity which he intended is limited to no particular class of indigent people. It embraces male and female, old and young, married and unmarried, sick and well, Jew and Gentile, Catholic and Protestant, Christian and infidel, every individual residing in Richmond county who is a worthy object of charity, and a fit subject for a home for the destitute. Another objection to the judgment is that it takes from the agents appointed by the testator the right to select, from the general class which he indicated, the particular persons who shall be within the limitations of the order of the court, the particular institutions which shall dispense it. The discretion in selecting the beneficiaries, which the testator intended should be exercised by the trustees, is, under the order of the court, to be delegated by them to others, who are not subject to their authority or control. The court found that it was impossible and impracticable to establish and maintain a poor house, with the means at the disposal of the trustees for this purpose; but, until it is established that it is impossible to devise a scheme by which the agents of the testator's own selection can dispense his charity in a manner next most consonant with the mode which he prescribed, their right, their power, and their duty to dispense it should not be taken from them. It may be that, by allowing the income of the fund to accumulate for a few years longer, the scheme of the testator to provide a home and support for destitute people can be carried out. If it is found that it is impossible, in this way, within a reasonable time, to establish and support such a home, it would seem that a nearer approximation to the specific mode prescribed by the testator than that indicated in the judgment of the court would be for the trustees to use the income of the fund in relieving the necessities of such people, residing in the county of Richmond, as they, in the exercise of a wise discretion, deem would be fit subjects for such a home, were one instituted. In this way the charity would not be limited to a particular class or particular classes of indigent people, and the power and duty of the agents selected by the testator to dispense it would not be taken from them.

The judgment is reversed, and direction is given that the court again, in the light of what is laid down in this opinion, and of such evidence as may be introduced, investigate the question whether or not a poor house may not be established and maintained in accordance with the testamentary scheme. To this end, any citizen of Richmond county who desires to do so may be allowed to intervene and introduce testimony. If it should still appear impossible to carry out that scheme, the court is directed to cause an inquiry to be made as to whether or not, by allowing the annual income to accumulate for a while longer, the will of the testator can be effectuated within a reasonable time, in which event the court will frame its order to that end. If, however, it should be found that it is impossible to carry out the testamentary intention, either at once or after the lapse of a reasonable period, during which the annual income shall accumulate, then the court will enter a decree directing the trustees to themselves dispense the income in the manner above indicated. Judgment reversed, with direction. All the justices concurring.

OHNSON v. CHARLESTON & S. RY. CO.

Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 23, 1900.)

INJURIES—RELEASE—EFFECT—APPEAL—APPEARANCE—DIVIDED OPINION—RES JUDICATA.

1. Under Const. art. 5, § 12, providing that idgments shall be affirmed in the supreme urt when the justices are divided equally in ieir opinions, a judgment affirmed under such nditions is res judicata of the issue involved to the particular case.

2. Where plaintiff executed a valid contract release for injuries, and accepted benefits ereunder, he released defendant from liability r the injuries, though full tender of the payents due under the contract was not made.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court Charleston county; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by Willis Johnson against the harleston & Savannah Railway Company. rom a judgment for defendant, plaintiff apealed. Affirmed.

W. St. Julien Jerrey, for appellant. Mordeai & Gadsden, for respondent.

JONES, J. This appeal is from a judgent for defendant in an action by an emoyé for damages for injury alleged to have en caused by defendant's negligence. The iswer, with other defenses, set up a conact by plaintiff with the Relief Hospital epartment of the Plant System, whereby, ter injury, he received certain payments of oney and other benefits, and, in considera)n of such contract and acceptance of bene s thereunder, released defendant from liaility for said injury. On the former trial, aintiff demurred to the defense for insuffiency on the ground that said contract was ntrary to law and against public policy. iis demurrer was overruled, and on appeal om the order overruling the demurrer the dgment of the circuit court was not reverse. The members of the supreme court be g equally divided on the question, the judgent of this court was that the judgment of e circuit court stands affirmed under the nstitution. See 55 S. C. 152, 32 S. E. 2, 33 E. 174. On the trial thereafter, resulting the judgment now appealed from, the plainf requested the circuit court, Judge Gage esiding, to charge the jury as follows: "(8) ie contract on which the affirmative deise of the defendant is based is contrary to blic policy, and void. And no act of the rties can give vitality to a void contract, or tisfy the same. (9) If the acceptance of nefits under the hospital and relief departent is a carrying out or ratification of the ginal agreement, it cannot avail as a deise when the original agreement is null d void. (10) The tender and acceptance of yments under the contract do not amount an acquittance, unless such tender was in l of all claims under the contract." The st and second mentioned requests were reised, the court holding and charging that the effect of the overruling the demurrer by Judge Watts and its affirmance by an equal division of the supreme court on appeal therefrom was to decide that the said contract was not void as against public policy, and that the defense, if proven, was a good defense, and that such question was res judicata. The request numbered 10, above, was refused on the ground that as, under the ruling of Judge Watts, the contract set up was valid if plaintiff has accepted benefits thereunder, he is remitted to that contract for his remedy for full performance thereof.

We agree with the circuit court on both questions presented by this appeal. The first question is whether the affirmance of the judgment of the circuit court by an equal division of the supreme court on appeal therefrom is res judicata of the issue involved as to that case. Article 5, § 12, of the constitution provides: "In all cases decided by the supreme court the concurrence of three justices shall be necessary for a reversal of the judgment below; but if the four justices equally divide in opinion the judgment below shall be affirmed, subject to the provisions hereafter prescribed." Then follow provisions for calling together the supreme court en banc in certain contingencies, not necessary to be mentioned, as no question arises thereunder in this case. As every judgment or order of the circuit court is the law of that case until reversed by a proper tribunal, and as by reason of the equal division of the supreme court on the question the circuit court was not reversed, but by reason of such division of the supreme court was affirmed, we think that there can be no doubt that the decision of the issue so made and affirmed is final for the purposes of that case. As it is not necessarily involved here, we express no opinion as to effect of such affirmance of an issue joined and decided below as a precedent for guidance in other cases involving the same or similar questions.

The next and only remaining question is whether there was error in refusing the tenth request above stated. This question is practically settled by the foregoing, for, if the contract set up in the answer is a valid contract, and plaintiff has elected to accept and has accepted benefits thereunder, he could not escape the contract of release, because a full tender of all payments due under the contract had not been made to him. By the contract and election to accept certain benefits and payments, he released the defendant from liability. The consideration for the release was the obligation or promise of the association to do certain things, and the release was not conditioned on full performance by such association. For full performance of the contract by the association the plaintiff, as correctly ruled below, has his remedy under the contract. See, on this point, Petty v. Railway Co. (Ga.) 35 S. E. 88. The judgment of the circuit is affirmed.

PLEADINGS—AMENDMENTS—ALLOWED AFTER COMMENCEMENT OF TRIAL.

Under Code, § 194, permitting amendments to pleadings in furtherance of justice, either before or after judgment, when the amendment does not change substantially the claim or defense, a case against a railroad company for damages to plaintiff's buildings and machinery from a fire set by the negligence of defendant may be withdrawn from the jury after the commencement of trial, upon objection by defendant to the admission of evidence showing any destruction of property, on the ground that the complaint does not show that plaintiff's buildings were destroyed, to enable plaintiff to amend his complaint as he may be advised.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Barnwell county; D. A. Townsend, Judge.

Action by Jennie Brown against the Carolina Midland Railway Company for damages from a fire set by defendant. From an order permitting plaintiff to amend her complaint, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Robt. Aldrich and Izlar Bros., for appellant. R. C. Holman, for respondent.

JONES, J. Defendant appeals from an order allowing plaintiff to amend her complaint "as she may be advised," granted after trial begun. Omitting formal parts, the complaint was as follows: "(3) That on or about the night of the 10th of January, A. D. 1899, the plaintiff was the owner of valuable buildings known as the 'Brown Cotton and Manufacturing Co.,' with a complete corn-mill outfit; a complete cylindrical cotton-press outfit, together with cotton ginnery, consisting of 4-70 saw Winship cotton gin, feeders, condensers, fans, pulleys, shafting, conveyors, etc., complete; also fifteen bales of cotton, 500 bushels of corn, 2,000 bushels of cotton seed, several thousand tin cans and cases used for canning fruits and vegetables, two engines, boilers, shaftings, and pulleys complete, in the aggregate value of ten thousand dollars. (4) That on the night of the 10th and the early morning of the 11th (about one o'clock a. m.) of January, A. D. 1899, as hereinbefore alleged, the defendant corporation, whose depot was situated near their line of road, to wit, the usual distance (and the alleged plaintiff's buildings being situated a like distance therefrom), allowed fire to remain in or so near said depot building that the same caught or took fire, and communicated same to plaintiff's buildings, as hereinbefore alleged. (5) That among other things it was the duty of the defendant corporation to retain a night watchman at and around said depot (at night), to prevent just such conflagrations as herein complained of, which they failed (negligently) so to do. (6) That said fire would not have occurred but for defendant's carelessness and negligence in allowing same to remain in their stove or heater in said depot, and other defendant allowed a box car to stand between their depot and plaintiff's building, in a dangerous condition, to wit, a hot box being thereto attached,—all of which facts were well known, or should have been known, to said defendant; and by reason of the aforesaid facts the defendants have damaged the plaintiff $10,000." Upon the trial the court sustained an objection by defendant to evidence to show that there was any destruction of property whatever, there being no allegation in the complaint that the buildings were destroyed, and no allegation that the contents of the building were either destroyed or injured. Thereupon plaintiff's counsel asked to be allowed to amend so as to allege what was destroyed and what was injured. The court then granted an order withdrawing the case from the jury, continuing the case, and allowing plaintiff to amend her complaint as she may be advised.

The order complained of was within the discretion of the court. Section 194 of the Code provides: "The court may before or after judgment in furtherance of justice and on such terms as may be proper, amend any pleading, process or proceeding * * * by inserting other allegations material to the case; or when the amendment does not change substantially the claim or defense, by conforming the pleading or proceeding to the facts proved." Allowing plaintiff to amend "as she may be advised" would not authorize an amendment so as to state a wholly different or new cause of action than that attempted to be set up in the complaint, but would permit all "other allegations material" to the case defectively stated in the complaint. The complaint alleged that the fire was communicated to plaintiff's buildings, containing machinery, etc., and this fire was referred to as a "conflagration." We do not see well how such a fire could be otherwise than injurious in some degree to buildings at least. We think it was in furtherance of justice to permit the amendment. This case differs widely from the case of Cuthbert v. Brown, 49 S. C. 513, 27 S. E. 485, wherein the court held it error, after trial gone into, to allow an amendment to an answer "by converting admissions in the verified answer into denials of facts thus admitted, and, in addition thereto, to insert allegations of an agreement between the parties at the time of making of the contract, the breach of which constituted the plaintiff's cause of action, of which agreement there was no allegation, or even hint, in the original answer." Such an amendment substantially changed the defense. In the present case, the amendment contemplated was not to change substantially the cause of action, but was for the purpose of curing a defective statement of a cause of action attempted to be set up. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

DISTRESS WARRANT—DEFENSES—EVIDENCE—DIRECTING VERDICT.

1. Where a tenant against whom a distress warrant has been sued out meets the same by a counter affidavit, in which he, as the statute provides, flatly denies the whole of the alleged indebtedness, or some definite portion thereof, he may, by competent evidence, prove any fact connected with the rent contract which shows that the rent distrained for, or the portion thereof denied, is not a just demand against him. But where in such counter affidavit no distinct and general denial of the plaintiff's demand is set forth, but the defendant merely alleges that a designated portion of the rent claimed is not due, for certain specified reasons, he will, in making out his defense, be confined to introducing testimony establishing the truth of those reasons only.

2. Even if rejected evidence offered by a defendant was admissible, its exclusion is harmless error, if such evidence would in no way have strengthened the defense set up.

3. Taking the evidence for the defendant actually introduced, and the excluded evidence as to the plaintiff's alleged promise in reference to the repair of the levee, the whole of it together presented no reason in law for defeating the plaintiff, either in whole or in part, and therefore the court did not err in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Macon; W. D. Nottingham, Judge.

Action by Florence Chambers against J. D. Hunnicutt. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Hardeman & Moore, for plaintiff in error. Steed & Ryals, for defendant in error.

FISH, J. One ground of the motion for a new trial is that the court erred in excluding certain evidence offered by the defendant for the purpose of showing that, when he rented the place and gave the rent note, Chambers, the plaintiff's agent, agreed to furnish him with lumber with which to build two or three houses on the rented premises, so that the defendant could put subtenants in them, and that by reason of the failure of the plaintiff to comply with this agreement the defendant sustained damages amounting to several hundred dollars. The court excluded this evidence upon the ground that, as the rent note did not contain any agreement on the part of the landlord to furnish lumber, the evidence offered tended to vary the terms of the written contract. We deem it unnecessary to determine whether the ground upon which the judge based his ruling was sound or unsound, for we are clearly of opinion that the evidence was inadmissible for another reason. The counter affidavit filed by the defendant did not authorize the introduction of this evidence. Where a tenant against whom a distress warrant has been sued out meets the same by a counter affidavit, in which he, as the statute provides, flatly denies the whole of the alleged indebtedness, or some definite portion thereof, he may, by competent evidence, prove any fact connected with the rent terson, 86 Ga. 725, 13 S. E. 17, and cases there cited. The counter affidavit in this case did not contain any general denial of the indebtedness for rent which the plaintiff claimed against the defendant, nor did it contain a general denial of any definite portion of this alleged indebtedness. The amount distrained for was $818.72. In his counter affidavit the defendant alleged that he did not owe the amount distrained for, "for the reason that the said plaintiff [was] indebted to him in the sum of $542.50 by reason of her failure to keep and fulfill her cross obligations under said rent contract, and under the statute in such cases made and provided," in that she failed to repair a certain levee upon the rented premises, the purpose of which was to protect the swamp land from overflow by the waters of a creek, in consequence of which failure to repair this land was flooded, and the crops of the defendant and his tenants were destroyed. Then followed an itemized statement of the particular crops which were damaged, and the amount of damage to each, the whole footing up exactly $542.50. We think that the effect of this counter affidavit was to admit that the defendant owed the amount distrained for, less the damage which he had sustained by reason of the plaintiff's failure to properly keep up the levee. The defendant impliedly admitted that the only reason why he did not owe the full amount distrained for was because of the damages which he had sustained in consequence of the overflow of the bottom land. He denied the plaintiff's claim only to the amount of $542.50, and qualified this denial by alleging that the reason he did not owe this much of the sum claimed by the plaintiff was because of these particular damages. Standing upon a counter affidavit which denied only a definite portion of the amount claimed by the plaintiff, and denied that portion of it solely for the reason stated, the defendant, in addition to introducing evidence to support this contention, sought to attack the undenied portion of the plaintiff's claim by introducing evidence to show that he was damaged in a further amount by the failure of the plaintiff to furnish him with lumber with which to build certain houses on the rented place. Clearly, under the pleadings, he could not legally do this. To have allowed him to introduce evidence to support his claim to recoup the sum of $542.50 for damages occasioned by the overflow of the crops, and also to introduce testimony to show that he was damaged in an additional sum by the failure of the landlord to furnish him with lumber with which to build the houses, would have been equivalent to allowing him to contest in whole or in part that portion of the plaintiff's claim which he had not denied by his counter affidavit. The effect of his counter affidavit was this: "I admit that, when the plaintiff's claim for rent is reduced by the amount of the damages ance." But when he came to introduce evidence he undertook to show that, even if the claim of the plaintiff were thus reduced, there should be a further reduction on account of the damages occasioned by the failure of the plaintiff to furnish him with lumber with which to build upon the rented place two or three houses for subtenants. We think, in introducing evidence, he was rightly confined to the specific defense which he set up.

2. Another ground of the motion was that the court erred in excluding the following evidence offered by the defendant: "At the time the rent note was written and signed, Mr. Chambers' attention was called to the levee, and the strength of it. We talked about it before, and also on that day; and he asked me if I would keep up the levee, and I said I would not keep it up for the rent of the plantation. I says: 'I want you to keep it up; for, if you tear it down, it would ruin the whole farm in the swamp. It has done it before, and without that they are not worth anything.' And I do not remember the answer. Chambers said he would attend to the levee, as he had done before." This evidence was excluded on the ground that the rent note did not contain an agreement to repair the levee, and therefore the evidence offered tended to vary the written contract. The effort of the defendant was to prove that, at the time the rent contract was entered into, the plaintiff, through her agent, Mr. Chambers, promised to repair the levee, but it will be seen that the only promise that the defendant offered to testify that Chambers made was that "he would attend to the levee as he had done before." The exclusion of the testimony to establish this promise on the part of Chambers did the defendant no harm whatever, because there is nothing in the evidence in the case which shows that Chambers did not, after the rent contract was entered into, attend to the levee as he had done before. The defendant was permitted by the court to freely testify as to the condition of the levee before, at the time, and after the execution of the rent contract. All the evidence that he offered in reference to the levee seems to have been admitted, except his statement as to Chambers' promise. We have carefully examined the evidence, and we do not find anything in it which shows that after the execution of the rent contract, and up to the time that the levee was broken and the defendant's crops injured, Chambers knew that the levee was not in as good condition as it was when the defendant rented the place. In fact, the evidence does not show that up to that time the condition of the levee had materially changed. The defendant himself testified: "At the time I rented, the levee was in the same condition as year before. Of course, it had been torn down; but we fixed it up the year before, and we did not go all over it and examine it. I contracted the year before to fix one place, and fixed it. When I made rent contract, the levee was in course, we did not go over any part of it to see." In endeavoring to ascertain whether the defendant was hurt by the refusal of the court to allow him to testify that Chambers promised to attend to the levee as he had done before, two questions naturally arise: First. How did Chambers attend to the levee before? Second. Did he comply with this promise, by attending to the levee as he had done before? Upon the first of these questions the evidence was very meager. The defendant testified that the year before, when the levee had been torn down, it was fixed up. The only other witness introduced by the defendant testified that he did not know that the levee, before the freshet which occasioned the damage to the defendant's crops, "was any worse than it was two or three years back," and that he did not think there had been any work done on it at all. The only witness introduced by the plaintiff testified that at the time of the freshet the levee "was in same condition it had been for several years, and it stood the freshets of previous years," while he lived on the place, and that "no repairs were made on the levee while [he] lived there, about eleven years, except when a big freshet tore it down in some unexpected spot, like it did this year." All that can be said, from this testimony, in reply to the first question, is that the way in which the levee had been attended to before was to repair it after it had been torn down. There is nothing to show that after the defendant rented the place the levee was torn down, until it was broken by the freshet which caused the damage to the defendant's crops. So it cannot be said that the evidence shows that Chambers did not comply with his promise—if made—to attend to the levee as he had done before. Besides, we think that the testimony clearly shows that the damage of which the defendant complained was caused by an extraordinary freshet. The defendant's witness Hicks testified that: "An extraordinary freshet in creek broke down the levee. It was a little bigger than any we had since I have been on the place." Nisbet, the only witness for the plaintiff, testified that the break in the levee was caused by "an unusual freshet,—the largest in several years." The testimony of the defendant himself does not conflict with this. He testified that "the break was caused by high water," and that "it was a freshet." So, granting that Chambers, the plaintiff's agent, made the promise which the defendant sought to prove, we think the evidence shows that the break in the levee, and the consequent damage to the defendant's crops, were not caused by a failure upon Chambers' part to keep this promise, if he had given it, but by an extraordinary freshet, and for this reason the defendant could not have been hurt by the ruling of the court.

3. Taking the evidence for the defendant actually introduced, and the excluded testimony relating to Chambers' agreement to plaintiff of the amount in issue between the parties, and therefore the court did not err in directing a verdict for the plaintiff. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

GEORGIA RAILROAD & BANKING CO. v. SPINKS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1900.)

DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT—PERSON ENTITLED TO RECOVER—DEPENDENT.

A man whose earnings are sufficient to adequately support himself is not "dependent," within the meaning of section 3828 of the Civil Code, although he may by law be chargeable with the maintenance of others, for the support of whom and himself such earnings are insufficient. (a) Accordingly, a father whose monthly wages were enough to more than afford him individually a support commensurate with his circumstances and standing in life was not, under the provisions of the section cited, entitled to recover the full value of the life of an unmarried minor son tortiously killed, and whose mother had died, although, because of the insufficiency of the father's wages to support himself and also his family, consisting of a second wife and minor children, he received contributions in money from the son while living.

Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming and Sanders McDaniel, for plaintiff in error. Arnold & Arnold, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. On the trial of an action brought by H. D. Spinks, under section 3828 of the Civil Code, against the Georgia Railroad & Banking Company, for the full value of the life of his minor son, Pearl Spinks, there was a verdict for the plaintiff. A motion for a new trial was filed by the company, and to the overruling thereof it excepted. Taking the evidence most favorably for the plaintiff, which is proper, since the verdict was in his favor, the facts on which it rests are, in substance, as follows: The death of Pearl Spinks was occasioned, without fault on his part, by the negligence of the company. He had never married, and his mother died before he was killed. At and before the time of the homicide the earnings of H. D. Spinks exceeded $100 per month, and they were largely more than sufficient for his individual support. He had a family, which included a second wife and minor children, who were dependent upon him. His wages were not sufficient to afford him and them a support commensurate with their circumstances and standing in the community in which they lived, and the son before his death made contributions in money to his father, which grounds of which were abandoned, raises no controversy as to the amount of the verdict, and really presents for decision here the sole question, was the plaintiff, upon the state of facts above disclosed, entitled to any recovery at all from the defendant? This question, differently stated, is resolvable into the inquiry: Was H. D. Spinks a dependent person, within the meaning of the Code section on which his action was predicated? It declares: "A mother, or, if no mother, a father, may recover for the homicide of a child, minor or sui juris, upon whom she or he is dependent, or who contributes to his or her support, unless said child leave a wife, husband or child. Said mother or father shall be entitled to recover the full value of the life of said child." After full reflection and careful deliberation, we are satisfied that the plaintiff was not "dependent," in the sense in which this word was used in framing the statute under consideration. In Smith v. Hatcher, 102 Ga. 160, 29 S. E. 162, the opinion was expressed that it is a harsh one, and should be strictly construed. But for it, a father's interest in the life of a minor child would be limited to the value of his services during minority, and the former would have no interest at all in the life of an adult child. So much, therefore, of the statute as confers upon parents the right to sue for the wrongful killing of a child is in large measure punitory, and hence the reason for holding that at least this portion of the homicide act should be subjected to strict construction. It is not, however, a purely penal act; for, if the general assembly had intended that for every death resulting from crime or negligence a right of action should arise, it would have taken care to so provide, and in no case would a plaintiff be wanting. The act therefore is, to a considerable extent, compensatory in its character. This being so, what was its design relatively to the compensation of parents? We think that in this respect its underlying principle was to provide for parents of both sexes, who, by reason of poverty, age, or physical infirmity, were incapable of supporting themselves, and especially for mothers without means, who, because of this and of their sex, were so incapable. The condition of dependence contemplated by the general assembly was that of the parent with relation to his or her personal need of aid in obtaining a livelihood. We cannot believe it was the legislative intention to assist a self-sustaining father in taking care of others, whose support he had voluntarily undertaken, or with which he was legally chargeable. The true spirit of the law was to help both mothers and fathers who were in a substantial degree themselves dependent upon a child, and not to help members of their families who were dependent upon them or the child. If the general assembly had been legislating with reference to need of aid arising from the ex-every case where there is one; for a purpose to benefit members of a family dependent upon the head thereof, or to benefit him because under the duty of maintaining them, would have been best accomplished by conferring upon him the right to sue, even if the mother should be in life. But this is not what the law does. The father cannot sue at all for the value of the child's life if there is a mother, which shows most conclusively, we think, that the individual dependence of the mother or father, as the case might be, was what the legislature contemplated. There is no hint in the law that a brother or sister of one tortiously deprived of life shall have a right of action because of the homicide, and no implication that such brother or sister shall have an indirect benefit because of the right of action given to the parent.

The cases of Daniels v. Railway Co., 86 Ga. 236, 12 S. E. 365; Railroad Co. v. Johnston, 89 Ga. 560, 15 S. E. 908; Railway Co. v. Glover, 92 Ga. 132, 18 S. E. 406; and Railway Co. v. Gravitt, 93 Ga. 369, 20 S. E. 550, 26 L. R. A. 553,—do not, we think, conflict with the ruling now made, or with any of the views above expressed. They are authority for the propositions (1) that, to entitle a mother to recover for the wrongful killing of her child, it is not incumbent upon her to show that she depended upon him alone for a livelihood, or that he furnished her entire support, but that partial dependence upon the child's labor, accompanied by substantial contribution therefrom to her maintenance, was sufficient; and (2) that where a family of working people, including parents and a minor child, were mutually dependent upon the labor of one another for a livelihood, and the child rendered valuable services, of which the mother got the benefit, she was dependent upon him, if he thus contributed substantially to her support. In the Glover Case, upon which counsel for the defendant in error mainly rely, the precise ruling was expressed as follows: "Where father and mother and minor children all reside together, and are mutually dependent upon the labor of the family for support, a minor child over fifteen years of age, whose labor, or the proceeds of it, come into the common stock, is to be considered as contributing substantially to the support of the mother." It is to be observed that in all of these cases the action was brought by the mother. A mother without property is an essentially dependent member of a household consisting of her husband, herself, and their children. She may render many valuable services and perform many onerous duties, but, when it comes to obtaining the necessaries of life,—food, clothing, fuel, and the other essentials to human existence,—she is, in the very nature of things, dependent upon each and every member of the family whose ordinarily quite different as to a father. Manhood, which is self-sustaining, and more than self-sustaining, is not a condition of dependency. Minority is an element of dependence in both males and females, and the female sex of itself constitutes such an element in adults, but not so as to the sex masculine. Our homestead system is illustrative of the view that fathers are independent and mothers and children dependent; and this view, so far as relates to females, is further illustrated by the cry of the age, by and in behalf of women, to widen their field of employment so that they may lessen their dependence or rescue themselves from their dependent position. The contention of counsel for the defendant in error may derive apparent support from some of the language used by Chief Justice Bleckley in the opinion delivered in the Glover Case, but what he said should be considered in the light of the facts with which he was dealing. That case, properly understood, is not authority for holding that a full-grown man, not rendered by age or disease incapable of working and deriving his daily support from his own labor, is dependent upon any one but himself. He is the very best type of a self-sufficient, self-sustaining human being, and is really much better off than he would be with money enough to produce an income equal to that which his labor yields him, but without health or strength to labor at all. In dedicating his poems to the Caledonian Hunt, Burns wrote, "I was bred to the plow, and am independent." This is good sense, good spirit, and good law. Judgment reversed. LOWE v. STATE.

FALSE PRETENSES.

When one, by using any deceitful means or artful practice, other than those which are mentioned specifically in the Penal Code, obtains the money or goods of another, the offense forbidden by Pen. Code, § 670, is complete as soon as the owner is thus deprived of his property, and subsequent repentance and restitution on the part of the wrongdoer will constitute no bar to a prosecution against him.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Stewart county; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Dewitt Lowe was convicted of obtaining goods on false pretenses, and brings error. Affirmed.

B. F. Harrell & Son, for plaintiff in error. F. A. Hooper, Sol. Gen., for the State.

LEWIS, J. The accused was tried before a jury in the county court of Stewart county under an indictment charging him with the offense of cheating and swindling. It alleged substantially that by deceitful means and artful practices he falsely represented to one Pugh that one Overby authorized accused to purchase for him (Overby) a peck of apples of the value of 40 cents, and two pounds of candy of the value of 20 cents, and charge same to the account of Overby; that the statements and representations were false and fraudulent, and were made by accused for the purpose of defrauding Pugh out of said merchandise, and did defraud him in the amount named. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, whereupon accused brought his petition for certiorari to the superior court of said county, and excepts to the judgment of the court refusing to sanction the same. The only ground of error insisted on by counsel for the accused is that the verdict of the jury is contrary to the evidence, in that the testimony showed the person alleged to have been defrauded did not sustain any loss or injury, the goods being sold on a credit, and not intended as a cash sale, and having been paid for before the finding of the indictment. The evidence for the state substantially made out the charges in the indictment. Obtaining the goods by the false representations of the accused as charged was proved. Some time thereafter the seller of the goods asked payment of the man whom the accused represented had given him authority to purchase the goods on his account. He was then informed that this person gave no such authority whatever to the accused, and he refused to pay the bill. Several demands were thereafter made on the accused for the money, and he failed to pay the same. Before the indictment, however, and several months after the alleged commission of the crime, the accused had a settlement with the seller of the goods, and paid him his price therefor. The accused is indicted under Pen. Code, § 670, which declares: "Any person using any deceitful means or artful practice, other than those which are mentioned in this Code, by which an individual, or the public, is defrauded and cheated, shall be punished as for a misdemeanor." It does not require either a warrant or indictment to make an offense thereunder complete. It is complete when deceitful means or artful practices are used by which an individual or the public is defrauded and cheated. There is nothing in the contention of counsel that the goods were sold on a credit, and not intended as a cash sale, for there was certainly no credit extended to the accused, but, upon the faith of his representations, to another party who was not responsible for the purchase. The crime, then, was certainly complete when the accused failed to pay for the goods after the prosecutor had become aware of his misrepresentations, and demanded payment of him; and thus being deprived of them, and without receiving any pay therefor, for several months, he was defrauded and cheated. The fact that he afterwards settled with the accused for the value of the goods is not pretended as a settlement of the crime that had been committed, even if the parties had authority to settle such a crime; but it must be construed simply as a settlement of a civil liability. It was perfectly legitimate, then, for the grand jury to afterwards find an indictment charging the accused with a violation of law upon the subject of cheating and swindling. This principle is decided in Williams v. State, 105 Ga. 606, 31 S. E. 546. It was there held that where one, for the purpose of deceiving another and obtaining a credit, makes a false and fraudulent representation to the effect that he has purchased and has become the owner of valuable property, and who in this manner defrauds the person to whom such representation is made of money or other thing of value, is guilty of being a cheat and swindler; and a settlement between such wrongdoer and the person defrauded, made after the commission of the offense and the arrest of the former upon a warrant charging him therewith, constitutes no bar to his conviction thereof upon an indictment subsequently returned. It is true it appears in that case that a warrant had issued. In the opinion it was announced, in effect, that the restitution made by the accused did not relieve him of the consequences of his violation of the criminal statute, "which was complete before his arrest." The court added: "As well might it be said that one guilty of a larceny could escape prosecution by returning the stolen goods after being arrested for the offense." Applying this principle to the facts in the present case, it follows that the court committed no error in refusing to sanction the petition for certiorari. Judgment affirmed. GAY v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 7, 1900.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—MANSLAUGHTER.

1. While a judge is not bound to give in charge to the jury any proposition of law which has no foundation except the statement of the accused, he may, if he sees proper so to do, base an instruction on the statement.

2. Under the sworn testimony in this case a verdict of murder would have been well warranted, but the statement of the accused authorized a charge on the law of voluntary manslaughter, but not on the law of involuntary manslaughter.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Emanuel county; B. D. Evans, Judge.

A. A. Gay was convicted of manslaughter, and brings error. Affirmed.

F. H. Saffold, for plaintiff in error. B. T. Rawlings, Sol. Gen., for the State.

COBB, J. The accused was tried on an indictment charging him with the offense of murder, and the jury returned a verdict finding him guilty of voluntary manslaughter.

1. "It is well settled that, in the absence of a proper and pertinent written request for instructions thereon, the court is not bound to give in charge the law of a theory of the case arising solely from the statement of the accused." Hardin v. State, 107 Ga. 718, 33 S. E. 700, and cases cited. While the judge is not bound to charge the law applicable to a theory of the case derived solely from the prisoner's statement, he has a right to do so. It is the duty of the judge to give to the jury appropriate instructions on every theory of the case presented by the evidence, and it is the best practice to give such instructions on every phase of the case presented by the prisoner's statement, though, as above stated, the failure to do so, in the absence of a proper request, will not be held to be error. While instructions on a theory of the case as derived from the statement are not required by strict law, few cases, if any, can arise where such instructions would not be dictated by every sense of justice and fairness. A careful examination of the prisoner's statement in the present case satisfies us that, if the jury credited the same, a verdict for voluntary manslaughter was authorized. It was not erroneous, therefore, for the judge to give in charge to the jury the law relating to this offense. This is true notwithstanding counsel for the accused not only did not request the law of voluntary manslaughter to be given in charge, but strenuously contended that there was nothing in the statement to authorize such charge. It is the duty of the judge to instruct the jury on the law applicable to the evidence in the case. It is the right of the judge to charge the jury in criminal cases on the law applicable to the facts set forth in the prisoner's statement. A contention of counsel on the evidence that is not well founded will not prevent the judge from giving in charge to the jury the law applicable to the evidence as it really is. Neither will an erroneous contention of counsel as to the theory presented by the statement of the accused deprive the court of the right, if he desires to exercise it, of giving in charge to the jury the theory actually presented by the statement. Under the statement of the accused in the present case, as above indicated, the law of voluntary manslaughter was applicable, and the judge did not err in charging the jury on that subject, notwithstanding that during the progress of the trial the court had asked counsel for the accused whether the law on that subject was involved in the case, and counsel had replied "that the same was not involved."

2. The evidence for the state would have well warranted a finding that the accused was guilty of a willful, deliberate, and cruel murder. The deceased was a negro, and, according to the testimony for the state, was pursued into the very home of his employer, and was not only unjustifiable, but was not attended with any extenuating circumstances. The statement of the accused would not, under any view of it, have authorized an acquittal, and, to say the most of it, contained a version of the transaction which was unreasonable and improbable, but, in one view of it, does present a state of facts which would authorize a finding that the offense committed by the accused was that for which he was convicted. The jury having taken this view of the case, we will not interfere with the decision of the judge in refusing to grant a new trial. In no view of the case was the law of involuntary manslaughter involved, and the judge committed no error in failing to charge the law on this branch of homicide.

There was no error requiring the granting of a new trial. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

CROW v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 7, 1900.)

CRIMINAL LAW—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—WRIT OF ERROR—DISMISSAL.

1. When there is no return or acknowledgment of service "indorsed upon or annexed to" a bill of exceptions, the writ of error will be dismissed.

2. Service of a bill of exceptions cannot be shown in the supreme court by parol statements of counsel, or by producing detached writings purporting to evidence such service.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Whitfield county; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Charley Crow was convicted of crime, and brings error. Dismissed.

Mann & Terry, for plaintiff in error. Sam P. Maddox, Sol. Gen., for the State.

LUMPKIN, P. J. On the call of this case the solicitor general moved to dismiss the writ of error on the ground that there was no entry indorsed upon or annexed to the bill of exceptions showing service thereof. An inspection of the bill of exceptions fails to disclose any evidence whatever that it was ever served upon the solicitor general. We are accordingly constrained to hold that the motion to dismiss is well taken. Counsel for the plaintiff in error produced in this court a separate writing purporting to be an acknowledgment of service by the solicitor general of the bill of exceptions in this case. In this connection it was stated that this writing had been received from the solicitor general, filed in the office of the clerk of the trial court, and by him sent by mail to the clerk of this court. The solicitor general admitted that the writing referred to had been signed by him. We cannot, however, act upon these statements as proper evidence of service.

to transmit it to this court as such nor attempted to do so. The case of Akerman v. Neel, 70 Ga. 728, is directly in point on the question now presented. In that case it was held: "Proper service of the bill of exceptions must appear from an entry indorsed upon it or annexed thereto. When there is no entry whatever indorsed upon or attached to the bill of exceptions showing service, parol statements cannot be heard in this court for the purpose of showing that service was perfected." See, also, cases cited. Counsel for the plaintiff in error insisted that the law as thus laid down had been modified by so much of the act of December 18, 1893, as is now embodied in section 5569 of the Civil Code, which provides that: "It shall be unlawful for the supreme court of Georgia to dismiss any case for any want of technical conformity to the statutes or rules regulating the practice in carrying cases to that court, where there is enough in the bill of exceptions or transcript of the record presented, or both together, to enable the court to ascertain substantially the real questions in the case which the parties seek to have decided therein." Manifestly, failure to show in the lawful manner due service of a bill of exceptions is not a mere "want of technical conformity to the statutes or rules regulating the practice in carrying cases" to this court. Such failure amounts to no conformity at all with section 5547 of the Civil Code, which not only provides that there shall be proper service of a bill of exceptions, but also expressly declares that there shall be "a return of such service (or acknowledgment of service) indorsed upon or annexed to such bill of exceptions." That section further undertakes to deal specifically with the matter of dismissing cases for want of service, and provides merely that a bill of exceptions shall not be dismissed in the event "the party benefited by a failure to serve shall * * * waive service and agree that said case may be heard." We therefore hold that the present bill of exceptions cannot be retained for a hearing on its merits by virtue of anything contained in the section of the Code first above cited. Writ of error dismissed. All the justices concurring.

In re MADDOX, Solicitor General.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 7, 1900.)

SOLICITOR GENERAL—FEES.

A solicitor general, for services rendered in this court in a criminal case, wherein it appears that the accused was indicted for a felony, and in the trial court convicted of a misdemeanor, is entitled to a fee of $15, and not $30.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application of Solicitor General Maddox for taxation of costs. Motion granted, and costs taxed.

to tax his costs, and thus presented the question whether he was entitled for his services in this court to a fee of $30 or to a fee of only $15. In that case it appeared that the accused had been indicted in the trial court for the offense of seduction, which is a felony, and that he was convicted of the offense of fornication, which is a misdemeanor. Section 1099 of the Penal Code prescribes that for services in the supreme court the fees of solicitors general shall be "in capital cases, $50.00; other felonies $30.00; all other cases $15.00." So the real question is whether the present case should be treated here as a "felony case" or as a "misdemeanor case." While the indictment was for felony, the accused was convicted of a misdemeanor, and in his writ of error sought to have this court pass upon the question whether or not he was legally convicted of an offense of that grade. Now, what was the character of the judgment of which he complained? It was one by which it had been judicially declared that he had committed a misdemeanor. This court was not called upon to determine whether or not the accused was lawfully convicted of a felony, nor was there any such conviction. We are, therefore, clearly of the opinion that the case, when it reached here, and as it stood upon the docket of this court, was one which should be classed as a "misdemeanor case," and, consequently, that the solicitor general is not entitled for his services to the fee prescribed for representing the state in "felony cases." His compensation is fixed by that clause of the fee bill which allows him in "all other cases" a fee of $15.

WESTERN UNION TEL. CO. et al. v. GRIFFITH.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 7, 1900.)

APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—AMENDMENT—PARTIES—TELEGRAPH COMPANIES—INJURY BY WIRES—NEGLIGENCE—DAMAGES.

1. A bill of exceptions may, in this court, be amended by the record so as to include the names of all necessary or proper parties who might have been joined with the party excepting as plaintiffs in error; aliter as to parties defendant not named in the writ of error, who are unwilling to waive service and consent that the case be heard on its merits. (a) The test to be applied in determining whether one sought to be introduced by amendment could have been joined with the excepting party as a plaintiff in error is, were they on the same side of the controversy in the trial court? for such litigants only as were co-parties below can properly appear before this court as parties plaintiff. (b) All formal parties to the pleadings in the trial court are proper parties to a writ of error, though, since the passage of the practice act of 1881, such of them only as will really be affected by the judgment to be rendered in this court are to be regarded as indispensable parties. (c) In the present case the party brought before this court by amendment to the bill of exceptions was not a neces-tition set forth a cause of action, and was not open to demurrer on the ground that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant. (a) The plaintiff went even further into detail than was necessary in describing the location of the wires and poles belonging, respectively, to the defendant companies, but the petition was defective in that it failed to state with sufficient particularity at what points the plaintiff expected to prove that they negligently permitted their wires to remain in contact. They were not, however, entitled to notice as to the character or extent of the evidence upon which the plaintiff expected to rely as showing knowledge on their part of facts with which they were alleged to have been acquainted.

3. The petition did not disclose facts showing that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover expenses incurred for medical attention, etc., but was subject to demurrer on the ground that the amount of such expenses was not therein alleged.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Richmond; W. F. Eve, Judge.

Action by L. B. Griffith against the Western Union Telegraph Company and others. From an order overruling a demurrer to the complaint, defendants bring error. Reversed.

J. S. & W. T. Davidson and F. G. Du Bignon, for plaintiffs in error. C. H. Cohen, J. R. Lamar, and Boykin Wright, for defendant in error.

FISH, J. When this case came on to be heard at the October term of this court, counsel for Mrs. Griffith presented a motion to dismiss the writ of error on the ground that the Augusta Railway & Electric Company was a necessary party thereto, but had not been named as such in the bill of exceptions. Thereupon counsel for the telegraph company, without conceding that the railway and electric company was an indispensable party, asked leave to amend the bill of exceptions "from the record in the case," agreeably to the provisions of section 5570 of the Civil Code, by inserting the name of the latter company as a co-plaintiff in error. After argument had as to the right of the telegraph company to make the proposed amendment, we granted it permission so to do, and overruled the motion to dismiss. This was, as we shall undertake now to show, in accord with a rule of practice which has been uniformly adhered to and consistently applied during a period of more than half a century.

1. Under the procedure which obtained both in England and in this country at the time the supreme court of this state was organized, all persons affected by the judgment of a trial court, including securities upon an appeal bond, even though they might not be formal parties to the record, were indispensable parties to a writ of error sued out to review such judgment; and it was accordingly held by this court that a necessity and reasonableness of such a requirement, Judge Lumpkin, who delivered the opinion filed in the latter case, pointed out what provision was made for cases in which one only of several parties on the losing side might wish to accept, saying, in this connection (page 289): "One of several parties [cannot] be subjected to the hardship and loss of being deprived of his writ of error because the others refuse to join in it. One may sue out a writ of error in the name of all, and, if the others refuse to join in the prosecution, they may be brought before this court, and severed, at their own request, after which he or they who sued out the writ of error may go on alone. In this manner all inconvenience may be avoided, justice administered, and the harmony and conformity of the record preserved." The right to amend the bill of exceptions by the record, and thus bring before the court necessary plaintiffs not joined in the first instance, was recognized both in the case of Long v. Strickland, 2 Ga. 348, and in that of Carey v. Rice, Id. 408. Such an amendment was allowed in Beall v. Fox's Ex'rs, 4 Ga. 408, it appearing from the record in that case that the parties plaintiff thus sought to be introduced were co-defendants with the plaintiff in error in the court below. Then came the practice act of 1847, which wrought no change in the rules of procedure, save to provide that thereafter it should not be necessary to join in the writ of error securities on appeal or upon injunction bonds, but that such persons only as were formal parties to the pleadings in the lower court should be considered indispensable parties to a writ of error sued out to review a judgment therein rendered. See Carey v. Giles, 10 Ga. 8, wherein this statute was cited and construed. The court in that case declared it necessary not only to include in the writ of error all essential parties thereto, but to observe the equally important requirement that they be therein joined "in the order in which they stand in the record below." As explanatory of what was meant by the phrase just quoted, and as affording an illustration of how this requirement could and should be met, it was said (page 2): "When, therefore, one of two or more defendants against whom a decree has been rendered brings a writ of error to reverse it, it is necessary for him to join his co-defendants as plaintiffs in error, and upon the trial they may unite with him, and assign error against the decree, or they may sever, and be heard in defense of the decree. And, if such plaintiff in error has failed to make his co-defendants parties plaintiff to the writ of error, they may be added by motion, without delay or cost, with the same privilege of assigning errors or severing." Commenting upon the act of 1850, which declared that writs of error could be amended less to talk about the mockery of adding parties here, on motion, without giving them notice to appear. * * * So far as these parties are concerned, they have * * * very little cause of complaint. The plaintiff in error now before the court could have used their names, and brought them here as parties plaintiff without their consent, and without notice. They are now being made parties upon motion, in a condition very little worse than they would have been in had the plaintiff taken that course. In neither case has the law provided for notice to them, and in both cases they are presumed to know what are the public laws; to know that under the laws they are liable thus to be made parties; and in both cases their rights are the same,—that is, they can assign errors with the primary plaintiff, and co-operate with him in procuring the reversal of the judgment below, or they can sever, and be heard in support of the judgment. It is their privilege to elect." See, also, what was said upon the same line by Bleckley, J., in McNulty v. Pruden, 62 Ga. 138. In the course of his discussion he observed that, if the case "had been brought up by the complainant below, and not by some of the defendants, other rules would apply," for there was a vast difference between introducing proper plaintiffs in error who were not entitled to notice and attempting to add by amendment necessary defendants in error who had not been made parties to or served with the bill of exceptions agreeably to statutory provisions which were imperative. For instance, where this distinction was drawn, and the writ of error was dismissed for want of proper parties defendant in this court, see Barksdale v. Bunkley, 26 Ga. 398; Curey v. Hitch, 57 Ga. 197; Bird v. Harris, 63 Ga. 433; Jordan v. Kelly, Id. 437; Brown v. Wylie, 64 Ga. 435; Maynard v. Hunnewell, 65 Ga. 281; Jowers v. Baker, Id. 611; Haines v. Clary, 66 Ga. 519; and Price v. Lathrop, Id. 247. In the case last cited it appeared that an assignee in bankruptcy, who was a necessary party defendant in error, had not been named as such in the bill of exceptions. With a view to meeting a motion to dismiss the writ of error, the plaintiffs offered to amend by making him a co-party with them, but the court refused to allow this to be done, holding: "Such assignee cannot be made a party plaintiff in error with complainants by an amendment to the bill of exceptions instanter, because he was not on the same side of the litigation in the court below, as was the case in McNulty v. Pruden, 62 Ga. 135, and Carey v. Giles, 10 Ga. 1. His interest, as well as his position in the court below, show him to have been antagonistic to the case made by complainants, and therefore he cannot be made a party on the same side of the litigation in the "Saving Act" of 1881 (Acts 1880–81, p. 123). Among other things, it provided for curing by amendment "any imperfection or omission of necessary and proper allegations" in the bill of exceptions which "could be corrected from the record in the case," and declared that no writ of error should be dismissed "on any ground whatever" which could be "removed during the term of the court to which the said writ of error is returnable." See Civ. Code, §§ 5567, 5570. In express terms this statute further declared that no dismissal should result simply "because the bill of exceptions sets forth the parties differently from the record, or discloses that some party not interested in sustaining the judgment of the court below had not been served," provided the record shows "clearly who were the respective parties to the litigation in the court below, and the bill of exceptions shows that all who were interested in the case, as presented in the supreme court, in sustaining the judgment of the court below, had been served." Id. § 5562. No change in the then prevailing practice concerning a proper alignment on opposite sides of the respective parties at interest seems, however, to have been contemplated; nor was any provision made for service of the bill of exceptions upon such parties as, under the procedure which had previously been established, were required to be brought before this court in the capacity of plaintiffs in error. Indeed, this act was essentially one of mercy, not designed to introduce a different system of procedure, or to impose any additional burdens upon one suing out a writ of error, but merely to shield him from the pains and penalties which had theretofore been visited upon those who failed to observe certain requirements of the law which this court was bound to enforce; that is to say, the established rules of practice were not dealt a mortal blow, but were merely crippled, by being thus practically declared directory, rather than mandatory. But one change therein was introduced which affected the practice as to the manner of joining parties in a writ of error. This related solely to the requirement that all parties to the record in the trial court should be made parties to the bill of exceptions, which requirement the general assembly modified to the extent of declaring that "no party shall be considered as interested in the litigation in the supreme court who will not be affected by the judgment to be rendered in that particular case, such as sheriffs upon a money rule when the contest is between various claimants of the fund and not between the sheriff and any one of them, or a receiver occupying a similar relation, or a complainant in a bill of interpleader, and other parties occupying similar positions." Civ. Code, § 5562. Recognizing that the act of 189-age of that statute: "Where some of the defendants to a bill in equity except to the overruling of a demurrer to the bill, they need not serve their co-defendants with the bill of exceptions." Bank v. Harrison, 68 Ga. 463. It may further be observed that since that act went into effect the practice which formerly prevailed as to allowing writs of error to be amended by the record so that proper parties plaintiff might be added has also been consistently adhered to and applied in a number of instances. See Swatts v. Spence, 68 Ga. 496, 499; Sharp v. Findley, 71 Ga. 655; Epping v. Aiken, Id. 682; Fouche v. Harison, 78 Ga. 359, 407, 3 S. E. 330; Culver v. Mullally, 94 Ga. 644, 21 S. E. 895; Isbell v. Blanchard, 94 Ga. 678, 21 S. E. 720; Steele Lumber Co. v. Laurens Lumber Co., 98 Ga. 329, 24 S. E. 755; Swift v. Thomas, 101 Ga. 89, 28 S. E. 618; Bennett v. Trust Co., 106 Ga. 578, 32 S. E. 625. Many cases have, indeed, been dismissed for want of necessary parties. Allen v. Cravens, 68 Ga. 554; Craig v. Webb, 70 Ga. 188; Knox v. McCalla, Id. 725; Cameron v. Sheppard, 71 Ga. 781; Baker v. Thompson, 78 Ga. 742, 4 S. E. 107; Anderson v. Faw, 79 Ga. 558, 4 S. E. 920; Crosthwait v. James, 95 Ga. 570, 20 S. E. 494; Davis v. Peel, 97 Ga. 342, 22 S. E. 525; Hunter v. Wakefield, 97 Ga. 543, 25 S. E. 347; Capers v. Kirkpatrick, 98 Ga. 260, 25 S. E. 438; Inman v. Estes, 104 Ga. 645, 30 S. E. 800; Stroup v. Pruden, 104 Ga. 721, 30 S. E. 948; White v. Bleckley, 105 Ga. 173, 31 S. E. 147; McConnell v. West, 105 Ga. 468, 30 S. E. 654; United States Leather Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 107 Ga. 263, 33 S. E. 31; Papworth v. Ryman, 108 Ga. 780, 33 S. E. 665; Tiner v. Carter (Ga.) 34 S. E. 567; McCain v. Sutlive, Id. 1013. But in none of these cases could the fatal omission to include in the writ of error all necessary parties defendant thereto be cured by amendment; for, in view of the doctrine laid down in Price v. Lathrop, supra, one suing out a bill of exceptions cannot properly join with him as a plaintiff in error another litigant who was on the opposite side of the controversy in the court below, and the act of 1881 in terms declares that the provision therein made that no dismissal shall result merely "because the bill of exceptions sets forth the parties differently from the record" is applicable only in the event all necessary parties defendant have been duly served. Of course, no case will be dismissed for want of service when the parties entitled thereto voluntarily appear before this court, either in person or by attorney, and consent that the case may be heard. Civ. Code, § 5547, par. 3; Craig v. Webb, 70 Ga. 188. And reasonable time and opportunity will be afforded a plaintiff in error in order that he may, if possible, procure such consent during the term to which the writ of error way of amending a bill of exceptions by the record so as to include therein the name of additional parties defendant, this will avail nothing in the absence of a waiver on their part of due service, as any service upon them thereafter effected would come too late. Cameron v. Sheppard, 71 Ga. 781; Papworth v. Ryman, 108 Ga. 780, 33 S. E. 665, and cases cited. It is also proper to call attention to the fact that the right to introduce by amendment even necessary parties plaintiff is limited to those litigants only who are entitled to sue out a writ of error, and cannot be exercised for the benefit of others by one not himself injuriously affected by the judgment excepted to. Railroad Co. v. Craig, 59 Ga. 185; Healey v. Scofield, 60 Ga. 451; Railroad Co. v. Craig, 62 Ga. 362; Swift v. Thomas, 101 Ga. 89, 28 S. E. 618.

In view of the practice outlined above, it is clear that, as the railway and electric company was not a co-party with Mrs. Griffith in the court below, it did not belong on that side of the case which she occupied before this court. Certainly, it was not incumbent upon the telegraph company, if it desired to bring here for review the judgment overruling its separate demurrer, to make the railway and electric company a party defendant to the bill of exceptions. Jones v. Hurst, 91 Ga. 338, 17 S. E. 635, citing previous decisions of this court. But counsel for Mrs. Griffith contended that a new trial could not legally be granted as to one only of the joint defendants below, and accordingly argued that, as the railway and electric company was not made a party to the motion therefor, or to the present writ of error, the case should be dismissed. This position is not altogether logical. If that company was, as insisted, an indispensable party to the motion, it would simply follow, as a result of not making it a party, that the telegraph company could not, in its bill of exceptions, justly complain that the trial judge committed error in refusing to grant a new trial which could not lawfully take place, and would have to depend alone upon its assignment of error touching the overruling of its demurrer. That is to say, the mere fact that there might be no merit in one of its complaints would not justify a dismissal of its bill of exceptions, if it presented another question properly raised, which could and should be passed upon. We are, however, by no means prepared to agree with counsel as to the correctness of the premise upon which they based their argument. Although the action brought by Mrs. Griffith was against both companies as joint tort feasors, her right to recover in the case did not depend upon her ability to show that both were liable to respond in damages. She might, before trial, have voluntarily dismissed her action as to one, and Atlanta v. Anderson, 90 Ga. 481, 16 S. E. 209. Or at any time before verdict she might, if unable to prove that both were liable, have disclaimed a right to recover as to one, and insisted upon a verdict against its co-defendant. Baker v. Thompson, 89 Ga. 487, 15 S. E. 644. And a verdict such as was actually rendered, releasing one of the companies, but finding the other liable, could lawfully be returned. Austin v. Appling, 88 Ga. 55, 59, 13 S. E. 955, and cases cited. True, if Mrs. Griffith had wished to file a motion for a new trial with a view to obtaining another hearing as to the liability of the railway and electric company, which was released by the verdict of the jury, it would have been necessary for her to make the telegraph company a party respondent. This is so for the reason pointed out in Hunter v. Wakefield, 97 Ga. 543, 545, 25 S. E. 347, 348, viz.: If, in an action like the case at bar, "brought against several defendants, the plaintiff recovers at all, the damages awarded must be for the same amount as to all of the defendants found liable"; and, therefore, where a verdict has been found "against some only of several joint defendants, and the plaintiff moves for a new trial against those of the defendants as to whom he failed to recover, if his motion is granted at all, the verdict in his favor against those of the defendants who were found liable must necessarily be set aside, for, unless this be done, there might, upon a subsequent trial, be a finding for the plaintiff for a sum totally different from that already found, and thus there would result a recovery in one amount against some of the defendants and a recovery in quite a different amount as against others of them." The plaintiff would, however, have as much right after verdict as he had before or pending the trial to abandon his case as to some of the defendants; and, this being so, it is evident that, if he elected to stand upon his partial victory, there would be no necessity, in the event the defendants found liable desired to move for a new trial, for them to join in their motion such of the defendants as were by the jury absolved from liability, and as against whom the plaintiff, by failing to move for a new trial, had voluntarily chosen not to further press his action. Obviously, where the only logical result of a trial was to release one of several defendants sued as joint tort feasors, a new trial may properly be granted at the instance of those against whom a recovery was had, without disturbing the righteous finding of the jury as to the one whom they discharged. Railroad Co. v. McConnell, 87 Ga. 756, 13 S. E. 828. This fully disposes of the motion to dismiss.

It remains only to briefly notice a point raised by the railway and electric company, which appeared before this court through its attorney, and strenuously resisted being made a party to the case on the ground that it was not a necessary party to the bill of exceptions or the controversy here presented. In this connection counsel confidently made the assertion that his client was not even a proper, much less a necessary, plaintiff in error. We did not at the time, nor do we now, concur in this view. Under the facts disclosed by the record, it is, indeed, manifest that the railway and electric company had itself no right to sue out the writ of error. Collier v. Hyatt (Ga.) 35 S. E. 271; Braswell v. Mortgage Co., Id. 322. But, as the bill of exceptions was filed by a party entitled to except to the rulings therein complained of, it by no means follows that the company just mentioned was not at least a proper party plaintiff. As has been seen, the rule of force prior to the passage of the act of 1881 was that all parties to the record below were not only proper, but necessary, parties to a writ of error. That act, in providing against the dismissal in this court of bills of exceptions for want of necessary parties, went no further than to declare that, in determining who really were indispensable parties thereto, "no party shall be considered as interested in the litigation in the supreme court who will not be affected by the judgment to be rendered in that particular case, such as" mere stakeholders and others, purely nominal parties to the controversy in the court below. It cannot, therefore, be said that any formal party to the record in the trial court is not still to be regarded a proper party to a bill of exceptions, irrespective of the question whether he be an essential party thereto or not. Counsel based his argument upon the proposition that his client had been absolved from liability by the jury, whose finding was binding and conclusive, the same never having been set aside; but the record before us, by which alone we are to be governed, is silent as to whether or not any steps have been taken by Mrs. Griffith to further press her action as against the railway and electric company in the event another trial should result from the judgment rendered by this court in the present case. Accordingly, we undertake merely to say that company was a proper, though perhaps not indispensable, party plaintiff. The order passed, whereby it was introduced as a party, satisfied the demands of the telegraph company, fully met and overcame the motion to dismiss urged by Mrs. Griffith, and inflicted no hardship upon the railway and electric company; for, if it really has no further interest in the litigation, its rights in the premises cannot possibly be injuriously affected by the judgment which we render. This being so, reflection confirms us in the belief that this order was not improvidently granted, but that it provided quite a satisfactory solution of the whole difficulty presented.

2. The case made by the petition filed by Mrs. Griffith was, in brief, as follows: The telegraph company maintains in the city of electric company has likewise erected a similar system of poles and wires used in connection with its business. At some places the wires of the telegraph company, which are strung on poles which are higher than those used by the other company, cross the wires of that company, while at other points the wires connected with the two systems run parallel with each other on the same streets. The wires of the railway and electric company are heavily charged with currents of electricity "sufficiently powerful to do great bodily harm." On or about the 2d day of December, 1896, there was a fall of sleet and snow, and "the wires belonging to and controlled by the said defendants were each and all heavily weighted by said snow and sleet." As a result "thereof, the wires of the said defendants came in contact with each other at sundry points and places in the city of Augusta and in the village of Summerville," and "by reason of such contact the powerful currents in the wires of the Augusta Railway & Electric Company were conducted to and into the wires belonging to and controlled by the Western Union Telegraph Company," of which fact "both of the defendants had knowledge." Because of "said contact, the wires of the Western Union Telegraph Company became dangerous to persons and property touching or being touched by the same, [and] both of said defendants had knowledge of said danger." The wires of the two companies were thus in contact "at and near the intersection of Walton Way and Telfair street in the village of Summerville, and at divers other places in said village and city," and this was known by both companies. On the date above mentioned a rotten and unsound pole belonging to the telegraph company, situated "in the yard of the Bonair Hotel," broke, and fell across a roadway leading to that hotel, carrying with it the wires which had been strung upon it. "Said pole was negligently allowed to remain upon the ground with the wires upon and across said roadway for a long space of time, to wit, 13 days," notwithstanding "the said defendants, and each of them, had notice of the fact that said pole had fallen, and that said wires were across said roadway," and although both "knew that the said wires so as aforesaid upon the ground were dangerous, and likely to produce injury to any person or thing passing along said roadway." On the 15th day of December "petitioner had occasion to visit the Bonair Hotel on business," and was driven thither in a vehicle through the Walton Way entrance to that hotel. Neither she nor the driver knew of the dangerous conditions of the wires across the roadway leading to the Telfair street entrance, and in attempting to return by that route one of the horses drawing the vehicle in which she was riding the vehicle to such an extent that petitioner, who was greatly alarmed, and was trying to alight, either fell or was thrown to the ground. She not only sustained serious injuries by reason of this fall, but also "received a violent burn from the electric current" with which the wires upon the ground were charged. In addition to other items of damage specifically alleged, she was "forced to incur an expense of $—— for medical attention and nursing." One of the defendants in the court below, the telegraph company, met the plaintiff's petition with a general demurrer, and also demurred specially thereto on the ground that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant therein. We now rule specifically, as was practically decided when the case was here at the March term, 1898 (104 Ga. 62, 30 S. E. 420), that the plaintiff set forth in her petition a cause of action, and properly joined therein as joint tort feasors the two corporations through whose alleged negligence she was injured.

By special demurrer the telegraph company called upon Mrs. Griffith to allege with more particularity at what points its wires ran parallel with, and at what points they crossed over, those of the railway and electric company. We have no hesitation in holding that in the respects indicated the petition was even more specific in its allegations than was necessary. There was no averment that either of the defendants was negligent in that it improperly constructed its system of wires and poles, and the sole purpose of the pleader evidently was to bring out the fact, by way of inducement merely, that the two systems were in close proximity one with the other at different points in the city and village. It was, however, the right of the telegraph company to demand, as it did in its special demurrer, that it be put upon notice as to where were the "divers other places in said village and city," besides that at the intersection of Walton Way and Telfair street, at which the plaintiff expected to prove that the company had negligently allowed its wires to remain in contact with those of the railway and electric company. Under the circumstances alleged, it was a distinct and unpardonable act of negligence to permit the dangerous agency to continue at each of the "divers other places" referred to; and under this loose and flexible allegation the plaintiff would be entitled, if not called upon to amend her pleadings in this particular, to introduce evidence concerning a contact at any point within the limits of the city of Augusta or those of the village of Summerville. This was altogether too much latitude, and gave the plaintiff an opportunity to place the telegraph company at a great disadvantage in endeavoring to make out its defense. If the plaintiff really knew, as wires of the two companies were in contact, it would have been easy enough for her to comply with the reasonable demand made upon her to state specifically where such places were. If she did not, as matter of fact, know of or expect to prove a contact at a point other than the intersection of the two streets mentioned by name, she would have amended her petition by striking therefrom all reference to such "divers other places," for she had no right to expect to be allowed to go to trial in the hope of being able to prove by mere chance something which she was unable even to allege with any degree of certainty and particularity. Section 5048 of the Civil Code expressly declares that: "Special defects or omissions in the petition may always be taken advantage of by demurrer, and unless cured by amendment, the petition shall be dismissed." The petition under consideration was not free from "defects and omissions" calling for the prescribed remedy. Indeed, the plaintiff's disregard of the positive requirements of the law as to good pleading is so palpable as to suggest, by way of analogy, a violation of that provision of our piscatory laws now embodied in section 585 of the Penal Code, to the effect that, while a sportsman is at liberty to angle with hook and line, he cannot lawfully go after his intended victims with a drag-net. In a brief filed by her counsel, the case of Kraatz v. Light Co., 82 Mich. 457, 46 N. W. 787, is cited and relied on in support of the contention that "it is not necessary to prove the point of contact; it is impossible to have a tracing or chasing of lightning." There the evidence disclosed that Kraatz received a shock from wires which "should have been, and were supposed to be, at the time" he was working upon an electric lamp, "dead wires, or wires not charged with electricity." The wires connected with a different circuit were then charged with electricity, and there was positive proof that "there were crosses of these dead and live wires observed on the very day of the injury to plaintiff." The only question presented for decision in this connection was whether the jury were warranted in finding that the injury resulted from one of these contacts shown to exist, or was the result of negligence on the part of some employé of the company, or the act of a stranger in turning the current upon the wires of the circuit upon which the plaintiff was engaged at work. The court stated its conclusion to be that the most plausible theory presented by the evidence was that there was a "transfer of electricity from some live wire on" one of the circuits "to some dead wire on" the other circuit "at some of the crosses of these wires," and that the verdict ought to stand, notwithstanding the plaintiff did not prove with mathematical certainty at what precise spot such transfer took place. No tiff's pleadings in this respect. The telegraph company also sought to compel Mrs. Griffith to set forth the manner in which notice was brought home to it that its wires were in contact with those of the other defendant. We think her allegation that both of the defendant companies had knowledge of the facts stated in regard to this matter was amply sufficient in point of detail. An individual would certainly not be entitled to call upon the plaintiff to exhibit to him, in advance of the trial, the particular evidence by which she expected to show such knowledge on his part. A corporation stands upon no better footing; for, theoretically at least, it has an equally good opportunity to know whether it did or did not know facts alleged to have come within its knowledge, and therefore is prepared to meet such an allegation with all the evidence at its command.

3. Two distinct points of objection were raised by the telegraph company to the allegation contained in the plaintiff's petition concerning the expense incurred by her for medical attention and nursing. One of these objections is presented by a speaking demurrer, wherein the company advances the argument that, as it appears "that Mrs. Griffith is a married woman, and it does not appear but what her husband is liv ing," she cannot recover such expenses, as the same should have been borne by him. We will dismiss this point with the suggestion that it should have been raised in the company's answer as matter of defense. Had the demurrer specifically called upon Mrs. Griffith to state whether or not she had a living husband, an altogether different question would be presented. The other objection should have been met by an appropriate amendment, for it was directed against and clearly pointed out the omission of the plaintiff to allege the amount she expended for medical attention and nursing. It is possible that her counsel looked upon this point as too trivial to require serious consideration, and would regard it a great hardship were we to reverse the judgment simply because a proper amendment to cure this defect was not offered. Yet we are by no means prepared to say we would be justified, in view of the section of the Civil Code last above cited, in holding that, were this the only objection to the petition which was well taken, a reversal of the judgment overruling the demurrer would not be demanded. We do not so rule, but take this occasion to emphasize the fact that the salutary rules of practice which require good pleading have not, as yet, been altogether abolished in this state. As furnishing an instance of what anomalous results may sometimes flow from ignoring what appear to be purely technical objections urged against pleadings which are defective in matter of form merely, we refer on to deal ought certainly to have been sustained. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

RACINE IRON CO. et al. v. McCOMMONS, Tax Collector, et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 7, 1900.)

INTERSTATE COMMERCE—LICENSE—TRAVELING AGENTS—INJUNCTION.

1. The "Interstate Commerce Clause" of the constitution of the United States does not operate to prevent a state from imposing, for the purpose of raising revenue, a license tax upon persons who, as traveling agents for principals residing in other states, make executory contracts for the sale of goods, and who, when the same are shipped into this state, receive them in bulk, break the original packages in which they are contained, and distribute them among the customers with whom such contracts had been made.

2. One upon whose property an execution against another, issued by a tax collector, is levied, may, under section 899 of the Political Code, interpose a claim, and consequently has no need of an injunction to prevent the threatened sale.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Greene county; John C. Hart, Judge.

Action by the Racine Iron Company, of Wisconsin, and G. H. Pettigrew, against R. L. McCommons, tax collector, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Jas. Davison and J. S. Reynolds, for plaintiffs in error. Park & Merritt, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. The Racine Iron Company, of Wisconsin, and G. H. Pettigrew, filed an equitable petition to enjoin the tax collector and the sheriff of Greene county from proceeding with an execution against Pettigrew, which had been issued by the collector, and by the sheriff levied on property alleged to be that of the company. The execution purports to have been issued for a "special tax for the year 1898." It does not contain a recital that the tax was due by Pettigrew as a peddler. The petition, however, raised no objection to the execution on this ground, but expressly dealt with it as if it had embraced such a recital. Apparently, the tax sought to be collected was for the year 1899, for the facts disclosed at the hearing, about which, as will presently be seen, there was no dispute, plainly so indicated. The answer of the defendants alleges that the tax in question was for that year, and the petition distinctly avers that the "tax act of the general assembly of Georgia for 1898, so far as it applies to petitioners, or each of them, is repugnant to article 1, § 8, par. 3, of the constitution of the United States, and, as to them, unconstitutional and void." This act is the due to an error in transcribing. At any rate, it is certain that the petition squarely presents the question whether or not the paragraph of our tax act of 1898 which imposes a license tax upon certain classes of peddlers is, so far as it relates to the business carried on by Pettigrew for the iron company, violative of the interstate commerce clause of the federal constitution. Indeed, this is the main and controlling question in the case, and upon it counsel for both sides invoke a decision at our hands. The bill of exceptions alleges error in the refusal of the court to grant an interlocutory injunction upon the following agreed statement of facts: "G. H. Pettigrew sold in Greene county a lot of smoothing irons, taking the notes of the purchasers therefor. The irons sold were the property of the Racine Iron Company, of Wisconsin, and the defendant sold by sample, and subsequently had shipped from its factory in Wisconsin his entire sales, in boxes, 12 in a box, and consigned to G. H. Pettigrew as their local agent, who then delivered them to the purchasers on the sales previously made. No sales were made in Greene county after April, 1899. G. H. Pettigrew both solicited the orders and delivered the goods. G. H. Pettigrew is a resident of Louisiana. Said irons were sold for $7.75 each. Defendants in fi. fa. do not store goods in the state of Georgia, and have no warehouse or place of business in Georgia. R. L. Pettigrew, brother of G. H. Pettigrew, is the general agent of the Racine Iron Company for the South, and is a resident of Tennessee. The fi. fa. by the tax collector for $100 was issued and levied as alleged in the petition for injunction." It will be noted that according to this statement of the facts Pettigrew sold smoothing irons, "taking the notes of the purchasers therefor," and that he "both solicited the orders and delivered the goods." It makes no difference whether he took from his customers promissory notes payable to the company, or written orders upon it, or both. In each instance the contract of sale was executory, and it required a delivery of the article bargained for to complete the sale. The form of the transaction is a matter of no consequence.

1. Our tax act of 1898 imposes for each of the years 1899 and 1900, "upon each peddler of clocks or smoothing irons," a specific occupation tax of "one hundred dollars in each county of the state in which such peddler may do business." Acts 1898, p. 26. A stern sense of duty, not inclination, constrains us to enter upon a discussion of the question whether or not Pettigrew can, by virtue of the above-mentioned clause of the constitution of the United States, escape the payment of the tax imposed upon him by this act, and for which the execution in controversy was issued. In endeavoring to find a solution of this question, we have diligently sought for such aid as could be derived from authoritative utterances of the supreme court of the United States. The result of our researches in this direction will be developed as we progress.

In Woodruff v. Parham, 8 Wall. 123, 19 L. Ed. 382, the doctrine was announced that: "The term 'import,' as used in that clause of the constitution which says that 'no state shall levy any imposts or duties on imports or exports,' does not refer to articles imported from one state into another, but only to articles imported from foreign countries into the United States. Hence a uniform tax imposed by a state on all sales made in it, whether they be made by a citizen of it or a citizen of some other state, and whether the goods sold are the produce of that state enacting the law or of some other state, is valid." To the same effect, see Hinson v. Lott, 8 Wall. 148, 19 L. Ed. 387. "A discriminating tax upon nonresident traders trading in the limits of a state other than that in which they reside cannot, however, lawfully be imposed." Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall. 418, 20 L. Ed. 449. Such a tax was, in Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. Ed. 347, held to be unconstitutional. In Machine Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676, 25 L. Ed. 754, the question was presented whether or not a sewing machine agent, who had been sent by a Connecticut corporation "into Sumner county [Tenn.] to sell machines there," was subject to a license tax imposed by a statute of that state upon "all peddlers of sewing machines and selling by sample." It appeared that while the corporation manufactured its machines at Bridgeport, in the state of its residence, it "had an agency at Nashville," Tenn., from which latter place its agent was sent into the county above mentioned. "The supreme court of Tennessee decided that the law of that state imposing" the tax in question was intended to apply to "all peddlers of sewing machines, without regard to the place of growth or produce of material or of manufacture"; and it was accordingly held by the federal supreme court, upon a review of the judgment of the state court upholding the validity of the statute, "that the law, so construed, [was] not in violation of the constitution of the United States."

Then came the now familiar, though at the time somewhat startling, decision in Robbins v. Taxing Dist., 120 U. S. 489, 7 Sup. Ct. 592, 30 L. Ed. 694. Robbins, a citizen of Ohio, "was engaged at the city of Memphis, in the state of Tennessee, in soliciting the sales of goods for" a Cincinnati firm, "and exhibited samples for the purpose of effecting such sales,—an employment usually denominated as that of a 'drummer.'" He failed to pay a license tax imposed by statute upon persons of his calling, and a criminal prosecution was instituted against him on the charge of doing business without a license, which the statute "made a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not less than five nor more than fifty dollars." His conviction followed as a matter of course, and the same was sustained by the state supreme court upon the ground that the statute in question was not unconstitutional. In reviewing its judgment, Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for a majority of the members of the federal supreme bench, said that the inquiry presented was "whether it is competent for a state to levy a tax or impose any other restriction upon the citizens or inhabitants of other states for selling or seeking to sell their goods in such state before they are introduced therein." He further remarked, in the course of his opinion, that while the conclusion to the contrary reached by a majority of the court might, to some extent, operate to interfere "with the right of the state to tax business pursuits and callings carried on within its limits," yet this interference would be very limited in its operation, and would "only prevent the levy of a tax, or the requirement of a license, for making negotiations in the conduct of interstate commerce." Indeed, all that was decided in that case was that a state has no power to impose an occupation tax upon a commercial drummer, who, in behalf of a nonresident principal, undertakes to do no more than exhibit a line of samples, and solicit orders for goods which are at the time within the jurisdiction of another state. To this extent, and no further, did the court go in Corson v. Maryland, 120 U. S. 502, 7 Sup. Ct. 655, 30 L. Ed. 699 (decided at the same term). On the same line are the cases of Asher v. Texas, 128 U. S. 129, 9 Sup. Ct. 1, 32 L. Ed. 368, and Stoutenburgh v. Hennick, 129 U. S. 141, 9 Sup. Ct. 256, 32 L. Ed. 637. In neither was the doctrine announced in the Robbins Case in any wise extended or applied to a different state of facts.

Next came a similar decision in Brennan v. City of Titusville, 153 U. S. 289, 14 Sup. Ct. 829, 38 L. Ed. 719. Brennan, at the time the restraining hand of the law was placed upon him, was engaged in a "house to house" canvass in pursuit of customers for pictures and picture frames. He merely exhibited his samples and solicited orders. Such orders as were procured he immediately forwarded to a nonresident principal, who shipped the goods "to the purchasers" direct "by railroad freight and express." In some instances Brennan did collect "the price of said goods," but, so far as appears, he did not undertake to himself make delivery of any of the articles for which he received orders. Commenting upon this feature of the case, Mr. Justice Gray, in Emert v. Missouri, 156 U. S. 296, 15 Sup. Ct. 367, 39 L. Ed. 430, said (pages 319, 320, 156 U. S., page 374, 15 Sup. Ct., and page 437, 39 L. Ed.): "In Brennan's owner in the other state directly to the purchasers." An exhaustive and painstaking review of all previous decisions having any direct bearing upon the case then in hand was entered upon by the learned justice, and the conclusion was announced that it was distinguishable from every one of its predecessors, save only the case of Machine Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 676, 25 L. Ed. 754, which was "approved and followed." The importance of getting a firm and intelligent grasp upon the facts on which the decision in Emert's Case was rested is, therefore, apparent, especially in view of the fact that, so far as we have been able to ascertain, it presents the latest enunciation on the subject which the federal supreme court has vouchsafed. It is a circumstance also worthy of comment that this decision was rendered without a dissent on the part of any of the justices. The precise ruling made was as follows: "A statute of a state by which peddlers of goods, going from place to place within the state to sell them, are required, under a penalty, to take out and pay for licenses, and which makes no discrimination between residents or products of the state and those of other states, is not, as to peddlers of goods previously sent to them by manufacturers in other states, repugnant to the grant by the constitution to congress of the power to regulate commerce among the several states." In conformity to what seems to have become quite a common custom in this class of cases, Emert went to trial upon an agreed statement of facts. We gather therefrom that while, possibly, he started out innocently enough as a mere soliciting agent, carrying with him on his travels a sewing machine belonging to a nonresident principal, with the intention of doing no more with it than exhibiting it as a sample, he eventually forsook his original calling for that of an itinerant vender, who not only solicits trade, but actually sells. At all events, it was admitted that upon a specified day "he offered for sale, to various persons at different places," a sewing machine which he carried along with him in a wagon, and that he did on the same day "find a purchaser for said machine and did sell and deliver the same to" him. In dealing with the facts thus presented, Mr. Justice Gray, speaking in behalf of all the members of the court, said (page 311, 156 U. S., page 370, 15 Sup. Ct., and page 434, 39 L. Ed.): "The defendant's occupation was offering for sale and selling sewing machines, by going from place to place in the state of Missouri, in a wagon, without a license. There is nothing in the case to show that he ever offered for sale any machine that he did not have with him at the time. His dealings were neither accompanied nor followed by any transfer of were they in any way directly connected with such commerce. The only business or commerce in which he was engaged was internal and domestic; and, so far as appears, the only goods in which he was dealing had become part of the mass of property within the state. Both the occupation and the goods, therefore, were subject to the taxing power and to the police power of the state." It was pointed out, in this immediate connection, that "the statute in question [was] not part of the revenue law," but was one looking solely to regulation, and designed, apparently, "to protect the citizens of the state against the cheats and frauds, or even thefts, which, as the experience of ages has shown, are likely to attend itinerant and irresponsible peddling from place to place, and from door to door." That is to say, the statute was one passed by virtue of the police power residing in the state, and not in the exercise of its rights by taxation to raise revenue for its support.

This brings us to a consideration of the question whether or not there are in the case now before us any distinguishing features which can properly be said to differentiate it from that last cited. The two cases are not, upon their facts, identical. Pettigrew, the agent whose anomalous vocation is the cause of our present distress, first solicited orders for goods which at the time were in the hands of his nonresident principal. Then such orders as were in this manner procured were duly forwarded to be filled by the latter. Not a single order was, however, filled separately, but goods sufficient in quantity to fill the orders of a number of customers were shipped in bulk, consigned to Pettigrew himself; and on receipt of each shipment he broke the original packages in which the goods were sent, and proceeded to distribute the contents among such customers as were entitled thereto. From either a legal or a moral standpoint, it would, therefore, seem that Pettigrew belonged to a class of itinerants requiring as much police supervision as that of which Emert was a member. And, if this be true, why would it not inevitably follow that the reasons assigned by Mr. Justice Gray for upholding the police regulation which Emert called into question could very fairly be said to apply equally as well to Pettigrew and his calling, if the statute now under consideration was one designed to protect the citizens of this state against fraud and imposition? As such is not the nature of this statute, we will not indulge in further conjecture on the line just suggested, but will discuss the question actually before us, which is: Can the statute be upheld, as against Pettigrew and his principal, upon the ground that this state has not, in thus undertaking to exercise its inherent power of taxation, invaded the sacred precincts guarded by the interstate commerce clause of the federal constitution? The purpose of the general tax act for 1899–1900 was not simply to impose taxes, but to actually raise revenue for the support of the state government; and, looking to that end, penalties were prescribed for nonpayment of the license taxes therein laid, regardless of the citizenship of the persons thereby affected. In support of the proposition that this was "an exercise, not of the police power, but of of the taxing power," of the state, we need only cite Brennan v. City of Titusville, 153 U. S. 289, 14 Sup. Ct. 829, 38 L. Ed. 719. Giving to the doctrine which was first announced in the Robbins Case the widest possible scope which can legitimately be claimed for it, we fail to see how it controls the case in hand. On principle it is certainly true that a citizen of one state, who is engaged in interstate commercial dealings, can lawfully accomplish through the means of an agent neither more nor less than he himself would have a right to do in person. It is now well settled that no tax can be laid upon the exercise by a manufacturer of his privilege of visiting a state other than that of his residence with a view to creating a demand for his goods by exhibiting a sample thereof, and securing orders therefor; i. e. seeking a market for his goods, and taking advantage of it, when found, by entering into purely executory contracts of bargain and sale to be performed in the state of his residence by making actual delivery there to a common carrier authorized to receive them in behalf of the persons who agree to buy. But what if he enters into a contract whereby he binds himself to make delivery to a customer in person within the state of the latter's residence? What if the parties expressly agree that the sale itself, as distinguished from the mere executory contract made in contemplation thereof, shall be of a wholly internal and domestic nature, having no interstate commerce feature about it? A customer has, of course, a constitutional right not only to agree to buy, but through his carrier agent to actually buy, goods the situs of which is to continue at the home of the manufacturer until the sale is consummated there; and upon the exercise by the customer of this privilege no restriction could be lawfully imposed by the state in which he resided. Scott v. Donald, 165 U. S. 58, 17 Sup. Ct. 265, 41 L. Ed. 632; Vance v. W. A. Vandercook Co., 170 U. S. 438, 10 Sup. Ct. 774, 42 L. Ed. 1100. Suppose, however, the customer does not choose to exercise this right, but, on the contrary, declines to even agree to purchase save upon the express stipulation that the goods shall be brought into the state by the manufacturer, and then, and not until then, really sold. In that event, the customer would be in no wise concerned as to the methods employed by the manufacturer in order to meet his obligation to thus effect a change in the situs of the goods before calling upon the former to actually purchase the same; and if the manufacturer, as a matter of personal convenience to himself, should enter into an independent contract of carriage with a common carrier, whereby it acted as his agent in bringing the goods to the point agreed on as that where the sale should take place, this surely could not have the effect of introducing an interstate commerce feature into the transaction. In Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 623, 5 Sup. Ct. 1091, 29 L. Ed. 257, it was held that: "Coal mined in Pennsylvania, and sent by water to New Orleans, to be sold in open market there on account of the owners in Pennsylvania, becomes intermingled, on arrival there, with the general property in the state of Louisiana, and is subject to taxation under general laws of that state, although it may be, after arrival, sold from the vessel on which the transportation was made, and without being landed, and for the purpose of being taken out of the country on a vessel bound to a foreign port." This decision was based upon the doctrine announced in Woodruff v. Parham, supra, to the effect that goods shipped from one state into another for the purpose of sale become immediately subject to taxation by the latter state, notwithstanding they belong to a nonresident importer engaged in interstate commerce. See, also, in this connection, Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 6 Sup. Ct. 475, 29 L. Ed. 715. The theory upon which it is held that an occupation tax sometimes operates as an unwarranted interference with interstate commerce when laid upon a nonresident merchant or manufacturer is that "a license tax required for the sale of goods is, in effect, a tax upon the goods themselves." Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. Ed. 347. Or, as was said in Machine Co. v. Gage, 100 U. S. 678, 25 L. Ed. 754, "a tax for a license to sell goods is, in effect, a tax on the goods authorized to be sold." When applied to a commercial drummer, who merely "sells goods by sample," the goods being at the time in the hands of a nonresident principal, there is much force in the argument that, as the state in which the drummer solicits orders has no jurisdiction over the goods themselves, and cannot impose any direct tax upon them before they are shipped within its borders, the state has no power to lay an indirect tax upon them by resorting to the expedient of requiring the drummer to pay a license fee for the privilege of pursuing a calling which is a legitimate, and oftentimes necessary, incident to commercial dealings between residents of different states. But the argument necessarily loses its force when, as in the present case, the goods, before delivery to the customer, are shipped into the state with a view to consummating the executory contract of sale. We see no reason why, as soon as the shipment is complete, and the goods turned over to an agent of the shipper, they may not be immediately subjected to a direct tax, irrespective of the fact that a resident customer had previously been found who was willing a direct tax could be laid on the goods while yet in the possession of the shipper or his agent, the state could, by imposing a tax upon the privilege of consummating the sale of the goods, reach them indirectly. The following extract, taken from the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Field in Welton's Case, seems to bear us out in the conclusion just stated: "The general power of the state to impose taxes in the way of licenses upon all pursuits and occupations within its limits is admitted, but, like all other powers, must be exercised in subordination to the requirements of the federal constitution. Where the business or occupation consists in the sale of goods, the license tax required for its pursuit is, in effect, a tax upon the goods themselves. If such a tax be within the power of the state to levy, it matters not whether it be raised directly from the goods, or indirectly from them through the license to the dealer, but, if such tax conflict with any power vested in congress by the constitution of the United States, it will not be any the less invalid because enforced through the form of a personal license." It is true that in Bowman v. Railway Co., 125 U. S. 465, 8 Sup. Ct. 689, 1062, 31 L. Ed. 700, the reviewing court took occasion to present the quære "whether the right of transportation of an article of commerce from one state to another includes by necessary implication the right of the consignee to sell it in unbroken packages at the place where the transportation terminates." But this doubt was suggested with reference to the right of a state, in the exercise of its police powers, to forbid common carriers from bringing "intoxicating liquors into the state from any other state" without first complying with certain prescribed regulations. We are also aware that it was subsequently held, in Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 10 Sup. Ct. 681, 34 L. Ed. 128, that "a statute of a state prohibiting the sale of any intoxicating liquors, except" for medicinal and other like purposes, was, "as applied to a sale by the importer, and in the original packages or kegs, unbroken and unopened, of such liquors manufactured in and brought from another state, unconstitutional and void." However, this decision was put upon the ground that, in undertaking to entirely prohibit such sales, the state exceeded its police powers, and encroached upon the exclusive right vested in congress to regulate interstate commerce. That congress may itself impose restrictions upon, or entirely prohibit, interstate traffic in injurious commodities, was recognized in Rahrer's Case, 140 U. S. 540, 11 Sup. Ct. 865, 35 L. Ed. 572. The decision in Plumley v. Massachusetts, 155 U. S. 461, 15 Sup. Ct. 154, 39 L. Ed. 223, is authority for the proposition that a state has the power to prohibit the sale "of oleomargarine artificially colored so as to cause it to look like yellow butter," ufactured in and brought from a sister state. But when, in Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania, 171 U. S. 1, 18 Sup. Ct. 757, 43 L. Ed. 49, the question arose whether oleomargarine could "be wholly excluded from importation into a state from another state where it was manufactured" upon the idea that it was an injurious commodity, the court reiterated its ruling made in Leisy v. Hardin, cited above, and held that an importer had a right to sell this commodity in original packages, whether the same were "suitable for retail trade or not," and irrespective of the question whether a consumer or a wholesale dealer became the purchaser.

In referring to these several adjudications concerning the limits within which a state may properly exercise its police powers we are not, as we have already indicated, to be understood as entertaining the opinion that any one of them has any bearing whatever upon the case at bar. As matter of fact, we think directly to the contrary; and, as evidencing the correctness of our conclusion that the supreme court of the United States has never departed from the doctrine that the taxing power of a state is coextensive with its jurisdiction over property of a nonresident brought within its borders, we confidently cite Transit Co. v. Hall, 174 U. S. 70, 18 Sup. Ct. 599, 43 L. Ed. 899, wherein it was held that a state could lawfully impose a revenue tax upon transient railway cars, notwithstanding "the fact that such cars were employed as vehicles of transportation in the interchange of interstate commerce," and paid only casual visits to the state in the course of extended peregrinations covering this entire country. Our real purpose in calling attention to what that court has said in regard to the right of an importer to sell his goods in the original packages in which they were shipped is (1) to point out that he is not exempt from taxation upon such goods, and (2) to present the argument that, even were this otherwise, Pettigrew could rightly claim no immunity from taxation, for the reason that he did not attempt to dispose of goods in the original packages in which they were shipped to him, but in every instance broke such packages, and peddled the contents thereof among his customers. We use the term "peddled" advisedly. From a purely legal standpoint, at least, he was a peddler; for, in view of the definition which our Code gives to one of his vocation, it can matter little whether an itinerant trader carries along with him a "pack, and makes immediate delivery of his wares to customers," or merely "sells by sample," and waits a day, a week, or longer, before freighting himself with goods, and undertaking to fill the orders he had previously procured by his house to house canvass. In this connection, see Range Co. v. Johnson, 84 Ga. 758, ject herein dealt with has been under discussion do we find anything which militates against the views we have above expressed. We will therefore present but a brief review of them. In the case just cited a foreign corporation and its traveling agent, Lee, joined in an equitable petition to enjoin the enforcement against them of certain executions levied upon their property. The controlling question presented was whether or not Lee was liable for the payment of a license tax imposed upon peddlers. He did no more than exhibit a sample and take orders for goods, and accordingly, in deference to previous rulings announced by the federal judiciary which were authoritative, this court held that Lee's calling was exempt from a license tax. It is perhaps inferable from the facts appearing in that case that, after he forwarded to the company at St. Louis such orders as he procured, it there filled the same, and then shipped the goods to other agents in Georgia for delivery to the purchasers, the goods sometimes being stored in warehouses located in this state until such delivery could be made. But no question was raised as to the right of these agents to thus make delivery, nor could Lee's right to pursue his inoffensive "interstate commerce" calling without paying a license fee be in any wise affected by what they did or failed to do. For aught that was disclosed, they complied with the law as to taking out licenses. If not, the executions should have been directed against them, not against Lee or the company itself, it not being a "peddler," within the meaning of the statute under consideration. Had Lee been criminally prosecuted on the charge of confederating with other agents of the company with a view to evading the laws of this state and enabling them to carry on the business in which they were engaged without paying a license tax, it may be taken for granted that this court would not have confined itself to the inquiry whether or not his vocation was one upon which a license tax could lawfully be imposed. See Duncan v. State, 105 Ga. 457, 30 S. E. 755. What has just been said also applies to McClelland's Case, 96 Ga. 749, 22 S. E. 329. It there appeared that it was sometimes the practice of the company which he represented, when it had several purchasers at one point, to send the goods to one customer, and notify "the others to call on that one for them, allowing him fifteen cents per package for delivery." McClelland was a traveling salesman, and did not himself attempt to deliver the goods for which he solicited orders. He was prosecuted on the charge of failing to take out a license, and therefore the only question presented was whether or not he should have done so. In the case of Manufacturing Co. v. Wright, 97 Ga. 114, 25 S. E. 249, 35 L. R. A. 497, it was held that: "A specific ticular business is not violative of paragraph 3, § 8, art. 1, of the constitution of the United States, as being an interference on the part of the state with commerce between the several states, where the property employed in such business has been brought into this state, and has itself become subject to taxation therein." In support of this ruling the writer ventured to suggest (pages 122, 123, 97 Ga., page 252, 25 S. E., and page 501, 35 L. R. A.) that, as the property itself was within the state's jurisdiction, and subject to a direct tax, "upon principle the business of selling it [was] alike taxable in that jurisdiction." It appeared in the case of Walton v. City Council, 104 Ga. 757, 30 S. E. 964, that the plaintiffs were "persons engaged on their own account in a 'commercial street brokerage business,' in the course of which they [took] orders for goods to be filled by nonresident dealers," who were regular "correspondents," and with whom the plaintiffs had large commercial dealings; and, upon the authority of Ficklen v. Taxing Dist., 145 U. S. 1, 12 Sup. Ct. 810, 36 L. Ed. 601, we held that they were not exempt from a municipal tax imposed upon the class of brokers to which they belonged. In Price Co. v. City of Atlanta, 105 Ga. 358, 31 S. E. 619, there was "evidence fairly warranting a finding that goods manufactured in another state were shipped in large quantities to a warehouse located in this state, and at that point divided and distributed among a number of customers, who, after such shipment, had purchased different articles of these goods from a person going from house to house in a given city in this state, exhibiting samples and taking orders, which were then filled from such warehouse or distributing point." It was accordingly held that "the sales so made did not in any sense constitute interstate commerce, and the person so selling became liable to a license tax as a canvasser." Precisely the same doctrine was also applied in Duncan's Case, 105 Ga. 457, 30 S. E. 755, and it was further ruled that: "When one person travels through the country as an itinerant, exhibiting samples of goods and taking orders for goods of like character, and another follows in his wake, delivering the goods thus sold, both should be regarded as peddlers when it appears that the business was thus conducted in pursuance of a scheme to evade the law of this state requiring peddlers to register and pay taxes." The question herein dealt with was incidentally involved in Chrystal v. Mayor, etc., 108 Ga. 27, 33 S. E. 810, but, as it was not necessary in that case to pass upon this precise point, no ruling thereon was made. There it appeared that the Chicago Portrait Company was conducting in this state, through agents, its business of taking orders for portraits and selling picture frames.

of the portraits ordered, delivered the same to customers and made collections. To each customer was given the privilege of "selecting and purchasing from" the company's agents in this state "a suitable frame for every portrait from a stock of frames shipped to Georgia for this purpose," but no customer obligated himself to purchase a frame, or was called upon to do so, until delivery of the portrait ordered by him was made. We therefore held that, in so far as the "sale of the frames" was concerned, this was "a Georgia business, pure and simple," with "no interstate feature." On the argument here counsel for the plaintiffs in error relied mainly on the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana in the case of McClellan v. Pettigrew, 44 La. Ann. 356, 10 South. 853, the facts of which were somewhat similar to those of the case at bar, wherein that court held that where goods belonging to a nonresident are not within the state at the time his agent solicits orders therefor, and are subsequently shipped direct to such agent merely for the purpose of filling the orders procured by him, "it is immaterial whether the sale is perfected by delivery" in that state. We cannot, however, regard this decision as even persuasive authority, for it was based wholly on what we conceive to be an entire misconception of the rulings of the supreme court of the United States in Machine Co. v. Gage and Robbins v. Taxing Dist., supra, and no argument whatever was advanced to show that it is sound upon principle. We do not think it is. On the contrary, it appears very plain to us that, when a traveling salesman so far departs from the vocation ordinarily pursued by a commercial traveler as to actually vend the goods for which he solicits orders, he ceases to be a mere "drummer" in the sense in which that term is used by Mr. Justice Bradley in Robbins' Case. We so hold upon principle, for not until further light on the subject is shed by the federal supreme court can we hope to better reflect its views than by assuming, as we do, that its decisions were intended to be construed with reference to the controlling facts upon which the same were based.

2. The ruling announced in the preceding division of this opinion disposes of the case in so far as Pettigrew, "the uncommercial traveler" of the Racine Iron Company, is concerned. Of course, property belonging to that company is not subject to levy and sale under an execution issued against its agent, it not being itself liable for the payment of his license tax. Range Co. v. Johnson, 84 Ga. 754, 11 S. E. 233, 8 L. R. A. 273; Bohannon v. Range Co. (Ga.) 36 S. E. 907. But it by no means follows that there was any occasion for granting the extraordinary equitable relief which the company failure to comply with the laws of this state. Assuming that the property levied on really belongs, not to him, but to his principal, it should have interposed a claim. Having, under section 899 of the Political Code, a clear statutory right to do so, it had no need whatever for an injunction. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

CARMICHAEL v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 7, 1900.)

CRIMINAL LAW—REVIEW—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

1. The supreme court will not pass upon assignments of error requiring a consideration of evidence, when what purports to be a brief thereof is in no sense a brief, but a full report of the examination of witnesses, embracing to a substantial extent palpably needless and irrelevant matter.

2. Newly-discovered evidence, the only effect of which, if believed, would be to show that a witness sworn at the trial afterwards made statements conflicting with his testimony, affords no cause for reversing a judgment denying a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Carroll county; S. W. Harris, Judge.

Walter Carmichael was convicted of burglary, and brings error. Affirmed.

Felix N. Cobb, E. B. Merrell, and J. L. Cobb, for plaintiff in error. T. A. Atkinson, Sol. Gen., for the State.

LUMPKIN, P. J. The plaintiff in error was in the superior court of Carroll county convicted of burglary, and excepted to a judgment overruling a motion for a new trial. The motion contains the general grounds, and also a ground based on newly-discovered evidence.

1. The document purporting to be a brief of the evidence consists of a full stenographic report of the examination of the witness introduced at the trial. It is in dialogue form, and sets forth much irrelevant matter. Even a casual inspection of it shows that there was no attempt whatever to condense or brief the testimony as the law requires. This court will not, therefore, undertake to pass upon the assignments contained in the motion that the verdict is contrary to evidence and is decidedly and strongly against the weight of the evidence. Mining Co. v. Brown, 107 Ga. 264, 33 S. E. 73; Price v. High, 108 Ga. 145, 33 S. E. 956, and cases cited.

2. The newly-discovered evidence merely tended to show that a witness sworn at the trial in behalf of the state afterwards made statements conflicting with his sworn testimony. Consequently the ground of the motion relating to this matter is, under repeated rulings of this court, without merit here. Judgment affirmed.

SAME v. ATLANTA RAPID-TRANSIT CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 7, 1900.)

STREET RAILROADS—CROSSING OTHER ROADS —ADDITIONAL SERVITUDE—CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS.

1. Even if the provisions of Civ. Code, § 2219, are applicable to the crossing by a street railroad of any other railroad, the phrase, "heretofore or hereafter chartered by the legislature of this state," embraces a street-railroad company whose charter, though granted by the secretary of state, has been confirmed and made valid by an act of the general assembly. A company having such a charter may properly be termed one "chartered by the legislature."

2. No new burden or servitude is imposed upon a public street or highway by constructing and operating therein a street railway for the transportation of passengers, the cars of which are propelled by electric power.

3. That a street-railway company has, under its charter, authority to use steam as well as electricity as a motive power, is a matter of no consequence in testing its right in a given instance to cross a railway on a street under a municipal grant restricting the company to the use of electric power, and where it is not seeking to employ steam power.

4. A railroad corporation which is permitted to construct its tracks across an existing city street or public road does so subject to the condition that it must submit to the increased inconvenience to it which may result from the growth and development of the city or country, and the consequent increase of travel in the usual methods along such street or road.

5. A company owning and operating a street railway of the character above indicated may, under the permission of the proper municipal or county authorities, construct its lines across the track of a steam-railroad company, and use the same, without instituting condemnation proceedings, or being required to pay damages.

Error from superior court, Fulton county; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Actions by the Southern Railway Company against the Atlanta Railway & Power Company and the Atlanta Rapid-Transit Company. From judgments dissolving the injunction, plaintiff in both cases brings error. Affirmed.

Dorsey, Brewster & Howell and H. A. Alexander, for plaintiff in error. Goodwin & Hallman, John L. Hopkins & Sons, Rosser & Carter, King & Spalding, and Brandon & Arkwright, for defendants in error.

LEWIS, J. The Southern Railway Company brought suit in the superior court of Fulton county against the Atlanta Railway & Power Company and the Atlanta Rapid-Transit Company, corporations owning and operating lines of street railway in Fulton county, and in the city of Atlanta. The petion, in substance, alleged that plaintiff was in possession of, owned, and operated two lines of railroad, among others, leading from the city of Atlanta in a southeasterly direction, one running to the town of Ft. Valley, in said state, and the other to the city of Brunswick, Ga., and each ran through Fulton county, and crossed what is known as the Fulton. In the transaction of its business it was obliged to run and does run across said McDonough public road upon the lines of its railway a great many passenger and freight trains every day, and this renders Henderson's crossing an exceedingly dangerous and hazardous one. It alleges that the Atlanta Railway & Power Company, owning and operating a system of street railways in the city of Atlanta and Fulton county, was preparing and intending to lay its tracks across the line of plaintiff's railroad at Henderson's crossing on the McDonough road; that it had prepared everything for this purpose, and it would be accomplished unless enjoined from so doing. To permit this, it was charged, would render the use of the public crossing a constant menace of danger to the traveling public, and would at the same time do petitioner an irreparable injury in retarding the work and business in which it was engaged; would cause irreparable and perpetual damage to petitioner, resulting in delay to its business, and in accidents to both persons and property while crossing at said point. It was charged that the Atlanta Railway & Power Company was operating its street railway and proposing to cross plaintiff's track by virtue of a certificate of the secretary of state issued on May 16, 1891, which certificate was affirmed by the legislature on August 31, 1891, and denies the power and authority of the defendant, under its charter and under the law by which it is operating, to cross the track at a grade level without its consent; that the purpose to cross the track would be consummated unless it is restrained by the court; and plaintiff prayed for an injunction restraining defendant from in any manner laying its track across the lines of railroad of petitioner at Henderson's crossing, in the county of Fulton. Upon this petition a temporary restraining order was granted by the court. An amendment was added to the petition to the effect that the Atlanta Railway & Power Company was chartered by the secretary of state, and not by the legislature, and that the general law of the state regulating the crossing by one railroad of the track of another, as embodied in Civ. Code, § 2219, restricts the right of crossing the track of another railroad to those railroad companies which are chartered by the legislature, and that, therefore, defendant is forbidden by law from crossing the track of petitioner. The right of plaintiff to cross McDonough road constitutes an easement of inestimable value vested in petitioner, and that, as the owner of such easement, it has a right to operate its road on said crossing, free from any hindrance or molestation whatever, save such as is incident to the ordinary use of said road by the public. The petitioner then specifies the damages which would result to plaintiff by increased delay of its business, wear and tear of its machinery, the facts set up therein as to Henderson's crossing being dangerous and hazardous, as alleged. So far as any danger is concerned, it is caused by plaintiff's trains and traffic crossing over a public highway which existed 35 or 40 years prior to the building of its railroad. Defendant claims a right to cross the track under and by virtue of the provisions of its charter, granted in the first instance by the secretary of state on May 16, 1891, in compliance with the general law for the incorporation of railroads, approved September 27, 1881, and subsequently confirmed by chapter 343, Laws Ga. 1890–91, p. 169, approved August 31, 1891. It denies paragraph 8 of the petition, and says the language quoted in that paragraph from the act therein referred to was not in force on May 16, 1891, when it was first incorporated, nor on August 31, 1891, when its charter was confirmed by the general assembly of Georgia. It denied that its crossing plaintiff's road will have the effect of adding to the dangerous condition of the crossing; alleges it will only have the effect of diverting the travel on said highway from private vehicles and persons traveling on foot and horseback to and upon its cars, and, as a matter of fact, the result will be to largely minimize the chances for accidents; and that the building of its street railway on said public road will not create any additional burden upon said railway, and none upon said public road. It has a legal right to cross plaintiff's tracks with its street railway at grade level along and upon said McDonough road at Henderson's crossing. Defendant prays that plaintiff be enjoined and restrained from interfering with it in the construction of its railway on said public road at Henderson's crossing, and that the temporary restraining order granted against the defendant be dissolved. The answer, as amended, also denies the material charges in the amended petition of the plaintiff. A like petition was filed by the Southern Railway Company against the Atlanta Rapid-Transit Company to enjoin it from crossing its road on a street in the city of Atlanta. It appears that this road procured a franchise from the city of Atlanta to construct and operate its line along Decatur street and across the tracks of plaintiff to the city limits. Both these street railways procured like franchises from proper authorities to operate their railroads in Atlanta, and beyond the limits of the city of Atlanta to the city of Decatur. It was conceded that the issues in these two cases were practically the same; the only difference being that the Atlanta Rapid-Transit Company also had in its charter the power to use steam, but the city conferred upon it only the power to use electricity, and it did not propose to use any other motive power in the operation of its road. After hearing the evidence for plaintiff and defendants, the court denied the injunction grounds of error alleged are as follows: (1) Under the constitution and laws of Georgia private property cannot be taken or damaged unless just compensation has been first paid; and the right of petitioner to cross Henderson's crossing was a valuable property right subsisting in it, and was embraced within the term "property" as used in the constitution; and the construction of the street-railroad tracks across the tracks of petitioner was a taking and damaging of petitioner's said property right. (2) Although it was thus preparing and threatening to take and damage petitioner's property, it had neither paid nor offered to pay, nor had it taken any steps to ascertain, the damages that petitioner would suffer by such crossing of its tracks. (3) The acts of the defendant of building its tracks across the tracks of petitioner without first paying just compensation for damages inflicted was an unlawful trespass upon petitioner's rights, and without authority of law. (4) For the acts complained of petitioner was remediless at law, and could receive adequate relief only in a court of equity. (5) The evidence and pleadings show that the defendant, the Atlanta Railway & Power Company, had been incorporated by act of the secretary of state, and under the law of Georgia only those railroad companies which were chartered by the legislature have the right to cross the tracks of another railroad company at grade. The same questions were raised in the case against the transit company, except the one last mentioned; and as to this company the point as to its charter power to use steam was insisted upon.

1. One point made by the petition in this case against the Atlanta Railway & Power Company is that this company, in the light of the history of its charter, has never been incorporated by the legislature of this state, but was incorporated by certificate from the secretary of state, and that, therefore, under Civ. Code, § 2219, as the privilege of one railroad company crossing another is only given to such companies as are chartered by the legislature of this state, this defendant company has no right at all to cross plaintiff's road. We do not think, however, that a street railroad constructed on a public highway, with consent of the proper authorities having jurisdiction over such highways, needs any benefit from the provisions of section 2219. Being a public highway, it has, independently of that section, a right to cross the tracks of a railroad crossing the public road, just as any other vehicle or mode of transportation on such public road might cross the same, provided it duly obtains a license from the proper authority in charge of the street or road it proposes to use. But, even if the provisions of section 2219 are applicable to the crossing by a street railway of any other railroad, we are quite confident that the phrase, "heretofore or hereafter chartered by the legislature of this state," embraces a street-railroad company whose charter, though granted by the secretary of state, has been confirmed or made valid by an act of the general assembly. While this defendant company originally obtained its charter from the secretary of state, the same has since been confirmed by an act of the legislature of August 31, 1891 (Acts 1890–91, p. 169). It is therein declared: "That all charters heretofore granted by the secretary of state to street and suburban railroad companies are hereby confirmed and declared to have had full effect from their dates." See Almand v. Railway Co., 108 Ga. 423, 34 S. E. 6 et seq., where the charter powers of this defendant company were thoroughly discussed by this court, and where the act of August 31, 1891, above cited, was recognized by the court as confirming by direct act of the legislature all charters theretofore granted by the secretary of state.

2. The main contention in behalf of plaintiff in error in these cases is that the defendants have no right to cross its track even on these public highways without first making compensation for the damages which would result therefrom. It is obliged to be conceded that no such damages can be claimed unless the acts of the defendants complained of would amount to an invasion of some property right of the plaintiff resulting in its injury and damage. It appears from the record that many years before plaintiff's line of railway was constructed over the highways in question they had been in use for travel by the public. The only right the railway company acquired was necessarily simply an easement to cross these highways with its lines of railway, and to transport across the same its freight and passengers. It acquired no fee-simple title whatever to any portion of the road, but necessarily received its easement subject to the right of the public to continue to freely use the highway for travel. This, of course, does not imply that the government authorities having control of these highways cannot, as the public exigencies and convenience may require,—for instance, by an increase of population in cities or towns,—add to the facilities for travel over such roads. These authorities would have as must right to grant licenses and privileges to others to use vehicles and conveyances propelled by different kinds of power for the purpose of accommodating the public, and for the public benefit, as the plaintiff company would have to increase the number of cars and engines on its line of railway, and the frequency of trips across these highways, whenever this would be demanded by the increase in its business. If, for instance, in this case, it should happen that the present business of the plaintiff company requires twice as many cars and engines now as it did soon after its first construction, can it be pretended that either the county or the municipal authorities would have a right to exact of it any pay for such further privileges before they could be exercised? Now, if these electric car companies impose no new burden or servitude upon the public streets or highways by constructing and operating thereon street railways for the transportation of passengers, the cars of which are propelled by electric power, it will necessarily follow that passing over a railway track crossing a public highway does not make them liable for any damages. As to whether or not a company engaged in the operation of electric cars upon the streets of a city or the public roads of a country would thereby impose a new servitude upon such roads, and would, therefore, be liable to damages which others might sustain in consequence thereof, seems to be an open question in this court. In the case of Floyd Co. v. Rome St. R. Co., 77 Ga. 614, 3 S. E. 3, it was decided that a railroad operated by horses on a public highway is not an appropriation of that highway to a different use. It will be seen from the facts in that case that the county of Floyd had constructed a bridge which spans a river at the foot of Howard street, in Rome, Ga., and placed it under the control and management of the authorities of the city of Rome. The Rome Street-Railroad Company was empowered by its charter to lay out, construct, equip, use, and employ street railroads in the city of Rome and Floyd county, and was given power to cross the bridge in question. That bridge was afterwards washed away. The county constructed a new one, and then sought to enjoin the street-railroad company from running its track over the bridge without paying compensation therefor. The injunction applied for was refused, which was affirmed by this court. On page 618, 77 Ga., and page 4, 3 S. E., Hall, J., delivering the opinion, said: "The laying of railroad tracks in a public highway or street does not subject it to a new use or servitude. Its use is not confined to the precise mode or kind of use which was in view at the time of the taking, but may extend to other modes which were then unpracticed and unknown." It was further announced: "A railroad operated by horses on a public highway is not an appropriation of that highway to a different use;" and it was recognized that in some states the decisions go so far as to hold that the appropriation of a highway to the use of a railroad propelled by steam would not change the use to which it was originally dedicated, while in others the contrary was held as to steam railroads. It is true this decision had reference to street railroads operated only by horse power; but we cannot conceive how, if the cars are operated by electric power, they can produce any more burden or servitude than those operated by horse power. The latter certainly, with the horse and car com-the facilities for stopping and avoiding accidents are certainly not any greater than they would be when electric power is used. This question, however, has been passed upon by courts of last resort in other states, and we have failed to find a single case where it has ever been held that a street-car company, it matters not by what power its cars are propelled, did not have a right, after receiving a grant from proper municipal or government authorities, to use streets, and to pass over the lines of other railways that may cross such streets, without being liable in damages to such other railway companies. There is, however, abundant authority to sustain the contrary view. In Chicago & C. Terminal Ry. Co. v. Whiting, H. & E. C. St. Ry. Co., 139 Ind. 297, 38 N. E. 604, 26 L. R. A. 337, it was held: "Since it is the settled law of this state that a street railway is not an additional burden to that of the easement which the general public has in the street, and that the street-railway company's right to use the street is founded on that easement, it must be held that the right of a street railway to cross over the tracks of a steam railway laid on such street is subject to no conditions other than those to which the general public is subject in traveling over such streets. Hence it is not error to enjoin a steam-railway company from interfering with a street-railway company where the latter is proceeding to construct a proper crossing at its own expense." In that case it appeared that the steam-railway company sought to interfere with a street-railway company, which was operated by electricity, and to prevent it from proceeding to construct a crossing over the railway of the former. The street-railway company applied for an injunction and the grant of the same was sustained by the supreme court of Indiana. It was further decided in that case that the same principle applies where the crossing is in a public highway not a street. See this same case reported in 151 Ind. 577, 46 N. E. 999, in which the principle above announced was adhered to and reaffirmed. In Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. West Chicago St. R. Co., 156 Ill. 255, 40 N. E. 1008, 29 L. R. A. 485, it was held: "The fact that the tracks of a railroad company are laid across city streets, and its cars permitted to pass over them, gives the company no exclusive use of the crossing, but only use to be enjoyed with the public. Erections upon a public street impose no additional servitude where they aid and facilitate its use for the purposes of travel and transportation. Permission to a street-railway company to lay its tracks in a public street is not a grant of an additional easement in the soil of the street, such road being merely a modification of the existing public use, adding thereto an additional mode of conveyance, and inflicting no damintended to lay its tracks and operate its cars by animal power only, although it had the right to use cable, electric, or other motive power. In Elizabethtown, L. & B. S. R. Co. v. Ashland & C. St. Ry. Co., 96 Ky. 347, 26 S. W. 181, it was held: "When a railroad company has obtained the right to pass over a turnpike by the permission of those controlling the road, the right thus acquired is not exclusive of the rights of the public, or of such uses and purposes as those for which public highways and streets are established, among which uses are the establishment and operation of street railways. Therefore the railroad company has no such property rights in the crossing as entitle it to compensation from a street-railway company crossing its track at that point, the progress of the cars of the former not being unreasonably impeded or interfered with." It seems from that case that the charter of the street railway empowered it to use steam, horse, or other propelling power for the transportation of its passengers. Counsel for plaintiff in error seek to distinguish that case from the one at bar by reason of general and special legislation, and special grants to the street-railway company; but we fail to see from the record and report of that case that the street railway had any more special grant of power to use the streets and highways where it had its road in operation than the defendants in this case have under the law and the licenses granted them to use the street and highway in question. In Railroad Co. v. Steel, 47 Neb. 741, 66 N. W. 830, it was held: "A railroad company which has by ordinance acquired a permanent easement in the streets of a city is not entitled to compensation from a street-railway company as a condition to the crossing of its tracks by the latter under a grant of power from the city." See the able opinion of Post, C. J., on page 746, 47 Neb., and page 831, 66 N. W., et seq., and authorities he cites. The following is the conclusion of his opinion: "The doctrine of the cases cited, and which to us appears altogether reasonable and sound, is that a railroad company acquires no exclusive use of streets crossed by its tracks with the consent of the city or other municipal body, but must enjoy the right so conferred in common with the general public; that it is presumed to have contemplated the adoption of such improved means of travel as the exigencies of the case require in order to best subserve the public interests and necessities; and that any mere inconvenience suffered by it on account of the crossing of its lines by the tracks of street railways by permission of the proper authorities is damnum absque injuria." See the same principle enunciated in Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Rosedale St. Ry. Co., 64 Tex. 80, where it was held: "Streets are acquired, establish-

, and maintained for the accommodation d convenience of the inhabitants and the neral public, and may be used for the nvenience of the public by the ordinary ides of conveyance operated upon such eets, the chief of which, in this case, was : street railway. Railroad companies ve not the exclusive right to a public ssing, but are restricted by public conlience and necessity." In the case of nsas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. v. St. seph Terminal R. Co., 97 Mo. 457, 10 S. 826, 3 L. R. A. 240, it appears that a rail.d company obtained from the city the ht to keep and maintain its tracks and itches upon certain land, and to construct h other tracks, switches, and turnouts n the land and across a street, when ned, as it deemed necessary for the nsaction of its business. It was there d that such reservation was not the grant an exclusive privilege, but only equivat to the usual permission to occupy the et with its tracks, and plaintiff was not itled to compensation from the defendant road company laying its track along the et by permission of the city, and across intiff's track therein; nor can it enjoin endant from so laying its track, when horized by the city to do so. See, also, Bois Traction Pass. Ry. Co. v. Buffalo & P. Ry. Co., 149 Pa. St. 1, 24 Atl. 179. eral of the states whose decisions are ctly in point, and which are cited above, e provisions in their constitutions sim- to ours, to the effect that private prop- shall not be taken or damaged for pub- purposes without just and adequate comsation being first paid. The states re- ed to are Nebraska, Illinois, Missouri, tucky, and Texas. Authorities might nultiplied to sustain the principle herein ounced, but we deem it entirely unnecry.

It is contended, however, that one of e defendants in error, to wit, the Atlanta ld-Transit Company, has in its charter ority to use steam as a propelling power its cars, and that the weight of author- s that steam railways constitute a bur- and servitude upon a public street. A plete answer to this is that by the li- e or franchise granted by the city of At- a to this company it is authorized only se electric power, and there is nothing in record to indicate that it ever intends to anything else. We do not mean to say its use of steam instead of electricity as propelling power would necessarily deprive the right to cross this track at the point uestion without being liable in damages ie plaintiff railroad company. Whether ot a street or suburban railway consti- a burden upon streets or highways in a or country does not depend so much upon motive powers used in propelling the as it does upon the character and nature siness it transacts. For instance, what own as a "commercial railway," which carries not only passengers, but quantities of freight, from one portion of the state to the other, and even from one state to another, in traversing public highways of the country or streets of a city would necessarily constitute a greater burden and servitude upon such highways or streets than an ordinary car of a street or suburban railway, whether propelled by steam, cable, electricity, or otherwise, which has for its purpose simply the transportation of passengers from one point to the other on the streets of a city, or to adjacent places in the contiguous country. A marked difference between the two systems is that the former often carries long trains of passengers and freight cars over its line, and is not intended at all for the accommodation of the public desiring to go from one portion of the city to the other, while the latter ordinarily uses one car, and facilitates the transportation of passengers desiring only to go short distances between different points in the city. Hence it is that the decision of this court in Georgia Midland & G. R. Co. v. Columbus Southern Ry. Co., 89 Ga. 205, 15 S. E. 305, and which was relied on by counsel for plaintiff in error, has no application whatever to the facts in the present case. It was there decided in the headnote: "Without first making compensation for the damages which will result therefrom, one railway company cannot lay and use its track across the track of another railway company located in a public street of a city." It will be seen from the facts in that case that it was a contest between two commercial railway companies, and the city of Columbus constituted a terminus of each of these lines of railway. It was complained in the case that the petitioner constructed its depot, roundhouses, etc., on the depot grounds. The lands for terminals of defendant, with its depot site, side tracks, etc., lay east of petitioner's property, and that it was entirely unnecessary for it, in order to make its proper connections, to construct a side track just north of petitioner's depot grounds at a point where is located the travel and entrance to petitioner's grounds, thus unnecessarily increasing damage, delay, hindrance, inconvenience, and risk of accidents to the plaintiff at a point where its traffic of every sort passes. It will thus be seen that there is no analogy whatever between that case and the present one, where the defendant roads, under grant of authority from proper sources, are running their lines along the streets and public highways for the benefit of the public itself. Neither has the case of Campbell v. Railroad Co., 82 Ga. 320, 9 S. E. 1078, any application whatever to the case we are now considering. It was there decided: "The construction and operation of a horse railway in the public streets of a city by authority of the legislature and the consent of the city government, whether it be a new burden upon the streets or not, does not entitle a private individual to compensation therefor, unless the construction or operation of such railway works be shown to have damaged the property, they should be considered in arriving at the amount of the recovery; but, if they amount merely to inconvenience or discomfort to its occupants, they are not an element of damages, and should not be so considered." It appears in that case that the railroad company had permission from the legislature and the city council to lay its track in the streets where it pleased. In this particular place it elected to lay its track near the sidewalk of plaintiff's residence, and it was contended that the unceasing passage of cars so near the entire front of petitioner's property would effectually cut off all safe entrance to or exit from the front of said property to any kind of vehicle. The marked difference between that case and the present one is that the plaintiff there owned the absolute title to the abutting lot. We think the principle therein decided was correct. Under the provisions of the constitution which requires compensation to be paid not only for property taken in the exercise of eminent domain, but also for property damaged thereby, this necessarily implies that for a direct invasion of any legal right of property pertaining to its ownership and enjoyment which results in material damage to the property the owner must first be compensated, whether it has been seized or not. One of the rights pertaining to the ownership of a home, for instance, is free and comfortable ingress and egress thereto; and this right cannot be interfered with, even for the public good, to the extent of causing material damage to the market value of the property itself, without compensation being paid in advance to the owner.

4, 5. But in the present case we fail to see that the defendants have invaded, or were seeking to invade, any legal right of plaintiff. As above indicated, when the plaintiff was permitted to construct its track across an existing street or public road, it did so subject to the condition that it must submit to the increased inconvenience which might result from the growth and development of the city or country, and the consequent increase of travel in the usual methods along such street or road. It acquired only an easement; that is, a privilege of crossing this street and road in the transportation of its freight and passengers. It may be that the crossing of defendant's tracks over this street and highway will cause inconvenience to the plaintiff, but, as we have above demonstrated, this use thereof by the defendants, instead of constituting any burden or servitude upon them, is intended for the convenience and benefit of the traveling public on these streets. The question as to whether or not their construction was necessary and important in order to accomplish such a purpose has been passed upon by tribunals constituted by law to decide such issues. There is nothing in the record to show any abuse whatever of the exercise of that power. the same subject to any increased inconvenience which might arise by reason of the demands or wants of the public for greater facilities for traveling. Cleveland v. City Council, 102 Ga. 233, 29 S. E. 584, 43 L. R. A. 638. We are at a loss, therefore, to see how any legal right of property of the plaintiff will be invaded, or in any wise affected, by the exercise of the rights and franchises which the street-railway companies are attempting to use in the present instance. It follows from the above that no legal right of plaintiff has been encroached upon, and none of its property has either been taken or threatened to be taken or damaged in contemplation of law. The companies, therefore, owning and operating street railways of the character above indicated, may, under the permission of proper municipal or county authorities, construct their lines across the track of the plaintiff, and use the same, without instituting condemnation proceedings, or being required to pay damages. The court did not err in denying the injunctions prayed for or in dissolving the restraining orders which had been previously granted. Judgment in each case affirmed. All the justices concurring.

CAMP et al. v. DIXON et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 7, 1900.)

TRESPASS TO REALTY — INJUNCTION — TITLE OF PLAINTIFF—DEED—POWER OF ATTORNEY.

1. In order to bring an application for injunction within the provisions of section 4927 of the Civil Code, as amended by the act of December 20, 1899 (Acts 1899, p. 39), it is essential for the plaintiff to show either that he "has perfect title to the land upon which the timber is situated," or that he "has perfect title to the timber" thereon. The "perfect title" must appear upon the face of the paper or papers, an abstract of which the plaintiff tenders for the purpose of showing such title; and, unless it does so appear, the requirement that the plaintiff should allege insolvency of the defendant, or that the damages will be irreparable, is not dispensed with.

2. When, therefore, as a part of the plaintiff's chain of paper title, it appears that a deed constituting a part of the same was executed under a power of attorney, in which there was a recital to the effect that the maker thereof had empowered the attorney in fact therein named to convey the title to the timber on the land therein referred to, subject to a time reservation in the maker's favor, the papers in question did not show a perfect title.

3. The plaintiffs in the present case did not show a perfect title, and neither alleged nor proved insolvency of the defendant, nor that their damages would be irreparable. There was, therefore, no error in denying the injunction; the more especially as the judge required of the defendant a bond which was, in his judgment, sufficient to protect the rights of the plaintiffs.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Echols county; A. H. Hansell, Judge.

J. L. Sweat, for plaintiffs in error. S. T. Kingsberry & Son, Charlton & Charlton, and W. M. Hammond, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. The general rule is that equity will not interfere to restrain a trespass unless the injury is irreparable in damages, or the trespasser is insolvent. Civ. Code, § 4916. An exception to this rule is found in section 4927, Id., which declares that in all applications to enjoin the cutting of timber for sawmill purposes, railroad ties, and bridge timbers for railroad purposes, or the boxing or otherwise working the same for turpentine purposes, it shall not be necessary to aver or prove insolvency, or that the damages are irreparable, "provided, the petitioner has perfect title to the land upon which the timber is situated, and shall attach an abstract of his title, stating the name of grantor and grantee, date, consideration, and description of property, names of witnesses, when and where recorded, to his petition, and produce the original titles before the judge"; the petitioner being required to give such bond as the judge, in his discretion, shall deem proper to answer the damages which the defendant may sustain by reason of the granting of the injunction. By an act approved December 20, 1899 (Acts 1899, p. 39), the section just referred to was amended so as to make the provisions of the same apply not only to cases where the petitioner has perfect title to the land, but also to cases where he may not have perfect title to the land, but still have "perfect title to the timber upon" the land. In Lumber Co. v. Bullock (Ga.) 35 S. E. 52, it was held: "The 'perfect title' which will, under section 4927 of the Civil Code, relieve an applicant for an injunction from averring and proving the insolvency of the defendant, or that the threatened damages will be irreparable, must be a duly-executed paper title, the exhibition of which will show both the 'right of possession' and 'the right of property' in the plaintiff. A paper title not meeting these requirements, or a title resting in parol, will not bring an injunction case within the provisions of this section." The "perfect title" to the timber necessary to bring a case within the provisions of section 4827 of the Civil Code, as amended by the act of 1899, is exactly the same character of title as was required before that act was passed, when the petitioner was the owner of the land. What was such a title when the petitioner was the owner of the land is clearly set forth in the case above cited. In the present case the title to the timber produced before the judge consisted of a grant from the state to Thomas Taylor to the land upon which the timber was situated; a deed from the heirs of Taylor to Rollin J. Nelson to the land upon which the timber was situated; above mentioned, the power of attorney containing the following recitals: "It is understood that I, said Rollin J. Nelson, heretofore conveyed timber on all said land now situated in Clinch county, Georgia, to Alma S. Cleveland, by a bill of sale dated January 23, 1898, with time limited as therein stated; also that I conveyed to Ebenezer Wakely the timber on said land in the other said county of Echols, heretofore mentioned, in the state of Georgia, with time limited as therein stated and in the renewal attached to this bill of sale; and this power of attorney is subject to the rights of said Alma S. Cleveland and Ebenezer Wakely, and to their vendees, if any, holding by and through such bills of sale from me to said Cleveland and said Wakely, to which reference is had." The next link in the chain of title was a lease from Nelson, by Wakely, as attorney in fact, to the plaintiffs, conveying the timber upon the lots in Echols county referred to in the power of attorney. Applying the rule laid down in the case above cited, this did not constitute a "perfect title" to the timber, there being an interest in the same outstanding in Wakely. It was sought to remedy this defect by an affidavit of Wakely to the effect that the time limitation referred to in the power of attorney had expired, and that he disclaimed all title and right to the timber in question. The evidence contained in this affidavit could not be looked to for the purpose of curing the defect in the paper title. In order to authorize an injunction to issue in such a case as the present without an allegation of insolvency or irreparable damage, the plaintiff must show a perfect title upon the face of the papers presented by him, and constituting his chain of title. If such papers do not show upon their face a perfect title, aliunde evidence will not be admitted to explain the defects in the title apparent upon the face of the papers, and the injunction must be denied when the plaintiff has failed to aver and prove either the insolvency of the defendant or that the threatened damage will be irreparable. In the present case there was no error in denying the injunction; especially so as the court required of the defendants a bond which was, in its judgment, sufficient to protect the rights of the plaintiffs. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

FLOYD v. FLOYD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 7, 1900.)

TROVER—EXEMPTIONS—PROPERTY SET APART TO WIFE.

When, on application of a husband, personal property belonging to him was set apart as an exemption for the benefit of his wife, no change in the title of the property occurred. While by such exemption the wife, as beneficiary, was entitled to have the proceeds of such beneficiary of a trust estate, and the possession of the husband is that of a trustee; and while, by proper proceedings, the wife may subject the income of the exempted property to her support, she is not entitled to recover possession by an action of trover.

LEWIS, J. Suit was brought in the city court of Atlanta in the name of the Inman Park Presbyterian Church, of Fulton county, by George E. King and others, certain of its officers and trustees, against the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, for the sum of $1,339.54 principal, $515.90 of which indebtedness was upon an open account, and the remainder thereof was upon 19 promissory notes, aggregating $836.64 principal. To this petition the defendant demurred on the general ground that it sets forth no cause of action; and on the special grounds that it does not appear from the petition that the Inman Park Presbyterian Church, named as plaintiff, has capacity to sue; and, further, because it affirmatively appears upon the face of the petition that the account and notes upon which the suit is based were and are not the property of plaintiff, but were at the time of filing said suit therein alleged to be the property of the husband is that of a trustee; and while, by proper proceedings, the wife may subject the income of the exempted property to her support, she is not entitled to recover possession by an action of trover.

LEWIS, J. Suit was brought in the city court of Atlanta in the name of the Inman Park Presbyterian Church, of Fulton county, by George E. King and others, certain of its officers and trustees, against the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, for the sum of $1,339.54 principal, $515.90 of which indebtedness was upon an open account, and the remainder thereof was upon 19 promissory notes, aggregating $836.64 principal. To this petition the defendant demurred on the general ground that it sets forth no cause of action; and on the special grounds that it does not appear from the petition that the Inman Park Presbyterian Church, named as plaintiff, has capacity to sue; and, further, because it affirmatively appears upon the face of the petition that the account and notes upon which the suit is based were and are not the property of plaintiff, but were at the time of filing said suit therein alleged to be the property of the Inman Park Presbyterian Church, and that they might have judgment against the defendant for the amount of principal and interest that might be shown to be due by defendant on the claims sued upon. This amendment was allowed, and error is assigned on the judgment of the court overruling the demurrer and allowing the amendment.

We think the court clearly erred in not sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the plaintiff's petition. This was a suit originally instituted in the name of a certain designated church, which was suing by certain of its alleged officers. The record shows that the association named as a certain church in the petition was never incorporated. A suit can only be maintained by or in behalf of a natural or artificial person. The plaintiff in the present case evidently was neither, and it follows from this that, the action being instituted by no one having capacity to sue, there was nothing in the petition to amend by, and hence the court erred in allowing the amendment. The demurrer should have been sustained, and the petition dismissed. This principle is decided in the case of Wilkins v. Episcopal Church, 52 Ga. 351, where it was held: "A religious society, which is not incorporated according to law, or which has not recorded its name and objects, * * * cannot be sued as such. Its members are liable on its contracts as joint promisors or partners." See, also, Jones v. Watson, 63 Ga. 679, 680, where the amendment offered was similar to the one in the case at bar. The case of Barbour v. Albany Lodge, 73 Ga. 474, was a suit against certain lodges of Masons, designating them by name. The petition did not allege either that the defendants were corporations or that the members were partners, so as to be sued as such. It was there held by this court that there was no party defendant in the case, and a demurrer was properly sustained. It was further held that, as no person was sued, no case was in court, and there was nothing to amend by. We do not think there is anything in the case of Lumber Co. v. Rogers, 85 Ga. 587, 11 S. E. 867, at all in conflict with our decision in this case. That was a suit brought by the plaintiff for the purpose of recovering for material furnished for and used in the erection of a college lding. Whether the college had been ac-lly incorporated or not could have had effect upon the equity of plaintiff's claim,) certainly had an equitable lien upon the perty which had been improved by the ıishing of material, and the building premises were liable for the payment he debt. Neither is the case of Josey v. st Co., 106 Ga. 608, 32 S. E. 628, in ıt. It was there held: "A voluntary ciation of persons organized for reli-ıs purposes, which has regularly ap-ıted trustees to hold and manage its perty, is liable to have such property ected to the payment of money furnish-'or the use of such trust estate, under eedings authorized by statute." We do mean to say that an association organiz-ıs a church, although unincorporated, not, through its regularly appointed tees, institute a suit for the recovery or ection of its property. How the trus-in this case were appointed does not ap-. Civ. Code, § 2357, seems to imply that societies may, upon the conditions in named, be capable in law of suing being sued in any action involving their s, but the condition is expressly there-id down that such societies "shall have ded the name, style, and objects of association." This act was in force the decision of Wilkins v. Episcopal ch, 52 Ga. 351, above cited, was ren-l, and that decision was based upon a ruction of that act. See Acts 1855–56, 2. We know of no decision of this which takes this case out of that rul-t not appearing in the present instance the church suing as plaintiff has ever such a record as required by that te. Action by G. A. Cassin and others, by next friend, against the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Burton, Smith, Dorsey, Brewster & Howell, for plaintiff in error. Arnold & Arnold and Bray & Arnold, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. George Cassin was injured by the plaintiff in error May 6, 1892. He instituted suit, and while the action was pending the company paid him $2,500, taking a receipt stating that it was "in full settlement of my action against said company now pending in the city court of Atlanta, and also in full settlement of all and any claim for damages on my part arising out of the injury received by me on or about May 6th, 1892." More than five years after the injury, Cassin died, and his widow thereupon brought suit against the company for his homicide, alleging that his death was caused by the injury negligently inflicted by the company. She, too, died, and the suit was then continued in the name of the children. The evidence as to the cause of the death of Cassin was conflicting; one physician testifying that it was due to apoplexy, superinduced by Cassin's habit of body, and great mental distress, caused by domestic afflictions. Another physician testified that it was caused by the blow from the fall of the telephone cable. The company offered in evidence the receipt given by Cassin in settlement of the damages, and the court excluded it.

The technical rule of the common law, preventing a wife or child from recovering damages for the death of a husband or father, was a great hardship. There was a crying demand for the enactment of a law which would give a cause of action against "the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued," and in 1846 was passed Lord Campbell's act,—the first of a series of acts giving such remedy. At the present time like statutes exist in nearly all of the states of the Union, and none more liberally protect the rights of the wife and children than does that in Georgia. In many of the states, while there is no limit to the amount of damages recoverable for personal injury, there is a limit in case of death; some providing that the verdict, in case of death, shall not exceed $5,000, and some that it shall not exceed $10,000. In others, while there is no statutory limit to the amount of the verdict, the widow or children are only entitled to recover the "pecuniary value" to them of the father or husband, and in arriving at this pecuniary value the jury must consider and deduct at least what he would have spent on himself. But so liberal to the wife and children are the provisions of our law, that, when the life of the deceased, without deduction for his necessary and personal expenses,"- a provision which, "to say the least, is a harsh rule, and must be strictly construed." Smith v. Hatcher, 102 Ga. 160, 29 S. E. 163. The proposition relied on by defendants in error, if correct, exactly doubles the operation of a statute which has already gone a bowshot beyond that of any other state; for it is claimed that this act gives the widow the full value of the life of the husband, even though he in his lifetime had received from the defendant compensation for the injury inflicted, and that evidence of the release cannot be introduced, either as a bar to her recovery, or to be considered by the jury in reducing the amount of the verdict. A decision which would announce, to persons who have settled with parties injured, that the settlement, instead of being in full, was only partial; that, if death ensues as a result of the injury, they must pay again, and this time the full value of the life of the deceased,—will be justly regarded as a great hardship, and it will come to the widow and children, not as the grant of a right heretofore unjustly withheld, but as a second payment of a claim already satisfied.

Examining the decisions in England under Lord Campbell's act, and the decisions under similar statutes enacted by the various states in the Union, we find that sometimes the right of action is vested in the injured party, and survives to his personal representatives or family. Sometimes a cause of action for the death is given to the personal representatives, who sue for the benefit of his estate, or sometimes for the benefit of persons who are dependent on him. In such cases the personal representative is trustee for these beneficiaries, and not for the estate. In other cases the widow or children are given directly the right of action for the death of the husband. But these differences are all incidental. Tiff. Death Wrongf. Act, § 24. Each of these statutes had the same purpose as our own. Differing as to details, they are all intended to give the personal representatives, or the members of the family, or whomsoever the plaintiff might be, a right to recover against "the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued." In Littlewood v. Mayor, etc., 89 N. Y. 24, 42 Am. Rep. 271, the court had under consideration an act giving the personal representative a cause of action for death, and said: "The main purpose was to deprive the wrongdoer of the immunity from civil liability. The entire gist of the first section is that the wrongdoer shall be liable to an action for damages notwithstanding the death of the person injured. It does not provide that the wrongdoer shall be liable notwithstanding * * * any other defense he might have had at the time of death, but merely that the death of the party statutes are absolutely silent as to the effect of settlements made by the husband in his lifetime, and yet notwithstanding this silence the courts have generally held that such settlement was a bar to another suit against the same party, as the act was not intended to "give two actions for a single injury." Sawyer v. Perry (Me.) 33 Atl. 660. Some of these decisions had been rendered before our act of 1887, and are fairly to be presumed to have been within the knowledge of the legislature when revising the law on the subject of death by wrongful act. If that body had intended to change this well-known construction as to the effect of settlement, it would have said so. Its silence is to be taken as more indicative of approving than disapproving this line of cases. For many years the court has permitted a widow, and, if no widow, the children, to recover for the homicide of the husband or father. During that period hundreds of instances have occurred in which the husband was injured, and has received compensation therefor. In the very nature of things, many of these physical injuries impaired health, and probably hastened death, and yet no suit therefor has until within recent years been brought by the widow of such person. Evidently, by the common understanding of the community, payment to the husband—accord and satisfaction between him and the defendant—was regarded as a settlement of all liability growing out of the negligent act. See Lubrano's Case (R. I.) 32 Atl. 207, 34 L. R. A. 797. We feel safe in saying that many adjustments have been made upon this idea which would not otherwise have been made, and that giving to the statute the effect now insisted upon would not only be a great hardship upon defendants who, relying and acting upon the heretofore generally accepted view of the law, have paid their money and bought their peace, but it would be giving to widows something which they did not expect, where a settlement had been made by the head of the family.

But it is said that no decision that a release by the husband bars a subsequent suit by or for the wife is of any value in this case, unless it was rendered by a court which holds that the survival and death acts create new and distinct causes of action. This, therefore, must be borne in mind in estimating the weight of the authorities cited. In reading them with this prominently in view, it is remarkable to note the various expressions used in the effort to define the relation which the action by or for the widow bears to the action in favor of the injured husband. Some—in fact, all—of the courts may be said to call it a "new cause of action," as in Railroad Co. v. Bass, 104 Ga. 390, 30 S. E. 874. Some call it a "new, but not an independent, cause of action." Cooley, Torts, 264, speaks of it as an "en-tinguished during the life of the injured party, it survives, and may become two causes of action. Others say, "The cause of action for the homicide is contingent on the death of the injured party without having satisfied his claim for damages." But, notwithstanding this variety of expressions, there is substantial unity in holding that a release by the husband bars the wife; this view being taken even by those courts which insist most strongly that the two acts create two causes of action, and by courts, also, which rule that concurrent suits may be maintained. However new it may be, in the very nature of things it cannot be independent. It is inherently rooted and grounded in the injury to the husband. It grows out of it, and is a part of it, having almost complete identity of substance, and subject to the same defenses. More than a dozen courts have directly passed upon the effect of a release by the husband, and all except those of Massachusetts and Kentucky have held that it bars a suit after his death. Com. v. Boston & L. R. Corp., 134 Mass. 211; Com. v. Vermont & M. R. Co., 108 Mass. 7; Donahue v. Drexler, 82 Ky. 157; Railroad Co. v. McElwain (Ky.) 84 S. W. 236, 34 L. R. A. 788; Littlewood v. Mayor, etc., 89 N. Y. 24, 42 Am. Rep. 271; Legg v. Britton (Vt.) 24 Atl. 1016; Hill v. Railroad Co. (Pa. Sup.) 35 Atl. 997, 35 L. R. A. 196; Hecht's Case (Ind. Sup.) 32 N. E. 302; Fowlkes v. Railroad Co., 9 Heisk. 829; Holton v. Daly, 106 Ill. 131; Price v. Railroad Co. (S. C.) 12 S. E. 414; Town of Walkerton v. Erdman, 23 Can. Sup. Ct. 352; Read v. Railway Co., L. R. 3 Q. B. 555, decided in 1868, and other English cases. To which may be added the positive dicta in the Sweetland Case (Mich.) 75 N. W. 1066, 1078, 43 L. R. A. 568, both in the concurring opinion of Long, C. J., and in the dissenting opinion of Hooker and Montgomery, JJ., and the equally positive statement of the supreme court of Wisconsin in Brown v. Railroad Co., 78 N. W. 773.

The right of the plaintiff to recover in this case notwithstanding the release is said to grow out of the language of our statutes, creating two causes of action,—one for the injury, and the other for the homicide,—and that a settlement of one is not a settlement of the other; it being urged that the survival act of 1889 (Code, § 3825), when construed in connection with the death act (Code, § 3828), logically supports the theory that the two suits may proceed concurrently, and that a recovery for the injury would not be a bar to a recovery for the death. And Railroad Co. v. Phillips, 64 Miss. 693, 2 South. 537, and Davis v. Railway Co., 53 Ark. 117, 13 S. W. 801, which are relied on, certainly sustain the proposition that "concurrent suits may be maintained." But the right to maintain concurrent suits is not involved in this case. What are we to determine the cause of action, neither single nor concurrent suits can spring therefrom. If, however, no release has been signed, and the injured party dies, leaving in force a live cause of action, there might arise the question whether from this living germ only one suit, or concurrent suits, could spring. If a release wipes out the wrong done by the defendant, and makes it as though no injury had been suffered, then upon the death of the injured party there would be no cause of action, just as though there had been no injury; and it would not be a question as to the right to maintain two concurrent suits, but as to the right to maintain any suit at all. It is perhaps improper to consider the act of 1889 (Code, § 3825) as strictly a survival statute; for it does not create or preserve a cause of action, as such, though it does preserve pending suits. It is not so much a survival statute as one to prevent the abatement of cases actually in court; for, if the injured party dies before bringing suit, his administrator could not institute an action for the pain, suffering, and diminished capacity to labor, as was expressly held in Frazier v. Railroad Co., 101 Ga. 79, 28 S. E. 662. The act of 1889 is by no means so broad as the survival statutes of some of the other states, which do preserve the cause of action for an injury, whether a suit had been brought thereon, or not, in the lifetime of the injured party. But, even if we treat the act of 1889 as being a survival statute, in the fullest sense, and then undertake to discuss the right to maintain concurrent suits, we would be no nearer a solution of the difficulty, so far as the authorities are concerned; for it will appear the courts have been frequently called on to determine what effect the survival act has upon the death act, and vice versa,—whether the remedy under one is exclusive, or whether the two acts confer two remedies, with the right to maintain concurrent actions. The cases are more in conflict than those which pass upon the effect of a release,—at any rate, are far more evenly balanced. Some of them hold that under the survival act and the death act "two separate and distinct causes of action are created, which may co-exist, but have no connection, and that these two actions may be prosecuted concurrently." This view is forcibly presented in Needham v. Railway Co., 38 Vt. 294,—a view which is followed and elaborated in Davis v. Railway Co., 53 Ark. 117, 13 S. W. 801, Brown v. Railroad Co. (Wis.) 78 N. W. 771, and Railroad Co. v. Phillips, 64 Miss. 693, 2 South. 537. The contrary view is quite as strongly presented in Legg v. Britton (Vt.) 24 Atl. 1017 (overruling the Needham Case), Lubrano v. Atlantic Mills (R. I.) 32 Atl. 205, 34 L. R. A. 797, and Railroad Co. v. O'Connor, 119 Ill. 586, 9 N. E. 263, where it is held that concurrent suits the wrongful act before the judgment, the death act, and not the survival act, must be relied on. Fellers v. Fellers (Neb.) 74 N. W. 1078, col. near bottom. The Kansas court (McCarthy v. Railroad Co., 18 Kan. 46; Martin v. Railroad Co., 49 Pac. 605) and the Michigan court (Sweetland's Case, 75 N. W. 1066) are divided, so that we may fairly say the authorities are so evenly balanced on this point as to settle nothing, if it were necessary to rule as to the right to maintain concurrent suits.

The assignments of error call only for a ruling as to the effect of a release, and upon that point, also, there is some conflict, which, however, is not only more apparent than real, but the preponderance is so great as to remove all doubt,—at least, so far as it can be removed in any case by weight of authority. The Massachusetts court holds that "the husband cannot, by a settlement, bar the wife's rights"; but in that state the statute is highly penal,—the damages being limited, and recoverable by indictment, the fine being for the use of the family. Therefore in Com. v. Vermont & M. R. Co., 108 Mass. 7, it was held that "conditions on a ticket could not relieve the road from liability under a penal statute for gross negligence"; and in Com. v. Boston & L. R. Corp., 134 Mass. 211, for the same reason, it was held that want of due care in a passenger would no more be a defense to an indictment for damages than it would have been in a prosecution for murder. And where the suit was in tort, instead of by prosecution by indictment, the result was the same, for "the fact that the statute is penal must be borne in mind. * * * The remedy by indictment was extended to an action of tort. The amount in either case goes to the widow and children. * * * It is, in substance, a penalty given to them, instead of the estate, and, as such, the intestate could not release the defendant from liability for it." The same distinction must be borne in mind in considering Donahue v. Drexler, 82 Ky. 157, where the court held that a release by the husband did not bar the wife of her action given by statute, "where the husband was killed by the criminal or malicious use of firearms or other deadly weapons," and "* * * in such action the jury may give vindictive damages." The court does say that it "creates a new cause of action," but it emphasizes the fact that "this is a highly penal statute, * * * to prevent the perpetration of such acts by awarding vindictive damages." It cites the cases of Schlichtling v. Wintgen, 25 Hun, 627, since overruled, and Whitford v. Railroad Co., 23 N. Y. 467. If the fact that the statute is penal is not the underlying reason for the decision in Donahue v. Drexler, then the state of the authorities in Kentucky is in some services, the statute also gave a remedy for her homicide; the damages to be for the use of the husband. The husband insisted on both remedies, but the court held "there was no intention to multiply actions," and that the husband's action was defeated by a judgment in favor of the wife's representative for larger damages than were recoverable under the old form of action. In Leggott v. Railway Co., 1 Q. B. Div. 599, an administrator had recovered damages for the homicide, under Lord Campbell's act. Afterwards the administrator brought suit for damages to the estate arising from the "breach of the contract of carriage"; claiming that he was entitled to "recover the expense of the decedent's sickness, nursing, medical attendance, and the like." The court held that the recovery in tort did not bar the action for the breach of the contract; for, as stated by Lord Denman in Pulling v. Railroad Co., 9 Q. B. Div. 110, "there was a distinction between actions of contract and actions of tort." Pym v. Railway Co., 2 Best & S. 761; Bradshaw v. Railway Co., L. R. 10 C. P. 189; Barnett v. Lucas, 5 Ir. C. L. 140; Id., 6 Ir. C. L. 247; and the Leggott Case,—have sometimes been cited to show that they overrule or weaken the authority of the Read Case, cited supra, but without success. In Littlewood v. Mayor, etc., 89 N. Y. 24, and in Lubrano v. Atlantic Mills (R. I.) 32 Atl. 205, this was carefully considered, and the Read Case shown to be unshaken. See, also, Railroad Co. v. Clarke, 152 U. S. 237, 14 Sup. Ct. 579, 38 L. Ed. 422. Even Brown v. Railroad Co., which follows the Needham, Arkansas, and Mississippi cases, treats the Read Case as authority, and concedes that the Leggott and Bradshaw Cases are to be distinguished therefrom, and are not in conflict with it. The statement by Long, C. J., in Hurst v. Railway Co. (Mich.) 48 N. W. 46, that "satisfaction of one claim would be no bar to the other," is said by him in Sweetland v. Railroad Co. (Mich.) 75 N. W. 1068, to have been obiter.

We think the cases above cited are the very strongest which can be found in favor of the position taken by the defendant in error. It will be seen that they are based either upon penal statutes, or upon decisions which have been overruled, or that they are discussing the effect of concurrent remedies after the death of the injured party, or that the decisions themselves have been weakened by conflicting decisions in the same jurisdictions. To begin with, the English courts have held that Lord Campbell's act created a new cause of action; and yet, in the Read Case,—the first decision as to the effect of a release,—it was pointedly held "that a plea of accord and satisfaction with the deceased in his lifetime was a good bar to an action by his legal representatives." The New rk court, in Whitford v. Railroad Co., 23 Y. 465, positively and unmistakably ruled it "the statute created a new cause of ac- a"; that "it was not a mere continuation the right of action which had been in the eased." This was reaffirmed and followed the Littlewood Case, and yet it was ruled t "this new cause of action was barred there had been a previous judgment for injury." Judge Rapallo begins the deci- ı by admitting that it was a "new cause action," but says: "This is not the point which the case turns. The true question whether in enacting the statute the legis- ıre had in view a case where the deceased, his lifetime, brought his action, recovered nages for the injury, which subsequently ılted in his death, and whether it was in- ded to superadd to the liability of the ongdoer, who paid damages for the in- y, the further liability in case the party erwards died from such injury." In an e and carefully considered opinion, the rt held that the payment to the deceased red the suit in favor of the wife. In g v. Britton (Vt.) 24 Atl. 1016, constru- a statute admittedly like our own, the rt said: "It is contended that the statute es a new cause of action. Strictly, it is ew right of recovery." But it was nev- ieless held that where the injured party l, and pending the suit died from his in- es, and the administrator continued the and recovered judgment, that was a bar ın action for the benefit of the widow. he recovery was in the right of the in- ate while living, such "recovery, in legal ct, would antedate his death, exhaust his t of action, and nothing would remain survive for the subsequent action. It ld exhaust the liability of the wrong- ', and no liability would remain, to be rced in the subsequent suit." In Penn- ania, in Fink v. Garman, 40 Pa. St. 103, court held "that the section created a ' cause of action,' wholly unknown to the mon law, and the right of action was given to the person suffering the injury, e no man could sue for his own death, to his widow and personal representa- s." Yet, after quoting this language, in v. Railroad Co. (Pa. Sup.) 35 Atl. 997, as held that "the widow did not have an independent action for injuries caus- her husband's death that he could not, is lifetime, release or compound it." The e of action is the same in both cases, "a new remedy is given the widow, h had no previous existence. If he gs an action and obtains judgment, which ıid, it must be conceded that this is the of the case. The defendant's negli- e has been tried and adjudged, and, ı the judgment has been discharged by ıent, it has been satisfied for all pur- s. The consequences of the transgres- have been suffered, and the penalty The statute preserves the right of re- ry, but does not give another and ad- ditional remedy to other parties for the same injury." The decision cites the Read Case, holds that a release by the injured party was a bar to an action given for the benefit of the widow, and concludes by saying, "The person injured has such a right in the cause of action as he may release the offend- ing party from all damages." In the Hecht Case (Ind. Sup.) 32 N. E. 302, it was "claimed that the statute gave a new right of action. This is true, in a certain sense. Without the statute the action could not be maintained. The right to sue is purely statutory, and in derogation of common law, and must be strictly construed." A settlement by the husband was held to bar a suit for homicide. In Fowlkes v. Railroad Co., 9 Heisk. 829, cited in the Hecht Case, it was held that as the injured party had recovered a judgment, or made a settlement or release, his personal representatives could not sue. It was ruled in Holton v. Daly, 106 Ill. 131: "If the in- jured party has released his claim for dam- ages, his personal representatives cannot sue for the homicide." In Town of Walkerton v. Erdman, 23 Can. Sup. Ct. 352, and in Price v. Railroad Co. (S. C.) 12 S. E. 414, it was held that releases executed by the injured party barred a subsequent suit for the ben- efit of the wife; the South Carolina court distinctly declining to discuss whether the statute gave a new cause of action or con- tinued the original cause of action. To these should be added the Sweetland Case (Mich.) 75 N. W. 1066, 1078, and Brown v. Railroad Co. (Wis.) 78 N. W. 773. The Brown Case most distinctly asserted the right to main- tain concurrent suits, because there were two causes of action. And yet it recognized that, though concurrent suits might be maintained, they could not be if the party injured, dur- ing his life, had satisfied the cause of ac- tion; for "the extinguishment of the primary cause of action leaves the statute with no office to perform, and only in the absence of such extinguishment are there two causes of action." The supreme court of Michigan, in the Sweetland Case, was divided as to the right to maintain concurrent actions, but there was no disagreement as to the effect of a release. There were three counts in the declaration. One for the common-law liability for pain and suffering endured by the deceas- ed prior to death, which, it was claimed, was not instantaneous, and the right of action for which, it was claimed, survived by vir- tue of the statute. The second count was for damages to certain personal property, and the third count was for the benefit of a de- pendent brother under the death statute. There was a verdict in favor of plaintiff on each count. One of the judges held that, as death was instantaneous, there could be no cause of action for pain and suffering which could survive. Long, C. J., in concurring, elaborately discusses the question as to whether survival acts and death acts cre- ate two causes of action, or only one, and reaches the conclusion that there was only injuries, and a separate suit for the homicide. "The fact that the common-law right of action which survives is for the benefit of the deceased's estate, and that the right of action under the death act is given for the benefit of the decedent's heirs, can make no difference in the construction. It was not the intention of the legislature to give two rights of recovery for the same injury, which results in death. * * * If such judgment obtained by her in her lifetime, or settlement so made by her, is a bar to a recovery by the heirs, under sections 8313, 8314, 2 How. Ann. St. Mich., then a judgment obtained by the heirs for a cause of action accruing to them by survival under section 7397 would be a bar to the right to recover for his death under sections 8313 and 8314." Montgomery, J., in his dissenting opinion, said: "It is generally held, and we think properly, that if the deceased settles for the injury received in his lifetime, or recovers his damages in an action, an action cannot be maintained after his death under Lord Campbell's act;" citing, among others, the article in 28 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 385, 513, 577, where the various statutes are reviewed, and the conclusion reached "that the right of action under Lord Campbell's act was a new cause of action, and both may be maintained after the death of the injured person, supposing him not to have recovered damages in his lifetime." Hooker, J., in his dissenting opinion, said: "We find that the courts generally hold that the recovery is a bar to a subsequent action by the administrator, and we think the legislature intended that it should be. The greater number of cases discussing the question deny the dual right of recovery. * * * The various cases under different statutes are supported by different reasons, but, as already stated, they generally agree in holding that there is a single remedy." Tiffany, in his work on Death by Wrongful Act (section 124), after giving all the acts of the different states, and citing all the cases, including Lord Campbell's act and decisions thereunder, lays the rule down as follows: "If the deceased, in his lifetime, has done anything that would operate as a bar to a recovery by him of damages for the personal injury, this will operate equally as a bar in an action by his personal representatives for his death. Thus, a release by the party injured of his right of action, or a recovery of damages by him for the injury, is a complete defense in the statutory action."

Having now fully attempted to consider the state of the authorities outside of Georgia, let us see what are the rulings of our own court. It has never had the exact question involved in this case before it, but it can be positively stated that it has never used an expression which could suggest that there might be two recoveries for the same negligence. On the contrary, every ruling ing, he too could have recovered against the defendant. The Bass Case, 104 Ga. 292, 30 S. E. 874, makes this plain. While holding that the widow's cause of action does not accrue until the death of the husband, and that therefore the statute does not begin to run until his death, yet that decision contains this distinct declaration: "What we now rule is evidently not in conflict with the adjudications of this court to the effect that, where a widow sues for the homicide of her husband, the defendant may set up any defense which might have been pleaded to the merits of the issue if the suit had been brought by the husband for the injuries to his person." This court has construed sections 3828 and 3829 of the Civil Code to mean that if the husband was an employé, and if under the fellow-servant rule, or if by reason of contributory negligence, he had no cause of action, neither has the wife. So, in a number of other carefully considered cases, these sections have been construed to prevent a recovery by the wife if the husband himself could not have recovered. Why? The statute does not say so. It simply provides that the widow may recover for the homicide of the husband, caused by crime, or criminal or other negligence. A man may be injured by the negligence of a defendant. His death may be directly attributable to that negligence, and yet, if he consented to the injury, or if by ordinary care he could have avoided the injury or gotten out of the way of the death-dealing negligence, he could not have recovered for the injury, nor could his wife recover for his death. These sections prolong or continue an old cause of action, or they enlarge the old cause of action, or they substitute a new remedy, or it may even be conceded that they give a new cause of action, but they do not deal with defenses to that cause of action. The law applicable to defenses is drawn from other sources, and in applying that law this court has repeatedly and consistently held that the wife stood in the shoes of the husband. "The widow is bound by relations they had established by contracts not illegal. The wrong she sues for must be a legal wrong,—a wrong which the law recognizes as a breach of the duty the road owed her husband. She stands in his shoes, has his rights, and takes his responsibilities." Railroad Co. v. Strong, 52 Ga. 467. In the succeeding case (Hendricks v. Railroad Co., Id. 468), the court says: "Any relation existing by contract or law between the person killed and the company which would bar a recovery by him for damages, in case he had not died, apply to and govern the right of the wife. * * * The principle which allows a defendant, when sued by a widow for the homicide of her husband, to set up any defense which would prevent or lessen the husband's re-

(Syl., point 1), that "a widow may recover for the homicide of her husband; she will have a right of action when the husband, had he lived, had such a right, and whatever would have been a good defense to his suit, had he lived, will be equally good against one brought by her." In Railroad Co. v. Maloy, 77 Ga. 242, 2 S. E. 943 (Opinion, point 6), the mother sued for the death of a minor son, and the court said: "The suit being by the parent to recover damages for the killing of a minor, she cannot recover unless, if he were in life, he could recover. She stands in no better condition than the deceased would have stood in, had he not been killed, and was present before the court."

In all these cases there is a recognition of the privity between husband and wife, or parent and child, as to the circumstances attending the killing, out of which the liability can grow. Outside of the mere acts of the deceased, the courts have recognized that this privity existed. In Lord v. Refining Co. (Colo. Sup.) 21 Pac. 148, after deciding that declarations not part of the res gestæ are not ordinarily admissible, the court held "such declarations are competent when offered by the defendant. They affect the plaintiff [widow] in a case of this kind in the same way they would have affected the deceased if he had lived and brought an action for the same injury." A similar ruling was made in Hughes v. Canal Co. (Pa. Sup.) 35 Atl. 190, in a suit by a widow for the homicide of her husband, "since the plaintiff derived her action from the deceased." "At the time his statement was made, the only right of action there was, was in him. The plaintiff had no claim until he died, and then the foundation of her claim was the injury to him. If defendant would not have been liable to him in the first instance, it was not made liable to her by his death. We are not aware of any case in which a widow has recovered for an injury to her husband where he could not have done so himself if he had survived, and, on principle, it is perfectly clear that she can never do so; for the original right of action is in him, and hers is but the succession or substitution of his, where he has not asserted it himself." In Railroad Co. v. Venable, 67 Ga. 700, the mother was injured and sued, but died before verdict. The child then brought suit for the homicide of the mother, and sought to use the mother's interrogatories, which had been sued out in the first case. The court allowed it upon the ground, among others, that the mother represented her child, both suing for injuries in the same transaction, the substantial cause being the same. In Railroad Co. v. Fitzgerald, 108 Ga. 507, 34 S. E. 316, it is distinctly ruled that the wife and husband are in other grounds. That is true, and the court so ruled, but that the controlling reason was the privity appears from the decision itself. We quote: "Her right to a recovery must necessarily depend upon a determination of the question whether or not 'the husband, had he lived, would have had such a right; and whatever would have been a good defense to his suit, had he lived, will be equally available against one brought by her.' Berry v. Railroad Co., 72 Ga. 137. In other words, she is to be considered in privity with the husband in so far as her right to complain of the homicide is concerned. It follows necessarily that the company should have been allowed to show, by any competent evidence at its command, that the injuries sustained by him were occasioned, not by the alleged acts of negligence on its part, of which complaint is made, but by other and wholly different causes. Section 5181 of our Civil Code provides, in terms, that 'the declarations and entries of a person, since deceased, against his interest, and not made with a view to pending litigation, are admissible in evidence in any case,' while section 5193 undertakes to state the rule that the admissions of privies in blood, privies in estate, and privies in law are admissible as against all persons with whom they are in privity. Accordingly, we think that in the present case the defendant company should have been permitted to prove that the plaintiff's husband, in undertaking to state the cause of his injuries, had stated that 'he was making an effort to couple cars, and that his foot struck an obstacle on the track and he fell.'" Railroad Co. v. Fitzgerald, 108 Ga. 508, 34 S. E. 317.

The Fitzgerald Case logically leads to the conclusion that the widow is barred by the settlement. To hold otherwise would be to say that the wife could be barred by what her husband said, but not by what he did; that she might be concluded by words, but not by money; that the evidence of her husband, given in the suit for his personal injuries, might be used against her in a suit for his death, but that the more solemn judgment against him would not conclude her. If the wife is in privity with her husband, it is conceded that his settlement will bind her; but, if there is no privity between them as to this class of cases, then, if the husband should sue and fail to recover, the wife, after his death, would not be bound by that judgment. She may bring suit and obtain a verdict notwithstanding the husband failed in his suit. So that not only is a settlement no bar, but neither is a verdict against the husband a bar. This would not only make the statutes penal, but it would not allow the defendant to buy his peace by paying money; nor could he secure peace by making a successful defense immediately after the in-

But, as in this case, five years after the injury, upon proof, that can oftentimes be only too easily secured, that the old injury has been the cause of the recent death, the defendant is again called into court. What is it to do? How is it to perpetuate its evidence? How is it to know whether the suit is ever to be brought or not? How is it to know whether it is liable or not? It has been acquitted of liability to the husband, but years after it is sought to make it liable to the wife. In many cases it would be perfectly easy for the wife to make out a prima facie case,—rely, say upon the presumptions against railroads,—and recover against the defendant, who was not at fault, who has been adjudged not to be in fault, but whose witnesses may have died or moved away, or otherwise become inaccessible. These are not improbable results. They are certain to follow if the contention of the defendants in error is sound. There is a reasonable bar provided by law for small claims,—for notes, for accounts, which require little or no evidence, or only written evidence; but the contention of defendant in error, if correct, will open the door of the court, years after an injury has happened, to determine questions of the most intricate character, requiring the nicest proof of exactly where the dead man was, what he was doing, what he was employed to do, who hurt him, the exact manner of the injury, and all of that elaborate and complicated balancing of conflicting evidence which is an almost invariable accompaniment of a suit for personal injuries. We cannot characterize it better than by using the language of Judge Bleckley in Telegraph Co. v. Nunnally, 86 Ga. 505, 12 S. E. 578, in discussing a statute allowing a penalty of $100 against a telegraph company. The force of what he there said is to be multiplied, because, while he was considering a statute which allowed $100, we are considering cases in which the damages will not be hundreds, but thousands. "To leave the company exposed to suits for the almost innumerable transactions of this kind for twenty years would be simply absurd." See, also, Railroad Co. v. Clarke, 152 U. S. 237, 14 Sup. Ct. 579, 38 L. Ed. 422. It is true that, even now, under the ruling in the Bass Case, these results may follow. But such cases will be exceedingly rare. Where the husband is fatally injured, and the defendant is liable, there will generally be prompt settlement or a suit. The defendant will be put on notice, and can prepare for his defense. The serious consequences to which we have referred would result from a ruling that where the husband fails to recover a verdict, or where he makes a settlement or obtains a verdict, years after, when he dies, the widow may sue, in spite of the previous trials and accord and satisfaction, when the witnesses are dead, and the evidence lost, upon considerations of public policy interposing a statute of repose; for, if the settlement is not a bar, there is practically no statute of limitations, and oftentimes no person with whom the defendant can settle, and, even after a settlement, marriage, birth of after-born children, death of the wife, minority of the children, and the possibility that the children themselves may die during the lifetime of the injured party, all make the defendant liable to an uncertain extent as of an uncertain date, to unknown and unknowable persons.

In the nature of things, one who claims as a wife is bound by the husband's conduct. His freedom from fault inures to her benefit, but his negligence is imputed to her, when, as a quasi substituted plaintiff, she asks the court to investigate the circumstances of his killing. If his negligence in the act is imputed to her, should not, also, his conduct after the injury be imputed to her? In spite of all the recent statutes, "the husband is still the head of the family." his life is his own, and whatever right in that life the law gives to the wife must be subject to the superior right of the husband. While the law gives her the full value of that life, she takes it as he left it. If it was a valuable life, in a pecuniary sense,—if his health, his strength, his habits, were such as to give it a great earning capacity,—then great is her recovery. But if, on the contrary, he had so lived as to lessen these elements of pecuniary value,—if by idleness and vice and dissipation he had shorn himself of his strength,—the wife's right therein must be taken burdened by what he has done in his lifetime. While he lives, his life and his person belong to himself, and he must use that life and body for the support of his family. He must be left free, when injured, to settle for the wrongs which were to him, and to him alone; he must be at liberty to adjust that wrong without the amount of his settlement being diminished by the possibility or probability that the person dealing with him will have to pay a second time for the same act. The family stand to him in the relation of heirs, and, like all heirs, have no rights which can interfere with those of the living. They take what he leaves. They take under him and subject to him, and not adversely to him. Under this statute the cause of action primarily grows out of the relation between the husband and the wrongdoer, and his rights against the wrongdoer. The full value of action is in him. Only secondarily is it in the wife, and it comes to her, if it comes at all, burdened and incumbered by his conduct, his settlement, and whatever else he did in his lifetime in reference thereto. It is true, she may recover the full value of his life, but that value depends on what he was and what he did in his life-tion into dollars and cents, and deprived his family of any further value growing out of the negligence complained of. Let us take an instance. A husband loses a limb under circumstances which entitle him to recover. He brings suit. On the trial the judge charges the jury that they may allow the plaintiff compensation for his pain and suffering, for the mortification of living as a maimed man, for all damages arising from the impairment of his health and from the shock to his nervous system; in addition, they will, from the tables, determine what was his expectancy of life at the time of the injury, and how much his earning capacity had been diminished. They will multiply the amount of this diminished capacity by the number of years he would have lived according to the table, reduce that to its present value, and that sum, plus what they allow for pain, suffering, etc., would be the amount of their verdict. Now, in the language of Judge McCay in Railroad Co. v. Johnson, 38 Ga. 409, "it is impossible to estimate the value of a life." Still, the law is obliged to measure pain and suffering and life in dollars and cents, and according to rules which are not intended to bankrupt the defendant. In all cases of this class the plaintiff himself consents that the injury shall be valued in money. When he gets a verdict the law has done all it can to make him whole. The limb and the health have been valued in the only way possible to the law. Theoretically, after he gets a verdict he has got them back, valued upon the theory that he would have lived out the full term of his life. The jury does not give him the value of his hand for one day, but for twenty years. The jury treats him as though, by a legal certainty, he would live out his allotted span, and thus restores him to himself and family sound and well. Exactly the same results flow from a settlement, because our Code (section 3035) so encourages adjustments that it "will not force parties to litigate in order to have done what they ought, and are willing, voluntarily to do." The settlement or the verdict has atoned for the wrong of the defendant. After that he may claim that whatever injury was done has been cured, and that he is no longer liable to the injured person or those who claim under him.

The substantial grounds on which the courts must hold that the husband's settlement bars the wife are based upon the fact that the wife's right in the life of the husband is subordinate to what he himself has done with his life; that, as his negligence is imputable to her, so his ratification and condonation of the wrong done him estop her; that his acceptance of payment ratifies the act, and admits that he has been made whole of his injury; that thereafter the defendant can say he has not harmed the husband, but bar, upon considerations of a public policy encouraging compromises, which would be rendered difficult, if not impossible, under the view contended for by defendants in error. The contention of the defendants in error means that, if a settlement takes place, the defendant may be called upon to pay a second time in case of death. It means double damages. It means that the statute is to be treated as penal, and not compensatory. It means that we are to lay at the door of our statute the reproach which was so often and so justly uttered against the statutes of some of the other states, as to which it was said that it was actually "cheaper to kill than to hurt." With us, hereafter, it would mean the same thing, because for the death of the husband there would only be one recovery. For his injury and subsequent death, there could be two recoveries. We have seen that statutes identical with ours in substance, having the same object in view, and intended to give the same rights, have all, or very nearly all, been construed to mean that where the husband was injured, and subsequently settled for the injury, and thereafter died from the effect of the injury, there could be no recovery by his wife for his death. She stands in his shoes. She recovers if he could have recovered. She fails if for any reason he would have failed. If he consented to the injury, she cannot recover. If he ratifies the injury by accepting compensation, she cannot recover. If by ordinary care he could have avoided the injury, she cannot recover. If he obtains judgment against the defendant, she cannot recover. What would have estopped him estops her. Not only would it be a hardship to require a defendant to pay double damages, but there are questions of public policy which cry out against such a construction,—a public policy so pronounced that it would require every reasonable doubt to be resolved in its favor. If the defendant is to pay the injured man full damages, and subsequently is to pay the full value of his life, it becomes manifest that settlements are impossible. It would operate to deprive the injured party "of the power of settling his claim or realizing anything from it in his lifetime. It would naturally, if not inevitably, prevent settlements and procrastinate litigation until it could be determined whether death would ensue from the injury. There could be little inducement to settle without suit, because whatever might be paid to the injured party would neither bar nor diminish the claim of his widow or children should death ensue. The statute should not be strained to bring about such a result, nor should it be reached unless required by the plain language of the enactment." Littlewood v. Mayor, etc., 89 N. Y. 24, 42 Am. Rep. 276, 277. Under such a construction the law, by its own act, would en-that there should be an end of litigation." It would make it impossible to obey the injunction, "Agree with thine adversary quickly whilst thou art in the way with him;" for the defendant can properly ask, "Who is mine adversary?" He might be willing to settle, he may have agreed on terms, and yet he would be compelled to say to a husband and father: "It is impossible to say whether you will die as a result of these injuries or not, or whether when you die your wife and your children will then be living or not, or whether you will be wifeless and childless. She may consent to the settlement, but she may also die, and you may marry again. Or the wife may die and leave you children. It is impossible to settle with them, because they are minors, and, even if that were legally possible, there may be after-born children; and all of these uncertainties must be considered in our negotiations." Surely the law does not intend that any case shall be so inchoate that the person liable does not know to whom he may be ultimately liable, and cannot adjust and settle, even when he admits liability and is willing to pay. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except COBB and LEWIS, JJ., who dissent.

COBB, J. (dissenting). Mrs. M. B. Cassin brought suit against the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company, alleging in her petition that she was the widow of George S. Cassin, who departed this life on the 10th day of December, 1897; that on the 16th day of May, 1892, while her husband was walking along the sidewalks of one of the streets of the city of Atlanta, the servants and employés of the defendant, who were engaged in placing a cable wire weighing about 500 pounds upon poles which were above the sidewalk upon which her husband was walking, negligently allowed such cable wire to fall to the street and strike her husband upon his head; that he was knocked insensible, and remained in that condition for some time; that the blow produced concussion of the brain and spinal cord, producing at the time partial paralysis, greatly impairing his power of locomotion; that the injuries thus inflicted impaired his mind; and that from them his death resulted. It was further alleged that from the sidewalk to the point on the post at which the cable wire was being fastened was a distance of 30 feet, and that the employés of the defendant negligently failed to hold the same securely and firmly, or to take any measures to keep the same from falling, having failed to fasten or hook the same in any manner whatever while handling and placing it in position on the poles, and negligently allowing it to slip from its fastening and from their grasp. The defendant filed an answer denying the allegations of negligence, and that the death of the husband of plaintiff was caused by the injuries be hereinafter referred to. The case came on for trial, and resulted in a verdict against the defendant for the sum of $3,500. Although it does not distinctly so appear, it is to be inferred from the record that Mrs. Cassin died pending the action, and that the children of the deceased were made parties plaintiff, as the motion for a new trial which appears in the record states the parties plaintiff as "Georgia A. Cassin et al., by next friend." This motion for a new trial was overruled, and to this judgment the defendant excepted.

1. The defendant filed a special plea in which it was set up that the deceased, prior to his death, brought suit against the defendant for the injuries alleged in the declaration, and on the 19th of January, 1893, the defendant settled his claim, paying him in full settlement the sum of $2,500, and taking from him a release, in which it was recited that the sum above named was received in full settlement of the suit against the company then pending in the city court of Atlanta, and also in full settlement of any and all claims for damages on his part arising out of the injuries received by him on or about May 16, 1892. These facts were pleaded as an accord and satisfaction of all claims growing out of the right of action now instituted by the plaintiffs, and in bar of the suit now prosecuted by them. Upon demurrer the court struck the plea, and this is one of the errors assigned. This assignment of error presents for decision the question whether a person who has been injured by the wrongful act of another, from which death does not instantaneously ensue, can, by a contract entered into by him with the wrongdoer, defeat the right of his widow or children, as the case may be, to bring an action for damages growing out of the homicide, if death should finally result from the wrongful act of which he has been the victim. Impressed with the importance of this question, and realizing the serious consequences which will result from a decision either way, I have endeavored to make a thorough investigation into the history of the law under which the present action was brought, as well as into the decisions of the courts of this country and of England on statutes of a similar nature.

In 1845 Lord Campbell introduced into the house of lords what he termed a bill "for giving compensation to the families of persons killed by negligence." The bill passed the house of lords, but was lost in the house of commons. See 10 Camp. Lives Ld. Ch. p. 149. In 1846, however, the bill did pass both houses of parliament, and was passed for the purpose, says the author in his autobiography, of "giving a compensation by action to the families of those who are killed by the negligence of others." 12 Camp. Lives Ld. Ch. p. 265. That act is known to history as "Lord Campbell's Act," and that a person shall be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then, and in every such case, the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued, shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to felony." 1 Shear. & R. Neg. § 126. In this connection, as a part of the history of this law, showing the chief objection which was raised to it at the time of its passage, and the importance with which the author regarded it, the following is extracted from 10 Camp. Lives Ld. Ch. pp. 153, 154: "The latter [that is, the death by negligence compensation bill] was now a good deal discussed, and Lyndhurst [the lord chancellor] showed some disposition to cavil it. He pretended, rather, to stand up for the old common-law maxim that 'the life of man is too valuable to allow of any estimate of the damages to be given for the loss of it.' I said: 'If a lord chancellor were killed by an accident on a railway, there might certainly be a difficulty in estimating the sum his family should receive by way of compensation for the pecuniary loss. This would depend much upon the probable tenure of his office if he had survived; for he might be likely to retain it for twenty years, or he might be on the point of being ejected from it by an inevitable change of ministry.' Lord Lyndhurst: 'There is a much more difficult case which may arise than that which my noble and learned friend has had the kindness to suggest. If my noble and learned friend should unfortunately himself fall a sacrifice to railway negligence, being at present without office and without retired allowance, how would a jury be able to estimate the value of his hopes?' The bill, however, did pass both houses, notwithstanding a powerful exertion of railway interest to crush it, and it has been the most popular of all my efforts at legislation."

It was the settled doctrine of the common law that no one could maintain a civil action for damages on account of the death of a human being. "The multiplication of fatal accidents in later times, and the practical impossibility of securing the punishment of mere carelessness by means of criminal proceedings," has been assigned as the reason for the passage by the British parliament of Lord Campbell's act. 1 Shear. & R. Neg. § 125. Statutes of a similar nature have been passed in nearly all of the different states of the Union. The first legislation on the subject in this state was an act passed in 1850, which was in the following words: "In all cases hereafter where death shall enstor of the injury, the legal representative of such deceased shall be entitled to have and maintain an action at law against the person committing the act from which the death has resulted—one-half of the recovery to be paid to the wife and children, or the husband of the deceased, if any, in case of his or her estate being insolvent." Cobb, Dig. p. 476. In 1856 an act in the following words became a law: "If any one shall be killed by the carelessness, negligence or improper conduct of any of said railroad companies, their officers, agents or employés, by the running of the cars or engines of any of said companies, the right of action to recover damages, shall vest in his widow, if any, if no widow, it shall vest in his children, if any, and if no child or children, it shall vest in his legal representatives." Acts 1855–56, p. 155. The acts of 1850 and 1856 above quoted were not carried into the first Code in the exact language in which they were enacted, but in lieu of such acts the following section appears: "A widow, or if no widow a child or children, may recover for the homicide of the husband or parent; and if suit be brought by the widow or children, and the former, or one of the latter, dies pending the action, the same shall survive in the first case to the children, and in the latter case to the surviving child or children." Code 1861, § 2913. The sections of the Codes of 1868 and 1873 dealing with this matter are in exactly the same language as that just above quoted. Code 1868, § 2920; Code 1873, § 2971. In 1878 the section of the Code of 1873 above cited was amended by adding thereto the following words: "The plaintiff, whether widow or child, or children, may recover the full value of the life of the deceased as shown by the evidence. In the event of a recovery by the widow, she shall hold the amount recovered, subject to the law of descents just as if it had been personal property descending to the widow and children from the deceased." "No recovery had under the provisions of this act, and the law of which it is amendatory, shall be subject to any debt or liability of any character of the deceased husband or parent." Acts 1878–79, p. 59. The section as thus amended appears in the Code of 1882, § 2971. This latter section was amended by an act passed in 1887 (Acts 1887, p. 44), and the provisions of the section as thus amended appear in sections 3828 and 3829 of the Civil Code in the following language:

"Sec. 3828. A widow, or, if no widow, a child or children, may recover for the homicide of the husband or parent; and if suit be brought by the widow or children, and the former or one of the latter dies pending the action, the same shall survive in the first case to the children, and in the latter to the surviving child or children. The husjointly, and not separately, with the right to recover the full value of the life of the deceased, as shown by the evidence, and with the right of survivorship as to said suit if either die pending the action. A mother, or, if no mother, a father, may recover for the homicide of a child minor or sui juris, upon whom she or he is dependent, or who contributes to his or her support, unless said child leave a wife, husband or child. Said mother and father shall be entitled to recover the full value of the life of said child."

"Sec. 3829. The word 'homicide,' used in the preceding section, shall be held to include all cases where the death of a human being results from a crime or from criminal or other negligence. The plaintiff, whether widow, or child, or children, may recover the full value of the life of the deceased, as shown by the evidence. In the event of a recovery by the widow she shall hold the amount recovered subject to the law of descents, as if it had been personal property descending to the widow and children from the deceased, and no recovery had under the provisions of this section shall be subject to any debt or liability of any character of the deceased husband, or parent. The full value of the life of the deceased, as shown by the evidence, is the full value of the life of the deceased without deduction for necessary or other personal expenses of the deceased had he lived."

In 1889 an act was passed, which is now embodied in section 3825 of the Civil Code, which declared that "no action for a tort shall abate by the death of either party where the wrong-doer received any benefit from the tort complained of; nor shall any action for the recovery of damages for homicide, injury to person or injury to property abate by the death of either party; but such cause of action, in case of the death of the plaintiff, shall, in the event there is no right of survivorship in any other person, survive to the personal representative of the deceased plaintiff, and in case of the death of the defendant, shall survive against said defendant's personal representative." Acts 1889, p. 73.

In the light of this history, what intention must be ascribed to the general assembly in making the changes in the law from time to time, finally culminating in the acts of 1887 and 1889? Was it their intention by this legislation to create one cause of action when a person received an injury as a consequence of the wrongful act done by another, this cause of action to be in the person injured, to deal with as he pleased, to the exclusion of every one else, if he survived the wrongful act, and the cause of action to survive to some other person in the event death was instantaneous, or that the person injured had failed to secure, by suit or settlement, com- and independent causes of action,—the one to be in the party injured, for whatever damages he might sustain, and to survive to his legal representatives in the event he died without receiving compensation; the recovery by the administrator to be assets of the estate of the deceased, to be administered according to law; and the other a cause of action in the widow or children or other person named in the statute as authorized to sue for the homicide of another, with the right to recover the full value of the life of the deceased? The general assembly have a right to impose upon a wrongdoer any penalty suitable as a punishment for the wrong he has committed, which is not prohibited by some constitutional provision. It is therefore within the province of the general assembly to impose double damages upon one who has by his wrongful act damaged another. In order, however, to authorize a holding that the general assembly has inflicted upon a wrongdoer a penalty amounting to double damages, it must appear clearly from the legislative acts that such was the intention of the lawmaking body. A law authorizing a widow to recover damages from one who wrongfully takes the life of her husband, the amount of damages to be recovered being either a specific sum, as is the case in the statutes of some of the states, or an amount to be ascertained by a stated rule, as is the case with the statute in this state, is nothing more or less than a legislative imposition upon a person who is the negligent cause of the death of another of a punishment for this negligent act, and the penalty inflicted is allowed to go to the person who sustained loss by the wrongful act, as compensation for the damage done him. While such legislation is punitive so far as the defendant is concerned, it is remedial so far as the plaintiff is concerned. That the legislature in such cases may impose double damages upon a wrongdoer, seems to be unquestioned. Littlewood v. Mayor, etc., 89 N. Y. 24, 27. The act of 1850 created a cause of action in the legal representative of the person whose death was brought about under circumstances which would have entitled him, "if death had not ensued," to a right of action. The amount recovered in this case was assets in the hands of the administrator for administration according to law, unless the deceased was insolvent at the time of his death, in which event one-half of the recovery was to be paid over to the widow and children. As the general assembly would have the right, as has been seen, to impose a double penalty upon a wrongdoer, and as this intention must be clearly apparent from the terms of the statute, it may be that a proper construction of this act would be that it was a survival statute, and gave to the legal representative a right to bring a suit only in the event no set-him and was pending at the date of his death, and for that reason had abated. The act of 1856 provided that if any one should be killed by the carelessness, negligence, or improper conduct of a railroad company in the running of its cars or engines, the right of action to recover damages should vest in his widow; if no widow, in his child or children; and, if no child or children, then in his legal representatives. While the words of this statute do not clearly indicate that it was intended by the general assembly as a survival statute, as is the case with the act of 1850, still, keeping in mind the rule that the infliction of a double penalty by legislative enactment must be clear and unequivocal, a proper construction of this act would probably be that the right of action of the widow or child or legal representative, as the case might be, would depend upon whether the deceased had received compensation for the wrongful act which resulted in his death. It is to be noted that under the act of 1850 the right of action was in the legal representative, although in one contingency a part of the recovery belonged to the widow and children, to the exclusion of creditors. Under the act of 1856 the right of action was in the widow or children, if there were either, and the recovery was had to the exclusion of all other persons interested in the estate of the deceased; and, if there was no widow or no children, there was still a right of action in the legal representative, the amount recovered in such a case being subject to administration as any other assets in the hands of the legal representative. These two statutes seem to connect the cause of action which the deceased had in his lifetime with the cause of action which was allowed to be asserted under the acts. While under the act of 1850 the widow and children are entitled to rights in the recovery which they would not be entitled to in the ordinary assets of the estate of the deceased, still the power to assert the right is in the legal representative, who would be recognized in law as the successor to the right of action which was in the deceased. And although under the act of 1856, as we have seen, the right of action was vested primarily in the widow, eo nomine, still a strict construction of this act might require that it be construed to be a survival statute, and not one creating a cause of action independent of that which could be asserted by the person injured. The provisions of the Code of 1861 which are quoted above, and which have been carried into all the Codes, and are now the law of this state, in the exact language which appears in the first Code, while evidently taken from the acts above referred to, are materially different in language from the old law. There is now no distinction in regard to this matter between the liability of natural persons and corporations of 1850 as one given to recover where death ensued under circumstances which would have entitled the deceased, had death not ensued, to sue and recover for the injury to him; nor, as in the act of 1856, as one to recover for the carelessness, negligence, or improper conduct of the wrongdoer; and what is intended to be accomplished by these expressions is embraced in the present law in the one word "homicide." The person authorized to bring the suit is the widow, and, if no widow, the child or children. If the widow brings the suit, and dies pending the same, the action survives to the child or children; and, if there were no widow and no child or children, there was, prior to the act of 1887, no right of action in any one, and prior to the act of 1889 a suit brought by the widow would, upon her death, abate, if there were no children, and, if brought by the children, upon their death would abate. In no event, either under the law as it was prior to the act of 1887, or as it is since the passage of that act, can a legal representative bring a suit for the homicide of his intestate. It does seem to us clear that the changes by the Code of 1861 in the acts of 1850 and 1856 manifest an intention to separate the right of action which is in the person for the wrongful act committed upon him from the right of action which is, under the law, in the widow or other persons if death results from such wrongful act. If one survives the injury inflicted upon him by the wrongdoer, he is to have a right to demand compensation for this wrong, and this is independent of any right which any other person might have to make claim upon the wrongdoer either in the lifetime of the person injured or after his death. If death results, or, in the language of the law, if there is a homicide, then the widow of the deceased, or other person named in the statute, is entitled to demand compensation under the terms of the statute; and this right is entirely separate, distinct, and independent from the right which the deceased could assert in his lifetime. A right of action under the act of 1850 in the legal representative, and a right of action in a certain contingency under the act of 1856 in the legal representative, would seem to be intended by the legislature as a means of transmitting from the deceased to the widow or other person the right of action of the deceased. Such being the case, if the right of action was settled during the lifetime of the deceased, there was nothing to be transmitted through the medium of his legal representative to his widow, or other persons who might sustain loss by his death. When the legislature sees proper, as it has done, to eliminate the legal representative from the statutes authorizing suits for homicide, and leave the person injured with full right to bring his suit for damages and demand com-tion for the homicide, and there being no words whatever in the statute which could be strained to connect the right of the deceased to bring an action during his lifetime with the right of the widow or other person named to bring an action after his death, but one conclusion can be arrived at, and that is that it was the intention of the general assembly to create two separate and distinct causes of action, which may be asserted independently of each other; and this would be true notwithstanding in some cases the effect of it would be to impose upon the wrongdoer a double penalty as a punishment for the injury which he has inflicted. This view of the case is strengthened when we consider the act of 1889. Prior to that act a suit brought by a person during his lifetime abated upon his death. In other words, the right of one to demand compensation for the injury done him existed as long as he lived, and, when he did not succeed in securing a settlement of the demand during his lifetime, the right of action did not pass to his legal representatives. The act of 1889 provides that no action for the recovery of damages for injury to the person suing shall abate by the death of either party, but shall survive to the personal representatives of the deceased plaintiff. In such case the amount of the recovery by the legal representative would be assets in his hands for administration according to law. There is no provision, as in the act of 1850, that such recovery should be for the benefit of the widow and children, and therefore it cannot be properly held that it was the intention of the general assembly by this act to provide that when this cause of action survived it would defeat the right of the widow to bring suit for the homicide; and it certainly cannot be held that the widow's suit for the homicide could be pleaded in abatement of this suit, which survived to the personal representative. As the law giving an action to the widow for the homicide says nothing at all in reference to the right of the husband to bring an action during his lifetime for the injury to him, so the act which provides that the husband's suit, in the event of his death, shall survive to his legal representative, says nothing at all in reference to the right of the widow to bring a suit in the event he dies. If the pendency of a suit by the legal representatives for the injury to the deceased could not be pleaded in abatement of the suit of the widow for the homicide of her husband, I am at a loss to understand how it could be contended that the judgment in favor of the deceased during his lifetime could be so pleaded; and for a similar reason it would seem that an accord and satisfaction entered into between the deceased and the wrongdoer during his lifetime would not be a bar to the suit by the widow after his death. I can arperson was negligently injured, and death did not immediately, but did finally, result from the injury received; that is, the one which the person injured would have under the common law, and the other one which the widow or other person named in the statute would have under the Code of 1861 as amended by the act of 1887.

I have been unable to find any ruling by this court which would be either directly controlling upon this question, or which would have such a bearing upon the same as would be recognized as persuasive authority either way. It is proper, however, in this discussion, to allude to the rulings and utterances of the court in some of the cases which have been brought under the different statutes above referred to. So far as I have been able to ascertain, the only case brought under the act of 1850 which ever reached this court was the case of Railroad Co. v. Paulk, 24 Ga. 356. No ruling was made in that case which would have any bearing upon the question now under consideration. No case brought under the act of 1856 seems ever to have reached this court. The first time that this court was called upon to deal with the law as contained in the Code of 1861 was in 1868, after the Code of that year went into effect. This was in the case of Railroad Co. v. Johnson, 38 Ga. 409, where it was held that, if the deceased by the exercise of ordinary diligence could have avoided the injury, his widow could not recover damages, and also that, if both the deceased and the wrongdoer were at fault, the damages would be diminished in proportion to the negligence or want of ordinary care on the part of the deceased. It is to be noted that this decision was prior to the act which declared that the measure of damages should be the full value of the life of the deceased. In the case of Railroad Co. v. Strong, 52 Ga. 461, Judge McCay uses this language: "But by our law the right is given by statute to the wife generally for the 'homicide' of her husband. Cases of self-defense, of inevitable accident, of execution by command of the law, etc., must, from the nature of things, be excepted. And it seems to us that the true inquiry is, has the defendant violated any of the public or private obligations he was under to the deceased? Whether those obligations or duties were implied by law or existed by express contract is immaterial, but that some duty, public or private, was violated by the homicide, would seem to follow from the very nature of a wrong, and from the principles of justice and equity. And our original act giving this action puts the right precisely on this ground, to wit, whenever the husband, had he lived, would have had a right of action, then the wife has it in case of his death." In the case of Hendricks v. Railroad Co., 52 Ga. 467, it was held that, with the killing, or any relation existing by contract or by law between the deceased and the defendant which would bar a recovery by him for damages in case he had lived, apply to and govern the right of the wife. A similar ruling was made in the case of Railroad Co. v. Ayers, 53 Ga. 12. In the case of Cottingham v. Weeks, 54 Ga. 275, it was ruled that the fact the defendant had been tried upon an indictment charging him with the offense of murder and had been acquitted could not be pleaded in bar of the widow's suit for the homicide. When the case came before this court a second time, in 56 Ga. 201, it was held that a widow could recover for the homicide of her husband, whether the homicide be the act of a natural or artificial person, or the result of intention or criminal negligence. The ruling in the Hendricks Case, supra, was followed and approved in the case of Railroad Co. v. Johnson, 60 Ga. 667. In the case of Railroad Co. v. Roach, 64 Ga. 635, it was held that a suit by a widow against a railroad company for the homicide of her husband, who was an employé of the road, could not be maintained unless it was shown that, in the transaction resulting in the death of the employé, he was free from fault. In Daly v. Stoddard, 66 Ga. 145, it was held that, in order to authorize a recovery by a widow for the homicide of her husband, his death must have been caused by some act amounting to a crime, or by the criminal negligence of the defendants. This case was decided before the passage of the act of 1887. In Cook v. Railroad Co., 72 Ga. 48, it was held that a contract entered into by a husband who was an employé of the company, which waived the right to sue for injuries resulting from criminal negligence on its part, was void, and could not be pleaded in bar of the widow's right to recover. In Berry v. Railroad Co., Id. 137, it was held that a widow had a right of action for the homicide of her husband whenever the husband, had he lived, would have had such right, and that whatever could have been a good defense to his suit would be equally available against one brought by the widow. An examination of that case, however, will show that the defense relied on was that the deceased could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence. In Railroad Co. v. Brantley, 93 Ga. 259, 20 S. E. 98, the rule that a widow of an employé of a railroad company could not recover against the company for the homicide of her husband, if the husband was at fault, or if he could have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, was recognized. In Railroad Co. v. Fitzgerald it was held that an admission by a person tending to show that an injury which was admissible in evidence in a suit brough by the widow to recover for the homicid See, also, in this connection, Railroad Co. v Roach, 70 Ga. 434; Railway Co. v. Stewar 71 Ga. 427.

It clearly appears from the present law o the state governing rights of actions of th character involved in the present case, a well as from the decisions of this cour above referred to, that a widow or othe person named in the statute is not entitle to recover unless the homicide is brough about as a result of a crime, or criminal o other negligence of the party occasioning it and that no recovery can be had for the homicide if the negligence of the deceased was of such a character as would have precluded a recovery by him, or if during his life he had done any act or entered into any contract which would have the effect of rendering the act which brought about his death one which was either lawful in the person committing the same, or one for which he would not be legally responsible. In other words, the right of a widow to recover is not because the death of her husband has been brought about by an act of some person, but his death must be the result of some act of commission or omission on the part of the defendant which the law would declare to be negligent, and under such circumstances that, had death not resulted, he would have been entitled to demand compensation. It is, therefore, clearly right that the widow should be deprived of her right to bring a suit if the deceased could have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence by the exercise of ordinary care, as well as in the case where the deceased had entered into a contract which had the effect of making the act of the defendant lawful as to him, and also in all of those cases where the facts and circumstances surrounding the killing, as well as those leading up to and preceding it, were such as to show either that the defendant had been guilty of no wrongful act, or that the deceased was the victim of his own folly in matter of contract, or of his carelessness in matter of conduct. All of the cases which we have cited above (being all we have been able to find in our Reports dealing with the question under consideration) relate to some act done by the deceased prior to or concurrent with the injury which he received. When a person is injured by the wrongful act of another, a foundation is at once laid for a cause of action in favor of those entitled under the law to demand compensation for his death, and the moment that his death results from such wrongful act the cause of action is full and complete. Nothing the person injured can say or do between the date of the wrongful act and his death can defeat the cause of action for the homicide. The Fitzgerald poses a wrongful act resulting in the death of the person wronged. In the Fitzgerald Case, evidence of an admission of the party injured was allowed, to show that no wrongful act had been committed by the defendant, but that the act complained of, as to the person injured, was lawful. Hence it tended to establish that no wrongful act was committed, and therefore no cause of action arose in favor of anybody. For the purpose of admitting such evidence, the deceased and the widow might be considered in privity. But, even if this is not true, the admission of the evidence in the Fitzgerald Case was predicated upon another principle; and that is that a declaration against interest by a person since deceased, under well-established principles, as recognized by the authorities there cited, is admissible in a controversy between third persons. It would seem that the ruling made in that case was better supported by the latter reason than by the former. In the case of Railroad Co. v. Bass, 104 Ga. 390, 30 S. E. 874, this court had before it the question as to when the statute of limitations began to run against the widow's right of action to recover for the homicide of her husband. It was held that, as such right did not exist until he was dead, the statute of limitations began to run from his death, and not from the time that the injury was inflicted which caused his death. In the opinion Mr. Justice Fish uses this language: "The plaintiff's action, however, was not for injuries done to the person of her husband. She had no right under the law to sue for such injuries. No one except the husband himself could maintain an action for them. If, however, such injuries resulted in his death, then, under section 3828 of the Civil Code, a right of action accrued to her. That section provides that a widow may recover for the homicide of her husband, and plaintiff's suit is based upon the cause of action therein given her. This statute does not profess to revive the cause of action for the injury to the deceased in favor of his widow, nor is such its legal effect; but it creates a new cause of action, in favor of the widow, unknown to the common law. The right of action given by the statute is for the homicide of the husband, in all cases where the death results from a crime, or from criminal or other negligence, and is founded on a new grievance, namely, his homicide, and is for the injury thereby sustained by the widow and children, to whose exclusive benefit the damages must inure." While the question now under consideration was not directly involved in that case, the argument made by Mr. Justice Fish in demonstrating the correctness of the conclusion as to the question then before him directly bears upon the present question, even if it is not conclusive of the same.

England, and, while the decisions are not altogether in accord, some of them are authority for the conclusion which I have reached in the present case. Those holding the contrary are based on statutes more nearly similar to Lord Campbell's act, and it may be conceded, for the sake of the argument, that the cases which hold that and similar statutes to be survival statutes were correctly decided. See, in this connection, Tiff. Death Wrongf. Act, § 24. This, however, did not seem to be the opinion of the author of that act, as is shown by the above-quoted extracts from his Lives of the Lord Chancellors. In the case of Needham v. Railway Co., 38 Vt. 294, it was held that, under statutes which are very similar to ours, two causes of action arose out of the wrongful death of another,—one in favor of the decedent, for his loss and suffering resulting from the injury in his lifetime; the other founded on his death, or on the damages resulting from his death to the widow or next of kin of the deceased,—and that each cause of action was to be prosecuted independently of the other; the damages allowed to be recovered in the two statutes being given upon entirely different principles, and for different purposes. Under statutes of a similar nature the supreme court of Mississippi held that a right of action in the administrator to prosecute a suit for personal injuries begun during the lifetime of his intestate was distinct from and independent of the right of action given by statute to the next of kin to recover for the death of the person, caused by the wrongful or negligent act of another; that the two sections could co-exist; and that they had no connection with each other. Railroad Co. v. Phillips, 64 Miss. 693, 2 South. 537. The court of appeals of New York held that a statute very similar to Lord Campbell's act was not simply remedial, but created a new cause of action in favor of the personal representative of the deceased, which was wholly distinct from, and not a revivor of, the cause of action which, if he had survived, he would have had for his bodily injury. Whitford v. Railroad Co., 23 N. Y. 465. Judge Denio, in his opinion, uses this language: "But the suggestion that the present action is brought to enforce the right which the common law gave to the deceased, and that the provisions of our statute should be considered as affecting only the remedy, which may always be regulated by the lex fori, is not, in my opinion, sound; for it is not a simple devolution of a cause of action which the deceased would have had which the statute effects, but it is an entirely new cause of action which is here sought to be enforced. The system of the statute as well as of the common law is that the right of action for damages on account of his bodily injuries, which elonged to the deceased while he lived, was ttinguished by his death. The statute does ot profess to revive his cause of action in avor of the executor or administrator. The ompensation for the bodily injuries re- ains extinct, but a new grievance of a dis- nct nature, namely, the deprivation suffer- l by the wife and children or other rela- ves of their natural support and protection, ises upon his death, and is made by the atute the subject of a new cause of action favor of these surviving relatives, but to e prosecuted in point of form by the ex- cutor or administrator. The reference in ie first section of the statute of 1847 to ie ability of the deceased to maintain the ction if death had not ensued is inserted olely for the purpose of defining the kind nd degree of delinquency with which the efendant must be chargeable in order to ubject him to the action. The act, neglect, r default must be such as would, if death ad not ensued, have entitled the party in- ured to maintain an action," etc. The su- reme court of Arkansas held, under stat- tes similar to ours, that two causes of ac- on could be maintained for the wrongful eath of an individual,—one for the benefit f his estate, and the other for the benefit f his next of kin. Davis v. Railway Co. Ark.) 13 S. W. 801. Section 18, c. 52, of ie Public Statutes of Massachusetts pro- ides that if a person suffers bodily injury r damage to his property through a de- ect in a highway, townway, causeway, or ridge, which defect might have been reme- ied, or which damage or injury might have een prevented, by the exercise of reason- ble care and diligence on the part of those bliged by law to repair the same, he might ecover against the wrongdoer for such in- ury or damage. Section 17 provides that, ' life is lost on account of an injury re- eived in the manner described in the fore- oing section, an action may be brought gainst the county, town, or person obliged y law to make the repairs, by the personal epresentative of the deceased, for the ben- fit of the widow and children, to recover sum not exceeding $1,000. In Bowes v. ity of Boston, 29 N. E. 633, 15 L. R. A. 65, the supreme court of Massachusetts eld that the action provided for in section 8 survived the death of the person injured, nd was independent of the action provided or in section 17, and that "both actions nay proceed at the same time, on independ- nt ground, and for different purposes." A tatute of Kansas provides that causes of ction for personal injury survive the death f the person injured. Comp. Laws 1879, § 20. Another section provides: "When the eath of one is caused by the wrongful act r omission of another, the personal repre- entatives of the former may maintain an ction therefor against the latter, if the for- ier might have maintained an action, had e lived, against the latter for an injury or the same act or omission." Id. § 422. The section further provides that the damages recovered in such a case shall not exceed $10,000, and shall inure to the exclusive benefit of the widow and children, if any, or next of kin. In McCarthy v. Railroad Co., 18 Kan. 46, it was held that the action for personal injuries survived only in the event the death did not result from such injuries, and that, where death resulted from the injuries, only the action for the homicide, for the benefit of the next of kin, could be maintained. This decision was followed by the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kansas in Hulbert v. City of Topeka, 34 Fed. 510. Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion, and, while he felt bound by the decision, he criticised adversely the ruling therein made, as the following extract from his opinion will show: "I was a member of the supreme bench of Kansas at the time this opinion was filed, and concurred in it. I feel constrained to follow that decision; and yet I may be permitted to say that my examination of this case has led me to doubt the correctness of that conclusion, for the measure of damages and the basis of recovery under the two sections are entirely distinct. Section 422 [the homicide section] gives a new right of action,—one not existing before; an action which is not founded on survivorship; an action which takes no account of the wrong done to the decedent, but one which gives to the widow or next of kin damages which have been sustained by reason of the wrongful taking away of the life of the decedent. It makes no difference whether the injured party was killed instantly, or lived months; whether he suffered lingering pain or not; whether or not he was put to any expense for medical attendance and nursing. None of these matters are to be considered in an action under section 422, and the single question is, how much has the wrongful taking away of his life injured his widow or next of kin? It is an action to recover damages for the death, and in no sense a survival of an action which the decedent himself had in his lifetime." In Railway Co. v. Bennett's Estate, 47 Pac. 183, a decision rendered in 1896, the court of appeals of Kansas, in a well-considered opinion by Garver, J., repudiated the doctrine laid down in the McCarthy Case, and put itself in line with the above-quoted language of Mr. Justice Brewer, and with other decisions referred to in the opinion. It will be noticed that the Kansas law is very similar to Lord Campbell's act. In Adams v. Railway Co. (C. C.) 95 Fed. 938, it was held that the statutes of Washington and Idaho, which are very similar to Lord Campbell's act, created an entirely new cause of action, independent of the right of the deceased to recover for the injuries to him.

The following decisions, while not directly in point, in their reasoning tend to support the conclusion I have reached in the 69 Ill. App. 256; Railroad Co. v. Wymore, 40 Neb. 645, 58 N. W. 1120; The Oregon (D. C.) 73 Fed. 846; Com. v. Metropolitan R. Co., 107 Mass. 236; Railway Co. v. Hosea (Ind. Sup.) 53 N. Railroad Co. (Mass.) 37 N. E. 770, 59 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 118; Donahue v. Drexler (Ky.) 56 Am. Rep. 886; Hurst v. Railway Co. (Mich.) 48 N. W. 44; Westcott v. Railroad Co. (Vt.) 17 Atl. 745; Railroad Co. v. Kuehn, 70 Tex. 582, 8 S. W. 484; Munro v. Reclamation Co. (Cal.) 24 Pac. 303; Putman v. Southern Pac. Co. (Or.) 27 Pac. 1033; Belding v. Railroad Co. (S. D.) 53 N. W. 750.

It has been ruled in England that the cause of action under Lord Campbell's act was the defendant's negligence, and that, if the deceased had in his lifetime accepted a sum of money in full satisfaction and discharge of his claim against the defendant, this would bar the right of the legal representative to recover for the homicide, the death of the person injured not creating "a fresh cause of action." Read v. Railway Co., L. R. 3 Q. B. 555, 9 Best & S. 714. See, also, Griffiths v. Earl of Dudley, 9 Q. B. Div. 357; Haigh v. Packet Co., 52 L. J. Q. B. (N. S.) 640; Wood v. Gray [1892] App. Cas. 576. The decisions, however, in England, even under Lord Campbell's act, have not been uniform. In Bradshaw v. Railway Co., 10 C. P. 189, it was held that where a person was injured on a railway by an accident, and after an interval died, his executor might maintain an action for damage to his personal estate arising in his lifetime from medical expenses and loss occasioned by his inability to attend to business. In making the decision the court found it necessary to construe Lord Campbell's act, and in reference thereto Grove, J., uses this language: "The intention of the act was to give the personal representative a right to recover compensation as a trustee for children or other relatives left in a worse pecuniary position by reason of the injured person's death, not to affect any existing right belonging to the personal estate in general. There is no reason why the statute should interfere with any right of action an executor would have had at common law. In the case of such right of action he sues as legal owner of the general personal estate which has descended to him in course of law. Under the act he sues as trustee, in respect of a different right altogether, on behalf of particular persons designated in the act." The decision in the Bradshaw Case was questioned, but followed, in Leggott v. Railway Co., 1 Q. B. Div. 599, 45 L. J. Q. B. (N. S.) 557. In that case suit was brought by the widow, as the personal loss by reason of inability to attend to business, etc.; and it was held that the recovery by the plaintiff in a former suit, brought in her representative capacity, for the benefit of herself and children, to recover for the homicide of the deceased, did not abate the action. In that case it was contended that an admission made in the former suit by the plaintiff operated as an estoppel in the latter, but the court were agreed that this contention could not be maintained, while they doubted whether a proper construction of Lord Campbell's act authorized the bringing of a second action at all. See, also, in this connection, Pym v. Railway Co., 2 Best & S. 759. In Town of Walkerton v. Erdman, 23 Can. Sup. Ct. 352, it was held that where an action was brought by a person injured, in which his evidence was taken de bene esse, such evidence was admissible in a subsequent action brought under Lord Campbell's act. From this proposition two judges dissented, but the court was of opinion that the principle of the decision in Read v. Railway Co., supra, was controlling. The construction of Lord Campbell's act made in the decision last cited has been followed by the courts in many of the states of the Union where the statutes on the subject are in the same or similar language as that contained in that act. See Littlewood v. Mayor, etc., 89 N. Y. 24, 27, 42 Am. Rep. 271; Dibble v. Railroad Co., 25 Barb. 183; Hecht v. Railway Co., 132 Ind. 507, 32 N. E. 302; Goodsell v. Railroad Co., 33 Conn. 51; Price v. Railroad Co. (S. C.) 12 S. E. 413; Birch v. Railway Co. (Pa. Sup.) 30 Atl. 826; Sawyer v. Perry (Me.) 33 Atl. 660; Railway Co. v. Long (Tex. Sup.) 27 S. W. 113, 24 L. R. A. 637; Railroad Co. v. McElwain (Ky.) 34 L. R. A. 788, and notes (s. c. 34 S. W. 236); Hill v. Railroad Co. (Pa. Sup.) 35 Atl. 997, 35 L. R. A. 196; Hansford's Adm'x v. Payne, 11 Bush, 380; Fowlkes v. Railroad Co., 9 Heisk. 829; In re Taylor's Estate, 179 Pa. St. 254, 36 Atl. 230; Andrews v. Railroad Co., 34 Conn. 57. In this connection, see 1 Jag. Torts, p. 310; Tiff. Death Wrongf. Act. § 124; Cooley, Torts, p. *264.

In Legg v. Britton, 24 Atl. 1016, the supreme court of Vermont held that where the plaintiff in an action for personal injuries died from such injuries pending the action, and his administrator recovered judgment therein, such a judgment was a bar to an action by the administrator for the benefit of the widow or next of kin under the statute of that state. This decision is directly in conflict with the decision made in the case of Needham v. Railway Co., cited supra; and Ross, C. J., in the opinion, says that what is said on the subject in the Needham Case is obiter. In Illinois, where there was a statute passed in 1853 very similar in language to Lord Campbell's act, and one passed in 1872 which provided that ctions to recover damages for injuries to ie person, except slander and libel, should irvive, it was held that the act of 1872 did ot repeal the act of 1853, but that the for- ier act simply referred to cases where ie death was not the result of the wrongful ct complained of in a pending case. Hol- n v. Daly, 106 Ill. 131. The supreme court Kentucky held that under statutes of that ate two causes of action—one for the men- l and bodily suffering of the person in- ired, and the other for the loss of life— d not survive, when the suffering and ath were caused by the same wrongful t, and that the party entitled to sue must ect whether he would bring the one or the her, and that the pendency of one action as a sufficient reason for the abatement of e other. Conner's Adm'x v. Paul, 12 Bush, 4. In 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 0, the rule by which it can be determined hether the statutes authorize two actions, one by the legal representative for the ben- t of the estate of the decedent, and the her by the widow or next of kin,—or only e action, which may be commenced by the rson injured in his lifetime and survive his legal representatives, or be commen- d by them after his death, is clearly stat- in the following language: "When the ght of action given by the statute is mere- such as the deceased would have had if had survived the injury, a release prop- ly executed by him in his lifetime is a mplete defense to an action by his per- nal representative or others to recover mages for his death. The same rule is ie where the statute is not a survival stat- e, but creates a new and distinct cause action in favor of certain beneficiaries, it provides that the right of action shall ist only in cases where the deceased him- if might have maintained the action had lived." Applying this rule to our stat- e, what is the result? It is clear that the ht of action given to the widow or other rson therein named is not merely such as e deceased would have had if he had sur- ved the injury, for the simple reason that is right of action, by the terms of the t of 1889, survives to the personal repre- ntative of the deceased. Neither is the tute a survival statute. The personal rep- sentative of the deceased has no connec- n with the cause of action or with the it, and is not mentioned in any way in e statute. The statute creates a new and tinct cause of action, as has been ruled the case of Bass v. Railroad Co., supra, d it is not distinctly provided that the ht of action shall exist only where the eased himself might have maintained the ion had he lived. If the act of 1850 were ll of force, with the language in it, which similar to the language in Lord Camp- l's act, then the ruling made by the court queen's bench in Read v. Railroad Co., ich has been followed by so many Amer- n courts in construing similar statutes, might be looked to as persuasive authority in determining what is a correct construc- tion of that act. But the general assembly has seen fit to change the language of the statute in such a way that it cannot be con- nected in any way with Lord Campbell's act, except that that act was doubtless the origin of our legislation on the subject. The language of Lord Campbell's act was not strictly followed in the act of 1850. It was departed from materially in the act of 1856, and, as has been seen, the Code of 1861 made radical changes in the act of 1856. I am aware of the hardship that may result from the interpretation thus placed upon this law, but this fact should not be considered when the intention of the general assembly to pass a law which would work such hardship is clear and manifest.

2. During the progress of the trial the defendant offered in evidence the receipt giv- en by Cassin during his lifetime for $2,500, which recited that it was in full satisfac- tion of all claims that Cassin had against the company. Counsel for the defendant contended that, even if the receipt was not admissible for the purpose of showing that the action was barred, it was admissible as a bar of all damages for decreased earning capacity up to the moment of the death of the deceased. The court ruled that the measure of damages was fixed by statute, which declares that the measure of dam- ages is the full value of the life of the de- ceased, as shown by the evidence, and re- fused to admit the receipt in evidence. If the deceased cannot by contract discharge the defendant from liability to the widow, it is difficult to see how the amount that is paid to him in discharge of the claim which the law allows him to assert could be used as evidence to diminish the recovery to which the law says the widow is entitled. It is true that the conduct of the deceased at the time that the wrong is inflicted which results in his death may be such that the damages which his widow would recover would be diminished, as was held in the case of Railroad Co. v. Johnson; supra; but it has never been held that anything done by the deceased after the injury was com- plete would have the effect of diminishing the damages which the law declares the widow shall recover in the event her hus- band died from the effect of the wrongful act. Judge Reid, in his charge to the jury, uses the following language: "The meas- ure of damages in this case, if the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, would be the present cash value of the financial value of the life of their father, calculated from the time of his death." This is the correct rule to be applied. Of course, there should have been no recovery in this case for any damages sustained by Cassin, such as loss of time, pain and suffering, decreased ability to la- bor, and the like; and the plaintiffs in the present case were therefore not entitled to recover any loss which accrued to their determine what was the full value of his life to his children, and therefore their loss growing out of his death, what was the condition of his health and his earning capacity prior to the injury. The full value of the life is not to be determined by the condition of the injured person after the wrongdoer has disabled him. Any other rule would bring about this result: If the wrongful act was of such a nature as to entirely destroy the injured person's capacity to labor, and still he survived the injury, the persons entitled to sue upon his death resulting from such injury could recover nothing, because his life between the date of the injury and the date of his death would have no pecuniary value. It cannot be seriously contended that this is the law. If it is, a person who commits an injury to the person of another tending to destroy his life should be diligent to see that death does not ensue immediately, and that his victim should survive a reasonable length of time in a totally disabled condition. In a case like the present the recovery should be the full value of the life of the deceased, taking into consideration what would have been his earning capacity at the time of his death if he had not sustained the injury which resulted in his death.

The foregoing sets forth fully the reasons which constrain me to dissent from the conclusion reached by a majority of the court. I believe the conclusion I have reached is founded upon absolutely sound reasons, and is abundantly supported by authorities, both English and American; and the current of American cases which have dealt with statutes at all similar to ours is with the conclusion I have reached. When it is conceded that the statute of this state giving a cause of action for the homicide creates a new cause of action, separate and distinct from the one which the injured party had in his own behalf at common law, —and I understand the majority of the court to so concede,—it seems to me that no argument is necessary to show that there can be a recovery in the case upon this new cause of action by the person in whose favor it is vested, notwithstanding the common-law cause of action in favor of the injured party has been released by him in his lifetime. Such a construction of the statute as is given by the court would make the legislature guilty of doing an absurd and vain thing when it enacted the law. When this court reached the conclusion, as it did in the Bass Case, that the statute providing for suits in cases of homicide created a new cause of action, the present case was, in principle, decided; and, to my mind, no argument was needed to establish the soundness of the position for which I now contend. I am authorized by Mr. Justice LEWIS to say that he concurs in the views above presented.

ACTION ON CONTRACT—JURY TRIAL—JUDGMENT—VALIDITY—EXECUTION SALE—DISTRIBUTION OF PROCEEDS.

1. When an action is founded upon an unconditional contract in writing, the judge has power to render a judgment thereon without the intervention of a jury.

2. If the plaintiff's petition in such an action alleges that the contract of the defendant therein sued on was secured by a deed to land executed by him, and prays for a special judgment against the land, and the judge, in rendering his judgment upon the note, incorporates therein a special lien upon the land, this latter part of the judgment, even if erroneous or void, does not invalidate the entire judgment, for the remainder of it is good, and, by operation of law, constitutes a lien upon the land, effectual from the date of the deed.

3. Where, after obtaining such a judgment, the plaintiff filed and had recorded a deed to the land, and had the land levied on and sold, and the fund was brought into court for distribution, other judgment creditors, whose judgments were older than the one above mentioned, but younger than the deed given to secure the note, could not attack the younger judgment on the ground that the deed given to secure the note was infected with usury.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Decatur county; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Thomasville against one Clifton. Judgment for plaintiff. C. C. Bush, trustee in bankruptcy on sale of defendant's land under execution, intervenes, as did also some other creditors. Judgment for the bank, and Bush and others bring error. Affirmed.

W. C. Worrill and R. H. Powell & Sons, for plaintiffs in error. B. B. Bower and A. L. Hawes, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. It appears from the record that Clifton borrowed from the Bank of Thomasville $7,000, for which sum he gave his promissory note with a stipulation for the payment of $700 liquidated damages (presumably attorney's fees) in case the note had to be collected by suit. For the purpose of securing the note, he made the bank a deed to certain land on November 14, 1892. In 1898 the bank brought suit against Clifton on the note, and prayed for a judgment on the note, and also for a special lien on the land. No defense was made, and the judge rendered a judgment on the note, and granted the prayer of the petition for a special lien on the land. This was done without the intervention of a jury. In 1893 and 1894 other creditors obtained common-law judgments against Clifton. Subsequently Clifton was adjudicated a bankrupt, and Bush was appointed trustee. In 1899 the bank had its execution based on the judgment rendered in 1898 levied on the land. Bush filed a bill in the United States court seeking to enjoin the levy and sale under this execution. A restraining order was granted by the judge of that court, and subsequently he issued an order owing the sheriff and Bush, the trustee, sell the land under the bank execution, d requiring them to deposit in another signated bank the proceeds of the sale. ; ordered that the trustee, representing ; other judgment creditors, litigate in the ıte courts with the bank as to the prior- of their judgments. The bank filed a ıtion in the superior court of Decatur ınty praying that the fund arising from ; sale be turned over to it, setting up the ts in regard to the loan, the deed, and ; judgment, and claiming a lien superior that of the other creditors. Those cred- rs—some through Bush, the trustee, and ne independently—filed interventions, in ich they claimed that their judgments re superior to the judgment of the bank, because the judgment in favor of the ık and granting a special lien on the land s rendered by the court without the in- vention of a jury, and (2) because the d made by Clifton to the bank was in- ted with usury, and therefore void, and y had the right, as Clifton was insolvent, suggest usury in his stead. The court ıtained a demurrer to these interventions, l awarded the fund to the Bank of Thom- ille. The trustee and intervening cred- rs excepted.

, 2. The suit by the bank against Clif- was a common-law action predicated ın an unconditional contract in writing. der the constitution and laws of this te the judge has power, without the in- vention of a jury, to render a judgment ın such contract where no issuable de- se is filed by the defendant. There was ıe filed by Clifton to the suit by the ık. It was clearly the duty of the judge render judgment upon the contract. It s claimed, however, by the plaintiffs in or that the judgment granting a special ı upon the land could not be rendered by judge without the intervention of a jury, l that the judgment was therefore void. ın if the verdict of a jury should have n had setting up the special lien, we ık the fact that the judge rendered it hout a jury would not make the judg- ıt void. Unless it plainly and palpably ıears that the court had no authority to der the judgment, the latter would not void. If there is doubt as to whether the ge has jurisdiction to render the judg- ıt, and he decides in favor of his power, ile such ruling may be erroneous, the gment will not be void. If the judge's ıntion had been called to the matter ın he rendered the judgment, and he had ided in favor of his jurisdiction, although may have decided that question erro- usly, the judgment would not be void, if unexcepted to, and unreversed, is a d and binding judgment. Railroad Co. Pendleton, 87 Ga. 751, 13 S. E. 822; Ev- ıt v. Westmoreland, 92 Ga. 673, 19 S. E. Crow v. Mortgage Co., 92 Ga. 815, 19). 31; Manning v. Weyman, 99 Ga. 59, 26 S. E. 58; Griffin v. Smyly, 105 Ga. 475, 30 S. E. 416. Even assuming, for the sake of argument, that this is not sound, we still think the judgment rendered by the court on the note, and the facts that appeared on the trial of the question of the distribution of the money, would give the bank a lien superior to that of the other creditors. The deed to the bank was executed in November, 1892. The judgments of the other creditors were subsequent to that date. It appeared at the trial that the deed was made for the purpose of securing the payment of the note. "Where one took a deed to land to secure a debt, and gave bond to reconvey upon its payment, and subsequently brought suit, and recovered a general judgment against the debtor, and filed and had record- ed a deed reconveying the land, and there- upon caused it to be levied on and sold, such judgment was entitled to the fund arising from the sale in preference to an older judgment rendered since the convey- ance to secure the debt was made. It is not necessary that such a judgment should set forth any specific lien or right of priority; but, where the facts appear from the untrav- ersed answer of the sheriff, the fund will be awarded to such judgment." McAlpin v. Bailey, 76 Ga. 687. See, also, Bennett v. McConnell, 88 Ga. 177, 14 S. E. 208. Moreover, the law as it stood at the time (section 1970, Code 1882) expressly declared that such a judgment upon a note which a deed had been given to secure should take lien upon the land prior to any other judg- ment or incumbrance against the defend- ant.

3. The next question which arises for consideration is whether a creditor holding a common-law judgment can attack an- other common-law judgment obtained by another creditor on the ground that there was usury in it. The trial judge held that this could not be done, and we think his ruling was correct. There are cases, some of which were cited by counsel for the plaintiffs in error, holding that one cred- itor can, in the distribution of the estate of an insolvent debtor, suggest and show usury in the claim or demand of another creditor. Upon reading these cases it will be seen that none of them involved a judg- ment at law, except those cases involving judgments foreclosing mortgages. These latter decisions are put upon a section of the Code, and do not contravene the general principle that a judgment obtained without fraud or collusion settles every question which could have been made or litigated by the defendant; or, as was said by McCay, J., in Gatewood v. Bank, 49 Ga. 45, 48, quoting with approval an opinion in 2 Hill, Law, 474: The original "contract has been merged into the judgment, which imports absolute verity; and it is conclusively pre- sumed that the parties made all the de- fenses allowed by law, and that the judg- ment is the conclusion of law on the true matter of course, if there be fraud in any of the other grounds for equitable interference, there is no difficulty; but, if the only objection to the judgment is that the original debt was usurious, the doctrine seems to be settled that it is too late to ask even chancery to interfere after a regular judgment at law. Nor are we able to see how the case is strengthened when the complainant is a creditor of the defendant, instead of the defendant himself. He is clearly a privy of the defendant. His only interest in the matter is that the defendant is his debtor. He comes into the controversy through the defendant, and it would entirely upset the whole doctrine of the conclusiveness of judgments if they were liable to be attacked on their merits by other creditors of defendant. * * * So far as I have been able to find cases of interference against a judgment by others than the defendant, they are all for want of jurisdiction, or for fraud and collusion. And but a moment's consideration will show that this must be the proper rule. There never would be an end of litigations if, after the defendant has had his day in court, and a judgment has been pronounced, every creditor shall have his day also, and have the issues re-examined." See, also, Phillips v. Walker, 48 Ga. 55; Foster v. Thrasher, 45 Ga. 519. There being in the present case no charge of fraud or collusion between the bank and Clifton, and no allegation of any accident or mistake, we think the judgment is valid, and binding on Clifton. He, therefore, could not attack it on the ground that there was usury in the note on which the suit was founded, for that question is settled against him by the judgment. His creditors, standing in his shoes by reason of their privity with him as debtor, cannot attack the judgment on any ground on which he is concluded. The record does not show any usury upon its face, and the judgment, as to him, imports absolute verity, and concludes him on the question of usury. For these reasons we think the court was right in sustaining the demurrer and awarding the fund in controversy to the Bank of Thomasville. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

PER CURIAM. Judgment on main bill of exceptions affirmed; on cross bill dismissed.

MORRISON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 7, 1900.)

LANDLORD'S LIEN—SALE BY TENANT—INTENT TO DEFRAUD.

1. In order to render penal a sale by a tenant of personalty which is subject to a landlord's lien for rent and advances, it must appear that such sale was made without the consent of the landlord, with intent to defraud him, and that in consequence of such sale he sustained a loss.

2. It was, on the trial of one accused of violating the provisions of Pen. Code, § 672, erroneous to charge that if a tenant was indebted to his landlord for rent or supplies, and if, being so indebted, he sold crops raised on the rented premises, without the consent of the landlord, and to his injury, and if loss accrued to the latter by reason of such sale, the accused would be guilty; the vice of the charge being that it failed to state that, in order to render the accused guilty, it should appear that the sale was made with intent to defraud the landlord.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Hart county; S. Reese, Judge.

J. T. Morrison was convicted of crime, and brings error. Reversed.

Asbury G. McCurry, for plaintiff in error. R. H. Lewis, Sol. Gen., and Harrison & Bryne, for the State.

LEWIS, J. The accused was tried in the superior court of Hart county under an indictment charging him with the offense of a misdemeanor, for that he did "unlawfully, wrongfully, and fraudulently, after having made a rent contract for the year 1898 with one R. T. Buffington, on which rent contract he was due said R. T. Buffington twenty-nine and $^{81}/_{100}$ dollars for rent and advances made upon the crops grown upon said rented land, for which he was due the said R. T. Buffington, landlord, on a landlord's lien, sell and otherwise dispose of a bale of cotton grown on said rented premises before the payment [of] the landlord's lien, without the consent of, and with the intent to defraud, said R. T. Buffington, the landlord, and loss was sustained by said R. T. Buffington in the sum aforesaid." The jury returned a verdict of guilty, whereupon the accused made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepts.

1, 2. This indictment was founded upon for rent and advances made upon crops by landlords, employers, or others, as authorized by law. A violation of the provisions of this section shall be a misdemeanor. Section 671, referred to above, provides: "If any person, after having made a mortgage deed to personal property, shall sell or otherwise dispose of said property before the payment of the mortgage debt, without the consent of, and with intent to defraud, the mortgagee, and loss shall thereby be sustained by the holder of the mortgage, the offender shall be punished as for a misdemeanor." In one of the grounds of the motion for a new trial error is alleged upon the following charge of the court: "If you believe, under the law as given you in charge and the evidence in this case, beyond a reasonable doubt, that this defendant sold crops raised upon the premises rented from Buffington for the year 1898, without his consent, and to his injury, and that loss accrued to him by such selling of the cotton alleged to have been disposed of and sold by him, being indebted for rent or supplies to Buffington at the time of selling the same, I charge you he is guilty, and you should so find." Error is alleged further upon the following charge of the court: "It is wholly immaterial to you, in considering this case, whether this defendant disposed of the crop for the payment of any other debt, either with or without the consent of Buffington, provided you believe that after such disposition there was any of the crop left, which he, without the consent of Buffington, sold, being then in debt to the landlord, Buffington, for supplies or rent, and loss accrued to Buffington." The ground of objection set forth in the motion to these charges of the court was that they were not the correct law of the case, and should have been qualified by instructions that such sale, to render defendant guilty, must have been made with intent to defraud the landlord. In the bill of exceptions it is alleged that, upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial, in addition to the amendment allowed by the court, defendant duly offered an additional ground, to wit: "The court, as movant contends, should, in addition to the other elements necessary to make out the case for the state, have instructed the jury that, before they would be authorized to find the defendant guilty, they must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the sale of the crop on which the landlord had a lien was done by defendant with intent to defraud the landlord, and the court nowhere in his charge instructed the jury that, before they would be authorized to find the defendant guilty, they must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that such sale was made with intent to defraud the landlord." The court refused to allow that necessary for a proper review of the case by the supreme court, upon which ruling defendant assigns error in his bill of exceptions. We have carefully examined the entire charge of the court, and fail to discover in it that the court gave any instructions whatever to the effect that they must believe that defendant's intent was to defraud the landlord before they would be authorized to convict him. Hence we think that the amendment refused by the court should have been allowed, as none of the other grounds of the motion for a new trial specifically set forth that the court failed entirely to give such instructions to the jury in other portions of the charge. We make no special ruling in the headnotes on this point, but in this opinion refer to it and the entire charge of the court with the view of showing that even upon the amendments to the motion for a new trial above quoted, as allowed, the court should have granted a new trial; and in the light of the record the principles decided in the headnotes necessarily control the case. There is no question but that one of the elements necessary to constitute this offense is an intent by a defendant to defraud his landlord, for all the provisions in Pen. Code, § 671, are adopted by the law making the crime charged in this indictment a misdemeanor, and among these provisions it is expressly stipulated that the defendant shall not only sell or otherwise dispose of the property before payment of the debt, without the consent of the mortgagee (landlord in this case), but he shall do it with intent to defraud. We cannot say that the evidence in the present case absolutely demanded a finding by the jury that there was an intent on the part of the accused to defraud. To say the least of it, it is clearly inferable from his statement that there was no such intent, and it was contended with some plausibility by his counsel that even the evidence in behalf of the state was not clear and definite enough to demand a finding, if they believed all of the state's witnesses, that the accused was guilty of a fraudulent sale of this property. We express no opinion on the general ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, nor do we mean to intimate that there was not sufficient evidence to have sustained a verdict of guilty had the court committed no error in the omission to charge of which complaint is made. It is sufficient simply to decide that we cannot say the evidence demanded a verdict of guilty, and therefore failure to enlighten the jury upon the law touching a valid defense to the charge in the indictment is reversible error. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

NONSUIT—TROVER—FORTHCOMING BOND—ESTOPPEL—EVIDENCE—RECOUPMENT—DIRECTING VERDICT.

1. There was no error in refusing to grant the nonsuit.

2. The execution of a recognizance, payable to the plaintiff, for the forthcoming of personal property, where bail has been required, in an action of trover, does not estop the defendant from denying that he ever was in possession of the property to recover which the suit was instituted.

3. Evidence offered to establish, by way of recoupment, damages sustained by the defendant, though growing out of the same contract, is inadmissible in an action of trover, unless some special equity, such as the nonresidence or insolvency of the plaintiff, is shown to exist.

4. The direction of a verdict under the facts of this case was error.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Decatur county; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by the G. Ober & Sons Co. against J. L. Bell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

A. H. Russell and M. E. O'Neal, for plaintiff in error. Townsend & Westmoreland, A. L. Hawes, and Harrison & Bryan, for defendant in error.

LITTLE, J. The G. Ober & Sons Company instituted an action of trover against J. L. Bell for the recovery of 7,590 pounds of lint cotton, of the value of $664, and also 18 promissory notes, of the value of $100, fully described in the petition. An affidavit for bail was made, and Bell, with certain securities, entered into a bond in the sum of $1,600, as prescribed by section 3418 of the Civil Code, conditioned that the said Bell should produce on the trial all of said cotton and notes sued for, and for the forthcoming of all of said property to answer such judgment, execution, or decree as might be rendered or issued in the case. The defendant answered that he was not guilty; that the present suit arose out of business transactions between plaintiffs and defendant for the year 1890, and that, relying on certain representations of the plaintiffs, he had entered into a written contract with them, and executed and delivered his note for 19,158 pounds of cotton, payable November 1, 1890; that said note and contract were obtained by fraud, etc. He denied any indebtedness to the plaintiffs. Plaintiffs introduced in evidence a note of defendant, dated May 9, 1890, for 19,158 pounds of cotton, to be due November 1st after date; also, two contracts made with the defendant, covering the subject-matter of the note. The stipulations of the contracts, in brief, are: That Bell was appointed agent for the sale of plaintiffs' fertilizers at two places in Decatur county. Plaintiffs agreed to consign to him, for sale on commission, fertilizers to the value of a named amount. Such fertilizers were to be consigned to him, and subject to their order. That defendant should keep an accurate account of sales, and render a statement of same, together with the names of purchasers, etc., and should protect the goods unsold. That for all time sales made by the defendant, whether for cotton or currency, notes were to be taken on forms furnished by plaintiffs, and should be forwarded to plaintiffs by a given date, together with a statement of such sales and of goods remaining unsold. These notes would thereafter be returned to defendant for collection, and were to be held in trust for plaintiffs. That for cash sales defendant should promptly remit. The names, prices, and amounts of fertilizers agreed to be shipped to the defendant under this contract were then set out. Defendant was allowed until the 1st of May thereafter to elect whether he would pay for the fertilizers shipped in currency or cotton. If the former, he was then to forward his note, accompanied with farmers' notes as collateral. The compensation to be received by the defendant was the difference between the net prices for which the goods were charged and the prices at which the defendant should sell the goods. It was further stipulated that the defendant should guaranty all sales made, etc. The plaintiffs' evidence tended to show: That the defendant had paid 11 bales of cotton on his note at one time, and 4 more at another, leaving a balance of 10,940 pounds of cotton due. That cotton was worth 8½ cents per pound at the date the note matured. Defendant also held notes of the value of $100 given by various named parties, all of which belonged to the plaintiffs. That on the 4th of November he owed plaintiffs 10,940 pounds of cotton, and at that time had on hand notes uncollected to the amount of $400. That the defendant reported this to the agent of the plaintiffs by a printed list. Plaintiffs demanded a settlement of the defendant, which he declined to make unless plaintiffs would settle all differences which existed between them. Plaintiffs then demanded the cotton and notes sued for, which defendant refused to deliver. A witness for plaintiffs, who was their agent in the transactions with the defendant, on whose evidence plaintiffs relied to make out their case, testified: That the way he arrived at what amount of cotton Bell collected was by taking what notes the latter had on hand, and deducting them from the balance of the cotton due. That Bell told him that the ones sued for were the only notes he had on hand uncollected. It is possible that the defendant might have taken stock in payment of some of the notes, but plaintiffs had nothing to do with the stock. What they wanted was for their notes to be collected. When he demanded give him up this note and settle some old matters that did not have anything to do with this case. "We brought suit for the cotton that he had on hand, and the balance of the notes that had been collected." This suit is instituted to recover the balance due on defendant's note, and the list of notes presented contained all that the defendant said he had on hand uncollected. Prices of cotton were then shown. The defendant testified: That there were some 15 or 20 notes in the list, which he had, and which were worth about $100. That he had not collected any of these. He tried, but could not. Does not think the money could be made on such notes by suit. At the conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiffs, defendant's counsel moved the court to award a nonsuit. This motion was refused, and the defendant excepted.

1. No error was committed in refusing to grant the nonsuit. It was very clearly shown by the evidence, both for the plaintiffs and defendant, that the latter was in possession of certain notes described in the petition; that they belonged to the plaintiffs; that they had demanded them from the defendant, which demand had been refused; and also the value of such notes. This was clear proof of conversion of the notes, and entitled the plaintiffs, in any event, to recover such notes or their value. Under the evidence in the case, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the cotton for which they sued. The defendant offered to show that he had collected 3,000 pounds of cotton, but this evidence was objected to, and the evidence excluded, and there was no evidence of any character which showed that the defendant had collected and converted to his own use any part or portion of the cotton for which the action was instituted. It seems to have been the theory of the plaintiffs that inasmuch as the defendant was intrusted by them with certain notes to collect, and these notes were payable in cotton, when they demanded a settlement, and received from the defendant a statement of the notes uncollected, this was an admission of the conversion of the cotton represented by the notes not included in the list of those uncollected, and sufficient to authorize a recovery in the action of trover. Not so. There is nothing in the evidence which distinctly shows that the defendant collected any of the notes in cotton, and, as the plaintiffs chose to bring their action to recover the cotton alleged to have been collected and converted, it was incumbent upon them to show that the defendant had been in possession of the cotton for which they sued at some time prior to the institution of the action. This was necessary to prove conversion. The evidence was certainly sufficient to show the existence of a debt due by defendant, but in this action they were not seeking to collect a debt, but to recover cer-defendant for any part of the cotton for which they brought suit, yet they did make out a case for the recovery of the promissory notes. Hence the court did not err in refusing to grant a nonsuit.

2. It was offered to be proven by the defendant that he never did collect but 3,000 pounds of cotton on the notes sent to him by the plaintiffs, and that he had not collected the amount sued for by the plaintiffs. To the admission of this evidence plaintiffs' counsel objected on the ground that by giving bond in the case the defendant was estopped from denying that he had the property in possession. We think this ground untenable, and that the court erred in rejecting the evidence. The gist of the action of trover is the conversion of the plaintiffs' property by the defendant; that is to say, that the defendant wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of possession. In this case the possession, according to the evidence of the plaintiffs, depended entirely upon whether the collection of the promissory notes sent to the defendant by the plaintiffs had in fact been made in cotton by the defendant. Evidence that they were not collected, or that they were not collected in cotton, or how much cotton was collected on the notes, was certainly admissible. Without some proof of this character, or admission waiving necessity of such proof, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the cotton, or any part of it. The defense to the action was that the defendant had not converted the property; that he had never collected, or been in possession of, the cotton for which suit was instituted. The claim that this evidence ought not to be admitted, because the defendant, by giving bond in the case, was estopped from denying that he had the property, cannot be maintained. Civ. Code, § 4605, prescribes that, when an affidavit for bail is made in connection with the action of trover, it is the duty of the sheriff to take a recognizance, payable to the plaintiff or complainant, with security in double the amount sworn to, for the forthcoming of such personal property to answer such judgment, execution, or decree as may be rendered or issued in the case. It is difficult for us to see any reason why the execution of a bond of this character, when given by the defendant to keep him out of jail, should estop him from denying that he had possession of the property. In the case of Phillips v. Taber, 83 Ga. 570, 10 S. E. 272, this court, in referring to the liability of a defendant in an action of trover, where he had given a bond of this character, said: "The defendant in a trover case is not liable by reason of having given a bond for the eventual condemnation money, but for damages in consequence of having converted the plaintiff's property." As we construe the condition of the bond, it simply binds the principal and sureties to produce the property sued for, to answer any judgment or decree ever having been in possession, or having converted the property. Such was not its purpose, nor does it have such a legal effect. Neither the ruling nor language used in the opinion in the case of Commission Co. v. McElhannon, 98 Ga. 394, 25 S. E. 558, establishes such a proposition. In our opinion, the court erred in rejecting the evidence which was offered.

3. It is also complained that the court rejected evidence of the defendant to the effect that, at the time of the sale of the fertilizers to him, the agent of the plaintiff stated that he was selling to the defendant these fertilizers as cheap as to any other agent in the county; that, believing these representations to be true, he entered into the contract; that said representations were untrue; and that the plaintiffs did sell to other agents in the county the same grade of fertilizers sold to defendant, at prices very much lower than those given to the defendant in his contract of purchase. This evidence, we think, was properly rejected. It was, in effect, an effort to recoup the damages which the defendant contended he sustained by reason of the fraud of the plaintiffs. But recoupment in the nature of damages cannot be pleaded by the defendant, nor adjudicated, in an action of trover, unless some special equity, such as nonresidence or the insolvency of the plaintiff, is shown, concerning which both the plea and evidence are silent. Harden v. Long, 110 Ga. —, 36 S. E. 100. See, also, Barrow v. Mallory, 89 Ga. 76, 14 S. E. 878.

4. After the evidence closed, the court directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $740 principal, besides interest and costs, to which direction the defendant excepted. From what has been said, it is clear that the direction of a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs was error. As we have attempted to show, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover any part of the cotton for which they sued, and, of course, were not entitled to recover the value of it. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

SMITH v. TOWNS et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1900.)

EJECTMENT—PLEADING.

This case is controlled by the decision of this court in Ewing v. Shropshire, 7 S. E. 554, 80 Ga. 374, and it follows that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the plaintiffs' petition.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Floyd county; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Action by C. M. Towns and others against Halsted Smith. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

This was an action of complaint for land. The petition contained the following allegations: (1) That Halsted Smith, of said county, by his tenant, Ben Prior, is in possession of the following tract or parcel of land, with the improvements thereon, in the Fifth ward of the city of Rome, in said state and county, to wit, known as "Lot 97," in Butler's addition to the town of South Rome, according to the survey, stakes, and map of said addition; the same being S. W. portion of land lot No. 277, 23d district and 3d section of Floyd county, Ga., fronting on Dunlap (now Forrest) street 67 feet, and running back 160 feet, more or less; and that said lands are worth one thousand dollars. (3) That your petitioners are the true owners in fee simple of three-fourths undivided interest in said land; that said Halsted Smith owns in fee simple one-fourth of said land. (4) That James H. Cooper, on the 22d day of June, 1885, executed to 'Mary W. Towns and the heirs of her body, born and to be born,' a deed to the lands hereinbefore described. (5) That petitioners are the heirs, and the only heirs, of the body of said Mary W. Towns; and that said Mary W. Towns departed this life on the 2d day of June, 1894. (6) That by the deed before described said Mary W. Towns and your petitioners held and owned each jointly an undivided one-fourth interest in said lands. (7) Petitioners further show that on the —— day of ——, 1893, said Mary W. Towns executed to said Halsted Smith a deed to said lands; that by said deed she conveyed to said Smith her interest in said land, to wit, an undivided one-fourth interest; and that said Smith went into possession of said lands on that date, all of petitioners being minors; and that said Smith's title or claim of title is under said deed only, and therefore through a common grantor with petitioners, to wit, J. H. Cooper. (8) That said Smith from said —— day of ——, 1893, has received all the rents and profits of said land, which are and have been of the annual value of one hundred dollars. (9) Petitioners further show that the money invested in the purchase of said lands was a trust fund for the benefit of the said Mary W. Towns and her said children, born and to be born, and was invested in accordance with the parol trust imposed on it by Gerome Harris and Mrs. Harris individually and as administrator and administratrix of Jas. D. Harris, deceased, for the benefit of the said Mary W. Towns and the said heirs of her body, born and to be born. (10) Petitioners further show that after the execution and delivery of said deed by said J. H. Cooper, during petitioners' minority, petitioners' names and interest were stricken from said deed, and the same, so erased, was delivered to said Halsted Smith, who now holds the same, if it is not destroyed. (11) That said Halsted Smith had full notice of peti-that Halsted Smith be required to bring said deed into court, but waive further discovery by him. (13) Petitioners further pray: (a) That guardians ad litem be appointed for Mary Eugenia Towns and Eunice Belle Towns; (b) that the deed under which they hold, a copy of which substantially is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A,' be set up and established; (c) that writ of possession issue in their favor for the lands in dispute; or (d) that by proper proceedings in such cases made and provided said lands be partitioned by the appointment of commissioners, who shall sell said lands, setting aside to each in severalty his or her portions of the proceeds of said sale, and they be given judgment against defendant for three-fourths of the rents and mesne profits received by him." To said petition a demurrer was filed as follows, to wit: "Now comes defendant in the above-stated case, and demurs to the petition of said plaintiffs, and for grounds of demurrer says: (1) That said petition sets forth no legal cause of action against said defendant, nor any legal ground upon which to base recovery of said land, or a prayer of reformation of the deed of James H. Cooper to Mary W. Towns. (2) Defendant demurs to the third paragraph of plaintiffs' petition because said paragraph sets out no facts which show ownership of the land referred to therein; nor is there any abstract of title attached to said petition showing title as alleged in said paragraph. (3) Defendant demurs to the fourth, fifth, and sixth paragraphs of said petition upon the ground that the language quoted in the fourth paragraph conveys no title to any other person than said Mary W. Towns. (4) Defendant demurs to the seventh paragraph of said petition upon the ground that the allegations in said paragraph show that said Mary W. Towns executed to said defendant a deed to said lands; said allegations show that said defendant received the whole title to said lands, and not to any portion thereof, and no allegation in the said seventh paragraph sets forth any legal reason to the contrary. (5) Defendant demurs to the ninth paragraph of plaintiffs' petition upon the ground that a parol trust cannot be set up in opposition to the express terms of a written instrument; and further that no notice of such parol trust is alleged to have been received by defendant before his purchase of the land. (6) Defendant demurs to that portion of the prayer marked "(b)" in the twelfth paragraph of plaintiffs' petition, and moves to strike Exhibit A, referred to in said subparagraph, because said paragraph and said exhibit are not set up as a part of the allegations in said case, but as a prayer in consequence of other allegations which do not embrace said exa ground for action." Said demurrer was overruled, and the defendant excepted.

BOHANNON, Tax Collector, et al. v. WROUGHT-IRON RANGE CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 7, 1900.)

PEDDLERS' TAX—LIABILITY OF TRADING CORPORATION.

1. Since only a natural person "who itinerates for trading purposes" can, under the statutes of this state, be regarded as a "peddler," there is no authority of law for issuing or enforcing against a trading corporation an execution for a special tax alleged to be due by it as a peddler. Range Co. v. Johnson, 11 S. E. 233, 84 Ga. 754, 8 L. R. A. 273.

2. It follows, from an application of the foregoing to the facts of the present case, that the court did not err in granting the injunction.

CONEY v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 17, 1899.)

RAPE—CORROBORATION OF WITNESS—INSTRUCTIONS.

When on the trial of an indictment for rape the state depended for a conviction solely upon the evidence of the alleged victim of the crime, and there was evidence strongly tending to impeach her, and no evidence whatever of any facts or circumstances in any manner tending to corroborate her, it was erroneous to charge upon the subject of corroboration. Such an error in such a case requires the granting of a new trial.

ADMINISTRATOR — NONRESIDENT — FOREIGN APPOINTMENT—EFFECT—EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

1. The appellate court will not consider facts which appear only in the exceptions, or in the argument of counsel, and which do not appear in the record.

2. Where appellant had been appointed administrator by a court in Florida, the appointment of another administrator for the same estate by a court in South Carolina was not in violation of Const. U. S. art. 4, § 1, providing that full credit should be given by one state to the judicial proceedings of other states.

3. The finding of fact by a court in Florida that appellant was a fit and proper person to administer an estate was not binding on a South Carolina court in appointing an administrator for the same estate.

4. Payment for burial clothes, with the purpose of obtaining administration thereby, is not sufficient to give a right to the appointment as administrator.

5. Under Rev. St. 1893, § 2067, providing that, if an administrator moves out of the state, his letters shall be revoked, a nonresident cannot be appointed as an administrator, since such an appointment is forbidden by implication.

6. One who petitioned for letters of administration could testify that he paid a doctor's bill for the deceased, notwithstanding Code, § 400, providing that a party to an action against an administrator, etc., cannot testify in his own favor regarding a transaction with the deceased, since the testimony was not given in an action against any of the parties named in the section.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Charleston county; George W. Gage, Judge.

Proceeding to appoint an administrator for the estate of William Neubert, deceased. From a judgment of the circuit court dismissing his appeal from the probate court, and sustaining an order appointing J. S. Pinkhussohn administrator of the estate, L. J. Burkhim appeals. Affirmed.

The following are appellant's exceptions: "(1) That the decree is in contravention of section 1, art. 4, of the constitution of the United States, requiring that 'full faith and credit shall be given, in each state, to the public acts and records and judicial proceedings of every other state,' in this: that it repudiates the appointment of L. J. Burkhim as administrator of the estate of William Neubert, deceased, by the proper court of Alachua county, in the state of Florida, the residence of the deceased. (2) That the decree is in contravention of said section 1 of article 4 of the constitution of the United States in finding that the administrator, L. J. Burkhim, so appointed by the proper court of Alachua county, in the state of Florida, as a proper person for said administration, 'is not a proper person to be intrusted with the administration of William Neubert.' (3) That there is no evidence that the said L. J. Burkhim was not a proper person. (4) Because L. J. Burkhim was the largest creditor of William Neubert, deceased, and entitled to the administration. (5) Because Mr. Pinkhussohn, the claim by his own oath, contrary to section 400 of the Code; (c) because the probate judge refused to subpœna Miss Swan, a witness, to disprove said claim."

W. H. Thomas and Robert E. Davis, for appellant. J. N. Nathans, J. N. Nathans, Jr., and Huger Sinkler, for respondent.

McIVER, C. J. For reasons that will hereinafter appear, we deem it necessary to set out the "case" in full, which is as follows: "J. S. Pinkhussohn, a resident of Charleston, S. C., on the 3d November, 1898, filed his petition in the probate court for Charleston county alleging that William Neubert, a resident of Charleston, South Carolina, and of Gainesville, Florida, died intestate, leaving personal property in Charleston of the value of $25,000, and no relatives in this city; and the petitioner is a creditor, and praying letters of administration, etc. L. J. Burkhim, a resident of Gainesville, Florida, on the same day filed his petition alleging: That Wm. Neubert, of Gainesville, Florida, died 29th October, 1898, intestate, leaving a brother and sister in Germany; the petitioner is a creditor; that deceased had $40 in a bank in Charleston, and perhaps other assets; that petitioner has applied for letters of administration upon this estate in Alachua county, Florida, and has received preliminary papers for the administration thereof. He asks letters of administration. Burkhim also filed a caveat against the granting of letters of administration to Pinkhussohn, because he denies that Pinkhussohn is a creditor, and as a stranger he cannot be appointed; that he (Burkhim) has been appointed administrator ad bona colligenda from the domiciliary court in Florida; that any administration in this county will be only ancillary, and that by granting him (Burkhim) the administration it will prevent circumlocution and expense. Publication of citation was made in regular form for 17th November, 1898, and, the parties appearing upon that day, at the request of Burkhim it was postponed until the 16th December, 1898, when the case was heard and determined. The letters of administration to Pinkhussohn were issued to him on the 17th, reciting, 'Whereas, Wm. Neubert, late of Gainesville, Florida, died intestate, * * * leaving property in this state,' etc. The testimony of J. S. Pinkhussohn (objected to by Mr. Thomas for Burkhim) was that at Neubert's request he had paid $2 to Dr. Edwards, a bill for medical attendance on Neubert, some time before Neubert's death, and that he had not been repaid; that Neubert spent three, four, and five months in Charleston, and kept almost all his property here, to wit, securities, moneys in bank, etc.,—some $20,000. He introduced judgments against Burkhim for $2,000. L. J. Burkhim testified that he was a creditor of the estate to the extent of about that he (Burkhim) is a resident of Gainesville, Florida. He also produced his letters of administration from Alachua county, Florida, by the proper court, giving him (Burkhim,—'in whose fidelity in this behalf I very much confide') the administration of said estate on the 15th December, 1898. The general findings of the probate court, among other things, were: The probate judge of Charleston finds that the assets in Florida are far more than enough to pay all Florida debts; that Pinkhussohn is a creditor, and that Burkhim is not, and that his action in paying for the burial clothes was intended to obtain administration; and, further, that he has unsatisfied judgments against him, and 'I do not regard him as a suitable person to be intrusted with the administration of so large an estate. He is also a nonresident of this state.' He also finds that the heirs of Neubert reside in Germany, and that they have given C. O. Witte, consul of the German empire in Charleston, power of attorney to represent them in all matters pertaining to the estate, and to receive their shares of the estate for them, etc. From this decree Mr. Burkhim appealed to the circuit court, because Burkhim, being the domiciliary administrator of Alachua county, Florida, the residence of the deceased, should be appointed ancillary administrator in this state, and that after his appointment in Florida, without discrediting evidence here, his right is unquestionable; because the court refused to hear testimony of the domicile; because Pinkhussohn was allowed to establish his creditorship by his own oath; because the administration of Pinkhussohn is clearly in the interest of the debtors of Neubert; because Pinkhussohn, not being a creditor, could only be given [letters] ad bona colligenda; and because he ignored the transcript from Florida proven before him. On the 7th April, 1899, the present respondent moved before Judge Klugh, after due notice, to dismiss the appeal, but on that day his motion was refused, and he served notice of appeal to the supreme court, and finally abandoned his appeal. [While we do not see that this paragraph has any relevancy whatever to any of the questions which this court is called upon to determine, yet, as we find it in the "case," which we proposed to set out in full, we did not feel at liberty to omit even this irrelevant paragraph.] The cause came before Judge Gage at the December term, 1899, and he made the following decree: 'This is an appeal from the decretal order of the probate court granting letters of administration to the respondent, J. S. Pinkhussohn. The order of the probate court sets forth the facts upon which his judgment was based, and, after hearing counsel for appellant and respondent, I am satisfied, among other reasons, that the appellant, L. J. Burkhim, is not a proper person to be intrusted with the probate judge, dated December 16, 1898, be, and is hereby, sustained as the judgment of this court, and that this decree be certified by the clerk of this court to the said probate court for such other proceedings as may be necessary to enforce the same.'" From this judgment the said L. J. Burkhim gave due notice of appeal to this court, basing the same upon the several exceptions set out in the record, a copy of which the reporter will insert in his report of this case.

Before proceeding to the consideration of the exceptions, we find it necessary to say that some facts which may possibly be material are stated in the arguments of counsel which are not to be found in the "case" as prepared for argument here, and which, therefore, cannot be considered by the court. For this reason we thought it best to incorporate in this opinion the whole of the "case" as we find it printed in the record, and shall base our conclusions upon facts which we find in the "case," without regard to any additional facts which may be stated in the exceptions or in the argument of counsel, which, under the well-settled rule, this court is not at liberty to consider. Ever since the case of State v. Wilder, 13 S. C. 344, decided as far back as November, 1879, and uniformly followed ever since, it has been the settled rule that this court cannot consider any fact which does not appear in the "case" as prepared for argument here, and which appears only in the exceptions or in the argument of counsel. In the light of this rule, so long and so well settled, we will proceed to the consideration of the several exceptions. We are unable to discover from the "case" anything tending to show that section 1 of article 4 of the constitution of the United States, requiring that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state, to the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other state," has been violated, as is claimed in the first exception; for there is nothing in the "case" which shows that the action of the court in Florida appointing Burkhim administrator there was repudiated, or even disregarded, either by the probate judge or the circuit judge, here. The rule that the judgments and decrees of the court of any state have no extraterritorial force is too well settled to require the citation of any authority. While, therefore, the action of the court in Florida may have had the effect of investing Burkhim with all the rights and powers of administrator in that state, it certainly had no force and effect in this state. If he desired to become administrator here, his duty was to do exactly what he did do,—apply to the proper authority here for letters of administration in this state; and upon such application it was not material to inquire what the court in Florida had done. The first exception must, therefore, be overruled.

For a somewhat similar reason the second ed with the administration of the estate there was in no way binding upon the court here. See Overby v. Gordan, 177 U. S. 214, 20 Sup. Ct. 603, 44 L. Ed. —, and the cases therein cited.

The third exception, based as it is upon an allegation of fact which does not appear in the "case," cannot be sustained. We do not know what evidence was before the probate judge, as the "case" does not show or purport to show all of the testimony which was before the probate judge.

The fourth exception, based as it is upon the assumption that Burkhim was the largest creditor of the intestate, cannot be sustained, because it is directly contradicted by the finding of fact by the probate judge, concurred in by the circuit judge, that the appellant was not a creditor of the intestate. Indeed, it appears from the testimony of Burkhim, as stated in the "case," that he does not pretend to have been a creditor of Neubert at the time of his death; but his claim to be a creditor is based upon the fact that after the death of Neubert he bought a suit of clothes in which to bury the deceased, for which he paid "about $20." It is true that in 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, at page 195, it is said, "A claim which accrued after the death of the deceased, as for funeral expenses, is sufficient to give the right to administer." But this is based upon only two cases, which seem to admit that this is a doctrine only to be applied in exceptional cases. Certainly it should not be applied in a case like this, where the probate judge finds as a fact that Burkhim's action "in paying for the burial clothes was intended to obtain administration." And when to this is added that the attempt is made in this case to apply this exceptional doctrine in favor of an applicant for administration who is a nonresident of the state, who is incumbered with debts to a large amount, which have been reduced to judgment, we are certainly satisfied that the probate judge was right in declining to issue letters of administration to the appellant. It is true that the case of Jones v. Jones, 12 Rich. Law, 623, has been cited as holding that administration may be granted to one residing beyond the limits of the state. But, as was well argued by counsel for respondent, that case was decided prior to the passage of the act of 1878, now incorporated in Rev. St. 1893 as sections 2067 and 2068, which necessarily implies that a nonresident of the state cannot be granted letters of administration; for that act provides that, if an executor or administrator, since the grant of letters testamentary or of administration, shall change his domicile to a place beyond the limits of the state, his letters shall be revoked. Of course, this necessarily implies that a grant of letters of administration to one who is a nonresident at the time would not be lawful.

(1) That his claim was a pretext; (2) because he was allowed to establish his claim by his own oath, contrary to the provisions of section 400 of the Code; (3) because the probate judge refused to subpœna Miss Swan, a witness, to disprove said claim. The first of these grounds is clearly untenable, as there is no testimony whatever to sustain it, and is in direct conflict with the concurrent findings of the judge of probate and the circuit judge. The second ground is likewise untenable. In the first place, it does not appear that the objection to Pinkhussohn's testimony was based upon the ground now insisted upon. But, waiving that, the general rule now unquestionably is that interest does not disqualify, and the question is whether the testimony objected to falls within any of the exceptions. The only one within which it can possibly be claimed to fall is that which forbids a person who is a party to an action or proceeding from testifying in his own favor against a person prosecuting or defending such action as executor or administrator, etc., in regard to a transaction or conversation between such witness and a person deceased. Here, while it is true that the witness was testifying as to a transaction with a person deceased, he was not so testifying in an action against the administrator or other person named in the section as bearing certain relations to such deceased. See Norris v. Clinkscales, 47 S. C., at pages 493, 494, 25 S. E. 799. It is clear, therefore, that there was no violation of section 400 of the Code in receiving the testimony in question. The third ground upon which this exception rests is without a shadow of foundation in the testimony to sustain it; for it does not appear in the "case" that the probate judge was ever asked to subpœna Miss Swan, or any other witness, in the case; and certainly it does not appear that he ever refused to do so. The fifth exception must likewise be overruled. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

JARRELL v. CHARLESTON & W. C. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 23, 1900.)

CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS — PROXIMATE CAUSE OF ACCIDENT — NEGLIGENCE — PRESUMPTION — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — AMENDMENT OF PLEADING.

1. Where the complaint alleged the negligent delay of the train on which the plaintiff was a passenger for several hours, and that such train was negligently stopped for over half an hour on a high trestle, where plaintiff, on account of the darkness and the poor lights furnished by defendant on the train, missed his footing, and fell to the ground, a demurrer for failure to state a cause of action was properly sustained, since the complaint failed to show defendant's negligence to be the proximate cause of the injury.

2. Where the complaint failed to show that aintiff's fall from the train was caused by an t of defendant, there is no presumption of gligence by the defendant from the mere fact the fall.

3. Where the complaint alleged that defendnt negligently stopped the train on which aintiff was a passenger for over half an hour a high trestle, and that while there, on acunt of the darkness and the poor lights furshed by defendant on the train, plaintiff missd his footing, and fell to the ground, but did t allege plaintiff's ignorance that the train as on the trestle, a demurrer for failure to ate a cause of action was properly sustained, ce the complaint showed contributory negliice by plaintiff which would defeat a recovy.

4. Leave to amend the complaint after susining a demurrer is discretionary in the trial urt, and, unless abused, the exercise of such scretion in refusing to allow amendment will t be interfered with on appeal.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court Hampton county; D. A. Townsend, dge.

Action by G. H. Jarrell against the arleston & Western Carolina Railway mpany. From an order sustaining a deurrer to the complaint and refusing perssion to amend, plaintiff appeals. Affirm-Julius P. Youmans, for appellant. James . Moore, for respondent.

JONES, J. This appeal is from an order staining a demurrer to the complaint on e ground that it failed to state facts suffint to constitute a cause of action. The ecific grounds of objection to the comint were: "(1) That the allegations in the nplaint do not show negligence on the rt of the defendant; (2) that the allegans in the complaint do show contributory gligence on the part of the plaintiff." re is the complaint, omitting the first ragraph, alleging that defendant is a corration: "(2) That on the 5th day of July, 7, this plaintiff, at Fairfax, one of the ular stations on said railway, purchased m the defendant company, and paid for, ticket, which entitled this plaintiff to sage on the cars of the defendant comy from Fairfax, in the county of Barnl, and said state, to Augusta, state of orgia, and return; and plaintiff, after ing purchased said ticket from defend, took passage on a train of cars belongto said company to Augusta. (3) That l defendant carelessly, and negligently, in violation of its contract with this ntiff, delayed the said train upon which plaintiff was to return to Fairfax in gusta, and failed to start the same on its irn trip until about 10 o'clock at night, ch was three hours past its advertised edule time; and when the said train reing reached the Savannah river trestle, was upon the same, this plaintiff being oard the said train, with his ticket paid as aforesaid, the said train was carely and negligently stopped and kept ding on said dangerous trestle for half an hour or more by the servants and agents of the defendant company who were in charge of said train and running the same for said company. (4) That while the said train was standing on said dangerous trestle in the aforesaid careless and negligent manner, on account of the darkness of the night and poor lights furnished by the defendant company on said train, the plaintiff missed his footing, and fell from the said train a distance of 30 feet, from which fall this plaintiff was badly bruised and injured, by having his breast bone and three ribs broken, his back wrenched and sprained, the muscles and tendons of his arms, side, and back badly torn and bruised, and his nervous system fearfully shocked; so that the plaintiff, on account of said wounds, bruises, and shock, was confined to his bed for six weeks or more, and has ever since experienced great pain and suffering. (5) That the injuries of the plaintiff aforesaid were caused by the wrongful acts, negligence of defendant, in the manner before mentioned, whereby the plaintiff has suffered great and long-continued bodily pain, is permanently injured in his person, and rendered unable to pursue any active calling, or to perform hard labor, which is necessary for the support of himself and family; and by such injury plaintiff has been damaged $10,000."

It will be seen that two acts of negligence are specifically alleged: (1) Delaying the train beyond the schedule time; (2) stopping the train and allowing it to remain for half an hour or more on a trestle. Then it is alleged that while the train was so standing, the plaintiff, on account of the darkness of the night and poor lights furnished by defendant on said train, missed his footing, and fell, thereby causing the injury. To constitute a cause of action for negligence, the complaint must not only show that the defendant was negligent, but that the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of the injury. We cannot see, from any allegation in the complaint, what possible connection the failure in starting the train on time had with the injury as a cause thereof. The negligence in stopping the train and allowing it to remain on the trestle for a time could not have produced the injury if plaintiff had remained in the car, where the defendant had reason to believe he would remain. The complaint does not show that plaintiff went out upon the platform of the car by any order or invitation of the defendant; nor does it state any excuse or necessity warranting plaintiff being upon the platform at the time; nor does it show that defendant, with knowledge of plaintiff's danger, failed to warn. There is nothing in the complaint from which a reasonable person could infer that plaintiff's going out upon the platform and falling therefrom was a natural and probable result of the stopping of the train upon the trestle. As to the matter of "poor lights," even if it be granted that the platform under the circumstances. The train was not at any station or place where persons are invited to use the platform as a means of entering or leaving the car, when, as to such persons, the defendant would owe the duty to so light the platform and landing as to insure safety in their use. Under the circumstances in the case the defendant owed no duty to plaintiff to light up the platform and adjacencies outside the cars for his benefit.

A presumption of negligence from the fact that plaintiff fell from the train and was injured could not arise. The case of Steele v. Railroad Co., 55 S. C. 389, 33 S. E. 509, cited by appellant, as well as other cases referring to the matter of presuming negligence by the fact of injury to a passenger on a railroad, shows that such presumption arises on proof of the fact of injury to a passenger caused by some agency or instrumentality of the railroad company. In this case, as shown, it does not appear from the complaint by any proper averment that plaintiff's injury was caused by the defendant. If so, then the presumption is rebuttable, and the complaint itself contains matter in rebuttal, which, under the demurrer, the court must consider. For this reason we will notice the second ground of objection to the complaint, viz. that the complaint shows contributory negligence by plaintiff. The question of contributory negligence cannot properly arise except when the negligence of the defendant is a proximate cause of the injury. Therefore, for the purpose of this question, we assume that the complaint shows negligence of defendant as a proximate cause of the injury. We may also say that, while contributory negligence is ordinarily a matter of defense, yet, if the complaint shows contributory negligence by plaintiff, that would render the complaint demurrable for insufficiency, since it contained allegations that would defeat the cause of action alleged, or prevent a recovery thereon. The complaint alleges the fact that the train stood upon the trestle for a half an hour or more, and does not allege that plaintiff was ignorant of this fact. The inference is that he knew the train was on the trestle when he went upon the platform. He was aware of the condition, also, that there were poor lights on the train, and that the night was dark. Nevertheless he went out upon the platform, without excuse or necessity. This was certainly negligence, which, if not the only proximate cause of his injury, was a proximate cause concurring with the negligence of the defendant.

It is also excepted that the circuit court erred in refusing plaintiff's motion to amend. This refusal was within the discretion of the court, and we cannot say such discretion has been abused. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 21, 1900.)

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE SALE — FAILURE OF TITLE TO PORTION OF LANDS—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER.

A purchaser of land at a master's sale under foreclosure is entitled to an abatement in the price bid, on discovery after the sale, and before a deed has passed, that a portion of the lands described in the decree and advertisement of sale had been recovered from the mortgagor by title paramount.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Greenville county; D. H. Townsend, Judge.

Action by the People's Bank of Greenville, S. C., against W. A. Bramlett and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant Ella M. Townes appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Irvine and L. K. Clyde, for appellant. L. O. Patterson, for respondent.

JONES, J. This appeal is from a decree of the circuit court allowing a purchaser at a foreclosure sale of land an abatement in the price on account of a defect in the title to a part of the land sold. The case is thus stated in the circuit decree: "This case comes before me upon the master's report, which shows that H. J. Haynsworth had purchased one of the tracts of land ordered to be sold at the price of $2,500, but that after his bid he ascertained that a certain portion of the land had been recovered from the mortgagor by title paramount in the case of Spillors v. Bramlett, and he claimed an abatement of one hundred and fifty dollars from the price because of the failure of the title to said portion. The affidavit of Mr. Haynsworth shows that he did not know that a good title to said portion of the land would not be conveyed by the master's deed, and that the lands were worth about fifteen dollars an acre. The record in the case of Spillors v. Bramlett shows a recovery of a portion of this Jenkins tract, said to contain about twelve acres. The decree of foreclosure and the advertisement under which the land was sold describe it as the Jenkins tract, and state specifically the lines, metes, and bounds, and describe it as containing 166 acres, more or less. The portion recovered by Spillors is included within these lines. On learning the situation, Mr. Haynsworth deposited in the hands of the master enough money to cover the cash portion of the bid, making due allowance for the above deficiency. This was not made as a payment upon his bid, but was a mere deposit to await the determination of the court upon the matter. I find from the evidence before me that the abatement applied for, to wit, one hundred and fifty dollars, is reasonable, and should be allowed, unless there is some rule of law forbidding it. The land was sold at a full price, and it seems just that the purchaser should not be required to pay for a portion which he cannot get. The applisale under a decree of foreclosure is not entitled to any relief where there is a deficiency or a failure of title as to a portion of the property. This position may be correct after the contract has been executed and the deed of conveyance made, and the authorities cited by the attorneys for the mortgagees tend to support such contention. But there is quite a difference where the contract is executory. The general doctrine is that one who agrees to purchase land will be allowed a reasonable opportunity to investigate the title, and if he finds that the title fails as to a portion, or there is a defect in the title, he will be allowed to rescind the trade, or an abatement from the purchase price. After the contract has been executed, however, and the deed actually made, the purchaser must look to the warranty contained in his deed, and he is entitled to only such remedy as he has under that warranty. The present case is one where the contract is wholly executory, and I think that the general rule applies to this case, and entitles the purchaser to an abatement of the price."

1. The first exception imputes error in allowing the abatement when there was no evidence offered to prove such deficiency, or to show that the purchaser would not, under the master's deed, get 166 acres, as claimed by him, there having been no survey made of the land. The affidavit of the purchaser was before the court, which stated "that a part of this land was recovered by A. Spillors about 1890, thus taking a part of the land included within the lines, metes, and bounds by which it was sold to deponent, and deponent has been unable to get possession of said portion, although it is included within said metes and bounds." The master reported that the purchaser, Haynsworth, claims a reduction upon his bid of $150, for the reason that it appears from the record of the case of Spillors against Bramlett that a portion of the tract bid off by him, containing about 12 acres, was recovered by the plaintiff in that action by title paramount prior to the institution of this suit of foreclosure. The circuit court found that "the record in the case of Spillors v. Bramlett shows a recovery of a portion of this Jenkins tract, said to contain about twelve acres." It is stated in the argument of appellant that the record in the case of Spillors against Bramlett was not put in evidence, and no evidence was offered at the hearing of the master's report except the affidavit of respondent. But the findings by the circuit court as to what the record in Spillors against Bramlett shows is not specifically excepted to, and we cannot assume that such finding was without evidence. The fact of a deficiency by reason of the recovery in Spillors against Bramlett was shown by respondent's affidavit, which was not in any way disputed, and appellant made this matter. It was not at all necessary to have a survey to ascertain whether respondent might not acquire 166 acres by his purchase notwithstanding said deficiency. The respondent bid for a tract described by designated boundaries. The deficiency arose from a failure of title to a portion within those boundaries; and the circuit court has found that an abatement to the extent of $150 on the purchase price of $2,500 would be reasonable, to which there is specific exception.

2. The second exception assigns that it was error to allow such abatement when said tract was sold as a body, for a sum in gross; the number of acres stated in the advertisement being used as a part of the description of the property as evidenced by the advertisement and the use of the expression "more or less." The tract involved was described in the mortgage, complaint, decree, and advertisement for sale, as follows: "The Jenkins tract, containing one hundred and sixty-six acres, more or less, conveyed to D. A. Bramlett by O. H. Jenkins, November 4, 1876, recorded in R. M. C. office book II., page 223, described as follows [giving a minute description by courses and distances and corners], adjoining lands of Goghill, Hyde, and others." It is true that the tract was sold as a body for a sum in gross; but it will be observed that the deficiency in question is not a mere deficiency in quantity arising from a mistake or variation in calculation of the acreage contained in specified boundaries, but the deficiency arises from failure of title to a part of the land within the given boundaries. If the deficiency was merely due to an error or variation in a surveyor's calculation, and the purchaser could nevertheless take the land within the specified boundaries, such deficiency, being only 6 per cent. of the acreage mentioned, would be guarded against by the words "more or less" in the description, and would not be such a gross variation as would call for redress, as shown in such cases as Lyles v. Haskell, 35 S. C. 391, 14 S. E. 829, and Erskine v. Wilson, 41 S. C. 198, 19 S. E. 489. But in this case the purchaser cannot get the land specifically defined by metes and bounds and corners, since a portion of it is not in the power of the court to convey, it having been taken from the mortgagor by title paramount. The purchaser bought the "Jenkins tract," whatever its acreage, but cannot receive a title for the whole of said tract.

3. It is excepted that the purchaser is estopped to claim abatement, because with knowledge of said deficiency he paid a part of the purchase money, went into possession of the property, and rented the same for the year 1899. This exception has no basis in the facts as shown by the record that the purchaser refused to comply with the terms of sale unless an abatement of $150 was allowed.

4. It is contended that the purchaser ought to be denied any relief, because he had constructive notice of the judgment recovered in the case of Spillors against Bramlett, and recorded in Greenville county prior to the execution of the mortgage. The purchaser swears positively that he had no knowledge of the deficiency at the time of purchase or bid. Whether a purchaser at an equity sale shall be held bound by constructive notice of all recorded judgments affecting the property sold, so as to defeat relief for defect of title actually discovered after the sale and before compliance, will depend upon whether it is the policy of the court of equity in this state to allow purchasers at sales under its order a reasonable time to examine into the title before compelling compliance. In Mitchell v. Pinckney, 13 S. C. 212, it was stated, "Reasonable time is always given for the examination of title, and, if necessary, a reference will be ordered." We take it that this expresses the policy in this state, and it is a fair and just one to all concerned, and is well calculated to inspire confidence and promote competition at equity sales. Such being the rule, we do not well see how purchasers at equity sales should be denied relief for defect of title, on the mere ground that they are bound by constructive notice of such defect, unless it be that relief is never to be afforded for defect of title which a full examination of the records would disclose, which would for most practical purposes be a denial of relief for defective title. If one has actual notice of the defect in the title, or has before his bid discovered such defect by an examination of the record, there would be good grounds for denying him any relief, but, if he has no actual notice, and bids in reliance on the rule allowing him a reasonable time to examine into the title, he ought not to be denied relief merely because he had constructive notice of the records at the time of his bid. Then, from the facts before us, we cannot affirm with certainty that the record in Spillors against Bramlett would disclose in itself the fact of the deficiency claimed, for it may be that some evidence aliunde was necessary to identify the land recovered in that case as a portion of the tract sold. This evidence was furnished the circuit court by the affidavit of the purchaser, who, after showing the identity, swore that he did not know of the deficiency at the time of his bid.

5. The fifth exception imputes error in holding that said purchaser had a right to time in which to investigate title after sale, when the decree under which these lands the question. As a matter of fact, the master did not resell, and no questions are before us growing out of a resale at the risk of a purchaser. The master has seen fit to repeat the matter to the court for guidance, instead of attempting to resell; and the court, by its decree, has again instructed the master in the premises. Notwithstanding the direction to resell on noncompliance, it was competent for the court in the proceedings to direct acceptance of the purchaser's bid, less the abatement allowed.

6. The remaining question is covered by the eighth exception, which assigns error in allowing said abatement, or any abatement of the purchase price of land sold at a forced judicial sale for the collection of money, in which there are no implied warranties, and to which the doctrine of caveat emptor applies, in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation. In execution sales by the sheriff the maxim of caveat emptor is rigorously applied. A sheriff under an execution is not directed to sell specifically described property, is governed by general laws, and is not the agent of the court in such sale. The court does not confirm his sales, and exercises no supervision over them, as it does with reference to sales under its own order. A sheriff selling under an execution cannot be said to represent in any way the defendant in execution, except in so far as by general law he is made the organ by which the interest of the defendant in execution in the property sold is conveyed to the purchaser. Hence it has been long settled that a purchaser at an execution sale by a sheriff buys at his peril, in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation. This in a large degree accounts for the sacrifices often attending execution sales, for it is reasonable to suppose that a prudent purchaser will make allowance in his bid for the contingencies of his purchase. In some jurisdictions this stern maxim of the common law is applied to all judicial sales at law or in equity, but in this state a more liberal and reasonable rule prevails. In equity sales the court is the vendor. Its order of sale acts on specifically described property. Purchasers are invited by the court to bid, and it is well known that bidders at such sales feel a greater sense of security that they will get the described property, or be treated with equity. This tends to make property bring its value,—a thing to be desired and encouraged. Now, if one who seeks equity must do equity, ought not a court of equity becoming a vendor of property at the instance and for the benefit of the parties concerned do equity, and render appropriate relief to a purchaser, when the court finds itself unable to convey what it advertised to sell? Surely the court will not do less than it would compel any other purchaser for defect of title. The purchaser at such sale will not be compelled to perform his contract to purchase if his title is doubtful. Fuller v. Missroon, 35 S. C. 326, 14 S. E. 714; McMichael v. McMichael, 51 S. C. 555, 29 S. E. 403. In the case of Monaghan v. Small, 6 S. C. 177, this principle was applied to a sale under proceedings to sell lands of a decedent in order to apply the proceeds to the payment of his debts and for distribution. I see no good reason why a rule applicable to partition sales and sales for the payment of the debts of a decedent is not also applicable to a sale under foreclosure of a mortgage. In all such sales the court is vendor at the instance and for the benefit of the parties in the enforcement of a right. In the case of Bolivar v. Zeigler, 9 Rich. (S. C.) 287, the court made a broad path for equity in these words: "Whatever doubts may have been once entertained as to whether the doctrine of caveat emptor applied to sales by the commissioners in equity, those doubts were finally settled by the principles established in the case of Commissioners v. Smith, 9 Rich. Law, 515, and there can be no doubt that this maxim does not apply to such sales, and therefore that the defense here set up, if established on the trial, will be a sufficient defense to the action. For although the sale in this case was made by the sheriff, yet it was not a compulsory sale under process of execution, where the rule of caveat emptor does apply, but a sale for partition at the instance of the parties, and must be governed by the same principles as applied to such sales when made by the commissioners in equity." That able and learned annotator, Mr. A. C. Freeman, in a note to Burns v. Hamilton's Adm'r, 70 Am. Dec. 575, fortifying the statement by numerous citations, says: "It is held in some states that the rule of caveat emptor applies to mortgage, partition, and other equity sales, and that in the absence of fraud or warranty a failure of title to the property sold is no ground for the relief of the purchaser. But the better rule is that in equity sales the purchaser is entitled to receive a title free from equities and incumbrances of which he had no notice, and if, by the sale, he will not receive such a title, he will not, upon his making objection, be compelled to complete his purchase, but will be released therefrom, unless the title can be made good, or other just relief awarded." The case of Latimer v. Wharton, 41 S. C. 508, 19 S. E. 855, contains some language from which it might be inferred that the court regarded the rule of caveat emptor applicable to an executed sale under foreclosure for debt on the grounds that such a sale was compulsory, and so would come under the rule applicable to execution sales by the sheriff. But the point decided in that case was that: "If the purchaser of land default in payment he is sued, but fails to plead failure of consideration in defense, and judgment is obtained; and if before payment the land so purchased is recovered by title paramount, and execution on such judgment is levied on the other property of the purchaser,—an injunction will not issue to enjoin a sale under such levy upon the complaint of the purchaser, who made no allegation of fraud or misrepresentation by which he was induced to accept the deed to the land, enter into possession thereof, or execute the bond and mortgage to secure the credit of the purchase money." That case was very different from this case, where the contract is executory, and where no element of waiver or estoppel enters. In that case the court recognized a great difference between enforcing an executory contract and giving relief after it has been executed, referring to several cases where the distinction was recognized, viz.: Evans v. Dendy, 2 Speer, 9; Fuller v. Fowler, 1 Bailey, 75; Prescott v. Holmes, 7 Rich. Eq. 1. See, also, Parker v. Parlow, 12 Rich. Law, 683. So that, even if the rule of caveat emptor should apply at all to sales by the court of equity, it should only apply after the sale is executed. The contract of a bidder at a sale in equity is not executed until he has complied with the terms of sale, and received the officer's deed of conveyance, or done something which should estop him from asserting that the contract was not executed. If a purchaser at a sale in equity, after discovery of the defect in title, complies with his bid, and goes into possession of the land, it might with force be contended that such purchaser is estopped to assert such defect afterwards, but no such case is presented here. The contract of the purchaser in this case is executory merely. But, further, we think it may be said in this case that there was a misrepresentation as to the property sold, for which cause relief would be granted even after an executed contract, if no element of waiver or estoppel interposed to prevent. It is not essential that such misrepresentation be intentional. It appears that the land was conveyed to the mortgagor in 1876. In 1888 a portion of the land was recovered from the mortgagor by title paramount in the case of Spillor against Bramlett. After this the mortgagor, with knowledge of this recovery, but probably not thinking of it at the time, executed the mortgage on land a part of which he did not own. This misrepresentation so incorporated in the description in the mortgage went likewise into the complaint, decree, and advertisement, which followed the description in the mortgage. This minute description in the mortgage and advertisement, already referred to in this opinion, giving courses, distances, and corners, was as if a plat of the land had been made by a surveyor, and ex-of caveat emptor does not apply to sales by the master in chancery, for, he being the agent of the parties for whose benefit the sale was made, they are as much bound by his representations as they would have been by their own, further decides that where a tract of land has been sold by the master in equity, and represented upon a map as containing more acres than it was discovered upon a resurvey to have, an abatement will be allowed for the deficiency in the quantity according to the nature and extent of the defect. To the same effect is Barkley v. Barkley, 3 McCord, 269. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

LACHICOTTE et al. v. FORD.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 13, 1900.)

WATER AND WATER COURSES—FLOODING LAND—DAMAGES—COMPLAINT.

Plaintiffs alleged that defendant owned a plantation lying on a certain river, and between such river and plaintiffs' plantation; that the banks of such river bounding on defendant's plantation, and the openings in the same, were solely within defendant's control; that in the spring of 1898, when plaintiffs were in possession of their plantation, defendant unlawfully, and with the malicious desire to injure plaintiffs, so operated the banks of such river and its canals as to cause the rice fields of plaintiffs' plantation to be overflowed, which fields plaintiffs had prepared for cultivation at much expense, and so maintained such nuisance as to prevent all cultivation of plaintiffs' plantation during the year 1898, and to render the same utterly useless; that, by reason of defendant's conduct, plaintiffs suffered damages, hereinbefore alleged, etc. Held, that the complaint states a cause of action, as it shows plaintiffs' right to the unobstructed use of their plantation, and the invasion of that right by defendant, in flooding such plantation by means of a water course.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Georgetown county; J. C. Klugh, Judge.

Action by St. Julien Lachicotte and A. A. Springs, co-partners under the firm name of S. M. Ward & Co., against Frederick W. Ford, for damages for flooding plaintiffs' plantation by means of a water course. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Mitchell & Smith, for appellant. Walter Hazard, Trenholm Rhett, Miller & Whaley, and Gilland & Pyatt, for respondents.

JONES, J. The circuit court overruled defendant's demurrer to the complaint on the ground that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the defendant now seeks to reverse said order. The complaint attempted to state two causes of action, each of which was demurred to; but it will be sufficient for this appeal to state the allegations as to one of said causes, which are substantially as follows: (1) That possession of a tract of land in said county known as "Woodside." (3) That the defendant owned and was in possession of a tract of land in said county known as "Rice Hope," lying on the waters of North Santee river, and between said river and said Woodside plantation. (4) "That the banks of said river, its creeks and canals bounding on Rice Hope plantation, and the trunks and openings in the same, were at the time mentioned hereinafter solely within the care, management, control, and operation of the defendant." (5) Alleged certain expenditures incurred in the preparation, etc., of said Woodside plantation in 1897 and 1898 for cultivation. (6) "That in the spring of the year 1898, when, as hereinbefore alleged, these plaintiffs were in the lawful possession of the said Woodside plantation, and in the exercise and enjoyment of their legal rights in and upon the same, the said defendant, as these plaintiffs are informed and believe, and upon such information and belief allege, unlawfully, and with the willful and malicious desire to annoy, harass, injure, and oppress these plaintiffs, so used the said Rice Hope plantation, and so controlled, handled, maintained, and operated the said banks of said river, and of its canals and its creeks, as also the trunks and openings therein, as to cause the rice fields of said Woodside plantation to be overflowed, which fields, as hereinbefore alleged, had been prepared for cultivation at much expense by these plaintiffs, and so caused and maintained such nuisance as to hinder and prevent any and all cultivation of said Woodside plantation during the said year 1898, and to render the same utterly useless to these plaintiffs during the said two years. (7) That by reason of the willful, unlawful, and unreasonable conduct of said defendant as aforesaid in the use and management of his said Rice Hope plantation, and in the use, management, care, control, maintenance, and handling of the banks of said river and of its canals and creeks, as also of the trunks and openings therein, these plaintiffs, in the manner aforesaid, suffered the special injuries and damages hereinbefore alleged, as well as the loss of the crops intended to have been cultivated on said Woodside plantation, in all to the damage of these plaintiffs in the sum of at least fifteen hundred dollars." (8) Some allegations as to exemplary damages.

We think that the complaint states a cause of action. A cause of action is stated when the facts alleged show some right of plaintiff, and the invasion of that right by some delict or breach of duty by defendant. The complaint shows plaintiffs' right to the unobstructed use and enjoyment of Woodside plantation, and the invasion of that right by the defendant, in flooding said plantation by means of a water course. Admitting the defendant's right to use the water of North license, or prescription authorizing the same. The case presented is one of flooding by means of a water course, and not a flooding through freshet, tide water, or surface water. While it is true that, in determining a demurrer for insufficiency, the court will treat as alleged all the facts of which the court should take judicial notice, as the facts that the tide ebbs and flows, and the general geographical areas subject thereto, still we cannot assume, as one of such facts, that Rice Hope and Woodside plantations are so subject, and argue therefrom that the flooding complained of was due to the action of tide water, and that the complaint failed to allege any duty which the defendant owed to the plaintiffs, to protect their land therefrom. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

BRITISH & AMERICAN MORTG. CO., Limited, v. BATES. SAME v. PEACOCK. SAME v. ALL. SAME v. KNEPTON.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 15, 1900.)

APPEAL—FINDING OF FACTS—EXCEPTIONS—NOTE—PLACE OF CONTRACT—USURY.

1. A finding of fact cannot be reversed in the absence of a specific exception assigning error therein.

2. A note and a mortgage securing the same, written in New York and made payable there, were sent to South Carolina for execution. The maker of the papers, after signing the same, made a draft for the amount of the loan on the payee of such papers, in New York, and the same was cashed by a bank in South Carolina. The papers were then sent to New York. Held, that a finding that the papers were made in the state, and not in New York, was proper.

3. Where a contract is made in one state, to be performed in another, the parties may stipulate in good faith for the rate of interest allowed in either; and where they have contracted with reference to the laws of one state, there being no evidence that they intended to evade the usury laws of the other state, the contract must be enforced, where it is not usurious.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Barnwell county; D. A. Townsend, Judge.

Actions by the British & American Mortgage Company, Limited, against James W. Bates, S. L. Peacock, W. Riley All, and L. P. Knepton, respectively, to foreclose four mortgages. From judgments for plaintiff, defendants separately appeal. Affirmed.

R. C. Holman, for appellants. T. O. Patterson, for respondent.

JONES, J. These four actions for the foreclosure of four several mortgages were heard together. One of the defenses made was that the contract was made in New York, and payable there, and was void for usury under the laws of New York. The circuit court found as a fact that the notes were made in South Carolina, and that the mortgages were made in South Carolina, and that the contracts were governed by the laws of South Carolina, and that the notes were not void for usury. The appellants except to the finding of fact that the notes were made in South Carolina, and not in New York, and to the finding that the contracts were governed by the law of either state, and that the preponderance of the evidence was that, while the notes were payable in New York, that place of payment was merely a convenience; and that the parties contracted with direct reference to the laws of South Carolina. The appellants' exceptions impute error (1) in holding that the notes and mortgages were made in South Carolina, and in not holding that they were made in New York; (2) in holding that the parties could contract in reference to either the laws of New York or the laws of South Carolina; (3) substantially as the first; (4) in decreeing for foreclosure, when he should have held that the contracts were governed by the laws of New York, and so void for usury.

In reference to the first exception: One of the notes given by defendant Bates was as follows: "Barnwell, S. C., July 10, 1896. $140.00. On the first day of November, 1896, I promise to pay to the order of the British and American Mortgage Company, Limited, one hundred and forty dollars in United States gold coin, of present standard of weight and fineness, at the National Bank of the Republic of New York, N. Y., for value received, with interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum after maturity. The payment of this note and interest is secured by a mortgage, which is recorded in the public records of Barnwell county, in the state of South Carolina. Witness my hand and seal. J. W. Bates. [L. S.]" The note appears on its face to have been signed at Barnwell, S. C. Bates was a resident of Barnwell county, and the mortgage, which was an essential part of the contract or transaction, covered lands in Barnwell county. The notes and mortgage, while written in New York, were sent to Patterson & Holman, in Barnwell, S. C., for execution by Bates, and were actually signed and sealed by Bates in Barnwell, S. C., before requisite witnesses. The "case" does not show the date of the record of the mortgage, but it is a just inference from the recital in the note, to which plaintiffs and defendant are parties, that the mortgage was at least filed for record in Barnwell on the day of the execution of the papers. It appears that, on the day of the signing of said papers by Bates in Barnwell, he made a draft upon Hoffman, in New York, through whom the loan by plaintiff was negotiated, for the amount of the loan, and that this draft was collected through a bank in the usual course of business. The draft was cashed by a bank in Barnwell, and with the proceeds, excepting a small amount, Bates on the same day discharged a prior incumbrance on the property. It appears that the papers were sent to Hoffman, in New York, through whom the loan was negotiated with plaintiff, along with the said draft for the amount of the mortgage loan, and was by Hoffman turned over to plaintiff. But this delivery to the plaintiff in New York was not the consummation of the execution. The execution was complete, so far as the question before us is concerned, when the papers, in the form they now have, were mailed in South Carolina for plaintiff, pursuant to the agreement under which the loan was negotiated. The circuit court found, as matter of fact, that the parties contracted with reference to the laws of South Carolina. This finding of fact cannot be reversed unless (1) there be a specific exception assigning error in such finding, and (2) after such exception it must appear that the preponderance of the evidence is against such finding. No exception is made to such finding. But, if there had been an exception thereto, the preponderance of the evidence is not against such finding. Where a contract is made in one state, to be performed in another state, the parties may in good faith stipulate for the rate of interest allowed in either. This is the law as settled in this state (Thornton v. Dean, supra), and in other jurisdictions (Jackson v. Mortgage Co. [Ga.] 15 S. E. 812; Dugan v. Lewis [Tex. Sup.] 14 S. W. 1024, 12 L. R. A. 93; Scott v. Perlee, 48 Am. Rep. 421). See, also, cases cited in note to Martin v. Johnson (Ga.) 8 L. R. A. 170 (s. c. 10 S. E. 1092). The parties having the right to so contract, and having, as matter of fact, contracted with reference to the laws of this state, and there being no evidence that the parties intended any shift to evade the usury laws, the contract must be enforced here, since it is not usurious under our laws. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

McDONALD et al. v. WOODWARD.

SAME v. STEWART et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 13, 1900.)

LIFE ESTATES—POWER OF LIFE TENANT—MORTGAGE.

The life tenant has no power, at the time of the conveyance to him, to so mortgage the land for the purchase price as to bind the interest of the remainder-men, who are in no way parties to such mortgage.

Appeals from common pleas circuit court of Fairfield county; George W. Gage, Judge.

Actions by Sallie E. McDonald and another, as remainder-men, against William B. Woodward, and against John R. Stewart, executor of Robert McCarley, deceased, and Thomas L. McCarley, respectively, to recover certain lands. From judgments for plaintiffs, defendants respectively appeal. Affirmed.

Jas. W. Hanahan and J. E. McDonald, for appellants. A. S. & W. D. Douglass, for respondents.

JONES, J. In each of these actions the plaintiffs, as remainder-men, after the death of the life tenant, sue the defendant as grantee of the life tenant for recovery of the land described. While not disputing the facts showing plaintiffs' title, the defendants seek to defend by showing that at the time of the conveyance to the life tenant and remainder-men the life tenant executed a bond and mortgage for the purchase money on said land; that said mortgage bound the interest of the remainder-men; that defendants, after taking title from the life tenant, paid said mortgage in consideration of the conveyance to them under the agreement that it should remain open for their protection, and that by reason thereof they were equitable assignees of said mortgage, entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee, and that such mortgage should be foreclosed for their benefit. The facts, in the concrete, are thus stated in the circuit decree: "One Thomas W. Erwin was the common source of title. He conveyed by deed to Mary J. Hemphill February 1, 1873. Thereafter Mary J. Hemphill, on the 13th of February, 1879, conveyed by deed 92.4 acres to Robert McCarley; and on the 19th of February, 1879, conveyed by deed 124½ acres to William B. Woodward. Thereafter Mary J. Hemphill died December 1, 1898, leaving her surviving the plaintiffs as her only children then alive. The habendum in Erwin's deed to Hemphill is: 'To have * * * unto the said Mary J. Hemphill * * * and during the term of her natural life, and after her death to such of her issue as she may leave living at the time of her death, the child of a deceased child, if any, to take the share to which their parent would have been entitled if living; and to their heirs and assigns, forever.' The consideration of the deed is expressed to be 'two thousand five hundred dollars by securities given and now paid me by Mary J. Hemphill. * * *' On the same day the deed from Erwin to Hemphill was executed, Hemphill executed to Erwin her bond for the penal sum of $[illegible] conditioned to pay the just sum of $[illegible] therewith, and to secure the payment thereof a mortgage on the premises the same day conveyed. It does not expressly appear either in the bond or mortgage that they were given to secure payment of the purchase money, but that fact is not seriously contested. I find that such was the fact. The mortgage employs apt language to convey the fee to Erwin, with clause of defeasance. It is proper to add, the deed, bond, and mortgage were prepared in the office of James H. Rion. Thomas W. Erwin hypothecated the bond and mortgage with the National Bank of C[illegible] to secure the payment of his own note to the bank for money borrowed. The bank pressed for its money, and Robert McCarley and William B. Woodward undertook to pay, and did pay, the bank the amount of the Erwin note. Thereabouts, on February 13, 1879, for $[illegible], and on February 18, 1879, for $996, respectively, they had purchased two parcels of land from Mary J. Hemphill. The purchase money therefor was to be paid and was paid the Erwin note, and on the collateral [illegible] liam B. Woodward for an amendment of the pleadings and fuller testimony thereon. We agree fully with the circuit court that the life tenant had no power to so mortgage the land as to bind the remainder-men, who were not in any way parties to such mortgage. It is therefore immaterial how may be decided the issue of fact whether it was the intention or agreement of parties to leave open for the benefit of defendants. The circuit court was quite correct in saying: "Admitting that the lien of the mortgage was preserved intact for the benefit of McCarley and Woodward, it could not survive the body which it held, to wit, the life estate of Mary Hemphill. That estate terminated at the death of Mary Hemphill in December, 1898, and with it ended the incumbering mortgage. There is, therefore, no opportunity to apply the equitable doctrine of assignment and subrogation." The case of Robinson v. Lowery, 52 S. C. 464, 30 S. E. 487, is much like this case in principle. The judgment of the circuit court in each case is affirmed.

CHESTERFIELD & K. R. CO. v. JOHNSON.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 17, 1900.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—CONSTRUCTION OF RAILROAD—COMPENSATION—APPEAL.

Under Rev. St. § 1747, relating to the condemnation of lands for a railroad, providing that from the verdict of the jury assessing compensation either party may appeal to the circuit court, giving the opposite party 15 days' notice of such intended appeal, with the grounds thereof, and, if the court shall be satisfied of the reasonable sufficiency of the grounds, an issue shall be ordered, and the question of compensation shall be submitted to a jury, an order of the circuit court granting an appeal from an assessment of compensation, and ordering an issue to be tried by a jury, which recites that the court was satisfied of the reasonable sufficiency of the grounds of appeal, cannot be reviewed by the supreme court, since it cannot say that the circuit court was not satisfied of the reasonable sufficiency of the grounds.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Kershaw county; W. C. Benet, Judge.

Proceedings by the Chesterfield & Kershaw Railroad Company against J. H. Johnson to condemn land for a railroad. From an order of the circuit court granting an appeal from the verdict of a jury impaneled by the clerk to assess compensation, and ordering the issue of compensation to be submitted to a jury, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. M. Shannon, for appellant. W. D. Trautham, for respondent.

McIVER, C. J. This railroad company, desiring to obtain, for the construction of its road, a right of way through the lands of the defendant, Johnson, situate in Kershaw ute. From the verdict of the jury impaneled by the clerk, finding the proper compensation to be $100, the defendant, Johnson, gave notice of appeal to the circuit court, accompanied with the grounds thereof. That appeal was heard by his honor, Judge Benet, presiding at the February term, 1900, of the court of common pleas for Kershaw county, who granted an order, reciting that "it appearing to the court the grounds are reasonably sufficient," and ordered an issue to be framed and submitted to a jury to determine the amount of compensation to which appellant was entitled. From this order the Chesterfield & Kershaw Railroad Company appeals to this court on the following grounds: "(1) That his honor erred in holding that the grounds of appeal were reasonably sufficient to sustain the appeal; (2) that his honor erred in framing an issue and submitting it to a jury on the showing made by the appellant."

This is a statutory proceeding provided for by Rev. St. §§ 1743–1747, both inclusive, and the question presented by this appeal must be determined by the provisions of the statute. These sections, after making provisions for the initiatory steps to be taken where a corporation desired to obtain a right of way over the lands of another for the construction of a railroad, whereby, among other things, it is provided that the clerk of the court shall impanel a jury to determine, in the first instance, the amount of compensation which shall be made to the landowner, and render their verdict in writing for the same, proceed, in section 1747, to declare as follows: "From the verdict so rendered it shall be the right of either party to appeal to the first term of the circuit court next ensuing in the county, giving to the opposite party fifteen days' notice of such intended appeal, with the grounds thereof; and upon the hearing of such appeal, if the court shall be satisfied of the reasonable sufficiency of the grounds, an issue shall be ordered, in which the appellant shall be the actor, and the question of compensation shall be thereupon submitted to a jury in open court," etc. From this language it will be seen that at least two conditions must be complied with by the person desiring to make such an appeal: (1) He must give 15 days' notice of such intended appeal. (2) That such notice must be accompanied with the grounds thereof. But there is but one condition upon which the appeal shall be granted, and an issue shall be ordered for trial by a jury in open court, and that is that the court to which the appeal is taken "shall be satisfied of the reasonable sufficiency of the grounds." Now in this case no question is raised as to the fact that the respondent herein complied with both of the conditions required for taking the appeal, by to be tried by a jury in open court, has been complied with. That requirement, as we have seen, is that the court shall be satisfied of the reasonable sufficiency of the grounds of appeal; and, as it is distinctly recited in the order appealed from that the court was satisfied of the reasonable sufficiency of the grounds of appeal, we do not see by what authority this court can question such a declaration of the circuit court. That court, speaking through its presiding officer (Judge Benet), had declared that the court was satisfied that "the grounds are reasonably sufficient," and we do not see how this court can undertake to say that the court to which the appeal was taken was not satisfied of the reasonable sufficiency of the grounds. It will be observed that the person who desires to appeal to the circuit court from the verdict of a jury impaneled by the clerk, in a case like this, and thus to obtain a trial by a jury, in open court, of an issue as to the amount of compensation to be allowed, is not required by the statute to satisfy this court that his grounds of appeal are reasonably sufficient, but the only requirement is that he shall satisfy the circuit court of the reasonable sufficiency of the grounds; and when that is done, as in this case, the statute makes it the duty of the circuit court to order the issue to be tried by a jury in open court, "whose verdict shall be final and conclusive unless a new trial shall be ordered by the supreme court." See section 1747, Rev. St. Indeed, we may say (though the point has not been raised in this case, and therefore is not properly before us for decision) that it is at least doubtful whether, under the provisions of section 20, art. 9, of the present constitution, a person who has taken an appeal to the circuit court in the manner prescribed by the statute, in a case like this, can be denied the right to have the issue of the amount of compensation which should be allowed him tried "by a jury of twelve men, in a court of record, as shall be prescribed by law." The case of Atlantic Coast-Line R. Co. v. South-Bound R. Co., 35 S. E. 553 (to be reported in 57 S. C. 317), cited and relied upon by the counsel for appellant herein, differs materially from the present case. In that case the appellant failed to comply with one of the conditions required by the statute for taking the appeal, by failing to serve any grounds for the appeal proposed to be taken from the verdict of the jury impaneled by the clerk; and therefore that appeal never was properly before the circuit court, and hence the circuit judge had no authority to grant the order appealed from. Here, however, both of the conditions required by the statute were complied with, and the appeal was properly before the circuit court. The case above re-

GARLINGTON et al. v. FLETCHER et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

RES JUDICATA—JUDGMENT IN CLAIM CASE—ANSWER.

1. Judgments are conclusive between parties and their privies as to all matters put in issue, or which under the rules of law might have been put in issue, in the cause wherein the judgment was rendered. Civ. Code, § 3742.

2. As a purchaser at sheriff's sale is the privy of the plaintiff in execution, a judgment in a claim case wherein the property has been found subject to the execution levied thereon estops the claimant from setting up title to the same in an action subsequently brought against him for its recovery by one who purchased it at sheriff's sale under the execution. Cosnahan v. Johnston, 33 S. E. 847, 108 Ga. 235, and cases cited.

3. In such an action it was not erroneous to strike, on demurrer, an answer filed by the defendant, in the nature of a cross petition, setting forth matters which, even if they ever had any merit, should have been put in issue by him in the trial of the case wherein he was claimant of the property.

4. As, for the reasons above indicated, the answer filed by the defendant was without merit, and was therefore rightly stricken, the defendant has no reason to complain of the overruling of a motion made by him to continue the case.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS—EXERCISES—PUNISHMENT OF PUPIL.

1. The authorities of a public school have full power to make it a part of the school course to write compositions, and enter into debates, and to prescribe that all pupils shall participate therein.

2. Whether a particular subject given by such authorities for composition or debate is suited to the age and advancement of the pupil is a question for determination by such authorities, and not by the courts. See, in this connection, Board v. Purse, 28 S. E. 896, 101 Ga. 422, and cases cited.

3. Where a pupil, who has been instructed to prepare a paper on such a subject, does not do so, but reads a paper prepared by her father, and containing expressions which are improper, and disrespectful to the teacher, the offense is wofold; and, although the school authorities may excuse and condone the preparation by the father of the paper actually read, and also its reading by the pupil, the latter may still be punished for her failure to herself prepare a paper in compliance with instructions. (a) If the punishment imposed be the preparation of a paper on the same subject at a later date, and the pupil refuse to prepare it, such pupil may be disciplined by expulsion, or suspension, or other proper punishment.

EXEMPTIONS—LABOR.

1. The record disclosing that the sum due by the garnishee to the defendant was not for daily, weekly, or monthly "wages," but for labor performed under a contract by the terms of which his compensation was measured by the amount of work done, the jury correctly found that the sum thus due was not exempt from the process of garnishment; and this is so although it appeared that payments were made to the defendant at the end of each period of four weeks.

STATE v. SALLADE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 7, 1900.)

EXECUTION—AFFIDAVIT OF ILLEGALITY—DISMISSAL.

1. A defendant in execution cannot file an affidavit of illegality until the execution has been levied upon his property. Consequently, where an execution against an individual has been levied upon property of a corporation, and the defendant interposes an affidavit of illegality, upon the ground that the execution is proceeding illegally against the property of such corporation, the court to which the execution and affidavit of illegality are returned has no jurisdiction to try the issue thus sought to be made, and for this reason the affidavit of illegality should be dismissed.

2. An affidavit of illegality is a remedy which lies only in favor of a defendant in execution, and, if filed by one who is not a defendant, the court to which the issue thus sought to be made is returned, being without jurisdiction to try it, should dismiss the affidavit of illegality.

Error from superior court, McIntosh county; Paul E. Seabrook, Judge.

J. M. Terrell, Atty. Gen., and Livingston Kenan, for the State. C. L. Livingston, for defendant in error.

FISH, J. The tax collector of McIntosh county issued an execution against "F. T. Sallade, Agent for the L. B. Price Company," for the sum of $100, alleged in the execution to be "due for special state tax for peddling clocks in" that county "for the year 1899." The sheriff of the county levied this execution upon certain personal property "as the property of F. T. Sallade, agent of L. B. Price Co.," whereupon F. T. Sallade, agent for the L. B. Price Mercantile Company, of Kansas City, Mo., "filed an affidavit of illegality, in which he alleged that the execution was" proceeding of McIntosh county. The case went to trial upon an admitted state of facts, and "upon oral motion of counsel for defendant in fi. fa. the court directed the * * * jury to return a verdict for the defendant in fi. fa., sustaining the illegality and dismissing the levy made under said execution," and the jury returned a verdict accordingly. The state excepted, pendente lite, to the direction of the verdict, and subsequently made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, whereupon it brought the case to this court for review.

We think that the court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant in execution. The execution was not against the L. B. Price Company, but it was against Sallade in his individual capacity. The words, "Agent for the L. B. Price Company," which followed Sallade's name in the fi. fa., were merely descriptio personæ. The same may be said with reference both to the levy and the affidavit of illegality, if we take them as they are set forth by copies in the record. From the copies of the levy and the affidavit of illegality it appears that the goods were "levied on as the property of F. T. Sallade, agent of L. B. Price Co."; and Sallade, who made the affidavit of illegality, did not swear that he was the agent of the L. B. Price Company, but was merely described as such in the affidavit. McDuffie v. Irvine, 91 Ga. 748, 17 S. E. 1028; Ice Co. v. Bluthenthal, 101 Ga. 541, 28 S. E. 1003; Music House v. Wynn, 107 Ga. 402, 33 S. E. 415. In the agreed statement of facts, however, it was admitted that the execution was levied upon certain goods "in the possession of F. T. Sallade, as the property of the L. B. Price Mercantile Co.," and "that an affidavit of illegality was filed by F. T. Sallade as agent of Price Co., upon the grounds therein stated." Considering the case as made by the execution, the levy, and the affidavit of illegality, copies of which appear in the record, we have a defendant in execution filing an affidavit of illegality upon the ground that the fi. fa. is wrongfully proceeding against the property of another party. The remedy by affidavit of illegality against an execution which has been issued illegally, or which is proceeding illegally, is purely statutory, and, except to the extent that the statute provides, there is no such remedy. We think it is clear from the statute that a defendant in execution can only file an affidavit of illegality when his property has been levied upon. Civ. Code, § 4736. He cannot interpose such an affidavit when the execution has been levied upon the property of some one else, and when, in such a case, he does so, the court has no jurisdiction to try the issue which he seeks to make. The court has jurisdiction only to try a case which the statute authorizes a defendant in execution to make, and the statute does not authorize a defendant to make such a case.

ment, the execution was against Sallade, and not against the Price Company. So then Sallade, as agent of the Price Company, made an affidavit, the effect of which, when considered in connection with the execution, was that an execution against himself had been levied upon, and was proceeding illegally against, the goods of the Price Company. The Price Company, not being the defendant in execution, could not interpose an affidavit of illegality to the levy of the fi. fa. "An affidavit of illegality is a remedy which lies only in favor of defendants in execution, and, if filed by persons who are not defendants, it will be dismissed." Artope v. Barker, 72 Ga. 186; Clinch v. Ferril, 48 Ga. 365; Civ. Code, § 4736. So, whether we view the case as made by the execution, the levy, and the affidavit of illegality, or as made by the agreed statement of facts, we reach the same result, viz. that the court had no jurisdiction to try the case made, and for this reason should have dismissed the affidavit of illegality. It does not appear that any motion was made to dismiss the affidavit of illegality for the want of jurisdiction. "Consent of parties, however, cannot give a court jurisdiction of a subject-matter when it has none by law; and when this court discovers from the record that a judgment has been rendered by a court having no jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the case is brought here for review upon writ of error, this court will, of its own motion, reverse the judgment." Smith v. Ferrario, 105 Ga. 53, 54, 31 S. E. 38. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

DISMISSAL—EFFECT—PLEADING—AMENDMENT—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

1. When the court passes an order sustaining a motion to dismiss a case on the ground that the petition does not set forth a cause of action, and in such order allows the plaintiff a specified number of days within which to amend his petition, the effect of the order is to take the case out of court, and finally dispose of the same, unless a proper amendment is filed within the time named in the order.
2. If such amendment is not so filed, it is too late to thereafter except pendente lite to the order of dismissal, but the same should be made the subject-matter of a direct bill of exceptions to the supreme court, which should be sued out within the time allowed by law for excepting to a final judgment.
3. The bill of exceptions in the present case was not sued out in due time, and accordingly the writ of error must be dismissed.

Vernon B. Robinson, for plaintiffs in error. A. F. Daley, for defendants in error.

LITTLE, J. An issue was formed on an affidavit of illegality interposed by Brantley to the levy of a certain execution issued on a judgment rendered in the superior court of Johnson county in favor of Meyer, Reinhard & Co. against T. J. Brantley & Bro. Both the plaintiff in execution and the defendant introduced evidence, and, the case having been closed, the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant, during the same term of court at which the verdict and judgment were rendered, made a motion for a new trial upon a number of grounds. The date of the hearing of the motion was fixed by the presiding judge as the 1st of November, 1899, and, by a proper he have five days after the hearing to file the brief of evidence. At the time and place set for the hearing, the movant presented his brief of evidence, upon which the judge then and there entered the following order: "The within brief of evidence is hereby approved as correct, subject to such additions as either side may desire, as taken from entries on the fi. fas. mentioned herein, as the fi. fas. are not now accessible. This November 1, 1899." The plaintiff in fi. fa. then moved to dismiss the motion because the brief of evidence presented was not a full and complete brief of the evidence submitted on the trial of the case. The court overruled the motion. The hearing was then had, and the motion for a new trial refused, and the movant excepted, and sued out a bill of exceptions to have the same reviewed by this court. The defendant sued out a cross bill of exceptions, assigning as error the ruling of the court in refusing to dismiss the motion for new trial, and in approving the brief of evidence before the same was perfected. The main and cross bills of exceptions were argued together in this court, and, under the view we take of the ruling assigned as error in the cross bill of exceptions, it is only necessary to consider that assignment, in order to properly dispose of the case. It will be noted that a direct exception was taken to the action of the judge in approving the brief of evidence before the same was perfected, as well as to the direction given by the judge, in his order of approval, that certain omissions should be supplied after the hearing. It was ruled in the case of Mann v. Railway Co., 99 Ga. 117, 24 S. E. 871, that it was not cause for dismissing a motion for new trial that the judge improperly approved, as a brief of the evidence, a paper purporting to be such, but that the proper practice in such case is to except directly to the order of approval, or else move to vacate that order, and, if the motion is refused, to except directly to such refusal. The error assigned in the cross bill of exceptions, that the judge erred in approving the brief before it was perfected, comes within the rule here laid down as being the proper practice. It would seem almost unnecessary to say that there can be no legal motion for a new trial without a brief of evidence, and that there can be no hearing on a motion for a new trial until the brief has been perfected and approved. A partial or incomplete brief is not such a one as is contemplated by the statute, which requires a brief of all the evidence to accompany a motion for a new trial; nor does a brief of evidence become a part of the record until approved by the presiding judge, which approval must necessarily include an assertion that the paper presented contains a brief of all the material a brief of evidence accompanying a motion for new trial had this entry indorsed on it by the judge: "Examined and approved, subject to future corrections if necessary." It appeared that, after this qualified approval, corrections were made in the brief, and after such corrections were made the judge finally approved the brief. This court ruled, under such circumstances, that the motion for a new trial should not have been dismissed, but the ruling was based on the fact that subsequent to the qualified approval the brief was corrected and approved in full by the judge. In that case the qualified approval was not a matter for consideration, inasmuch as the brief, when corrected, was fully approved, and this came up to the rule. In the case of Turner v. Wilcox, 65 Ga. 299, the judge indorsed on the brief of evidence, "Revised and approved, subject to corrections," and when the case was called in this court the writ of error was dismissed; the court ruling that, if it affirmatively appeared that the judge subsequently finally passed upon the brief and approved the same, it would not be subject to dismissal. And in the case of Iron Works v. Angier, 66 Ga. 634, the court dismissed the writ of error where the judge had thus approved the brief of evidence: "The within brief of evidence is hereby revised, approved, and ordered filed. Let the clerk copy the interrogatories of S. A. Echols, as a part of the evidence." It was intimated in that decision that if a copy of the evidence of Echols had been authenticated by the judge as true, and had accompanied the brief of evidence to this court, the writ of error might not have been dismissed. In the case of Railroad Co. v. Mitchell, 75 Ga. 144, there was an agreement between the counsel that the brief presented was correct, and, if the case was carried to the supreme court, that certain interrogatories and tables and other documentary evidence might be copied with the record by the clerk. Under this agreement the judge of the superior court approved and ordered the agreement filed with the record, and directed the clerk to copy the documentary evidence referred to in the agreement. This court ruled in that case that it was not a compliance with the rule for parties to agree, and the court to order, that a part of the evidence may be omitted from the brief, and, if the case should be brought to the supreme court, that the clerk might copy such evidence in the record, and accordingly dismissed the writ of error. These cases are cited to show that the jurisdiction of the trial judge is limited to an approval of the brief of evidence as it is finally made up, and that an approval of a brief which contemplates an addition thereto is not such an approval as is required by law, unless after the additions are made the judge again approves the brief of evidence as it is finally made up. In the present case the approval is made subject to such addition as either side may desire, as taken from certain papers described. It was not, therefore, a proper and legal approval; and, if additions were made to this brief of evidence after such qualified approval, we have no means of knowing whether the same are or not correct. A brief of evidence can be authenticated alone by the judge, and this court is not authorized to consider any brief not fully approved. For these reasons, the court erred in entering this qualified order of approval, and, the plaintiffs in error having properly excepted thereto, the judgment on the cross bill of exceptions is reversed, and the main bill of exceptions dismissed. Judgment on cross bill of exceptions reversed. Main bill of exceptions dismissed. All the justices concurring.

ROUSEY v. MATTOX.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1900.)

LANDLORD—LIEN FOR SUPPLIES—RIGHTS OF LABORER.

1. An agreement by a tenant with a laborer that the latter shall have as compensation for his services all the cotton raised upon a designated field included in the rented premises, the landlord having no knowledge of such agreement, and in no way assenting thereto, cannot, of itself, and without more, operate to defeat his statutory lien for supplies on all the crops produced upon the entire tract of land rented to the tenant. Consequently, where, in such a case, the tenant delivered to the landlord crops raised on such field, and the latter in good faith accepted the same in satisfaction of his lien for supplies, the laborer could not, in an action at law, recover from the landlord the value of such crops.

2. It follows from the above that, even if a landlord's special lien for supplies on the crop of the year is inferior to a laborer's special lien for work done in the making of such crop, the laborer cannot assert such lien by bringing an ordinary suit at law against a landlord, who had in good faith, by agreement with the tenant, taken the crop in settlement of his lien, for the value of so much of the crop as would equal the amount due the laborer by the tenant.

3. The charges complained of, being in substantial accord with the rule above announced, were not erroneous, and there was ample evidence to warrant the verdict.

It is true that in the two cases last cited the court had under consideration cases founded upon causes of action arising in the state of Alabama, but the principle ruled is the law of this state. If there is no dispute about the facts, and the only lawful verdict that could be rendered would be one finding that there were two ways in which to perform the duty, the one safe and the other manifestly dangerous, and that the employé had negligently chosen the latter method, then the court would be authorized to set aside a verdict finding otherwise, as was done in the Head and Harbin Cases, supra; or to direct a verdict for the defendant, as was done in the Quirouet Case. COBB, J. When an employé of a railroad company has his choice of two ways in which to perform a duty, the one safe, and the other dangerous, though convenient, he is bound to select the safe method. Railway Co. v. Head, 92 Ga. 723, 18 S. E. 976; Railway Co. v. Harbin (Ga.) 36 S. E. 218; Quirouet v. Railroad Co., Id. 599. If, under the evidence, it was doubtful whether there were two methods, or whether the employé chose the more dangerous, and whether in the latter case the employé chose that method, or whether there were two methods, one attended with less danger than the other, and the employé chose the more dangerous, then the issues thus raised should be submitted to a jury, and it would be error to grant a nonsuit. Railroad Co. v. De Bray, 71 Ga. 406 (Syl., point 15), 424. Applying the principles above referred to to the present case, the judge erred in granting a nonsuit. Even if it be conceded that the evidence in behalf of the plaintiff established that there were two ways in which the duty he was endeavoring to discharge at the time of the injury could be performed, and one of them was safe, the evidence raised an issue as to whether the method adopted by the plaintiff was one that was manifestly dangerous. • It not being at all clear from the evidence that either method was entirely safe, or which was the more dangerous, it was a question for the jury to determine whether, under the circumstances, in adopting the method which he employed, the plaintiff was free from fault. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

HARTLEY v. McGEE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1900.)

TRIAL—PROCEDURE—PLEADING—ISSUES OF FACT—APPEAL.

1. In determining whether or not an answer filed to a petition raises an issue of fact which should be passed upon by a jury, it is not proper practice for the judge to propound to the defendant any question or questions, either with a view to eliciting from him a fact not stated in the answer, or to ascertaining the real meaning of the allegations in the answer. An error of this kind will not, however, if it has no material bearing upon the result reached, necessitate a reversal of the judgment.

2. When a petition distinctly and affirmatively alleges that a specified sum of money was placed in the hands of the defendant, as county school commissioner, for the purpose of paying the same to his predecessor in office, and the answer does not deny these allegations, but, in effect, admits the same to be true, no issue of fact is thus presented, although the answer may make the point that as matter of law the former school commissioner was not entitled to receive the fund in question. The issue thus raised is one of law, and not of fact.

3. As the present bill of exceptions assigns no error, except that the court erred in holding that no issue of fact had been raised for a jury to pass upon, and as the point thus made was not well taken, no cause for reversing the judgment has been shown.

WILLIAMS et al. v. E. E. FOY MFG. CO., Limited.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 7, 1900.)

MORTGAGE—TITLE OF MORTGAGOR—CONVEYANCE—REDEMPTION—CONTRIBUTION.

1. When one has borrowed a sum of money, and conveyed land to the lender as security for the payment of the debt, and received from the grantee a bond conditioned to reconvey on the payment of the debt, the interest pertaining to such land which the grantor thereafter possessed is an equitable estate in the land, and may be sold and conveyed, subject to the paramount right of the original grantee to have all of the land appropriated to the payment of his debt. 1 Jones, Mortg. §§ 6, 8.

3. When, therefore, the original grantor, after the execution and delivery of the security deed, for a valuable consideration conveys to a third person, with notice of the first conveyance, all the timber growing on the land, subject to the rights of the first grantee, the legal effect of such second conveyance is to give the grantee therein named the right to the timber if the grantor redeems the same, and also the equitable right to redeem the land, for the purpose of having the title to his timber unincumbered. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1023.

4. When, however, the grantor subsequently sells to still another person, with notice of the prior conveyance of the timber, his right to redeem the land, and transfers to him his bond for titles, and such person redeems the land by paying up the indebtedness originally created, and receives from the lender a conveyance of the land in his name, such person takes the title subject to the right of the grantee of the timber to pay a proportionate part of the original debt, and convert into a legal title the equitable interest in the timber originally conveyed.

5. In such a case, before redemption, each of the parties having an equitable interest in the land, acquired subsequently to the execution of the security deed, were possessed of equal equities,—one as to the timber, and the other as to the land without the timber. When the grantee of the land paid the debt to secure which the outstanding deed was given, and took a conveyance of the land to himself, the equity of the grantee of the timber was not destroyed; but the grantee of the land was entitled to hold both estates thus redeemed, until, under the doctrine of contribution, the grantee of the timber reimbursed him by paying such proportion of the amount he paid to redeem as the value of the timber at the time of the redemption bore to the value of the land including the timber. Barney v. Myers, 28 Iowa, 472; Aiken v. Gale, 37 N. H. 501; Carpenter v. Koons, 20 Pa. St. 222. An analogous equitable principle is embodied in Civ. Code, § 3902.

6. The verdict was contrary to the evidence, and the charge in some particulars antagonistic to the rulings made. Therefore a new trial should have been awarded.

SHEAROUSE et al. v. MORGAN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 7, 1900.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—CERTIORARI—NOTICE OF SANCTION—SERVICE—WAIVER.

1. When the question whether or not written notice of the sanction of a petition for certiorari had been given in due time depended upon a direct conflict in the testimony of two witnesses respecting the correctness of a date appearing in an acknowledgment of service, this court will not undertake to say the trial judge erred in accepting as true the testimony of one of the witnesses, rather than that of the other.

2. Where in such a case the witnesses were the attorneys at law of the parties, and each attorney, after making in his place an oral statement as to the issue in controversy, was permitted to file an affidavit setting forth the facts embraced in his oral statement, a judgment dismissing the certiorari on the ground that notice of the sanction was not given in due time will not be reversed merely because the judge acted on the motion to dismiss without giving the attorney for the plaintiff in certiorari an opportunity to inspect and "reply to or rebut" the affidavit filed by the attorney of the other party; it not appearing that the plaintiff in certiorari was thus deprived of any substantial right, or that, if such opportunity had been extended, any additional reason for not sustaining the motion to dismiss would have been submitted.

3. Merely acknowledging service of a written notice does not estop the person making the acknowledgment from setting up that the notice was, under the law thereto relating, served too late.

4. There was not, in view of the facts appearing in the present record, anything in the conduct of either the defendant in certiorari or her counsel which amounted to a waiver of the point that the notice in question was not served within the time prescribed by statute.

5. There was no error in dismissing the certiorari for want of proper notice, nor in refusing to allow the proposed correction of the date of service.

CORPORATION—CONVEYANCE—EVIDENCE—WITNESS—COMPETENCY.

1. A bill of sale purporting to show the conveyance of title to A., "president of" a designated corporation, "his executors, administrators, and assigns," is inadmissible for the purpose of showing title in the corporation. (a) If, however, such a bill of sale be admitted in evidence, it is competent for the person to whom it was given to explain by parol that its real purpose was to secure a debt, and not to convey the absolute title.

2. A party to a case founded upon an alleged contract with a corporation is incompetent to testify that the contract in question was made by the defendant through an agent of the latter, since deceased.

3. When, in the trial of an action against a corporation for the breach of an alleged contract, the terms of a contract between the defendant and a deceased individual, not a party to the case, are collaterally relevant, an agent for the defendant, who acted for it in making this latter contract, is not, because of the death of the other party thereto, incompetent to testify with respect to the same.

Error from city court of Savannah; T. [illegible] Norwood, Judge.

Action by Michael P. Usina against the Florida Central & Peninsular Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Denmark, Adams & Freeman, for plaintiff in error. Saussy & Saussy, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Michael P. Usina brought suit against the Florida Central & Peninsular Railroad Company to recover for services alleged to have been rendered to that company in the capacity of captain of the steamboat Farmer, alleged to have been owned by it. The petition contained two counts, the first founded upon an express contract by the defendant to pay the plaintiff a stated sum per month for his services; the second a count alleging that the services were rendered at the request of the defendant and were reasonably worth the sum sued for. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the amount sued for. The defendant's motion for a new trial having been overruled, it excepted.

1. There was no evidence authorizing a finding that the defendant had made with the plaintiff an express contract, under the terms of which he was to receive a stated amount per month. The plaintiff relied for a recovery upon the second count in the declaration, in which he claimed that he had rendered the services at the request of the company, and that they were reasonably worth the amount sued for. In order to make out a case on this count, he endeavored to prove that the steamboat upon which he had rendered the services as captain was the property of the defendant. For this purpose he offered in evidence a bill of sale executed prior to his term of service, in which the South Carolina Steamboat Company conveyed the steamboat in question to "H. R. Duval, president of the Florida Central & Peninsular Railroad Co., his executors, administrators, and assigns"; the bill of sale being one in the ordinary form, and in which whenever the name of Duval was mentioned it was followed by the words above quoted. It appears from the record that the purpose for which the bill of sale was offered was to show title in the defendant. It did not do this. The words, "president of the Florida Central & Peninsular Railroad Company," which followed the name of Duval, are words merely descriptive of the person who was a party to the contract, and are not to be taken to for any other purpose; such words in no way characterizing the capacity in which Duval was contracting with the other party to the bill of sale. Lester v. McIntosh, 3 Ga. 675, 29 S. E. 7; And. Law Dict. "Descriptio Personæ"; Com. v. Lewis, [illegible] lass.) 101. While such words would in no ise limit the title of the party to the con- act, the principle is especially applicable in e present case. Here, wherever the name Duval, president, etc., appears, it is fol- wed by the words, "his executors, adminis- ators," etc., which indicate that he was act- g in his individual capacity. The purpose r which the bill of sale was offered being show title in the defendant, and the same t having this effect, the court should have cluded it from evidence, upon the objec- ns made by the defendant. If it had been own that the steamboat in question was tually purchased with the funds of and erated by the defendant, then perhaps the l of sale would have been admissible for purpose of showing that the defendant s the real owner, and Duval held the title nply in trust for it. But, if it had been ered and admitted for this purpose, it uld have been competent for the defend- t to prove, as it sought to do, in explana- n of this apparent ownership of Duval in ir behalf, that the title was taken in him, as owner of the vessel, but to secure a t due to him, or the company which he resented, by the real owners of the ves- ; that it had no other interest in the perty than that of a creditor, did not rate or control the steamboat, and had no er connection with the boat or its opera- n.

. Complaint is made that the court erred permitting the plaintiff to testify as fol- s: "It was the F. C. & P. that employed and paid me $150 a month. That was on the Farmer. I got $100 on the Farm-

The objection to this evidence was that the plaintiff had no written contract of ployment, and as the party who employed was Maj. Williams, an agent of the de- lant, since deceased, evidence as to any tract made with Williams was inadmissi- because, if made with him as agent of defendant, he was dead, and, if made h him individually, it was irrelevant. rly construed, we think the evidence ad- ed would convey to the minds of the jury impression that the defendant had em- ed the plaintiff at a salary of $150 per th at some time, but not on the Farmer, that the plaintiff had been transferred he Farmer by the defendant at a lower ry, being the amount sued for in the ent case. So construing the testimony, it clearly inadmissible, for the reasons set n in the objections to the same. Civ. , § 5269.

The defendant offered the testimony of al, its president, and of other officers of company, to show that Maj. Williams his associates were the owners of the nboat Farmer, and that under a con- made with the company and the own- through Williams, the steamboat was ated merely as a freight connection of company, and that it had no further in- t in the steamboat or its operations. The evidence of these witnesses was object- ed to by the plaintiff on the ground that, Williams being dead, they were not com- petent to testify as to any communications with him. Such a case does not fall within the letter, reason, or spirit of the evidence act of 1889, embodied in section 5269 of the Civil Code. The contract between Williams and his associates and the defendant was not the one which was sought to be enforced in the present case, but, even if it had been, there is nothing in the act which would have rendered the officers and agents of the de- fendant incompetent to testify as witnesses. See Rosser v. Georgia Pac. Ry. Co., 102 Ga. 164, 29 S. E. 171. It was never contemplated that the act of 1889 should be so construed as to render a party to a case incompetent to testify to a contract made with him by one since deceased, whose legal representa- tives are not parties to the case, and whose estate is in no way to be affected by the judgment to be rendered, when the fact of such a contract was a relevant and material fact in a controversy between the living party and a third person.

The errors committed by the judge in his rulings on evidence were of such a character as to require us to order a new trial. As there is to be another hearing, and as the evidence may be different on that hearing, we will not now rule on the motion to nonsuit, or express any opinion as to the sufficiency of the evidence. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

ATLANTA JOURNAL v. BRUNSWICK PUB. CO.

BRUNSWICK PUB. CO. v. ATLANTA JOURNAL.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

GARNISHMENT—FAILURE TO ANSWER—PROCEDURE.

When a garnishee fails to answer within the time prescribed, the general rule is that the plaintiff is entitled to have a judgment against the garnishee; but in a case where, within three days after the plaintiff had obtained judgment against the defendant, the garnishee filed an answer denying any indebtedness to the defendant, and set forth therein good and sufficient reasons for not answering in due time, which reasons showed that the garnishee was guilty of no laches, but acted in good faith, and therefore was, in justice and right, entitled to an opportunity to answer, it was error to strike the answer and enter a judgment against the garnishee.

the city court of Macon in its favor against Kennedy. A certified copy of the affidavit and bond was filed in the clerk's office of the city court of Atlanta. A judgment was obtained against Kennedy on June 12, 1899. On the 21st day of January, 1899, a summons of garnishment was served on the Atlanta Journal, which garnishment, it is claimed by the publishing company, was returnable to the March term, 1899, of the city court of Atlanta. The garnishee, according to the averments in its answer to the rule, filed an answer to the summons of garnishment in the city court of Atlanta on June 15, 1899, in which it denied any indebtedness to the defendant. Afterwards the publishing company filed a petition alleging that it had brought suit against Kennedy in the city court of Macon; that on the 12th of June, 1899, it had obtained a judgment against him; that prior thereto, and after the commencement of the suit, it had caused a summons of garnishment to be served on the Journal, returnable to the March term, 1899,—and prayed that the answer filed by the garnishee in June, 1899, be stricken, and that petitioner have judgment against the garnishee for the amount of the judgment it had obtained against the principal defendant, and that the garnishee be required to show cause why the petition should not be granted. In response to a rule served upon this petition, the garnishee answered that it did not have notice that the proceeding was pending in the city court until the day previous to that on which it filed its answer; that the summons of garnishment served upon it required the garnishee to appear at the February term, 1899, of the justice's court for the 1026th district, G. M., Fulton county, to answer, and that during that term of the justice's court, through its vice president, it did appear there and make answer to the summons, a copy of which answer is attached to this answer; that the original summons of garnishment was lost; that on the 14th of June it was notified that the case was pending in the city court of Atlanta, and after investigation the garnishee at once filed its answer in that court. It averred that a mistake was made in writing the summons, and prayed to be discharged. This answer was verified by an officer of the Journal Company. Much evidence was had on the question whether the summons of garnishment really directed the garnishee to answer to the city court, or to the justice's court. Without going into this evidence, it is sufficient to say that, while that offered by the Journal Company was positive and explicit that the summons required it to appear and answer at the justice's court, that of the movant tended to show that the summons required the garnishee to answer in the city court. After the evidence was heard the trial judge sustained the prayer of the petition, and rendered a judgment against the cepted to this ruling, and the same is alleged in this court to be error. The publishing company sued out a cross bill of exceptions, in which it alleged that the garnishment papers, with all entries thereon, including the return of the constable, being before the court, and it not appearing that any traverse had been filed to the return of the constable, nor that officer had been made a party, a motion was made to strike the answer to the petition, and for a judgment against the garnishee because the answer to the petition was insufficient in law,—that no traverse was filed to the return of the officer, and the officer was not a party to the proceeding,—and because the answer offered to be filed to the garnishment was too late; that the court overruled this motion, and the publishing company excepted. The main and cross bills of exceptions were argued together, and treated as one case, and will be so considered here.

It is claimed by the publishing company that the question made in the cross bill of exceptions has been decided in its favor by the recent case of O'Neill Mfg. Co. v. Ahrens & Ott Mfg. Co. (Ga.) 36 S. E. 66. Some of the points decided in that case are controlling as to similar points here. As an example, under the case cited it must be ruled that the return of the constable made in the case at bar meant that the summons of garnishment which he served directed the garnishee to file its answer in the city court of Atlanta. If the present case depended on the question whether or not the summons did so direct the garnishee, then the case cited would be conclusive of the question in favor of the publishing company. It is also true that that part of the answer of the garnishee which declared that the summons of garnishment served upon it directed it to make answer in another court was, under the ruling made in the Ahrens Case, a traverse of the truth of the officer's return, and, in order to have the issue raised by such traverse passed upon, it would have been necessary to make the constable a party; and it is also true that this the garnishee in the present case did not do. So far the two cases are analogous, but the main issues of law involved in the two cases are essentially different, and therefore the two cases are clearly distinguishable. In the Ahrens Case, above, the company filed a petition against the garnishee, alleging that it had obtained a general judgment against the defendant; that on this it had sued out a summons of garnishment on December 4, 1896, returnable to the January term, 1897, of the superior court, and had the same served on the garnishee; that no answer had been filed in response to the summons; and that the case was in default since the July term, 1897, of the superior court. It prayed for an order that the garnishee show cause why the plaintiff should not have judgment nishment that had been served upon it, and that it had filed its answer at the time directed by the summons; that the summons of garnishment served in that particular case, according to its best recollection and belief, required it to make answer in the city court; and that it had made answer thereto. This answer then denied that the summons of garnishment was properly served upon it. It then tendered an answer denying indebtedness, and prayed that it be allowed to file the same nunc pro tunc. Moreover, it distinctly appears from the record of that case that the garnishee was offered an opportunity to traverse the officer's return, and failed to do so. In the case at bar, while the garnishee affirms under oath that the summons it received directed it to answer in the justice's court, and it did not make the officer serving the summons a party, it sets up additional and distinct reasons why the judgment prayed for should not be rendered against it. While, therefore, the garnishee did not in this case occupy the advantageous position to which it would have been entitled had the traverse been filed, let us inquire if the reasons just referred to were not good and sufficient to defeat the motion for a judgment against it. These are that it acted in good faith; that it did appear at the justice's court in response to the requirement of the summons and answered the garnishment, a copy of which it attached to the answer to the rule; that it owes the defendant nothing; that it discovered on the 14th of June that the garnishment case was really in the city court; and that it appeared in said court on the 15th and filed its answer. For aught that appears, this answer, while out of time, was made before the calling of the garnishment case on the docket; and as it is provided by section 4726 of the Civil Code that the plaintiff shall not have judgment against the garnishee until he has obtained judgment against the defendant, under no circumstances could the plaintiff have obtained a judgment against the garnishee until the 12th of June, three days before the garnishee answered. The delay to the plaintiff could not have been very material. It is true that section 4551 of the Civil Code provides that, if the person summoned as garnishee fails to appear and answer at the first term, the case shall stand continued until the next term, and that, if he should fail to appear and answer by the next term, the plaintiff may, on motion, have judgment against the garnishee for the amount of the judgment he has obtained against the defendant. It is likewise true that the rights of the diligent creditor require a prompt compliance with the law on the part of the garnishee. It has, however, been repeatedly ruled by this court that circumstances may arise in which the garnishee ought not to have judgment rendered against him for failure to answer at the exact time required. Garnishee fails to appear and answer by the next (second) term, the plaintiff may, on motion, have a judgment, etc. It is not an inflexible rule that he shall. While the courts will and ought to require a prompt compliance with the garnishment, the repeated rulings of this court authorize further time to be given the garnishee under exceptional circumstances. In the case of Carhart v. Ross, 15 Ga. 186, it was ruled that the answer being actually filed within a few days after the time limited in the order, and before the case was reached on the docket, accompanied by the affidavits of the parties and their counsel, that it was impossible to have access to the original papers which were withdrawn from the clerk's office, was sufficient. In the case of Clark v. Chapman, 45 Ga. 486, Judge McCay, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The law requires the answer to be at the first term. We see no objection to giving time until the judgment goes against the principal debtor, and have several times ruled that the court may indulge the garnishee till that time. Perhaps there is no objection to indulgence, for good reasons, up to a reasonable time before the dismissal of the juries." In the case of McCallum v. Brandt, 48 Ga. 439, a defaulting garnishee moved the court, after the discharge of the juries, to be allowed to file his answer denying indebtedness, and, for cause why the answer was not filed before, showed that the original defendant had been before that time, in a case of involuntary proceedings in bankruptcy, adjudged a bankrupt; that a new trial had been granted; and that the proceedings in bankruptcy were still pending. It was ruled there that the court did not abuse its discretion in permitting the answer to be then filed. In delivering the opinion, Judge Trippe says: "When a party, under the advice of counsel, fails to file his answer in time, not believing that the court would proceed further in the main suit, shall he be adjudged in contempt (for it is as a quasi contempt), and be adjudged to pay the whole debt? Though the last day of grace in such cases may seem to have passed, it is not always that the door is finally closed." In the case of Russell v. Bank, 50 Ga. 575, this court ruled that when a garnishee failed to answer through a mistake as to his legal duty, and judgment was rendered against him for a much larger sum than he had in hand, the discretion of the court in setting aside the same, on motion made during the term, will not be controlled; and Judge Warner, in delivering the opinion in that case, said: "The general rule undoubtedly is that the court will not set aside a judgment against a garnishee who fails to answer, unless some good and satisfactory reason be shown therefor, to be judged of by the court." In the case of Bearden v.

term of the city court, and no answer was filed at that term, and at the December term the case was reached in its order, and still no answer was filed, and no reason was assigned for such failure, it was error to allow counsel for the garnishee "further time to look into the matter," and to refuse to strike the answer of the garnishee, subsequently filed, and to enter up judgment against it as in case of default. The previous adjudications of this court were reviewed in the case last cited, and the conclusion of our present Chief Justice, who delivered the opinion, after a consideration of the rulings made theretofore, was: "All these cases go upon the principle that where the garnishee has failed to answer, but gives a good and sufficient reason for the failure, it is then within the discretion of the court as to whether he will allow judgment against him or not. But there is no case that we can find where the judge has allowed the garnishee time, after the case is called, to look into the matter and ascertain whether he has a defense or not, without giving any reason or explanation for his failure to file his answer up to that time. In such a case the law seems to us peremptory, and there is no discretion left to the judge." With this statement of the rule we are in entire harmony, and are of the opinion that the trial judge ought not to have stricken the answer of the garnishee in this case, and entered a judgment against it in favor of the plaintiff. As we view the record, there is no evidence of bad faith upon the part of the garnishee. If it be assumed (which it must, under the ruling in the Ahrens Case) that the summons of garnishment in fact directed the Journal Company to answer in the city court, there can still be no question but what the garnishee in good faith understood the summons differently, because it did appear at the time named in the summons in the justice's court and file its answer. While, therefore, concluded by the fact that the summons was as stated, it surely was not estopped to deny that it made an honest mistake as to this fact, and that because of this mistake it in good faith made answer in the magistrate's court, and failed to answer in due time in the city court. It is not the object of the law to make one man pay the debt of another. The purpose of the garnishment law is to impound property belonging to a debtor in the hands of a third person, and, while such third person must promptly respond to the call of the plaintiff to answer, if he is prevented from doing so on the day named, by accident, mistake, or any unavoidable circumstance for which the law will have regard, but does appear and file his answer in time for the plaintiff to reap the reward of his diligence, and without putting the plaintiff to any unnecessary delay, in the soon as the circumstances will admit, there is no equitable reason why the answer should not be allowed to stand, and the rights of the parties determined on the merits as they shall be made to appear by investigation. Judgment reversed. Cross bill affirmed.

CITY OF ATLANTA et al. v. STEIN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1900.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—CONTRACTS—MONOPOLIES.

A municipal corporation, though not required by its charter to let contracts for public work to the lowest bidders, and though clothed, as to such matters, with the broadest discretionary powers, has no authority to adopt an ordinance prescribing that all work of a designated kind shall be given exclusively to persons of a specified class. Such an ordinance is ultra vires and illegal, because it tends to encourage monopoly and defeat competition, and all contracts made in pursuance thereof are void.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Action by George Stein against the city of Atlanta and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

J. A. Anderson, J. T. Pendleton, Lumpkin & Colquitt, and C. T. Ladson, for plaintiffs in error. C. W. Smith and Arminius Wright, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. The mayor and general council of the city of Atlanta adopted the following ordinance:

"An ordinance requiring the union label of the Allied Printing Trades Council on all city printing.

"Section 1. Be it ordained by the mayor and general council that all printing, of whatever character, used for or by the city of Atlanta, shall bear the Allied Printing Trades Council union label of Atlanta, Georgia, as registered with the secretary of state.

"Sec. 2. Each and every city official when advertising for bids for printed matter shall specifically state in said advertisement and shall notify bidders that all bids shall be made in accordance with this ordinance.

"Sec. 3. All ordinances or parts of ordinances in conflict with this ordinance are hereby repealed."

This ordinance went into effect March 9, 1900. In obedience to its requirements, the city comptroller made a contract with the Pease Printing Company, a member of the union, to do certain printing at an agreed price. Stein, a citizen and taxpayer of Atlanta, filed an equitable petition to enjoin the municipal authorities and the Pease Company from carrying this contract into effect, and the former from further enforcing the ordi-ıce mentioned. At the hearing it appear- that there were in the city four union and een nonunion printing establishments, and it the comptroller, solely because of this linance, refused to entertain bids for print- from the proprietors of any of the latter. e evidence was conflicting as to the value the work embraced in the contract with Pease Company, but the preponderance of was to the effect that it was worth less n the price to be paid that company; and t the city, if the nonunion printers had n allowed to compete for it, could have de a more advantageous contract. The rter of the city does not require the mayor general council to let contracts for pub- work to the lowest bidders, but, under its visions, the municipal authorities are, as uch matters, invested with a wide discre- . The injunction was granted, and the ndants excepted. As the contract was le strictly in pursuance of the ordinance, validity of the former depends upon that the latter. If, therefore, the ordinance void, and it was right to enjoin the fur- enforcement of it, there was certainly no r in preventing by injunction the consum- lon of the contract. The fall of the ordi- ce necessarily carries with it the agree- t, which had no other source of vitality. ur judgment, the ordinance was void, and injunction was properly granted. It can- be seriously denied that the ordinance led to defeat competition and encourage opoly. Indeed, the evidence introduced re the trial judge fully warranted a find- that such was not only the tendency, but actual effect, of the ordinance. It is not in the power of municipal authorities to t legislation of this kind. On the con- y, with all respect to the members of the council, we are constrained to hold that so g is an unwarranted act, which calls for cial interference. We cannot agree with able and distinguished counsel for the that "the ordinance attacked and enjoin- elow amounted only to a direction by the or and general council to the ministerial ers of the city to place the orders for pub- rinting with printers using a union label." ordinance is something more than a "direction." It has the form, and was ıded to have the effect, of law; and, if l, would, until repealed, bind the mem- of council as much as it would the sub- ınate officials of the city. These mem- could not, with propriety, disregard it so as they permitted it to stand upon the icipal statute book; and the mere power peal it certainly did not prevent its opera- on all concerned. If, in the absence of an ordinance, the contract in question been let to the Pease Company, it could properly be said that the making of it an abuse of discretion on the sole ground the price of the work was too high. It d require an extreme case to justify the s in setting aside a municipal contract ıch a ground, when made under a charter like that of Atlanta. With respect to agree- ing on prices, securing good work, prompt service, etc., the municipal discretion must and should be allowed a wide scope; and, when exercised, the courts should be exceed- ingly slow and reluctant to interfere. Cer- tainly, they should never undertake to substi- tute their judgment, in matters of judgment, for that of the city's governing authorities.

This court, in Semmes v. Mayor, etc., 19 Ga. 471, held that "a body corporate is not answerable for an erroneous exercise of a dis- cretion, though the consequences be injuri- ous," and that "inadequacy of price, unless so great as, of itself, to be evidence of fraud, is not a sufficient ground for impeaching" a contract for the sale of property belonging to a city. In Wells v. Mayor, etc., 43 Ga. 67, it was decided that, where a municipal cor- poration is acting within the scope of its pow- ers, a court will not "interfere to restrain or control its action on the ground that the same is unwise or extravagant," and that, "to sustain such interference, it must appear either that the act is ultra vires, or fraudu- lent, or corrupt." Again, in Danielly v. Ca- baniss, 52 Ga. 212, it was ruled that "when a town council is authorized by law to do a particular act at its discretion, the courts will not control this discretion, and inquire into the propriety, economy, and general wis- dom of the undertaking, or into the details of the manner adopted to carry the proj- ect into execution." The case of Mayor, etc., v. Eldridge, 64 Ga. 524, is on the same line, and there are many others in which this court has made decisions of similar im- port. The doctrine of all these cases, viz. that, as a general rule, there should be no judicial interference with the exercise by municipal bodies of the discretion with which they are by law invested, is sound and well recognized; but this rule is not absolutely without exception. The whole subject was given thorough consideration in the case of City of Atlanta v. Holliday, 96 Ga. 546, 23 S. E. 509, in which, after stating that "under the charter of the city of Atlanta the discre- tion of its municipal authorities, within the sphere of their powers, is very broad, and this discretion is to be exercised according to the judgment of the corporate authorities as to the necessity or expediency of any giv- en measure," it was held that: "Where these authorities are acting within the scope of their duties, and exercising a discretionary power, the courts are not warranted in inter- fering, unless fraud or corruption is shown, or the power or discretion is being manifestly abused to the oppression of the citizen. In a case where it clearly appears that a threat- ened act on the part of the municipal au- thorities will result in such oppression, a court of equity may interfere to prevent the wrong." The vice of the ordinance now un- der consideration is that it cuts off the power to fully and freely exercise that very discre- tion which the public good requires the may- or and general council to exercise in making in behalf of the city which it is idle to say would not be presented were this ordinance out of the way. We cannot, therefore, escape the conclusion that in adopting this ordinance the mayor and general council exceeded their authority. In 1 Spell. Extr. Relief, § 718, it is said: "Where no conditions or restrictions are imposed upon municipal officers in the matter of letting contracts, they are not obliged to let the work to the lowest bidder, and cannot be enjoined for a refusal to do so, unless guilty of fraud. They may exercise an unlimited discretion so long as they are not guilty of gross abuse of discretion, and do not pervert their powers to such an extent as to amount to a fraudulent misappropriation of the public funds." It is interesting, in this connection, to notice the case of Avery v. Job, 25 Or. 512, 36 Pac. 293, in which it was ruled that: "Although the purchase or erection of certain public improvements may have been by the municipal charter confided to the judgment and discretion of the city council, yet equity will, at the suit of taxpayers, restrain the council from proceeding in the matter when it is not exercising its discretion, but is arbitrarily wasting the public funds, since such conduct is a gross and manifest abuse of power amounting to a legal fraud on the taxpayers." Here, then, we have most respectable authority for the proposition that a municipal act which amounts to a refusal to exercise discretion, and which must result in an arbitrary waste of the public funds, "is a gross and manifest abuse of power amounting to a legal fraud on the taxpayers." Is not such waste sure to occur when, out of nineteen printing concerns in Atlanta, only four are allowed to compete for the city's work, and would not a combination of these four (which could most probably be effected without much difficulty) certainly create a monopoly? If the four should combine, there would be no competition whatever. It was urged in the argument that, if such a thing should occur, the ordinance could and would be speedily repealed. To this we reply that the combination might be made without the knowledge of the municipal authorities; but, aside from this, they ought at all times to be in a position to meet such an emergency without being compelled to resort to further legislation; and, further, whether such a combination is to be anticipated or not, they have no more right to restrict competition than to defeat it altogether.

The case of Adams v. Brenan, 177 Ill. 194, 52 N. E. 314, 42 L. R. A. 718, is in many respects similar to the one in hand. It was there held that "a board of education has no power to agree with the representatives of labor organizations to insert in all its contracts for work upon school buildings a provision that none but union men should be employed in such work, or placed upon its pay rolls." included in this contract is a discrimination between different classes of citizens, and of such a nature as to restrict competition, and to increase the cost of work. It is unquestionable that, if the legislature should enact a statute containing the same provision as this contract in regard to any work to be done for boards of education, or if they should, by a statute, undertake to require this board, as the agency of the state in the management of school affairs in the city of Chicago, to adopt such a rule, or insert such a clause in its contracts, or should undertake to authorize it to do so, the provision would be absolutely null and void, as in conflict with the constitution of the state. If such a restriction were sought to be enforced by any law of the state, it would constitute an infringement upon the constitutional rights of citizens, so that the state in its sovereign capacity, through its legislature, could not enact such a provision." Pages 199, 200, 177 Ill., page 316, 52 N. E., and page 720, 42 L. R. A. "There is another ground upon which complainant has an undoubted right to maintain the bill, and that is that the contract tends to create a monopoly, and to restrict competition in bidding for work. The board of education may stipulate for the quality of material to be furnished and the degree of skill required in workmanship, but a provision that the work shall only be done by certain persons or classes of persons, members of certain societies, necessarily creates a monopoly in their favor. The effect of the provision is to lessen competition by preventing contractors from employing any except certain persons, and by excluding therefrom all others engaged in the same work; and such a provision is illegal and void. A taxpayer may resist an attempted appropriation of his money in execution of such a contract." Pages 201, 202, 177 Ill., page 316, 52 N. E., and page 721, 42 L. R. A. In Holden v. City of Alton, 179 Ill. 318, 53 N. E. 556, which was a case of identically the same kind as ours, except that there the city charter required the contracts to be let to the lowest bidders, it was decided that an ordinance like the one now under review was "illegal, as tending to create a monopoly, and impose an additional burden on taxpayers." While, of course, the provision as to letting contracts to the lowest bidders was a matter of consequence, an examination of the opinion, which was delivered by the same justice from whom we quoted above, will leave little room for doubting that the decision would and ought to have been the same, even in the absence of such a provision.

There are, besides the foregoing, numerous other authorities which support our conclusion in the present case. We cite, as more or less in point, the following: Beach, Monop. § 125; 2 Beach, Inj. § 1299; City of Chicago v. Rumpff, 45 Ill. 90; Littler v. Jayne, 124 Ill. 123, 16 N. E. 374; Association v. Topeka, 20

Oakley v. City of Atlantic City (N. J. Sup.) 44 Atl. 651; Winkler v. Summers (Sup.) 5 N. Y. Supp. 723. Most of the authorities cited in this opinion are also pertinent upon the proposition that in a case like the present the taxpayer has the right to invoke an injunction. Our case of Peeples v. Byrd, 98 Ga. 688, 25 S. E. 677, relied on by counsel for the plaintiffs in error, is in entire accord with what we now decide. There the supreme court reporter was in fact exercising a discretion. Here the corporate authorities sought to put themselves in a place where they could not do so at all, or else within very narrow limits. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

CITY OF BAINBRIDGE v. REYNOLDS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1900.)

INJUNCTION—VIOLATION OF CITY ORDINANCE.

A court of equity will not, by injunction, prevent the institution of a prosecution for the violation of a penal municipal ordinance; nor will it, upon petition for an injunction of this nature, inquire into the validity of such an ordinance, upon constitutional or other grounds.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Decatur county; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by J. E. Reynolds against the city of Bainbridge. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Hawes & Hawes, for plaintiff in error. Albert H. Russell and M. E. O'Neal, for defendant in error.

FISH, J. The plaintiff, alleging that he was a resident of the city of Bainbridge, and the agent in that city of a nonresident steam laundry, applied for an injunction to prevent the municipal corporation, its officers and agents, from enforcing or attempting to enforce a city ordinance which required the "agent or agents or representatives of each nonresident steam laundry" to pay a special license of $100. He alleged that the ordinance was "unconstitutional, null, and void"; that it was violative of both the constitution of this state and the constitution of the United States; that the city had no authority, under its charter, to enact the same; that it was unreasonable, etc. The case was heard in the court below simply upon the pleadings, and the court granted a permanent injunction, as prayed for, whereupon the defendant excepted.

It appears from the record that the ordinance in question imposes upon the agent or agents or representatives of each nonresident steam laundry a special license of $100, and then, in respect to its enforcement, simply provides "that any violation of this ordinance shall be punished as prescribed in section 260 of the City Code." While it pose for which it was enacted, that the municipal corporation does intend to attempt to enforce this ordinance against the plaintiff, how it will attempt to enforce it, or in what way it can enforce it, does not appear, either from the petition of the plaintiff, the answer of the defendant, or from anything else in the record, except as may be inferred from the ordinance itself. As the ordinance, in respect to the means provided for its enforcement, appears to be purely penal in character, we must presume, from the record, that the plaintiff was seeking, by injunction, to prevent the institution against himself of a prosecution under its penal provisions. The case, therefore, as it is presented to us, is controlled by the decision in Paulk v. City of Sycamore, 104 Ga. 24, 30 S. E. 417, 41 L. R. A. 772, and the previous decisions of this court therein cited. In that case it was held that: "Courts of equity will not, by injunction, prevent the institution of prosecutions for criminal offenses, whether the same be violations of state statutes or municipal ordinances; nor will they, upon petition for an injunction of this nature, inquire into the constitutionality of a legislative act, or the validity or reasonableness of an ordinance making penal the act or acts for the doing of which prosecutions are threatened." Accordingly, as the ordinance involved in the present case is, with reference to the means provided for its enforcement, purely penal in its nature, the court below had no power, upon an application for an injunction against its enforcement, to inquire into its validity, either upon constitutional or other grounds, and to enjoin the city from attempting to enforce it. If the ordinance is invalid, by reason of its unconstitutionality, or for other cause, such invalidity would be a complete defense to any prosecution that might be instituted for its violation. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

BENTLEY et al. v. SHINGLER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1900.)

TAX EXECUTIONS—WILD LANDS—ADVERTISEMENT—EXECUTION SALE.

1. It was not essential to the validity of tax executions against wild lands issued by the comptroller general under the act of February 28, 1874 (Acts 1874, p. 105), that the same should recite that the lands were wild or unimproved, or that they had not been returned for taxation.

2. A statutory requirement that a given advertisement shall be published in a designated newspaper "once a week for four weeks" (Act Feb. 28, 1874, p. 105, as amended by Act March 2, 1875, p. 119), before a particular thing can lawfully be done, is complied with if the advertisement be inserted in that paper four times, in as many separate consecutive weeks, and the first insertion is made in an issue of the paper published 28 or more days before the thing in question is done.

4 weeks, before the day of sale.
(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Wilcox county; C. C. Smith, Judge.

Action by W. H. Bentley and others against J. H. Shingler. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

J. W. Haygood, D. A. R. Conn, and Greer & Felton, for plaintiffs in error. J. H. Martin, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. The plaintiffs in error, W. H. Bentley and others, brought against J. H. Shingler an action for the recovery of lots of land 277 and 278 in the Twelfth district of Wilcox county. They proved that they were the heirs at law of M. A. Bentley, deceased, and introduced grants to him from the state of the lots in question. The defendant introduced two executions issued by the comptroller general against these lots, respectively, for taxes alleged to be due thereon and unpaid, and also two deeds from the sheriff of Wilcox county to one Jonathan Walker, in one of which that officer undertook to convey to Walker lot 277, and in the other lot 278. Each of these deeds contained a recital that the lot therein described had been sold under a tax execution issued by the comptroller general, and the execution referred to in each deed corresponded, as to description, with one of those in evidence. The defendant also introduced a quitclaim deed to himself from Walker, covering both lots. There was no dispute that when the executions were issued, and the sheriff's sales had thereunder, the lots in controversy were wild lands. The plaintiffs then tendered in evidence what purported to be the original files of the Constitution, a newspaper published in Atlanta, embracing issues of divers dates. The court rejected the same, and upon this action the plaintiffs assign error. After the close of the testimony on both sides the court directed a verdict in favor of the defendant, and to this the plaintiffs also excepted. The case turns upon the three questions discussed below:

1. The executions issued by the comptroller general did not contain a recital that the lots were wild or unimproved lands, or that they had not been returned for taxation. These executions were issued under the act of February 28, 1874 (Acts 1874, p. 105). It was insisted by counsel for the plaintiffs in error that the executions were, for want of such a recital, void, and that the sales thereunder were likewise void. It is only necessary to refer to the decisions of this court in Greer v. Fergerson, 104 Ga. 552, 30 S. E. 943, and Hilton v. Singletary, 107 Ga. 821, 826, 33 S. E. 715, to show that there is no merit in this contention.

2. The executions in question were issued on the 1st day of October, 1877. If the files of the Constitution which the court rejected ment requiring the owners of the lots in dispute to come forward and return the same for taxation, and to pay the taxes thereon, and notifying them that in default of so doing the lands would be sold. This advertisement was published four times; the dates of the papers in which it was inserted being, respectively, August 31, September 7, September 11, and September 18, 1877. There was no publication of the advertisement before August 31st or after September 18th. The above-mentioned act of February 28, 1874, as amended by that of March 2, 1875 (Acts 1875, p. 119), required the comptroller general to publish such advertisements "once a week for four weeks" before issuing executions. Counsel for the plaintiffs in error contended that, inasmuch as the rejected newspaper files would have shown that the full period of 28 days did not elapse between the first and the last insertion of the advertisement under consideration, it would thus have been established that the law was not complied with, and that consequently the executions were invalid. To this we cannot agree. More than 28 days elapsed between August 31st and the date of the executions, which, as has been seen, was October 1st, and this was sufficient; there being no dispute that each insertion appeared in a separate and distinct calendar week from any of the others. See, in this connection, Boyd v. McFarlin, 58 Ga. 208; Montford v. Allen (Ga.) 36 S. E. 305.

3. It was further urged in behalf of the plaintiffs in error that the sheriffs' sales under which the defendant asserted title were void because the same were not advertised for 90 days, and that Walker, the defendant's grantor, must necessarily have so known, for the reason that the executions were levied on May 1st, and the sales took place on July 2d. The reply is that the law did not require the sheriff to advertise these sales for a period of 90 days. With reference to this matter the act of 1874 provided: "On the expiration of the time of advertisement, the comptroller general shall issue execution against all unimproved or wild lands not returned for state and county tax, as per assessment in the county where the land lies, assessing the value at the average value of such land in the county where it lies, which execution shall be directed to the sheriff of the county where the land lies, and the sheriff shall forthwith proceed to advertise and sell the same under the same rules and regulations as govern other sheriff sales." Under the rules and regulations governing sheriffs' sales at that time, a levying officer was required to advertise sales of land "weekly, for four weeks." Code 1873, § 3647. The requirement that property sold by a sheriff under an execution issued by a tax collector should be advertised for 90 days (Id. § 897) had no application to sales made under executions issued by the comptroller general. Doubtless the reason for pro-lectors was that the persons affected by those of the former class would, by the advertisement which the act of 1874 required the comptroller general to publish, be given timely and sufficient warning of the necessity of coming forward and returning their wild lands, and paying the state the taxes due upon the same, while no preliminary warning was provided in the case of executions issued by tax collectors. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

REID et al. v. SEWELL et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1900.)

WITNESS — COMPETENCY — TRIAL — RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE—APPEAL.

1. Though one may, as a party or otherwise, be pecuniarily interested in the result of a case brought by an executor, he is not incompetent to testify to admissions made in his presence by the testator to another, when it appears that the conversation in which such admissions were made was not addressed to the witness. Ray v. Camp (Ga.) 36 S. E. 242.

2. In order to entitle a defendant to the opening and conclusion of the argument, he must, in his pleadings, and before the plaintiff begins to introduce testimony, admit enough to make out a prima facie case for the latter. Massengale v. Pounds, 28 S. E. 510, 100 Ga. 770; Dorough v. Johnson, 34 S. E. 168, 108 Ga. 812; Railway Co. v. Morgan (Ga.) 35 S. E. 345; Whitaker v. Arnold (Ga.) 36 S. E. 231. (a) This is not done when the action is one by an executor upon a promissory note, and the defendant merely admits the execution of the paper, and its delivery to the plaintiff's testator. The answer should go further, and embrace an admission that the plaintiff, in his representative capacity, was, at the time of the bringing of the action, the holder of the note in question. (b) As the plaintiffs in the present case were, by reason of the court's refusal to allow them to open and conclude, deprived of a substantial right, and as the evidence by no means demanded the verdict, a new trial should be had. Massengale v. Pounds, supra.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—ASSIGNMENT OF LIFE POLICY—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

1. That one obtained credit by representing in general terms that he had policies of life insurance payable to his estate, which he expected to keep up, and the proceeds of which would after his death inure to the benefit of his creditors, did not in equity entitle the person who extended credit merely on the faith of the assignment of the policy to the wife it had no cash surrender or market value. And the more especially is this true when the premiums accruing upon the policy after the assignment to her were paid, not by the husband, but with her own funds, or funds advanced by others for her benefit.

2. In view of the evidence disclosed by the record, and of the rule above announced, there was no error in refusing the injunction.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 7, 1900.)

APPEAL—REFUSAL OF NEW TRIAL—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR.

1. No cause for reversing a judgment denying a new trial is presented: (1) By a general assignment of error that the verdict is contrary to the charge of the court, or to a specified portion thereof. See Manufacturing Co. v. Rucker, 4 S. E. 885, 80 Ga. 291, 295; Roberts v. Keller (decided at the present term), 36 S. E. 617. (2) Nor by a complaint merely alleging that the court erred in refusing, upon the request of movant, to rule out the testimony of a certain witness which related to a specified subject, such testimony not being otherwise indicated, and the ground upon which it was sought to be excluded not being stated. (3) Nor by an assignment of error in general terms upon a specified portion of the judge's charge, when the portion so excepted to states a sound proposition of law in the abstract, or when it embraces two or more distinct propositions, at least one of which is abstractly correct. Anderson v. Railway Co., 33 S. E. 644, 107 Ga. 500. (4) Nor by a general complaint that the court erred in refusing to admit in evidence a certain letter, there being no allegation that it was offered by the movant. See Ponder v. Walker, 33 S. E. 690, 107 Ga. 753.

2. The evidence, though conflicting, was amply sufficient to warrant the verdict.

INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—EVIDENCE—DIRECTING VERDICT.

1. In a suit against a railway company by an employé, a rule of the company relative to the duty of such employé is admissible in evidence in behalf of the company, without first proving that the employé had knowledge of the rule. Such knowledge may be shown either before or after the admission of the rule in evidence. Parker v. Railway Co., 10 S. E. 233, 83 Ga. 539.

2. It was error to direct a verdict for the defendant in this case, the evidence being conflicting on the main issues,—the same being (1) whether the employé's failure to get a coupling stick was due to fault on his part or on the part of the company; (2) whether the nonobservance of the rule to make all couplings with sticks was so general as to raise a presumption that such nonobservance was known to the company, and to lead the employé, although he was shown by the evidence to have had full notice of the rule, to believe that it was abrogated; and (3) whether there was any negligence on the part of the company in running the train back to make the coupling.

COUNTIES—TAXATION OF RAILROAD—PROPERTY—BACK TAXES.

1. Under the decisions of this court in the cases of Railway Co. v. Morton, 71 Ga. 318; City of Albany v. Savannah, F. & W. Ry. Co., Id. 158; Houston Co. v. Central R. Co., 73 Ga. 211; City of Atlanta v. Georgia Pac. Ry. Co., 74 Ga. 16; and City of Augusta v. Central R. Co., 78 Ga. 119,—neither counties nor municipal corporations had, prior to the act of October 16, 1889, providing a system for the taxation of railroad property by counties, any statutory authority to tax such property within their territorial limits, nor was there any machinery provided by the legislature for them to assess and collect taxes on such property. There is not, in the act just mentioned, nor any legislation subsequent thereto, any attempt to confer such authority or supply such machinery, with reference to "back taxes" on railroad property; and it necessarily follows that it was not within the power of the authorities of a particular county, or of its tax collector, in 1899, to levy and collect taxes on railroad property necessary for the support and maintenance of the railroad for the years prior to 1889, inclusive, and to assess double taxes for those years against the railroad company.

2. Can a county, in any event, collect taxes after the lapse of more than seven years from the time when they became due and payable? Quære.

3. If so, should not an equitable bar to the collection of such taxes be applied when, on account of the lapse of time, and for other sufficient reasons, it would be inequitable or unjust to enforce collection? Quære.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 7, 1900.)

VENUE—ACTION AGAINST RAILROAD—SERVICE OF PROCESS.

1. Section 2334 of the Civil Code requires all uits against railroad companies for damages person or property to be brought in the coun- wherein the cause of action originates, with ie sole exception that, if the cause of action rises in a county where the company has no gent, the suit may be brought elsewhere. The le jurisdictional fact being the place of the igin of the cause of action, and the statute ot superadding the further fact of the resi- nce of an agent as one requisite to jurisdic- on, it must be held that the scheme of the w is to make the jurisdiction exclusive in the unty where the cause of action originates hen there is such residence, but elective when iere is not. (a) It follows that the present tion was well brought.

2. While no question as to the manner of ef- cting service is presented by the bill of ex- ptions, a court with jurisdiction of the person nd subject-matter of an action necessarily has ie power to take proper steps to have service uly made.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

We think the scheme of the statute (Civ. ode, § 2334) is to fix the jurisdiction in the unty wherein the cause of action originates hen the company has an agent there, and to onstrain the bringing of it "in the county of ie residence of such company" when it has no ich agent. The word "may," in the last sen- nce of the section, has the force of "shall," else that sentence adds nothing to the mean- g of the law.

ATLAS TACK CO. et al. v. EXCHANGE BANK OF MACON et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 7, 1900.)

AGENCY—RATIFICATION—CORPORATIONS—MORTGAGE—PREFERENCE OF DIRECTORS—VALIDITY.

1. A creditor, by accepting a mortgage in his avor, which had been executed without a re- uest from him, and of which he had no knowl- ge until it was actually tendered to him, ac- uiesced in and ratified all that had been done in his behalf by the person who procured the execution of the instrument, and occupied the position of giving to all the terms and stipulations therein embraced an assent relating back to the time of its execution.

2. When, in such a case, a mortgage was, at the instance of the directors of an insolvent trading corporation, executed in favor of a creditor thereof, and purported to secure the payment of a promissory note due to that creditor, upon which the directors were individually liable as indorsers, the mortgage also reciting that it was made "for the purpose of saving harmless the said accommodation indorsers," then such mortgage, when its validity was questioned by other creditors of the corporation, should, unless falling within an exception to the general rule, have been classed as an instrument which was rendered void by the legal principle forbidding such directors from giving themselves a preference over outside creditors, and not as a security which was good as having been given in the exercise of a statutory right to prefer a particular creditor.

3. Such an exception might arise if the mortgagee in question, at the time of giving credit, or the directors, at the time of becoming liable on the paper, made with the corporation a valid and binding contract for additional security by mortgage, to be given on demand, or when such a contingency should occur; but a contract of this kind, to be effectual, would have to be sufficiently clear and explicit in its terms to be capable of enforcement, and would have to constitute a part of the consideration upon which the credit was extended, or the liability as indorsers assumed by the directors. (a) There was no such contract in the present case, the undertaking or agreement set up as such being entirely too loose and indefinite in its terms to meet the requirements of the law in this respect.

4. As this case was tried upon lines entirely at variance with what is above laid down, there must be another hearing, which should be had in the light of the principles now announced, and the result of which should be in accord therewith.

LEWIS, J. 1, 2. This case was here at the March term, 1897, and is reported in 101 Ga. 391, 29 S. E. 27, wherein its general nature is sufficiently indicated. This court simply held, as to the vital question in the case, that the judge erred in directing a verdict in favor of the mortgagees. It did not undertake to decide the controlling questions now dealt with in the headnotes; nor is there any intimation in the opinion of Justice FISH touching the questions which now engage this court's attention. On the contrary, on page 394 (of his opinion), 101 them, with one exception, knew that the mortgages had been executed until after they were filed with the clerk for record. It further appears that one of the purposes for which the mortgages were given, as expressed therein, was to secure harmless the accommodation indorsers or guarantors. While the motion for a new trial in the present case presents a number of questions, the same, upon such of its facts as are undisputed, really turns upon, and should be controlled by, the law announced in the preceding headnotes. The record discloses the fact that the Macon Hardware Company was a corporation composed of three persons,—L. E. Culver, H. C. Tindall, and J. C. Van Syckel,—who owned its entire stock, and who were also its directors. On December 23, 1893, there was a meeting of its stockholders, at which meeting it was unanimously resolved that the corporation had become utterly insolvent and incapable of continuing its business with safety to its creditors, and that it was impossible to attain the real objects for which the corporation was formed, namely, the carrying on of a wholesale hardware business in the city of Macon, Ga., and that the failure of the company is and had become inevitable, which statements are confirmed as the truth in the petition of said parties in this case for the appointment of a receiver, and in which they express a desire to surrender their charter. In that petition is an express declaration to the effect that the franchises of the corporation are "here surrendered." It is alleged in the petition that, prior to its filing, petitioners had executed mortgages to certain of its creditors to the amount of nearly $75,000. The entry of filing by the clerk indicated that the petition was filed a day before these mortgages were given. An attempt was made on the trial of the case to show that this was a mistake in the date, and that it was really filed on December 23d, but we deem it unnecessary to go into that question. For the purpose of determining what we conceive to be the controlling issues, it is sufficient to say that the record clearly shows very little space of time between the resolution adopted by the stockholders and the mortgages given under a resolution of the stockholders by the directors; the defendants in error contending that they were given the same date. However this may be, it is patent that, when these mortgages were given, the stockholders and directors not only knew of the corporation's insolvency, but had resolved on a discontinuance of its business, and by its action on that date had thereby practically ceased to be a "going corporation," and had abandoned the idea of continuing its business, on account of its being absolutely and hopelessly insolvent. Prior to the act of 1894, we recognize the fact that even an insolvent corporation could prefer a bona fide creditor, and that such preference could be upheld, although the corporation was at the time insolvent, and although the creditor preferred was himself a director, and was benefited thereby, in consequence of being indorser on the notes secured by the mortgages, does not necessarily render them invalid. Such was the decision in Welhl, Probasco & Co. v. Atlanta Furniture Mfg. Co., 89 Ga. 297, 15 S. E. 282, which was afterwards affirmed in Milledgeville Banking Co. v. McIntyre Alliance Store, 98 Ga. 503, 25 S. E. 567. We do not think that there is anything in the facts of those two cases which conflicts with the ruling herein made. Those were going concerns at the time of the execution of the mortgages. On page 506 (of the latter case), 98 Ga., and page 568, 25 S. E., Justice Lumpkin, now presiding justice, distinguishing it from the decision in Lowry Banking Co. v. Empire Lumber Co., 91 Ga. 624, 17 S. E. 968, says: "Had they in good faith been endeavoring to secure creditors who were asking to be preferred, it would, as in the present case, and in the case cited from 89 Ga. and 15 S. E., have been a different matter; for where directors, in behalf of the corporation, have simply undertaken to prefer certain of its bona fide creditors at their instance and upon their demand, the case presented is one in which a court of equity has no power to interpose or interfere." But the case at bar is quite different. It appears that these mortgagees had not only not asked to be preferred, and that these mortgages were not given at their instance or demand, but that, on the contrary, they had no knowledge of them until they were delivered after their record. Besides this, they were executed at a time when the corporation, through its officers having entire charge of its business, and in fact owning all its stock, had resolved to suspend business, and had reached the conclusion that it was utterly impossible for it to carry out the purposes for which it was chartered.

It is a well-established principle of law that, when a corporation has reached this condition, its assets should be really held by its officers in trust for its creditors; and it is, to say the least of it, questionable whether, under such circumstances, it can make a preference for any creditor. There is really a conflict of authority as to whether or not an insolvent corporation may prefer its creditors upon the same principle that such a privilege is allowed to individuals. In the absence of a statutory prohibition on the subject, some courts have decided that a corporation has the same power of disposing of its property as an individual has. In 5 Thomp. Corp. § 6496, it is declared: "But in adopting this hasty conclusion they have overlooked the fact that the analogy between an insolvent individual and an insolvent corporation wholly fails, in this: That, although an insolvent individual may turn over his property to certain of his creditors whom he desires to prefer, and may by so doing hin-may, and often does, get on his feet again, and acquire property and discharge his previous obligations. But when a corporation becomes insolvent, and ceases to have the means of carrying out the objects of its creation, and dispossesses itself of all its property, it destroys itself, and becomes ipso facto dissolved, and in fact is regarded as a dissolved corporation for many purposes, having reference to the rights of creditors." The author, in section 6504, further says: "After the corporation has actually become dissolved and has gone into liquidation, then there is no room for controversy upon the question; for then its assets, which were previously a trust fund for its stockholders, become a trust fund for its creditors and stockholders, and its directors, if they remain in custody of those assets, hold them as trustees for its creditors first, and its stockholders next. The principle here spoken of is not necessarily confined to that formal dissolution which takes place under the judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, but it equally extends to that de facto dissolution which takes place when the corporation suspends business by reason of insolvency, and goes into liquidation. The governing principle is that the directors and managers of insolvent corporations are trustees of the funds, as well for the creditors as for the corporation, and are bound to apply them pro rata, and cannot use them to exonerate themselves to the injury of other creditors." When a corporation is insolvent, in the sense that it has not sufficient assets to discharge its debts, we can conceive how it could with propriety borrow money, and secure the same by mortgage upon its property, for the purpose of endeavoring to work out of debt and discharge its obligations. Under such conditions, it may also secure an antecedent debt while it proposes to continue actively in business; and, if it does so purely and solely for the purpose of securing a creditor, the incidental benefit that one of its officers may derive from such security, by being indorser on such a debt, will not necessarily render that security invalid. This, as we understand it, is as far as this court has gone in its adjudications on this subject, even prior to the act of 1894. But we know of no decision of this court validating a mortgage given after the corporation had not only become insolvent, but had resolved, through its controlling officers, that it would liquidate its claims, surrender its charter, and attempt to follow its business no further. We do not decide that such a mortgage would necessarily be void, under the liberal view once allowed by our statute touching the right of a debtor to prefer a creditor, which has been applied to corporations as well as individuals. It is not necessary to decide that question in this case, though we must confess we do not see how the force of the argument can be avoided, as seems to have been done in the present instance, before, or at least when, these mortgages were given, they would not be violating this trust by any special preference for a particular creditor to the injury of its creditors generally. In this connection, see Bump, Fraud. Conv. (4th Ed.) p. 192, where it is declared, "It seems that there are circumstances in which an insolvent corporation cannot prefer any creditor." The author then quotes the following from Woolen-Mills Co. v. Kampe, 38 Mo. App. 229: "When a corporation is hopelessly insolvent, and there is no reasonable or well-founded hope for a continuance of its business, and these facts are known to its officers and directors, then all the assets of the corporation become a trust fund in the hands of the directors, to be administered by them as trustees or agents for the equal benefit of all the creditors of the concern; and any attempted preferences, either in favor of the directors themselves or of a stranger, will not be upheld." He further adds: "In equity the assets of a corporation hopelessly insolvent become a trust fund for the benefit of its creditors, to be managed by the directors; and after such confessed insolvency the directors cannot, in equity, secure any advantage to themselves or to a creditor." Manufacturing Co. v. Hutchinson, 11 C. C. A. 320, 63 Fed. 496; Wisconsin Marine & Fire Ins. Co.'s Bank v. Lehigh & F. Coal Co. (C. C.) 64 Fed. 497; Phipps v. Harding, 17 C. C. A. 203, 70 Fed. 479. We need not, however, go to that extent in this case. It appears from the record that these mortgages were executed under resolution of the stockholders made at the time of a practical dissolution of the corporation; for in them is a recital to this effect: "Now, for the better securing the payment of the aforesaid promissory notes to the said Exchange Bank of Macon, and for the purpose of saving harmless the said accommodation indorsers or guarantors, who were the shareholders of this corporation, the said Macon Hardware Company hereby grants," etc. Then follows the mortgage upon the property to secure the debt. It also appears from the record that these directors gave to themselves a mortgage as indorsers, which covered an alleged indebtedness of $13,000, and that this mortgage was made to them as indorsers on the notes of the Macon Hardware Company, which notes were then outstanding, and the holders of which were then unknown. Unquestionably, that was a direct effort to secure themselves and nobody else. In reply to the recital in these mortgages, the directors were permitted by the court below to testify that their real intention was not to secure or indemnify themselves against loss, but solely to prefer creditors who had befriended them. There is no pretense that the recital in the mortgage to the effect that sealed instrument as to one exact purpose of its execution; and we think, under every principle of law bearing upon this subject, that the makers of such an instrument, in the absence of any fraud, imposition, or mistake, would be estopped from contradicting the terms of such a recital, and its absolute truth. In Terrell v. Huff, 108 Ga. 655, 34 S. E. 345, it was held that, where a deed was unambiguous, parol evidence of declarations by the grantor, explanatory of its intent and meaning, was inadmissible. In Hill v. Manufacturing Co., 79 Ga. 106, 3 S. E. 447 (Opinion, point 3), it was held: "A party to a contract cannot, by proving what he said or wrote to a third person after the contract was entered into, show either what it means, or what he understood it to mean. Such evidence is not admissible."

It follows that these creditors, when they accepted the mortgages which had been executed without any request, and without authority until they were actually tendered, necessarily acquiesced in and ratified all that had been done in their behalf by the party who procured the execution of the instrument, and occupied the position of giving to the terms and stipulations embraced therein an assent relating back to the time of their execution. We think it very clear, therefore, that when the validity of these mortgages, to secure debts upon which the directors were indorsers, was questioned by other creditors of the corporation, they should have been classed as instruments rendered void by the legal principle which prevents directors of an insolvent corporation from giving themselves a preference over outside creditors.

3. To this general rule the record discloses no exception in favor of the mortgagees. Such an exception might arise if the mortgagees, at the time of giving the credit, or the directors, at the time of becoming liable on the paper, had made with the corporation a valid and binding contract for additional security by mortgage, to be given on demand. No such contract was made in the present case. There was, as to the mortgage given one of the creditors, some evidence tending to show that one or more of the directors told a party representing this creditor, in effect, that they would see him protected, or would protect him. Such testimony was loose and indefinite in its terms. There was nothing to indicate that the protection meant that a mortgage upon the assets of the corporation would be given in the event of its insolvency. It was just as susceptible of the meaning, as the directors had indorsed the debt, that the creditor would be protected through their individual obligation as guarantors.

4. In one of the grounds of the motion for a new trial, complaint is made that the court erred in refusing to give in charge to the promissory notes which the directors had indorsed, and to save harmless the directors who were indorsers on the notes of the Macon Hardware Company. This statement in the mortgages estops both the Macon Hardware Company and the holders of the mortgages from denying that such was its purpose in making the mortgages." And further in refusing to give in charge the following written request: "Evidence has been submitted to you as to the intent of the maker in executing the mortgages, but I charge you that such evidence will not release the maker of such mortgages or the creditors from the force of such estoppel. If the directors had the purpose of saving themselves harmless as to their indorsements, then, although the directors may have also had in view the securing of debts due to persons with whom they dealt and were under obligations, this would not render the mortgages valid; and, if you so believe, you should find against the validity of mortgages given to secure debts which were indorsed by the directors of the Macon Hardware Company." We think these requests to charge are entirely in accord with the law applicable to this main issue in the case. In fact, the record discloses that the case was tried upon lines entirely at variance with what is above laid down; and it follows, therefore, that there should be another hearing, which should be had in the light of the principles now announced, and the result of which should be in accord therewith. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

GARBUTT LUMBER CO. v. GEORGIA & A. RY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—PUBLIC USE—COMPENSATION—PROCEDURE.

1. A partnership, which is the owner of a sawmill, and which, in connection with the business carried on, has constructed a railroad, to be used solely for the purpose of facilitating the operations of the sawmill business, is not engaged in any business in which the public is interested. A railroad owned by such a partnership, and operated in such a way, is in no sense property used for public purposes.

2. Section 4657 et seq. of the Civil Code provides a method to be followed when private property is taken or damaged for public purposes, and the procedure therein prescribed cannot be adopted when the property is sought to be taken for a purely private purpose.

3. Even if the act of November 22, 1899 (Acts 1899, p. 31), which authorizes a person or company owning or operating a private railroad in this state to cross any other railroad, be construed to authorize the taking of private property for that purpose, and, when so construed, is a valid and constitutional law, there is no law of force in this state which provides a method for fixing the compensation to be paid the owner of the railroad sought to be crossed, when the right to cross is refused.

4. The proceedings to condemn in the present case do not purport to be instituted under the sections.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Wilcox county; O. C. Smith, Judge.

Proceedings by the Georgia & Alabama Railway against the Garbutt Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Hal Lawson and Eldridge Cutts, for plaintiff in error. Mackall & Anderson, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. The Georgia & Alabama Railway, a corporation, brought its petition against the Garbutt Lumber Company, a partnership, in which it alleged that the defendant was seeking to condemn a right of way for a tramroad across the track of the plaintiff at a designated point. It was alleged that the defendant was seeking to condemn, not for any public, but for a purely private, purpose, and that there was no law of Georgia by which the defendant could exercise the right to take or damage the property of the plaintiff for that purpose. Attached to the petition, as an exhibit, was a notice to the plaintiff, signed by the defendant, that, in pursuance of the provisions of law contained in section 4657 et seq. of the Civil Code, it desired to condemn a right of way for its tramroad across the track of the plaintiff at a described point,—such right of way to be 10 feet each way from the center of the tramroad of the defendant,—and requesting the plaintiff to appoint an assessor to act with one selected by the defendant, and named in the notice. The prayer of the petition was that the defendant be enjoined from undertaking to condemn any right of way at all across the tracks of the plaintiff. To this petition the defendant filed an answer in which it set up that it owned and operated a private railroad, and was engaged in the business of cutting and sawing for market pine lumber, and that it owned timber on both sides of the railway of the plaintiff, and that in order to carry its timber to its sawmill it was necessary to cross the plaintiff's track. The defendant further alleged that it desired to connect its sawmill, by means of a tramroad, with the Ocmulgee river, for the purpose of transporting lumber and timber by means of the same, which is a water way much used for the purpose of transporting lumber, naval stores, and timber to market and sawmills. In order to reach the Ocmulgee river, it is necessary for the tramroad to cross the plaintiff's right of way; the sawmill of the defendant being on one side of the railway, and the river on the other. On the hearing the judge granted the injunction prayed for, and this ruling is assigned as error.

1. One who owns a sawmill, and is engaged in preparing lumber for market, is engaged in a business in which the public is in no way interested, and a business which from its very ris, 42 Ga. 500.

The fact that a railway is necessary in order to make the enterprise successful does not change the business from one of a private nature to one in which the public is interested. The defendant admits in its answer that its railroad is a private one. It is not pretended that it was constructed for the use of the public, nor that it is used or to be used in hauling for the public. It came into existence simply as an incident to the private business of the owner, and has been, and is to be, operated as such. The answer of the defendant, when construed in its most favorable light for it, cannot be held to establish that its sawmill was erected, or its railroad constructed or maintained and operated, for any other purpose than that of private gain. Not one thing appears in the record which would authorize an inference that the defendant's sawmill or railroad business should be classified as one in which the public is interested.

2. The method of condemnation of property, and assessment of damages, to be followed in all cases where corporations or persons are authorized to take or damage private property for public purposes, except where such property is taken for the purpose of laying out public roads or private ways, is prescribed in section 4657 et seq. of the Civil Code. The provisions of law just referred to do not contain any grant of power to any corporation or person to exercise the right of eminent domain, but simply provide how property may be condemned and the damages assessed, when the right to do so is derived from any lawful statute. The method thus provided is limited in terms to cases where authority is given to take or damage private property for public purposes. As the defendant in the present case is not a person or corporation authorized to take or damage private property for public purposes, the method provided in these sections is not at all applicable, and cannot be used in any way whatever, as the business in which the defendant is engaged is not devoted to a public purpose. This was a sufficient reason to enjoin the condemnation proceedings sought to be instituted by the defendant.

3. Section 2219 of the Civil Code, as amended by the act of November 22, 1899, reads as follows: "Any railroad company heretofore or hereafter chartered by the legislature of this state, and also, any person or persons or company owning or operating a public or private railroad in this state, when necessary to reach minerals, timber, or other materials, shall have the right to cross any other railroads heretofore or hereafter built or to be built in this state, upon the following terms: They shall be allowed to cross at grade points, or at any other point where the same shall not obstruct the other road, and may be allowed claims that it has authority to exercise the right of eminent domain under the provisions of the act just quoted, which declares that a private railroad in this state, when necessary to reach minerals, timber, or other materials, shall have the right to cross other railroads. Even if the general assembly has power to grant to a private railroad the right to take or damage the private property of another for such purpose, and even if the section of the Code as amended, properly construed, should be held to confer such power, in order to make the grant effective there must be some method provided by law for assessing the damages to be paid to the owner of property thus taken; for the general assembly certainly has no power to authorize the taking of private property, for either a private or a public purpose, without adequate compensation being first paid therefor. This method may be found either in the act of conferring the authority to exercise the right of eminent domain, or in general laws which by their terms will be applicable to such cases. Neither the act of 1899, nor the section of the Code of which it was amendatory, provides any method whatever for assessing damages to the owner. The only general law on the subject of fixing the compensation of the owner of property which is lawfully taken is found in section 4657 et seq., above referred to, and sections 557 et seq. and 661 et seq. of the Political Code, which provide the method of fixing the compensation of the owner of property taken for a public road or a private way. As has been shown, the method prescribed in Civ. Code, § 4657 et seq., is not available to the defendant. Of course, the provisions of law with reference to the establishment of public roads have no application; and while the constitution provides that, in cases of necessity, private ways may be granted, upon just compensation being first paid by the applicant (Civ. Code, § 5729), the defendant does not claim the right to condemn for a private way, and the general assembly has expressly limited the purposes for which private ways may be granted to such ways as may be necessary for individuals to go from and return to their farms or places of residence. Pol. Code, § 661; Board of Com'rs v. Harris, 71 Ga. 250. Treating the act of 1899 as legislative authority to the defendant to condemn for the purpose desired, and conceding, for the purposes of the present case, that the general assembly can constitutionally grant such authority, the act is inoperative until the general assembly shall provide the method to be followed when the owner of the property sought to be condemned refuses to permit his property to be taken.

4. The defendant contended that it had a right to condemn a right of way across the son or corporation desiring to build a tramroad to connect with a water way, for the purpose of transporting lumber, naval stores, and timber by means of the same, may make application in writing to the county authorities of the county in which the tramroad is to be located, and after such application is filed the proceedings thereafter shall be the same as provided in the Code for condemning property, except that the strip of land to be used for such purpose shall not exceed 15 feet in width. There is nothing in the notice served upon the plaintiff in the present case to indicate that the defendant intended to proceed under the law just referred to. On the contrary, it is apparent from the notice that the defendant had no such intention, for the simple reason that the law just referred to limited the strip of land authorized to be taken to 15 feet, and the notice in the present case distinctly provided for condemnation of a strip 20 feet. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO. OF KENTUCKY v. CLANCY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

INSURANCE—DEFAULT IN PREMIUMS.

1. Where a policy of life insurance expressly stipulated that the premium should be paid annually, on or before a specified day, at the home office of the company, or to an agent producing a receipt of the company, signed by its president or secretary, and that if not so paid the policy should then become void, and that none of the terms of the policy could be changed or waived, except by written agreement signed by the president or secretary of the company, a failure to pay the premium as stipulated released the company from all liability upon the policy. See Reese v. Association (decided at the present term) 36 S. E. 637.

2. Where the local agent of the company represented to the holder of such policy that the company would change it so that the premium would be payable quarterly instead of annually, and the assured thereafter made a written request of the company that it make such change, the mere failure of the company to reply to this request was no excuse for not paying the premium in accordance with the terms of the policy.

3. The evidence submitted upon the trial demanded a finding in favor of the company, and the court erred in rendering judgment for the plaintiff.

RAILROADS—INJURY TO LIVE STOCK.

The railway company introduced positive testimony which fully overcame the legal presumption upon which alone the plaintiff's case rested. Its witnesses were entitled to be believed, for they were not directly contradicted; and the circumstantial evidence by which it was sought to discredit them, while consistent with the theory that they did not swear truly, was also consistent with the theory that they did. In such case the positive testimony must control.

Action by J. B. Thompson against the Georgia Southern & Florida Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Geo. S. Jones and R. C. Jordan, for plaintiff in error. E. P. Johnston, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. There was a head-end collision between a moving locomotive and a stationary bull, the latter showing fight, and manifesting total ignorance of the doctrine of impenetrability. The company's servants in charge of the locomotive were better versed in the principles of natural philosophy, and, according to their testimony, did their best to save the animal from the consequences of his rashness; but, in spite of their well-directed efforts, the crash came, with its inevitable result. They were the only eyewitnesses. At the trial the plaintiff proved certain circumstances which were consistent with his contention that the defendant's witnesses did not state accurately the details of the catastrophe, but these circumstances were also perfectly consistent with the company's contention that its witnesses gave an entirely correct version of what occurred. Under the well-settled rules of evidence applicable to such a case, it must be held that the defendant's witnesses were in no legal or fair sense discredited, and that the verdict in the plaintiff's favor cannot lawfully stand. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

JENKINS v. NATIONAL MUT. BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N OF NEW YORK.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

COMPROMISE AND SETTLEMENT—ACCEPTANCE—EVIDENCE.

1. When a debtor pays to a collecting agent a given sum of money upon the express condition that the same is to be accepted by the principal of the latter in full settlement of all demands against the debtor, it is the duty of the creditor, within a reasonable time after being informed of the condition on which the payment was made, to notify the debtor whether or not his offer of settlement is accepted, and, if not, to return to him the money received. What, in a given case, would be a reasonable announced, and did not submit to the jury the real issue upon which a proper determination of the case depended.

3. The court also erred in permitting witnesses to testify to the correctness of accounts taken from books which they did not keep, and upon which alone their testimony respecting the accounts was based.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Bibb county; W. H. Felton, Jr., Judge.

Action by D. E. Jenkins against the National Mutual Building & Loan Association of New York. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Anderson & Grace, for plaintiff in error. Marion W. Harris, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Jenkins brought his petition against the National Mutual Building & Loan Association of New York, alleging that he had borrowed a sum of money from the defendant, which he had agreed to pay back in the manner prescribed by its rules and by-laws, and, to secure the repayment of the loan, had executed a deed to certain realty; that after he had made sundry payments on the debt he made a calculation as to the amount necessary to pay the balance then due according to his understanding of the rules of the association, and that he remitted to it the amount thus ascertained by him, accompanied with the statement that this amount was to be received in full discharge of his liability to the association; that the association has retained the amount so remitted; and that a reasonable time has elapsed since the remittance for the association to determine whether it would accept the proposition or decline the same. The plaintiff charges that the failure of the association to return the money amounts to an election to receive the same in full satisfaction of his liability, and that notwithstanding this the defendant is attempting to sell the property held by it as security. The prayer of the petition is that the defendant be enjoined from selling the property, and that the deed and evidence of indebtedness held by it be delivered up to be canceled. The defendant in its answer admits having received the money, but denies having accepted it in full satisfaction of the plaintiff's liability to it, and, by way of cross bill, prays for a judgment against the plaintiff for the amount claimed by it to be due on the debt. The trial resulted in a verdict against the plaintiff in favor of the defendant on its answer in the nature of a cross bill.

At the trial it appeared that the plaintiff had paid the amount claimed by him to be the balance due on the debt to a collecting agent of the defendant at Macon, with the distinct understanding that the amount should be received in full settlement of the debt due by the plaintiff; that this agent remitted the amount, less his commission, forwarded by the agent to the association in a letter in which the agent said the amount paid by Jenkins completed "his payments, according to his understanding of contract with your association. He asks that you cancel and return to me or to him the evidence of indebtedness of your company against him." This letter was dated February 2, 1897, and the defendant acknowledged receipt of the same on February 8th, in a letter to its agent, in which it was said the amount remitted did not complete the payments of Jenkins due the association. Then followed a correspondence between the association and its agent, and the association and Jenkins and his attorneys, continuing until August 21, 1897. The money was never returned to Jenkins, and nothing that would amount to an offer to return the same was made until May 7, 1897. An examination of the correspondence shows that Jenkins and his attorneys steadfastly adhered to his original contention, that he had remitted the amount in final settlement, and that the failure of the defendant to return the same within a reasonable time after it was received amounted to an acceptance on its part of the proposition thus made by Jenkins. The letters from the association to Jenkins and his attorneys contain strenuous efforts to obtain from Jenkins an acknowledgment that there was a misunderstanding about the matter, that his calculation was incorrect, and that he did not understand the way to calculate the balance due on the debt according to the rules of the association, and also a claim by them that they took the amount of the remittance, and credited it upon the debt as they understood it to be. It is not at all clear that the letter of May 7th would amount to an offer to refund the money, but this is the first communication from the association that at all resembles an offer to refund. In Hamilton v. Stewart, 105 Ga. 300, 31 S. E. 184, it was held that where a debtor remitted to a creditor less than the amount of the debt as claimed by the creditor, upon the distinct understanding that the same was to be received in full discharge of the debt, if the creditor did not, within a reasonable time after the money was received, repudiate the offer and return the money remitted to him, all liability on the debt would be discharged. When the case was before the court a second time (108 Ga. 472, 34 S. E. 123) the necessity for the return of the money within a reasonable time was emphasized, and it was intimated that a bare refusal to accede to the proposition to accept the amount in full discharge would be unavailing to the creditor in the absence of a return of the money. In the present case, even if an offer to refund, without an actual tender of the money, would be available as a defense to the action, it was a question for the jury whether, in remittance was received. The charges complained of in the present case were not exactly adjusted to the facts of the case, and did not with sufficient fullness submit to the jury the real issues in the case, nor were some of them in harmony with the rules above laid down.

During the progress of the trial a witness was allowed to testify that he made up a statement of the account due by the plaintiff to the association, and that the same was correct. It appeared upon cross-examination that his knowledge of the transaction was derived solely from the books of the association. This testimony of the witness should have been excluded. Association v. Butler (Ga.) 35 S. E. 679. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. ROGERS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

CARRIERS—LIVE STOCK SHIPMENT.

The evidence showed that the damage to the live stock of the plaintiff resulted from his negligent failure to comply with that part of the special contract of affreightment in which he undertook to accompany and to water, feed, and attend such stock. The verdict against the defendant company was, therefore, error, and should have been set aside on motion for a new trial. Railroad Co. v. Bryant, 73 Ga. 722; Boaz v. Railroad Co., 13 S. (Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—SOLVENCY OF GRANTOR—SURETYSHIP.

1. As a general rule, in testing the solvency of one who has made a voluntary conveyance of property, his indorsements or suretyship on the obligations of others, not matured at the time of the conveyance, should not be counted as his debts, where it does not appear that his contingent liability was at that time likely to become absolute, or that it afterwards in fact became so. King v. Thompson, 9 Pet. 203, 220, 9 L. Ed. 102; McLaughlin v. Bank, 7 How. 229, 12 L. Ed. 675; Bump, Fraud. Conv. (4th Ed.) § 255. Where, therefore, one made such a conveyance to his wife, and was at the time surety for another, and the obligation that the husband was insolvent when he made it. (a) This case is distinguishable from that of Primrose v. Browning, 56 Ga. 369; Id., 59 Ga. 69. In that case the indorsement was on a 30-day note. The voluntary deed was made to the wife 5 days before the maturity of the note. The maker became a bankrupt, judgment was obtained against the indorser, and the execution was levied on land purchased by the wife with the proceeds of the land voluntarily conveyed to her. In that case the contingent liability of the surety became absolute, while in the present case the payment by the principal discharged the surety from all liability on the note.

2. Where one made a voluntary deed and some time thereafter died, the value of his other property at the time the deed was made is the true test of his solvency at that time, and not the value of his property at the time of his death, as estimated by appraisers appointed to set aside a year's support for his widow and minor children. EASEMENT—PRIVATE WAY—OBSTRUCTION—PRESCRIPTION—NUISANCE.

1. In order to sustain an application for the removal of obstructions from an alleged private way, the right to which the applicant bases upon prescription, he must show, not only that he has been in the uninterrupted use thereof for seven years or more, but also that it does not exceed fifteen feet in width, that it has been kept open and in repair, and that "it is the same fifteen feet originally appropriated." CONYERS v. FORD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

JUDGE—DISQUALIFICATION—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—EVIDENCE—CERTIORARI.

1. An attorney at law employed to file an equitable petition for the appointment of a receiver, and who, since the appointment was made, retired from the case, and had no further connection therewith, was not disqualified as a judge from presiding in a case subsequently brought by the receiver against a third person.

2. When it is sought to establish a course of dealings between two persons, with a view to showing that one of them was in the habit of sending his servant to the other for the purpose of purchasing goods, for which payment was uniformly made, evidence tending to show a similar course of dealings between the alleged principal and other persons is not admissible.

3. An overcharge or an unauthorized charge by a magistrate of costs alleged to have accrued in a trial before a jury in his court cannot be made the subject-matter of review by a petition for certiorari complaining of ertioned by the judge.

Error from superior court, Bartow county; J. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by F. M. Ford against James B. Conyers. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

B. J. Conyers, for plaintiff in error. Joe M. Moon, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Ford, as receiver of the estate of Satterfield, brought suit against Conyers in the justice's court upon an account for goods sold and delivered by the receiver after he had taken charge of the mercantile business which was carried on by the deceased in his lifetime. The trial resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant carried the case to the superior court by certiorari, complaining that certain errors were committed at the trial. The judge overruled the certiorari, and this is the error assigned.

1. When the case was called in the superior court the judge of that court announced that he was disqualified from presiding, and called upon the judge of the city court of Cartersville to hear and determine the questions made in the certiorari. Objection was made that the judge of the city court was disqualified by reason of the fact that he, as attorney at law, had been employed to file the petition in the case in which the plaintiff had been appointed receiver. It appeared, however, that after the appointment of the receiver the judge had retired from the case, and had no further connection therewith, and was not interested in any way in the litigation. Upon this state of facts, he held that he was not disqualified to preside, and we do not think there was any error in this ruling.

2. It was admitted at the trial that the goods were not sold and delivered to the defendant in person, but that the same were delivered to a servant in his employ. The defendant denied the authority of this servant to purchase the goods on his credit, and it was sought to charge him with her purchases for the reason that goods bought by her from the receiver in the past had been paid for by him. The case was stubbornly contested on this point. The defendant, as has been said, not only denied that the servant had any authority to buy the goods in his behalf, but also denied that any goods bought by her in the past had ever been paid for by him. The court admitted evidence that the defendant had paid for goods bought by this servant in his behalf from Satterfield, as well as for goods bought from another merchant. We think this was error. What the defendant may have authorized his servant to do with reference to purchasing goods from Satterfield and from person was calculated to prejudice the defense set up. The defendant would have a perfect right to authorize his servant to purchase goods from Satterfield and from another merchant in the city, and the fact that the servant was so authorized could not throw any light on the question as to whether she had authority to purchase from a person other than these two.

3. Complaint was made in the petition for certiorari that the magistrate before whom the case was tried had compelled the plaintiff in certiorari to pay more than should have been demanded as legal costs in the case. Such a complaint as this has no place in a petition for certiorari. It is not necessary to attach to the petition a certificate of the magistrate that the costs have been paid. Fuller v. Arnold, 64 Ga. 599. A certificate showing that the costs have been paid must be filed with the clerk within the time required by law before writ of certiorari could be issued. Any complaint in regard to an overcharge or an unauthorized charge of costs by the magistrate when the application is made for a certificate that the costs have been paid cannot be made the basis of an assignment of error in the petition for certiorari.

The petition for certiorari contained other assignments of error than those above mentioned, but the foregoing discussion embraces all the assignments of error which relate to matters which will probably arise at another trial, or which are of sufficient importance to require particular notice. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

KEYS v. FLEMISTER et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

DEPOSITIONS—INDORSEMENT—TRIAL.

1. Where a package containing interrogatories and answers thereto, which had been transported by mail, was by the postmaster, in the presence of the parties to a case pending in a justice's court, delivered in open court to the magistrate, and thereafter, pending the trial, upon objection that the package had not been indorsed by the magistrate as required by Civ. Code, § 5310, he then made the proper indorsement upon the package, this was a substantial compliance with the law as to such indorsement.

2. That a jury in returning a verdict in an action upon a promissory note accepted a calculation of the amount due thereon by the plaintiff's attorney is no cause for setting aside the verdict, unless it affirmatively appears that because of such action a verdict for too large an amount was rendered. (a) It does not in the present case appear that the calculation made by the attorney was in any respect incorrect.

3. The evidence, though conflicting, being sufficient to warrant the verdict rendered in the magistrate's court, this court will not reverse a judgment of the superior court overruling a ground of a petition for certiorari alleging that the verdict was contrary to evidence.

BATES et al. v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF DALTON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

PLEADING—CONSTRUCTION—USURY.

1. A trial judge, in passing upon the sufficiency of an answer, must base his judgment upon what the same actually contains, and not upon an erroneous representation as to its contents made in open court by counsel for the plaintiff; and this is so although counsel for the defendant may have heard the representation made, and have failed to call the attention of the court to the fact that the same was incorrect.

2. An answer in a suit brought by a national bank which set up that a promissory note on which the plaintiff's action was founded was usurious, because the payee had reserved as interest an amount exceeding the maximum legal rate,—the figures showing the precise amount of the alleged usury being distinctly alleged,—set forth a good defense, so far as the interest claimed on the note was concerned.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Murray county; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of Dalton against R. L. Bates and others. From a judgment striking pleas of certain defendants from the files, they bring error. Reversed.

COBB, J. The First National Bank of Dalton brought suit upon a promissory note against R. L. Bates, R. F. Chastain, and J. W. Green. Green filed no defense. Bates and Chastain each filed pleas to the action, which will be hereafter referred to. Upon motion the court struck these pleas, and this ruling is assigned as error.

1. The bill of exceptions states that the ruling of the judge was made upon an oral statement by counsel for the plaintiff as to the contents of the pleas, such statement not being denied or corrected by defendant's counsel. It appears that the statement of plaintiff's counsel was incorrect, and that the pleas were of an entirely different character from that referred to in the statement. The record shows that the court struck the pleas which were filed, and therefore the ruling upon which we must pass is the one appearing in the record; that is, the decision that the pleas as filed set up no defense to the action. The court must rule upon the case as made by the pleadings, and not upon the case as stated by counsel. See Bostick v. Palmer, 79 Ga. 680, 4 S. E. 319.

2. The plea of Bates set up that the note sued on was for $150, and that he was liable thereon only for the sum of $148, without interest, for the reason that at the time the note was made he received only $144, $6 having been taken out and reserved by the plaintiff as interest in advance, and that the amount so reserved was $2 in excess of the lawful interest for the time between the date of the execution and the maturity of the note. The facts alleged set up a complete defense to the action, so far as the interest on the note was concerned. While the rate of interest which a national bank is authorized to charge is governed by the law of the state in which the bank is located, the penalty to be imposed upon such a bank for exacting usury is that prescribed by the act of congress providing for the creation of national banks. In Bank v. Dearing, 91 U. S. 29, 23 L. Ed. 196, Mr. Justice Swayne says: "There was reason why the rate of interest should be governed by the law of the state where the bank is situated; but there is none why usury should be visited with the forfeiture of the entire debt in one state, and with no penal consequences whatever in another. This, we think, would be unreason, and contrary to the manifest intent of congress." The act of congress provides that knowingly taking or reserving a rate of interest greater than that authorized by law shall work a forfeiture of the entire interest which the note, bill, or other evidence of indebtedness carries with it, or which has agreed to be paid thereon. See Barnet v. Bank, 98 U. S. 555, 25 L. Ed. 212. It was error, therefore, for the court to strike the plea of the defendant Bates.

any usury had been charged or reserved, and set up that she was discharged by reason of "said usurious charge of interest by" the plaintiff, and prayed that the court should so decree. The principal being discharged to the extent of the interest on the debt by reason of the exaction of usury, of course the security is discharged to the same extent. It was argued in the brief of counsel for the plaintiffs in error that as the note contained a waiver of homestead, and as the exaction of usury in the transaction avoided such waiver, the security was discharged from all liability on the note. So far as the point thus raised is concerned, it is sufficient to say that no such claim was set up in the plea, and therefore the question as to whether the provisions of the national bank act will preclude the defendant from setting up this defense will not now be decided. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

SPEARS et al. v. SCOTT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

PLEADING—AMENDMENT—NONSUIT.

1. One at whose instance another is made a party to a pending case involving equities pro and con between the two cannot, after the latter has filed an answer in the nature of a cross bill, setting up his alleged rights in the premises, and praying for affirmative relief by an enforcement of the same, so amend his pleadings as to prevent a hearing of the case upon its real merits, and thus deprive his adversary of the opportunity to establish his allegations and obtain the relief to which he is entitled thereon.
2. Where such a case, upon the trial thereof, was finally resolved into an action by the newly-made party against the person who brought him into the litigation, it was erroneous to grant a nonsuit against such newly-made party, when there was sufficient evidence to sustain his allegations and entitle him to the judgment for which he prayed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Cherokee county; George F. Gober, Judge.

Action by J. P. Spears against A. K. Scott. R. L. Strickland was thereafter made a party, and filed a cross complaint. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The following is the official report:

J. P. Spears, as administrator of George W. Jefferson, deceased, brought suit in the su-substance, the following facts: That on said date Jefferson made a contract with Scott to sell him land lot No. 193, and the east half of lot No. 169, in the Twenty-Third district and Seventh section of Cherokee county, Ga., on the following terms: Jefferson owed Scott $1,000, with interest; James R. Brown, $1,000, with interest, and Mrs. M. E. Strickland, as guardian of R. L. Strickland, $787.91. And Scott agreed to pay the Brown and Strickland debts, and cancel his own, in consideration of obtaining deeds to said land. Jefferson made deeds to the land to Scott, who paid the Brown debt, but refused to pay the Strickland debt, wherefore the administrator brought suit to recover the amount of the Strickland debt. Scott answered the petition, admitting the purchase of land lot 193, and his agreement to pay the Brown debt and to cancel his own debt, as part of the consideration for the deeds, but denied having purchased the east half of land lot No. 169, and claimed that he and Jefferson and R. L. Strickland, who had become of age, had made a contract by which he (Scott) agreed that, if Strickland would accept $500 for his debt, he would pay the same, in consideration of a deed to be made by Jefferson to Scott to the east half of land lot No. 169; that Jefferson executed the deed, but that Strickland, who had the matter under consideration, declined to carry out the agreement and accept the $500, and the agreement fell through; that subsequently Strickland foreclosed his mortgage, sold the east half of land lot No. 169 thereunder, and bought it in at the sheriff's sale; that although he (Scott) had kept the deed, he had never been in possession of the land, and that, on account of Strickland's failure to comply with the agreement, he (Scott) was not liable for the Strickland debt; that, if there was any agreement on his part to pay it, the consideration for his promise had failed. He charged that the suit was really proceeding for Strickland's benefit, and that Strickland was a party to the original agreement, and had repudiated it; and he prayed that Strickland be made a party to this cause, and should show cause why he should not surrender the east half of land lot 169 and receive the $500, which defendant was willing to pay. By consent of all parties, Strickland was made a party in his name. Strickland thereupon filed a petition adopting all of the allegations of the original petition filed by Spears, administrator, and alleging that all the debts stated by Spears to have been due by Jefferson were owed, and that they were all secured by mortgages given by Jefferson on land lot 193 and the east half of 169, Brown's being the first mortgage, Strickland's the second, and Scott's the third; that by mistake land lot 193 had been written "No. 192" in the Strickland mortgage, and that it was a mutual mistake; that Jefferson had made the contract to sell and Jefferson had executed the deeds to Scott, who received them, but afterwards refused to pay the Strickland debt; that Jefferson, outside of the mortgaged property, was insolvent; that Scott received the deeds in pursuance of the agreement to pay these debts, knowing that all the lands were covered by the mortgages; that Scott refused to pay the Strickland debt, and petitioner (Strickland) afterwards foreclosed his mortgage, and bought in the east half of land lot No. 169 at sheriff's sale under this procedure; that there was due to him the sum of $787.91, with interest from March 8, 1895. He prayed judgment against Scott for this amount, and offered to release to Scott all claims he had to the said east half of land lot No. 169, on payment of said amount. Scott answered this petition, practically reasserting his former contentions, but withdrawing the proposition to pay Strickland $500 if Strickland would convey the east half of lot 169 to him.

Upon the trial of the case three witnesses were examined, viz.: D. W. Ferguson, who negotiated the transaction as the agent of Jefferson, R. L. Strickland, and P. P. Du Pre. Ferguson swore that Scott knew of these mortgages, and understood that they covered land lot No. 193 and the east half of land lot 169; that Jefferson had never owned land lot No. 192, nor was he ever in possession of it; that Scott afterwards found out that there was a mistake in the Strickland mortgage, and that the land lot was written therein "192," instead of "193"; that Scott purchased the land on the express undertaking to cancel his own debt and pay the Brown and Strickland debts, and that the deeds were made by Jefferson and delivered to Scott, and received by him, and never brought back; that it was not true that Scott was to pay Strickland $500 for his claim, but he was to pay both debts. Strickland testified that he had a conversation with Scott, and Scott admitted to him that he was to pay off the Strickland mortgage,—that his trade was to pay off the Brown and Strickland mortgages, and cancel his own, and take the land; that he had found out afterwards that there was a mistake in the Strickland mortgage, and that it described the land as land lot No. 192, instead of 193, and came to see witness (Strickland) to ascertain if the mistake was in the mortgage, or in the record, and, when he found it was in the mortgage, tried to scare him; that, when Scott refused to pay his (Strickland's) claim, he then foreclosed his mortgage, and had the east half of land lot No. 169 sold, because Scott filed a claim to land lot No. 193; that he bid off the east half of lot 169 at the sheriff's sale for $350, and took the sheriff's deed to the same, and is seeking to recover the balance due him upon his debt. Du Pre testified that Scott agreed to pay both debts and cancel his own, the Brown and Strickland debts, he could not get the property. Plaintiff put in evidence seven promissory notes, for the aggregate sum of $682.50, with interest from date at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, made by Jefferson, and payable to Strickland or bearer, dated April 4, 1888, with a credit of all interest up to April 4, 1893, and also a credit on one note of $29.40, dated February 21, 1890. Plaintiff also put in evidence the mortgage from Jefferson to Strickland on lot 192 and the east half of lot 169, dated April 4, 1888, to secure the bid notes; also, a deed from Jefferson to Scott, dated March 8, 1895, to lot 193, and a deed of the same date from Jefferson to Scott to the east half of lot 169. The judge, at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, granted a nonsuit, to which ruling plaintiff excepted.

W. D. Mills, Lee Mullins, P. P. Du Pre, and King & Spalding, for plaintiff in error. Teasley & Hutcherson and J. P. Brooke, for defendant in error.

FISH, J. 1. The facts of this case will be found in the reporter's statement. Whether Strickland, the mortgagee, could have brought, either at law or in equity, an action against Scott on his alleged promise to Jefferson, his grantor, to pay the mortgage debt, is a question upon which the decisions of the courts of the several states are in great conflict. See Clark, Cont. 513 et seq.; 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 104 et seq. In Insurance Co. v. Collins, 54 Ga. 376, and Austell v. Humphries, 99 Ga. 408, 27 S. E. 736, this court held, in effect, that one for whose benefit a contract was made between others, to the consideration of which he was a stranger, could not sue thereon in an action at law. In Bell v. McGrady, 32 Ga. 257, and Dallas v. Heard, Id. 604, wherein the contracts sued upon were construed to constitute the promissor trustee for the benefit of the third person, it was held that the latter might sue thereon in equity. Though it be conceded that Strickland could not have maintained an action, either at law or in equity, against Scott on his promise to Jefferson to pay Strickland the debt which Jefferson owed him, there can be no doubt but that Jefferson's administrator, Spears, had the right to bring the suit against Scott upon such promise, and to recover of him whatever balance remained unpaid of Strickland's debt. Williams v. Moody, 95 Ga. 8, 22 S. E. 30. And when Strickland, at Scott's instance, and in view of the allegations in the equitable cross petition filed by the latter, was made a party plaintiff in such action, it could proceed in his name, and he had the right to recover therein from Scott whatever balance might be proven to be due him on his mortgage debt. Nor could Scott, after Strickland had been made a party and had filed his answer to Scott's cross petition, so amend his

2. The evidence submitted upon the trial was amply sufficient to warrant a verdict in favor of Strickland for the balance due him on his mortgage debt, and the court erred in granting the nonsuit. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

JOLLEY et al. v. HARDEMAN et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

EXECUTION—PERISHABLE PROPERTY—PARTNERSHIP ASSETS—CLAIM CASE—LIS PENDENS—ABATEMENT.

1. The words "liable to deteriorate from keeping," employed in section 5463 of the Civil Code for the purpose of designating a class of personal property which may, under its provisions, be brought to speedy sale, do not apply to articles which, because of their enduring nature, are unlikely, merely by reason of the lapse of a brief space of time, to undergo changes in form or otherwise, causing depreciation in value, but to articles which are for such a reason subject to such changes. (a) An ordinary cotton press does not fall within the class described by the words above quoted.

2. It is not lawful to levy an execution against an individual upon property belonging to a partnership of which he is a member.

3. The mere tendering to a levying officer of the affidavits requisite to the interposition of a claim in forma pauperis does not, if he refuses to accept the same and return them to the proper court, make a claim case between the plaintiff in fi. fa. and the affiant.

4. Since neither the levying officer, nor the purchaser at a sale conducted by the former, are parties to a claim case, the pendency of such a case does not, relatively to an action by the claimant against them for the recovery of the property sold, constitute lis pendens.

Error from superior court, Cobb county; George F. Gober, Judge.

Action by J. J. & T. J. Jolley against James W. Hardeman and C. N. Barrett. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

J. O. Gartrell and H. B. Moss, for plaintiffs in error. J. Z. Foster, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. This was an action by J. J. & T. J. Jolley against James W. Hardeman and C. N. Barrett. The material portions of the plaintiffs' petition were as follows: They were, and had for many years been, partners, and as such were the owners of a described cotton press. Hardeman, the plaintiff in an execution which had been issued upon a judgment in his favor against J. J. Jolley, caused the same to be levied upon this cotton press by Barrett, a constable of the 898th district, G. M., of Cobb county. After so doing, Hardeman presented to the justice of the peace of that district a petition stating that such levy had been made, that the property was likely to deteriorate in value, and that the defendant a prayer for an order directing the property to be sold before the court-house door of said district after the same had been advertised for 10 days. Thereupon the magistrate granted an order of sale as prayed for, it being in the order recited that the defendant in execution could not be served with notice. Subsequently the constable did sell the cotton press, and Hardeman became the purchaser at the price of $5, although the real value of the property was $150. The latter then took possession of the cotton press, and refused to deliver it to petitioners upon their making a demand for the same. Before the sale took place, they tendered to the constable a claim affidavit in which it was distinctly alleged that the property levied on as that of J. J. Jolley was not his individual property, but the partnership property of the firm of J. J. & T. J. Jolley. The claim affidavit was accompanied by a proper affidavit of inability, from poverty, to give bond, etc. The constable disregarded this claim, and failed and refused to return the same to the court from which the execution issued. The petition distinctly alleged that the order of sale "was illegal and void; said press, in contemplation of law, not being such personal property of a perishable nature, or liable to deterioration from keeping, or of expense attending the keeping, as is specified and intended by the statute in such cases made and provided." Petitioners prayed that the sale be set aside, and that they recover possession of the property, with hire. To this petition the defendants demurred on the following grounds: "(1) It sets forth no legal cause of action against the defendants, or either of them. (2) Said petition shows that before and at the time of the filing of the same there was pending in the justice court of the 897th district, G. M., Cobb county, Georgia, a suit by said plaintiffs against said Hardeman for the recovery of said property sued for in this case; the same being a claim case in which said Hardeman was plaintiff in fi. fa., said J. J. Jolley defendant in fi. fa., and said plaintiffs, J. J. Jolley and T. J. Jolley, as a firm and partners and joint owners, claimants, and being the same cause of action and between the same parties as this suit." The demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiffs excepted.

1. The first question presented is whether or not so much of section 5463 of the Civil Code as provides for a speedy sale of property "liable to deteriorate from keeping" is applicable to such an article as an ordinary cotton press. We are of the opinion that it is not, and so hold as matter of law. The section in question deals with three classes of personal property, viz. (1) that which is "of a perishable nature"; (2) such as is "liable to deteriorate from keeping"; and (3) herent qualities, rapidly decompose or decay, and in so doing undergo material changes of form and quality, which render them unsuitable for use and of little or no value. Such things as fruit, fresh fish, and the like, may properly be termed articles "of a perishable nature," within the meaning of the above-cited section. The class of articles evidently intended to be covered by the words "liable to deteriorate from keeping" is of a somewhat different nature. The words just quoted doubtless refer to things which, while not so readily destructible by the mere lapse of time as articles strictly perishable in their nature, are nevertheless liable to become less useful, and consequently less valuable, much sooner than articles of an enduring character, whose composition and characteristics would be but little affected even by the lapse of a considerable period of time. The general assembly must, we think, have had in mind articles which would preserve their existence and form longer than those of a perishable nature, but which would in a short space of time undergo changes affecting their utility and value. Such, for instance, are articles of food manufactured for immediate use, which, though not perishable, to a greater or less extent lose with their freshness the chief features which render them desirable and valuable. Clearly, the class of articles to which we now refer is of a decidedly different nature from those which remain practically the same in form and substance through periods of weeks, months, or even years, and which therefore could not be expected, merely by reason of being kept, to deteriorate, and, consequently, to become depreciated in value, between the time of a levy and a sale had thereunder after advertising in accordance with the general statutory provisions on the subject. It would scarcely be pretended that a wagon or a sewing machine would appreciably deteriorate from keeping during such a space of time. We, of course, use the word "keeping" as synonymous with "properly keeping"; for it cannot have been employed by the legislature in any other sense. We are not now concerned with the question as to what property falls within the third class dealt with in the Code section above referred to, viz. that the keeping of which is attended with expense; for there is no contention in the present case that the property sold belonged to that class. We discussed the meaning of the word "perishable" only for the purpose of distinguishing property of which it is descriptive from that intended to be designated by the words "liable to deteriorate from keeping." We are quite confident that the general assembly never remotely contemplated that a cotton press should be classed as an article which would deteriorate if kept by a levying officer until a sale thereof could be made under a levy recting that the original order of dismissal be signed and entered nunc pro tunc, which was done, held that, whether the plaintiffs were or were not bound to except to the action taken at the preceding term within due time thereafter, they cannot maintain a bill of exceptions sued out after the adjournment of the last term, when it is impossible to ascertain therefrom whether exception is taken to what was done at the former term, or to the order directing the signing and entering of the original order of dismissal. This is so because such a bill of exceptions does not comply with the law requiring alleged errors to be plainly and distinctly pointed out.

2. Where a bill of exceptions recites that an order was passed on a specified day, and the record shows that it was passed on a different day, the record will control. Applying this well-established rule to the present bill of exceptions, it does not affirmatively appear that it was tendered within the time required by law.

MAYOR, ETC., OF CITY OF ATHENS v. SMITH.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

ACTION BY MARRIED WOMAN—PERSONAL INJURIES—DISMISSAL—DEMURRER.

1. A married woman living with her husband may bring an action in her own name for 829.

2. A general motion to dismiss a suit "because it is a suit for a tort by a married woman living with her husband, in her own name alone," was properly overruled where the petition set out a cause of action against the defendant, and prayed for certain elements of damage for which the plaintiff could recover, although it may have also contained prayers for other elements of damage for which the plaintiff had no right to sue. A general demurrer should not prevail where any part of the petition is good. Reese v. Reese, 15 S. E. 846, 89 Ga. 645, 652, and cases cited; Munnerlyn v. Bank, 14 S. E. 554, 88 Ga. 339; May v. Jones, 14 S. E. 552, 88 Ga. 308, 312, 15 L. R. A. 637, and cases cited. See, also, Baer v. Christian, 9 S. E. 790, 83 Ga. 822.

3. The evidence warranted the verdict for those elements of damage alleged in the petition for which the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and the trial judge did not abuse his discretion in overruling a motion for a new trial based on the grounds that the verdict was contrary to law and evidence.

MALPASS v. GRAVES.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

GUARDIAN—POWERS—SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS.

1. When a guardian makes with a debtor of his ward a final settlement, and, on receipt of a given sum paid in pursuance thereof, discharges such debtor from further liability, the ward, if the settlement, though not a just one, was free from fraud or collusion, cannot, on arriving at majority, maintain against the debtor an action for a balance which he ought to have paid to the guardian upon a proper settlement. Before such an action would lie, it would be incumbent on the ward to directly attack and set aside the settlement actually made; and to a proceeding for this purpose the guardian would be an essential party.

2. The case is controlled by the ruling above made, and in the light thereof all of the assignments of error, the decision of which is not controlled by the foregoing note, related to rulings which, even if erroneous, were not harmful to the losing party.

Roberts & Pottle, Jas. A. Harley, and R. H. Lewis, for plaintiff in error. W. H. Burwell and Bacon, Miller & Brunson, for defendant in error.

ant's intestate was the executor of the will of her grandfather William Fraley, and as such was liable to her, in different stated sums, for alleged acts of mismanagement as the representative of that estate. The defendant answered, denying any liability on the part of his intestate to the plaintiff. The trial resulted in a verdict in favor of the defendant, and, the plaintiff's motion for a new trial having been overruled, she excepted.

1. At the trial it appeared that an execution for $10,000 against one Watkins, in favor of William Fraley, came into the hands of Henry Fraley, as executor, and that by a negligent indulgence granted to Watkins a portion of this debt was lost to the estate. The plaintiff was one of the residuary legatees under the will of William Fraley, and the debt of Watkins passed under the residuary clause of the will. Lou A. Fraley, as guardian of the plaintiff, gave a receipt to Henry Fraley, as executor of William Fraley, for a given sum of money, in which it was recited that the sum was received "in full of amount due my ward from residuary clause in the will of said deceased," except two items, which are not involved in the present controversy. The plaintiff claims that the defendant's intestate was liable to her for her portion of the amount due on the Watkins execution which was lost by his negligence in failing to press the collection of the same with due diligence, and that the receipt given by her guardian should not be so construed as to preclude her from calling the executor to account for his negligence. The terms of the receipt of the guardian are broad enough to indicate that there was a final settlement between her and the executor as to this matter; and as, at the time she receipted the executor, the claim for the amount for which the plaintiff now sues was certainly of doubtful character, so far as the prospect of collecting the same was concerned, the guardian was authorized to compromise the same, under the provisions of section 3428 of the Civil Code, which declares that guardians are authorized to compromise all contested or doubtful claims for or against the estates or wards that they represent, to submit such matters to arbitration, or release a debtor, if to the interest of the estate or ward. There being no evidence whatever to show that the receipt given by the guardian did not speak the truth, or that the settlement was the result of either fraud or collusion, it was binding between the parties to the same; and the ward could not, on arriving at majority, maintain a suit against the executor on the claim which was thus settled by her guardian. If the settlement was not a proper one to be made by the guardian, the ward has her remedy against her guardian; but in order to reach the estate, and in such a proceeding the guardian would be a necessary party. Under this view of the case, the evidence demanded the verdict rendered. This case is to be distinguished from the case of Fraley v. Thomas, 98 Ga. 875, 25 S. E. 446, in that in the latter case Mrs. Thomas, the residuary legatee, did not receive the amount paid by the executor in full discharge of the amount due her under the will.

2. There were assignments of error in the motion for a new trial raising other questions than the one above dealt with, but, under the view we have taken of the case, all of them complain of rulings which, even if erroneous, were not harmful in the present case. Even if the receipt of the guardian did not preclude the plaintiff from recovering for the rents alleged to have been collected and not accounted for by the executor, there was no sufficient evidence to authorize a recovery on this branch of the case; and the failure of the judge to charge the jury with reference to the same was, therefore, not productive of any harm to the plaintiff. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

BORN v. SIMMONS.

SMITH v. FARMERS' MUT. INS. ASS'N OF GEORGIA.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

INSURANCE POLICY—AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

It is not essential to the validity of a policy of insurance, which was actually signed by the president and secretary of the company by which it purported to have been issued, that the person who, in behalf of the company, after the policy had been so signed and placed in his hands, filled blanks therein so as to make it a complete contract, and who then delivered the same to the insured, should have been clothed with written authority either to fill such blanks or make the delivery.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Elbert county; S. Reese, Judge.

brings error. Reversed.

John P. Shannon and Asbury G. McCurry, for plaintiff in error. W. D. Tutt, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Smith sued the Farmers' Mutual Insurance Association of Georgia upon a policy of fire insurance in the city court of Elbert county. At the trial, in addition to evidence of the value of the property claimed to have been insured, its total destruction by fire, and notice of loss to the company, followed by a refusal on its part to pay, there was evidence that the plaintiff received from one Brown the paper sued on, signed by the president and secretary of the association. Brown testified that he was the agent of the association, and as such filled up the blanks in the policy which had been delivered to him by one Manglebury, and after the property had been valued by Thomas, who was a director of the association, delivered the policy to the plaintiff, who signed the same as required by the rules of the association. It appeared from the minutes of the association that one Fickett was elected local agent for the county in which the plaintiff's property was located, and that Manglebury was appointed to assist him. The by-laws of the association, which were in evidence, clearly authorized the local agent to appoint assistants; one of such by-laws imposing upon the "agent, or any one appointed by him," certain penalties for insuring buildings of a certain character, and another by-law providing that, should the agent "appoint assistants, such assistants shall be responsible to their appointees, and not to the association, which shall hold each responsible for everything done in his name." At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence a motion was made to rule out the evidence as to what had been done by Brown, upon the ground that it appeared therefrom that his authority to fill the blanks in the policy and deliver the same was not in writing. The court sustained this motion, and then, upon motion of the defendant, granted a nonsuit. The rulings just referred to were assigned as error in a petition for certiorari which was filed by the plaintiff; and the case is here upon a bill of exceptions, in which a judgment overruling the certiorari is assigned as error.

As the effect of the ruling upon the testimony of Brown was to leave the plaintiff's case in a condition where, although the policy of insurance was in evidence, it did not constitute a binding contract with the association, we will deal only with the assignment of error on that ruling, for the reason that, if Brown had authority to fill the blanks in the policy and deliver the same, the evidence in behalf of the plaintiff was also to deliver them. There is no controversy as to this. It is said, however, that Manglebury is not a local agent. The minutes of the association show that he was appointed to assist the local agent. This would prima facie clothe him with the same authority as the agent had,—at least, so far as soliciting insurance and delivering the form of contract prescribed by the association. If Manglebury be treated as the agent of the association, duly appointed, he has, under the by-laws, undoubted authority to appoint another, being responsible for the acts of his appointee. Can such an appointment be made otherwise than in writing? is the question to be determined in the present case. It is said that because the law requires contracts of fire insurance to be in writing (Civ. Code, §§ 2022, 2089), and also that an agency must be created with the same formality as is required for the execution of the act for which the agency is created (Id. § 3002), Manglebury's parol appointment of Brown would not authorize him to fill, in behalf of the company, the blanks in the policy delivered to him. The contract of insurance was contained in a printed policy signed by the officers of the association, delivered first to Manglebury, and by him to Brown. All that was necessary to complete the contract was to find some one who was willing to accept the paper upon the terms therein contained, have the property valued in the manner prescribed in the by-laws of the association, and fill in certain blanks in the policy. Such a person was found in the present case. All that Brown was to do was to fill in his name, the description of the property, and the date, after the property had been valued by the director in the manner provided in the rules of the association. Brown did not execute the contract for the association. It was already executed when it was placed in his hands. Blanks in a written instrument may be filled in by parol authority. 1 Greenl. Ev. (16th Ed.) § 568a, note 8; Abb. Tr. Ev. (2d Ed.) p. 504, § 34, and cases cited. Does the rule just referred to apply in a case where the contract evidenced by the writing is valid only when it is in writing? In Ingram v. Little, 14 Ga. 173, it was held that "a deed, duly signed, sealed, and attested, but without any grantee named, and without the amount of the purchase money stated,—these being left blank,—is inoperative as a muniment of title, and cannot be completed by a third person in the absence of the grantor, without authority under seal." In the opinion, Judge Nisbet says that "we put our decision upon authority, conceding that the books in England and in this country are in 'distressing' conflict, and with some misgiving whether reason and common sense do not condemn it." In Drumright v. Philpot, 16 Ga. 428, Judge Lumpkin therein announced had been repudiated by Lord Mansfield, and that Chief Justice Marshall had expressed himself dissatisfied with the extent to which it had been carried. In Brown v. Colquitt, 73 Ga. 59, it was held that where several criminal recognizances were to be given, and the same surety agreed to sign all of them, and did so,—some of them being filled out at the time, and some of them having the name of the obligee and the amount blank, which were filled in by the sheriff under parol authority so to do from the surety,—the bond was not invalid, but was binding on the surety. It is to be noted in this case that the contract of the surety (being one to answer for the default of another) belonged to that class which the law requires to be in writing in order to be binding. The case of Ingram v. Little is expressly referred to in the opinion, and the doctrine therein announced virtually repudiated. In Weaver v. Carter, 101 Ga. 213, 28 S. E. 869, Mr. Chief Justice Simmons says, in effect, that the decision in Ingram v. Little was practically overruled in Brown v. Colquitt. The ruling now made is in perfect accord with the latter case, which seems to be in line with modern decisions. It may be safely said, in view of the foregoing, that the doctrine announced in Ingram v. Little is not at this time to be regarded as the law of this state.

It was erroneous to hold that the policy was invalid because Brown did not have written authority to fill the blanks and deliver the same. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

CARITHERS v. LEVY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

ACTION ON NOTE—DEFENSES—CONSIDERATION—FRAUD.

1. An answer to an action upon a promissory note which was given for the purchase of property, containing in substance the following allegations, set forth a good defense: The property for which the note was given was of considerably less value than the price agreed upon and included in the note. The defects were not patent. The defendant was induced to sign the note by false and fraudulent representations on the part of the plaintiff as to the value and character of the property. The defendant was thereby deceived and defrauded, and in due time made an offer to rescind.

2. Applying the above to the answer and the amendment thereto upon which the trial judge passed in the present case, it was, upon the demurrer filed by the plaintiff, error to strike the same.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Madison county; S. Reese, Judge.

Action by Mrs. D. Levy against J. S. Carithers. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

LEWIS, J. This was a suit brought by Mrs. D. Levy against J. S. Carithers upon a promissory note for $900 principal, besides interest and attorney's fees. The petition also sought the establishment of a special lien upon a tract of land which the maker had given for the purpose of securing the note. In answer to the suit the defendant stated, in substance: That the note was procured by fraud and fraudulent representations of the plaintiff. That $740 of the amount embraced in the note sued upon was given for the lease of a beef market and restaurant in the town of Elberton, Ga., and that, at the time of the contract touching the purchase of said property, plaintiff represented to the defendant that the business had proved paying and profitable, that plaintiff was making money out of the same, and that defendant could not only make money, but could pay off the note in less than 12 months' time from the profits of the business. Defendant, having no experience in such business, and reposing special confidence and trust in the plaintiff, relied upon the representations as to the character and extent of the business. He accordingly gave the note and deed to secure the same, and put an experienced man in charge of the business, but soon thereafter discovered that it was being conducted at a loss to defendant; and he was forced to quit the business, and to dispose of the same at the sum of $200, which was as much as the property was worth. The defendant filed an amendment to his answer, which was allowed by the court, alleging that he had discovered, soon after purchasing the market and restaurant, that plaintiff was running the business before the sale at a considerable loss; that plaintiff did not have the custom and trade as represented to defendant, and the character of the business was of such a nature that it could not have been discovered by defendant before he made the trade. As soon as defendant discovered that he had been deceived by the false representations of plaintiff, he offered to rescind the trade, and to place plaintiff in as good position as she was before the trade was made, and also to pay her $100 extra to rescind the trade, all of which plaintiff refused. To defendant's answer, plaintiff filed a demurrer, upon which the court granted an order that the demurrer to the plea as amended be sustained, and that said plea be stricken, and then directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the amount sued for. Upon this judgment error is assigned in the bill of exceptions. The defendant below also made a motion for a new trial on the general grounds, and likewise excepted to the judgment overruling this motion.

1, 2. We think the answer in this case sets up a valid defense to the suit. The defense relied upon is that of fraud, caused by chased. It appears from the answer that the property for which the note was given was of considerably less value than the price agreed upon and included in the note, that the defects were not patent, and that defendant was induced to sign the note by misrepresentations on the part of the plaintiff in reference to the character and value of the property. Acting upon the misrepresentations in reference to the property, the defects of which were not patent to the purchaser, the defendant was thereby deceived and defrauded; and in due time, as appears from the amendment to his answer which was allowed by the court, he made a fair offer to rescind, which was rejected. The answer made out a clear case of fraud perpetrated by the vendor of the property upon the purchaser, made with design to deceive, or at least which actually did deceive, the purchaser; and therefore, under Civ. Code, §§ 3533, 4026, the conduct of the vendor in this case constituted a legal fraud. The court therefore erred in eliminating this defense by striking the defendant's answer. For a full discussion of the law bearing upon this subject of misrepresentations, see the case of Newman v. H. B. Claflin Co., 107 Ga. 89, 32 S. E. 943, and opinion on page 90 et seq., 107 Ga., and page 943 et seq., 32 S. E. Though the facts alleged in this answer may not have been enough to authorize a rescission of the entire contract, we do not understand that the defendant is seeking that in his plea, but is seeking a reduction of the purchase money, which, under the decision in the case of Thompson v. Boyce, 84 Ga. 497, 498, 11 S. E. 353, he clearly has a right to do.

From the principles of law applicable to this case, the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the defendant's answer. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

COLLINS v. CARR.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

APPEAL—ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS—SUFFICIENCY.

1. The supreme court has no authority to "decide any question unless it is made by a special assignment of error in the bill of exceptions." Civ. Code, § 5584.

2. A bill of exceptions which, after setting forth a judgment rendered by the presiding judge in a case submitted to him for decision without a jury, merely adds, "To which decision of the court the defendant excepted, and now excepts, and assigns the same as error," does not contain a special assignment of error, and consequently does not present any question which this court can lawfully consider. See Deposit Co. v. Anderson, 28 S. E. 382, 102 Ga. 551, and cases cited; Henslee v. Henslee, 27 S. E. 676, 102 Ga. 554; Peavy v. Atkinson, 33 S. E. 956, 108 Ga. 167; Kimball v. Williams, 33 S. (Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1900.)

EXECUTION—CLAIM CASE—DISMISSAL OF LEVY—ISSUES—JUDGMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. When two fi. fas. in favor of the same plaintiff were levied upon realty, which was claimed by a third person under a deed from the defendant in execution of older date than the plaintiff's judgments, and before the trial of the claim case the plaintiff filed an equitable amendment in aid of his levies, to which there was no demurrer, and upon which the parties went to trial, and in the course thereof really contested over only two issues, viz. (1) whether the deed under which the claimant asserted title was one of bargain and sale, or had merely been given to secure a debt; and, (2) if the latter, what was the amount of that debt,—the plaintiff in the amendment referred to conceding the priority of this debt over his executions, and praying that the property be sold under his fi. fas., and that out of the proceeds thereof the amount due to the claimant should be first paid,—held: (a) that a refusal to dismiss one of the levies, even if based on a good ground, resulted in no injury to the plaintiff; (b) that, in such a case, giving a charge which restricted the verdict to be rendered by the jury to a mere general finding as to whether or not the property was subject was an error requiring a new trial; (c) that a verdict rendered on such a trial which simply found that the property levied upon was subject, without more, did not cover the issues submitted.

2. That a judgment does not follow, or is not authorized by, the verdict upon which it is entered, is not a good ground of a motion for a new trial.

3. On the trial of a claim case, wherein a corporation was the claimant, a memorandum, in the form of a written statement, in reference to a question involved in the case, made and delivered to the plaintiff in execution by a person not shown to have been an officer or an authorized agent of the corporation at the time the memorandum was made and delivered, was not admissible in evidence over the objection of the claimant.

4. When the value of given realty at a specified date was a material inquiry, there was no error in rejecting evidence tending to show what it brought at a public sale had several years thereafter.

ACTION BETWEEN PARTNERS—ACCOUNTING.

1. Where a partnership has been fully launched and is continuing, one of the partners cannot maintain against the other an action at law for damages resulting to the partnership by reason of the defendant's failure to perform a duty imposed upon him by a stipulation in the partnership agreement. This is true although the plaintiff may seek to recover only his pro rata share of the damage, and although at the time the suit is brought the partnership may owe no debts to third persons, and there may be no other debt due by either party to the other.

2. An accounting may be had in equity by one partner against the other, without a final winding up and dissolution, in a case where the partnership has, by the agreement, several years to run, and where the partnership articles contemplate a settlement at the end of each season.

Action by F. B. Freeman against G. H. Miller & Son. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Reversed.

Dean & Dean, for plaintiffs in error. Wright & Ewing and O. N. Featherston for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. Suit was brought in the city court by F. B. Freeman, as administrator with the will annexed of G. S. Freeman, against Miller & Son; the petitioner alleging that a contract had been entered into between his testator and the defendants, which was in substance as follows: Plaintiff's testator had leased to the defendants a certain described tract of land for a term of 15 years from January 1, 1893. Defendants were to furnish during 1893 as many peach trees as would be required to plant the land leased, and also to furnish trees to replant whenever necessary during the first three years of the lease. Plaintiff's testator was to cultivate, prune, pick, and pack the fruit as directed by the defendants; the same to be cultivated during the first three years in a designated way. After the expiration of the three years the orchard was to be cared for according to the terms prescribed in the contract. The defendants were to attend to the procuring of packages necessary to ship the fruit, and were to have full control of the shipping and selling of the fruit. After three years all expenses necessary to a proper carrying on of the business were to be borne equally by each party. The net profits derived from the sale of the fruit were to be contract were to be binding upon the heirs, executors, and assigns of the parties. The petition further alleged that since the death of the plaintiff's testator the defendants have, in their dealing with the petitioner, treated the contract as binding and obligatory; that in 1898 defendants failed to procure the packages necessary to ship the fruit in sufficient time to properly and seasonably ship and market the same, and thereby petitioner was damaged in amounts which are set forth in detail in the petition, aggregating the sum of $2,396.10, for which sum, with interest, petitioner prays judgment. By an amendment to the petition it was alleged that one inducement which moved the plaintiff's testator to enter into the contract was that the defendants were experienced fruit shippers, and plaintiff, under the contract, relied upon them to procure the necessary packages to ship and market the fruit; that there is nothing due and unaccounted for between the plaintiff and defendants on the contract, except the matter set forth in the petition; that the parties to the contract interpreted the same as providing for a division of the profits at the end of each season, and have so acted; that there are no debts due by the parties to the contract to others in connection with the business with which the contract deals, and there is no debt due by either one of the parties to the other, except the claim set forth in the petition. To this petition the defendants demurred. The court overruled the demurrer, and the defendants excepted.

There were but two questions argued by counsel for plaintiff in error: First, can one partner maintain an action against his co-partner in a court having no equity jurisdiction? And, second, the title to the property alleged to have been damaged being in the partnership, ought not the action to have been brought in the name of the partnership? No question was raised here as to whether the contract between the parties constituted them partners. See, however, in this connection, the case of Gray v. Blasingame (Ga.) 35 S. E. 653.

Treating the contract as one of partnership, we think that the present action was not maintainable at law, and that the judge erred in overruling the demurrer to the petition. The case fell within the recognized rule that one partner cannot, before a final winding up of a partnership, maintain against his co-partner an action at law based upon partnership transactions. This rule has but few exceptions; most of the so-called exceptions being apparent only, and not real. After the partnership is practically at an end, whether it be a single venture or otherwise, the rule cannot apply, for the parties are no longer partners. So an action may be maintained for the breach of an agreement to enter into a partnership, or of the suit is a matter not connected with the partnership affairs, the rule, of course, cannot apply. The present suit is, however, not like those just mentioned. It falls within the general rule against suits between partners, and cannot be maintained unless it is within the exception to that rule which is thus stated by Judge Story: "Wherever there is an express stipulation in the partnership articles, which is violated by any partner, an action at law (either assumpsit or covenant, as the case may require) will ordinarily lie to recover damages for the breach thereof." Story, Partn. (7th Ed.) § 218. While this statement of the exception is very broad, we think that, in seeking to determine whether this case is within it, it should be construed with reference to other authorities, and to the cases upon which it is based. A careful consideration of the statement, and of the authorities cited to sustain it, will show that the cases falling within this exception are of three classes: (1) those in which the partnership is inchoate and has never been launched; (2) those in which the partnership is at an end; and (3) those in which the stipulation which is violated, and for the breach of which the action is brought, is one between the partners individually, and "the damages from which belong exclusively to the other partner, and can be assessed without an accounting." See 2 Bates, Partn. § 889. The statement of the exception in Pars. Partn. (4th Ed.) p. 258, § 191, that, "whenever there has been any breach of an express stipulation between persons who are partners, an action for damages will be sustainable, unless the breach or the stipulation itself, or both, are such that they involve the whole partnership business and accounts, and the damages can be determined only by first settling those accounts," is more carefully worded; and the instance given as an illustration is where "one partner agrees to pay the other a certain salary or commission, or other compensation for his services, over and above his share of the profits, and independently of them." This is not in any sense inconsistent with the doctrine laid down in the case of Hill v. Palmer, 56 Wis. 130, 14 N. W. 23, in which it was said: "The test seems to be that if the damages resulting from a breach of a covenant or stipulation in the partnership agreement by one partner belong exclusively to the other partner, and can be assessed without taking an account of the partnership business, covenant or assumpsit may be maintained by the injured partner against the other for such damages."

Among the cases cited to sustain the judge in overruling the demurrer in the present case are several in which the stipulation violated was between the partners individually, and not for the benefit of the partnership. Such cases are not in conflict with what is with most of them the only fault is that, in ruling properly the particular cases, broad statements, made in reference, not to the cases decided, but to partnership cases generally, are not always guarded and restricted with sufficient care. So far as we can find, every case worthy of note in which this point is expressly decided seems to be an authority against the ruling of the court below in the present case. In section 196, Colly. Partn. (6th Ed.), it is said that the right of one partner to maintain an action at law against his co-partner for the breach of a stipulation in the partnership agreement, during the existence of the partnership, does not extend to cases "where the damages to be recovered are of necessity payable out of, or when recovered payable into, the partnership fund." Mr. Wood, in his notes to the section of Collyer just cited, states the test as follows: "An action for damages for the breach of an express agreement entered into by one partner with another will lie if the damages, when recovered, will belong to the plaintiff alone." In Gow, Partn. (3d Ed.) p. 70 et seq., the first statement of the right to sue for the breach of a partnership agreement is as broad as that of Judge Story, which it is cited to sustain. Every single instance given to illustrate it is, however, in perfect accord with those authorities which limit the right to sue at law during the continuance of the partnership to those cases in which the stipulation is between the partners personally, and not for the benefit of the partnership, or between it and one or more of its members. After mentioning cases where the breach is of an agreement to advance money to launch the partnership, and of an agreement not for the benefit of the partnership, but between the partners personally, and of an agreement to account, it is said: "Where a penalty is reserved in case of breach of a partnership agreement, one partner can recover on the covenant against his co-partner; and if it is stipulated in the articles of partnership that one of several partners shall sue for the penalty agreed on, and divide the amount between his co-partners who have not committed a breach of the articles, such agreement will be binding, although the partner appointed to sue, if he incurred the penalty, could not sue himself. The same rule applies to every other species of lawful covenant by which partners reciprocally and severally bind themselves inter se to the performance of any particular act or thing." In 2 Lindl. Partn. (Rapalje's Ed.) p. 456, it is pointedly stated that, before the English judicature acts of 1873 and 1875, "no action at law could be brought by one partner against another for the recovery of money or property payable to the firm, as distinguished from the partner suing. * * * An agreement by each partner with his co-partners might, indeed, be framed so as to enable one to be sued by the others, if care was taken and to exclude the partner suing from all obligation to contribute to his own payment; but an agreement so as to accomplish both these objects was not generally convenient." Again, in the same work (page 562), it is said: "An action for damages for the breach of an express agreement entered into by one partner with another would lie if the damages, when recovered, would have belonged to the plaintiff alone." With this the other authorities are in accord. "An action at law will lie for a premature dissolution in violation of the partnership agreement; but, to sustain such an action, the claim must be, not for the recovery of any share of profits or agreed compensation due him from the firm, but for the wrong done him personally, as distinguished from a breach of duty owing to the firm. This rule applies to the violation of all other stipulations in the articles, the damages from which belong exclusively to the other partner, and can be assessed without an accounting." 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) p. 1264. "Partners can, by agreement, separate any part of the business from the general rule of partnership, and make a separate and individual obligation of it, as between each other; and in such case the liability can be enforced at law, independent of the state of the partnership accounts. But the real test is not solely whether the action can be tried without going into the partnership accounts, but whether the defendant has bound himself personally to the plaintiff." 2 Bates, Partn. § 878. See, also, Ryder v. Wilcox, 103 Mass. 24, 29; Wills v. Simmonds, 8 Hun, 189; Stone v. Wendover, 2 Mo. App. 247; 15 Enc. Pl. & Prac. p. 1046.

Where, therefore, the stipulation is an agreement by one partner individually to do something for the benefit of the other individually, and imposes an obligation binding the one personally to the other, its breach gives a right of action at law, if the damages can be assessed without an investigation of the partnership accounts. But where the stipulation is for the benefit of the partnership, and consequently of both partners, neither partner alone has a right, the partnership relation existing, to sue in his own name, and at law, for the damages arising from its breach. There was in the present case no covenant to furnish crates, but merely an agreed distribution of partnership duties, by which the duty of securing crates was put upon the defendants, while the cost of the crates was to be defrayed by the partnership. The defendants did not agree to contribute the crates, but merely to see that crates were procured. The crates were to be used, not by the plaintiff, but by the partnership; and the right to the profits was in the partnership, and not solely in the plaintiff. The damage arising from the breach was to the partnership, and the plaintiff was not damaged at all, except by the reduction of the amount he should receive of the partnership profits. The defendants were to contribute more to the payment of such losses. While the damage arising from the breach of the defendant's agreement was to the partnership, one cannot sue himself, or be in the same action party plaintiff and defendant, and therefore the partnership could not maintain a suit against the defendants. Further, the compensation owed to the partnership by the defendants for their breach of duty was a partnership asset, and one partner could not collect and keep it. 2 Bates, Partn. § 849. These rules—that a partnership cannot sue one of its members, and that one partner cannot recover from his co-partner an amount due the partnership—are universally recognized, and the plaintiff sought to evade them by suing for only his pro rata share of the amount due the partnership. This cannot be done. See Id. § 1018. "One partner cannot recover his share of a debt due to the partnership in an action at law prosecuted in his own name alone against the debtor." Vinal v. Land Co., 110 U. S. 215, 4 Sup. Ct. 4, 28 L. Ed. 124. And a suit against one of the partners does not in this particular differ from a suit against a stranger. While the partnership continues, whatever sum is due from the defendants on account of their breach of the partnership agreement is due to the partnership, and not to the plaintiff alone, and must be considered as partnership assets. "So long as the community relation subsists, neither party has a remedy at law in respect to the joint assets." Hunt v. Morris, 44 Miss. 314. And the plaintiff, therefore, ought not to be permitted to maintain the present action. Until after a dissolution or termination of the partnership agreement, he cannot maintain such an action at law; and the judge should have sustained the demurrer to the plaintiff's petition, as it showed that the partnership relation still continued. While it appeared that, further than the claim made in the present suit, neither partner owed anything to the other, and that the partnership owed no debts to third persons, it did not appear that debts were not due to the partnership, or that there were no funds on hand, or that the profits already collected had been equally divided. And, even had all these things appeared, there may have been partnership transactions the next day, as a result of which the partnership may have become indebted to third parties, and other such transactions may occur at any time. One partner should not be compelled to make payment to the other, to settle a partnership matter, when the partnership assets may be used for that purpose. The liability of one partner to the other is for such sum only as will settle all cross claims, and this is usually best ascertained by an accounting. See Abb. Tr. Ev. (2d Ed.) p. 281. Even though the defendants in the present case are liable to account for their failure to properly provide crates, and for the resulting damages, their share of the undi-be compelled to submit to a judgment, when they can then recover of the partnership more than enough to pay the judgment. And certainly if the business is continuing, and the partnership likely to become indebted to third persons, it would not be proper to allow such a suit as the present one. The reason given in Story, Eq. Jur. § 664, why a somewhat different action between partners cannot be maintained, will, with little change, apply to the present case: It is impossible, during the continuance of the partnership, without taking a general account, to say that any one partner is, on the whole, a debtor of the firm to such an amount. And, if he is, how, in point of technical propriety, can a remedy be instituted against him by the other partner alone, as contradistinguished from the partnership? See 2 Bates, Partn. § 849, where it is said: "Even if there are no debts, yet collections must be received unequally by the partners. The mutual balances are therefore constantly fluctuating quantities, and a judgment on any one item would settle nothing, and, if allowed, would produce a multiplicity of suits."

We think, for these reasons, that the present case is one in which an action at law cannot be maintained by the plaintiff during the continuance of the partnership relation. The amount of the assets and profits can be best determined by an equitable accounting, in which all differences may be adjusted. It is urged as an objection to forcing the plaintiff to seek an accounting that it would be a hardship to force a dissolution of a partnership which is designed to continue for several years longer. We think that this objection is untenable, for two reasons: In the first place, while equity jurisdiction is extended to cases where the law does not afford a full or adequate remedy, a court of law cannot take cognizance of cases not otherwise within its jurisdiction solely because equitable relief can be obtained only on conditions which seem unreasonable or oppressive. In the second place, the rule laid down by the older text writers, and in a few of the older cases, that an accounting cannot be had in a court of equity unless there be a prayer for a dissolution, is now by no means recognized as applying to all cases. There are now many well-recognized exceptions. "It was formerly considered that no account between partners could be taken in equity, save with a view to dissolution; and a bill praying an account, but not a dissolution, has been held bad on demurrer. But this rule has been gradually relaxed; for it has been felt that more injustice frequently arose from the refusal of the court to do less than complete justice, than could have arisen from interfering to no greater extent than was desired by the suitor aggrieved." 2 Lindl. Partn. (Rapalje's Ed.) p. 494. "Whether one partner is entitled to the business, is, so far as text-books are to be believed, very doubtful; but a careful examination of the voluminous authorities extant upon the subject would seem to leave no doubt whatever that the action is a proper one, and can be maintained, not only during the existence of a partnership, but for the very purpose of settling questions in order to avoid a dissolution. * * * And not only is any such rule [that an accounting cannot be had without a prayer for a dissolution] manifestly oppressive in principle, since a partner is surely entitled to the benefit of the articles during the existence of the partnership, and not upon dissolution alone, but it is manifestly absurd, since it implies that the court will dismiss a bill because it lacks a prayer which the court has no power whatever to enforce by its decree, should the parties see fit to disregard it after judgment. * * * There is little doubt, or none, that the rule should be taken from our text-books, or at least be applied to such cases only as are brought for a receiver and for interim management." Tracy Gould, in an article in the Albany Law Journal for February 28, 1880 (volume 21, p. 168). Among the "more common cases where a partial accounting, or an accounting without dissolution, may be had," are those in which there is an agreement for settlements periodically. 2 Bates, Partn. § 911. See, also, Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 668, 671. The partnership now under consideration was such that there should be an annual loss or an annual profit, and that there should be annually a considerable period of time when but little partnership business could be done. The contract did not in terms provide for an annual accounting and settlement between the parties, but this was evidently their intention; and the allegations of the petition are clear and distinct that the partnership articles were so interpreted by the partners, and that in the past they have acted on this interpretation. The actual construction thus put upon the articles by the partners should be adopted as the proper interpretation of them. Story, Partn. (7th Ed.) § 191. The present seems, therefore, to be just such a case as should be excepted from the rule that an accounting cannot be had without a dissolution. An accounting would determine the state of the partnership accounts at the time when an accounting was contemplated by the agreement, and it would make no difference that accounts might be changing between the time of filing the petition and the time the decree is made. According to their agreement, the partners were entitled to an accounting at a certain time, and transactions occurring subsequently to that time could be accounted for on the next annual settlement. Then, too, the fact that at the end of the season there is but little partnership business to be done renders this a case in which

n accounting without dissolution would be ree from practically all the objections urged ı favor of the old rule against it,—a rule ;hich, "though true in some cases, and to a ertain extent, has been supposed to be more enerally applicable than it is upon author- :y, or ought to be upon principle," as was ıid by Lord Cottenham in Wallworth v. Holt, 4 Mylne & C. 619. Judgment reversed. ll the justices concurring.

APPEAL—PLAINTIFFS IN ERROR—GARNISHMENT—OFFICER OF CORPORATION.

1. A person interested in litigation as a party to a case in a trial court may, on motion, be made a party plaintiff in error in this court, in connection with the person suing out the bill of exceptions, they being on the same side in the lower court; and the writ of error will not be dismissed on motion of the defendant in error because such person has not been served with the bill of exceptions. The secretary and treasurer of a company, who as such holds funds belonging to it, is not subject to a process of garnishment requiring him to answer what property or effects he has in his hands belonging to the company of which he is an officer. His possession of such property as an officer is possession by the company. If such officer has been garnished as an individual, and he holds anything in his hands as an individual belonging to the company, such officer, as an individual, is subject to garnishment, and the property which he holds as an individual may be subjected to a debt against the company.

3. When the person who holds the office of secretary and treasurer of an incorporated company has been garnished, both as an officer of the company and as an individual, to answer what he is indebted to the company, or what effects belonging to it he has in his hands, and answers that as an individual he owes the defendant nothing, and has none of its effects in his hands, but that as an officer of said company he has in his hands a given sum of money belonging to his company, it is error to enter a judgment against the garnishee for the amount admitted to be in his hands as an officer of such company.

An instrument in the form of a contract between two parties, signed by one of them and by an agent of the other, with a clause reciting that "this contract shall not be considered as binding upon the first party until approved in writing by" the second party, is only a proposal to contract, submitted by the party of the first part to the party of the second part.

2. When, before approval of the proposed contract by the latter, a third person, for a valid consideration paid by the party of the first part, enters in writing upon such proposal a stipulation that he will "guaranty all sums owing or which may hereafter be owing [by the party of the first part] during the term of this contract," etc., such indorsement amounts only to a proposal of guaranty, and does not take effect until the original paper becomes a binding contract between the parties of the first and antor was entitled to notice of its acceptance by the party of the second part before he was bound by the terms which it set forth. Sanders v. Etcherson, 36 Ga. 409; Claflin v. Briant, 58 Ga. 414; Brandt, Sur. §§ 189–193; Clark, Cont. p. 29.

3. The record not disclosing that any proper notice of acceptance by the party of the second part was given to the guarantor, there was no error in any of the rulings made by the trial judge, nor in the direction of a verdict in favor of the guarantor.

HILL v. VAN DUZER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—WIDOW'S ALLOWANCE.

1. The points sought to be made as to alleged error in admitting testimony were not properly presented.

2. Mere agency to collect a particular claim does not authorize the agent to agree that the proceeds thereof shall be applied to a debt due by his principal.

3. Neither a widow nor her agent, whatever his authority, can lawfully apply the proceeds of a year's support set apart for the benefit of herself and minor children to the payment of a pre-existing debt due by her individually, in the consideration of which the minors had no interest.

4. Applying the principles laid down in the two preceding notes to the facts of the present case, the verdict complained of was without evidence to support it, and ought to have been set aside.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 8, 1900.)

APPEAL BOND—SUFFICIENCY.

1. The meaning of the phrase, "give bond and security to the ordinary for such further costs as may accrue by reason of such appeal," appearing in Civ. Code, § 4466, is that the bond required shall be deposited by the appellant with the ordinary. It does not mean that the bond shall be made payable to that official, for ground that the appeal bond was made payable, not to the ordinary, but to the appellee. Such bond was a proper and lawful one, and needed no amendment.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1900.)

UNDISCLOSED PRINCIPAL—AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

1. It is the right of one who deals with an agent who fails to disclose his principal to proceed directly against the principal, when discovered. Civ. Code, § 3024. This right is not dependent on the diligence of the plaintiff in discovering the fact of the concealed agency.

2. An agent to conduct a given business for his principal necessarily has authority to do everything which is essential to the performance of his duties as agent. (a) If the agency be to carry on a mercantile business, and to do this it is necessary to rent a house, the principal will be bound for the rent thereof, whether he expressly authorized the agent to make the contract of rent or not.

3. Two of the charges complained of in the present case being in conflict with the law as above stated, and the same having relation to vital issues in the case, there should be a new trial; the record not disclosing that the verdict complained of was demanded by the evidence.

LANDLORD—DISTRAINT—COUNTER AFFIDAVIT.

1. Under a contract of rent whereby the tenant agreed to pay to the landlord specified fractional portions of the crops made upon the rented premises, the latter, although the former further agreed to cultivate the land "in a good, husbandlike manner," and failed to do so, was entitled to distrain for only the value of such fractional portions of the crops actually made, and not for such portions of crops which might have been made if the tenant had complied with his contract as to the manner of cultivation.

2. The counter affidavit filed in the present case was sufficient in law, and there was no error in overruling the demurrer to the same. It does not appear that any error was committed in submitting to the jury the issues made by the pleadings, and the evidence warranted the verdict.

NEW TRIAL—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE—APPEAL—DIRECTING VERDICT.

1. When the time for filing in vacation a brief of evidence to accompany a motion for a new trial is expressly limited by an order of the court, and the brief is not filed within that time, it is not erroneous to dismiss the motion; nor will this court reverse the action of the trial judge in refusing to accept as a sufficient excuse for not duly filing a brief of evidence the failure of the circuit stenographer, from illness or any other cause, to write out the evidence. Boatwright v. State, 16 S. E. 101, 91 Ga. 13; Eason v. City of Americus, 32 S. E. 5, 106 Ga. 179.

2. While a trial judge may, within the restrictions prescribed by section 5331 of the Civil Code, direct a verdict, this court will in no case overrule, as erroneous, a refusal to do so.

3. When a party against whom a verdict has been rendered, without moving for a new trial, sues out a direct bill of exceptions, he must, in order to obtain a reversal of the judgment, show not only that error was committed, but also that the adverse verdict was a necessary result thereof. (a) There was at the trial of the present case no error, if any at all, of the nature above indicated.

MARRIED WOMAN—VALIDITY OF CONTRACT—DEBT OF HUSBAND.

1. Nelms v. Keller, 30 S. E. 572, 103 Ga. 745, and cases cited.

Proceedings by S. E. Bell to probate the will of Elizabeth A. Bell. Mary D. Keys fil-

Mann & Terry, for plaintiff in error. R. J. & J. McCamy, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. This was a proceeding by S. E. Bell to probate in solemn form the will of Elizabeth A. Bell. To this application Mrs. Mary D. Keys filed her caveat, and objected to the admission of the will to record, alleging that the instrument was not the will of Elizabeth A. Bell, because she did not execute the same freely and voluntarily, but was moved thereto by the undue influence exerted over her by her husband, S. E. Bell. Another ground of caveat was that the testatrix was misled by the legatees mentioned in the will, and especially by S. E. Bell, who, with Alice and Florence Bell, led the said Elizabeth Bell to believe that caveatrix was responsible for a certain lawsuit brought against Thomas Caldwell, father of testatrix, when in truth and in fact caveatrix had nothing to do with the bringing of such suit, and, further, that testatrix was for many years an invalid and in very feeble health, and was thereby made more susceptible to the undue influence of S. E., Alice, and Florence Bell. After the introduction of the evidence on the issue formed on this caveat, the court directed a verdict for the propounder, which was accordingly rendered, whereupon caveatrix moved for a new trial upon the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to law and evidence, and upon the further ground that the court erred in directing a verdict for the propounder. To the judgment of the court overruling her motion for a new trial, the caveatrix excepts.

The record discloses that the movant made no attempt whatever to prepare a brief of this evidence. On the contrary, it appears that what purported to be a brief of the evidence was nothing but the stenographic report of the testimony taken down by the stenographer on the trial of the case, and consisted of questions and answers in the exact language and order in which they were asked and answered, and covers a space in the record perhaps 10 times larger than was necessary. The judge below approved this evidence when it was presented to him, but when he passed upon the application for a new trial he granted the following order: "The brief of evidence as approved by me on December 2, 1899, was presented to me and approved without any examination. Upon taking up the motion to pass upon it, I find that no effort has been made whatever to comply with the rule of court as to briefing the evidence; and, there being no compliance with the rule, I refuse the motion for new trial, and deny the same, there being no motion to dismiss." We think the judge was clearly right in granting this order. Indeed, the record, in its present shape, even without such an action on the part of the judge below, could not be considered by this court, utter failure to prepare any brief of evidence at all, the grounds of error could not be considered. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

ATLANTA NAT. BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N v. JONES et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 9, 1900.)

APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—EXCEPTIONS PENDENTE LITE—DISMISSAL.

1. Where, during the pendency of an equitable petition to marshal the assets of the estate of a decedent, the court passed an order which in effect adjudicated that a particular claim against the estate held by one of the defendants, a corporation, and by it alleged to be for a stated amount and also to be secured by a deed to realty, was for a less amount, and unsecured, but no final judgment in the case was entered, such order was not the proper subject-matter of a direct bill of exceptions to this court, but of exceptions pendente lite.

2. The bill of exceptions now under consideration having been prematurely sued out, the writ of error must be dismissed; but inasmuch as the record discloses that the plaintiff in error did, at the proper time, tender exceptions pendente lite, and that the same, because of the illness of the presiding judge, were not certified in due time, leave is granted to enter as exceptions pendente lite the official copy of the present bill of exceptions, which the clerk of the trial court retained in his office. See Walsh v. Colquitt, 62 Ga. 384, 389; Bank v. Harrison, 68 Ga. 463; Stanford v. Treadwell, Id. 827; Bass v. Bass, 73 Ga. 135; McGowan v. Lufburrow, 7 S. E. 314, 81 Ga. 358; Buford v. Kennedy, 11 S. GLEASON v. TRAYNHAM et al.

APPEAL—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—WIDOW'S ALLOWANCE—PRIORITY—MECHANIC'S LIEN.

1. Where a case was submitted to the presiding judge without the intervention of a jury, and a judgment in favor of the plaintiff was rendered, an assignment of error in the bill of exceptions upon this judgment in the following language was sufficiently specific: "To which judgment the defendant excepts, assigns the same as error, and says the court erred in finding any sum for the plaintiffs, and that under the law and facts his judgment should have been in favor of the defendant."

2. If a cause is submitted to the presiding judge to decide both as to the law and the facts, a writ of error will lie to his decision, though no right to except was expressly reserved. Morrison v. Ponder, 45 Ga. 167.

3. The claim of the widow and children for a year's support, with the exception made in section 3472 of the Civil Code, will, as to realty, the property owned by him during the term of his ownership. Civ. Code, §§ 3424, 3465; Cole v. Elfe, 23 Ga. 235; Barron v. Burney, 38 Ga. 264; Rust v. Billingslea, 44 Ga. 306; Murphy v. Vaughan, 55 Ga. 361.

4. It follows from the foregoing that the claim of the widow and children for a year's support is superior to a material man's lien upon the property of the decedent, which attached to the property as the result of a contract made by him in his lifetime.

5. The ruling now made does not in any way conflict with the decision in Boynton v. Westbrook, 74 Ga. 68. It was simply ruled in that case that the lien of a contractor for material and work would take precedence of a claim of the widow on account of a debt due her for trust funds in the hands of her deceased husband. The question of the dignity of a widow's claim for a year's support was not involved in that case.

6. The judgment entered in the present case, not being in accord with the principles above announced, must be reversed.

EVIDENCE ON FORMER TRIAL—ABSENT WITNESS—ESTOPPEL—IMPEACHMENT—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

1. The trial judge did not err in admitting the evidence of an absent witness, taken on a former trial, and incorporated in a brief of the evidence had in such trial, which had been agreed to by counsel and approved by the court; it having been shown that the witness was, and had been for some time, in the territory of Oklahoma, and the fact of his residence in this state not having been satisfactorily established. Railway Co. v. Gravitt, 20 S. E. 550, 93 Ga. 369, 26 L. R. A. 553; Adair v. Adair, 39 Ga. 75.

2. A party to a suit, who testified in her own behalf on the trial, and who on a second trial of the same case is offered as a witness, becomes in such second trial an original witness, and is not estopped from testifying contrary to her evidence as reported on the former trial. The fact that her evidence originally taken was agreed to by counsel for each of the parties, and approved by the court, does not alter the rule. The material part of the brief of the evidence so filed and approved may be introduced by way of impeachment. It is not, however, admissible for this purpose unless the foundation for the evidence is first laid by asking the witness if she had not sworn to certain facts on the former trial. Taylor v. Morgan, 61 Ga. 46. As a general rule, a witness is not bound by recitals contained in a brief of evidence unless it be shown that such brief had been read over and approved by the witness. Reid v. State, 8 S. E. 431, 81 Ga. 760.

3. What part of the evidence of a witness should be given most weight is for the jury to determine, and it is error for the trial judge

While, at common law and by statute in state, "mere possession of a chattel * will give a right of action for any in- rence therewith," such possession must the plaintiff's own right, and not as agent nother. (a) The above rule is not contra- d by section 3038 of the Civil Code. The "agent," as used therein, is to be con- d as meaning an agent who has a proper- ther general or special, in the personalty in ossession.

ridge Cutts and Hal Lawson, for plain- error. Charlton, Mackall & Anderson, Nicholson, and W. A. Hawkins, for de- nt in error.

BB, J. T. I. Mitchell, describing him- "agent," brought an action against the a & Alabama Railway Company to re- possession of a certain described lot of alleged to be in the possession of the ant. The petition averred that the ff was the owner of the property sued d that he had demanded the same of fendant, who had refused to deliver it or pay him the profits thereof. At the e plaintiff testified that he was in pos- of the property described in the peti- agent for his wife, and that he had er interest therein; that he had the loaded on one of the cars of the de- t, intending to sell it to one Gibbs if he sh for it as agreed; that Gibbs did not the lumber, and the defendant, before r to it, and without authority of plain- tiff, shipped the lumber to Gibbs; that plaintiff made a demand on the defendant for the lumber, but it refused to deliver the same to him. At the conclusion of the evidence the court granted a nonsuit on the ground that the evidence showed the title to the property sued for was in the plaintiff's wife, and that he had no such possession as entitled him to recover. The plaintiff then offered an amendment inserting in the petition the name of his wife as usee. The court refused to allow the amendment, and the plaintiff sued out a bill of exceptions, complaining of this refusal and of the granting of a nonsuit.

1. The exception to the granting of a nonsuit brings up for determination the question whether a person in possession of a chattel as agent for another, and having no special property or interest therein, can maintain against a person wrongfully converting the goods an action of trover. A proper solution of this question requires a somewhat extended examination into the nature of some of the actions which were at common law employed in cases of injury to or interference with the personal goods of another. Our action of trover is purely statutory. In McBain v. Smith, 13 Ga. 315, Judge Warner said that it was a substitute for the old common-law action of detinue, while in McElhannon v. Commission Co., 95 Ga. 670, 22 S. E. 686, Mr. Justice Atkinson said that it combined some of the characteristics of both of the common-law actions of trover and detinue. We think it perhaps more accurate to say that our action of trover may be employed in any case in which replevin, detinue, or trover could be used at common law. We shall therefore inquire into the nature of these three forms of action, with a view to ascertaining what persons were authorized to maintain them.

Replevin was employed to recover goods unjustly taken and wrongfully detained. It was generally used in cases of distress, when the person whose goods were seized gave security and replevied the property, in which event he was bound to bring replevin against the distrainor. 3 Black, Comm. p. 146 et seq. It seems, however, that it could be brought in any case where the owner had goods wrongfully taken from him by another. 1 Chit. Pl. (16th Am. Ed.) *181; Steph. Pl. (Heard's Ed.) *20. And in many of the states the action of replevin is by statute employed to recover personalty in any case in which possession is wrongfully withheld from the person entitled thereto. In this form of action at common law the goods themselves could be recovered, with damages for their wrongful detention. The action of detinue was used to recover goods wrongfully detained, though lawfully taken. In order to maintain this form of action, it must have appeared (1) that the defendant came lawfully into possession; (2) "that the plaintiff have a property"; (3) that the goods were of some value; and (4) that they were capable of identification. In this action the plaintiff recovered the goods themselves, if tention. 3 Bl. Comm. p. 151. The common-law action of trover and conversion lay to recover damages equal to the value of the goods wrongfully withheld, but not the goods themselves. The gist of this action was the unlawful conversion. Id. p. 152. Under our action of trover the plaintiff may elect whether he will take a verdict for the property or its value, or for damages alone, or for the property alone and its hire, if any. Civ. Code, § 5335. It is well settled that, to support any one of the three common-law actions, the plaintiff must have had either a general or special property in the goods seized. "To support replevin, the plaintiff must, at the time of the caption, have had either the general property in the goods taken, or a special property therein." 1 Chit. Pl. (16th Am. Ed.) p. 239, *183. "It is a general rule that the plaintiff must have the property of the goods in him at the time of the taking." Co. Litt. 145b. See, also, Manufacturing Co. v. Wiggin, 14 N. H. 441, 40 Am. Dec. 198; Beckwith v. Philleo, 15 Wis. 223; Pattison v. Adams, 7 Hill, 126, 42 Am. Dec. 59; Walpole v. Smith, 4 Blackf. 304. To maintain the action of detinue, it must appear "that the plaintiff have a property." 3 Bl. Comm. p. 152. "It seems to be a general rule that the plaintiff must have a general or special property in the goods at the time the action was commenced, in order to maintain detinue." 1 Chit. Pl. (16th Am. Ed.) *137. See, also, 6 Enc. Pl. & Prac. 645 et seq. In reference to the common-law action of trover, Mr. Chitty says that in order to support the action the plaintiff must at the time of the conversion "have had a complete property, either general or special, in the chattel, and also the actual possession, or the right to the immediate possession, of it." 1 Chit. Pl. (16th Am. Ed.) *167. And on the next page he says, "Without an absolute or special property, this action cannot be maintained." See, also, 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) 744. In this state the general rule is that in order to maintain trover the plaintiff must show title in himself. Gilmore v. Watson, 23 Ga. 63; Jaques v. Stewart, 81 Ga. 81, 6 S. E. 815; Palmour v. Fertilizer Co., 97 Ga. 244, 22 S. E. 931. While a property in the goods, either general or special, must appear, to authorize any one of the three forms of action, "in an action of replevin against a wrongdoer prior possession is alone sufficient to enable the plaintiff to recover." Shinn, Repl. § 200. See, also, 18 Enc. Pl. & Prac. 505; Cobbey, Repl. § 423. The same is true of trover. In discussing what is meant by having a special property in a chattel, Mr. Chitty says, "It is a general rule that the bare possession of goods, without any strict legal title, confers a right of action against a mere wrongdoer, having no right, and not clothed with any authority from the real owner." 1 Chit. Pl. (16th Am. possessor in the thing may be, is sufficient to enable trover to be maintained, as against all the world except the rightful owner, for a conversion committed in respect to it." 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 748. See, also, Broom, Comm. (9th Ed., by Arch. & C.) p. 912; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. p. 632. This principle is well settled, and has been incorporated in our Code in the following language: "Mere possession of a chattel, if without title, or wrongfully, will give a right of action for any interference therewith, except as against the true owner or the person wrongfully deprived of possession." Civ. Code, § 3886. This section, as stated, is but a codification of the common law, and the principle intended to be announced therein is the same as that above quoted from Chitty and the Encyclopædia. As this case turns, to a large extent, on the construction of this section, it is necessary to ascertain the meaning of the words "mere possession," as used therein. As a general rule, as is laid down in the decisions from this court cited above, a plaintiff, in order to recover in trover, must show title in himself. Possession is presumptive evidence of title, and becomes conclusive evidence against a mere wrongdoer; he not being allowed to set up the jus tertii. Dicey, Parties, marg. p. 356, citing Jeffries v. Railway Co., 25 Law J. Q. B. 109, 110, in which the judgment was rendered by Lord Campbell, who, in his opinion, uses this language: "The law is that, if a person is peaceably and quietly in possession of a chattel as his own property, a person who takes it from him, having no good title, is a wrongdoer; and such person cannot defend himself by showing that the chattel is not the property of the plaintiff, but the property of a third person."

Whatever language of Lord Campbell there is in the opinion in that case which seems to support the proposition that an agent who is in possession can maintain an action in his own name must be qualified by the language above quoted, in which the learned chief justice states that the case with which he is dealing is one where the plaintiff was in possession of the chattel "as his own property." An examination of the authorities has satisfied us that the possession referred to is a possession in the possessor's own right, or under a claim of property, either general or special. Even in the case of a thief, who, according to many authorities, can maintain trover, or a finder or a bailee, the possession which the plaintiff claims is for himself and in his own right. It cannot be a possession simply as the agent or servant of another, who has no interest in the property itself. The action of replevin "cannot be maintained by one whose right of possession is for another,—as, for example, an agent or servant. The plaintiff must be entitled to possession in his own right." Shinn, Repl. § 32. "A mere bailor." 2 Greenl. Ev. (15th Ed.) § 561. "A mere servant who has possession at the will of the owner has not such a right of possession as will sustain the action." Cobbey, Repl. p. 224, § 423. Mr. Chitty states that the rule that a mere servant cannot maintain trover is an exception to the general rule that bare possession will authorize it. 1 Chit. Pl. (16th Am. Ed.) *170. "The possession by a mere servant of his master's goods is ordinarily deemed to be so far the possession of the master as to give the servant no right of action against one who disturbs that possession." Mechem, Ag. § 765. The case of Lockhart v. Railroad Co., 73 Ga. 472, seems to be almost decisive of this question. In that case the plaintiff brought suit against the defendant for "damages to personal property," the subject-matter of the suit being an oil painting of a landscape. On the trial it appeared from the testimony for the plaintiff that the picture belonged to her brother, who had given it to her to keep until he called for it, and, if he never did so, it was to be her property. It was held that as the plaintiff had no property, either general or special, in the picture, but was a mere borrower, she could not maintain the action. The plaintiff was in possession of the picture, but her possession was in the right of another, and no presumption of ownership arises from such a possession. The principle that, when possession is shown, a mere wrongdoer could not set up the jus tertii, as the presumption arising from such possession would be conclusive against him, was recognized in the decision, but it was ruled that that principle has no application to a case in which the plaintiff shows that he is not entitled to possession in his own right. In the case of Philips v. Robinson, 4 Bing. 106, the declaration alleged that the plaintiff delivered to the defendant certain deeds belonging to the plaintiff. The defendant pleaded that the plaintiff was not lawfully possessed of the deeds as of his own property, and that they were not the property of the plaintiff. At the trial it was proved that the deeds in question were the title deeds to an estate belonging to the plaintiff's wife, and that the plaintiff or his agent had delivered them to the defendant. It was held that the plaintiff could not maintain detinue for the deeds or their value. Park, J., said: "In order to support an action of detinue, the plaintiff must have a general or special property in what he seeks to recover." Burrough, J., remarked: "At the time of the action the plaintiff had no interest in these deeds; they were of no value to him; and therefore the nonsuit was right." See, also, Solomons v. Bank, 7 East (New Ed.) 79; De La Chaumette v. Same, 9 Barn. & C. 208. In the case of Williams v. Millington, 1 H. Bl. 81, it was held that an auctioneer could maintain against a buyer an action for goods sold an interest, which was a lien for the charges of the sale, the commission, and the auction duty, which he was bound to pay. In Ludden v. Leavitt, 9 Mass. 104, it was held: "Where a sheriff, having attached personal chattels on an original writ, delivers them to a third person for safe-keeping, such person is the mere servant of the sheriff, and has no legal interest in the chattels. He cannot, therefore, maintain trover for them." In Scott v. Elliott, 61 N. C. 104, it was held: "Possession of a chattel by one who holds for himself, in respect to either a general or a special property, will support replevin or trover. Such possession for another will not support an action." In Harris v. Smith, 3 Serg. & R. 20, it was held: "A mere servant who has the care of goods cannot maintain replevin, but if they are delivered to him by the master, as bailee, he may." In Clark v. Skinner, 20 Johns. 465, it was held that the owner of goods can maintain replevin against a sheriff or other officer who takes them from the custody of a servant or agent of the owner by virtue of an execution against such servant or agent; "the actual possession of the property in such case being considered as remaining in the owner, and not in the defendant in the execution." In Dillenback v. Jerome, 7 Cow. 294, it was held: "One who receipts property levied upon by a constable or sheriff by virtue of an execution, and engages to deliver to the officer, has neither a general nor special property. He is the mere servant or agent of the officer, and cannot maintain trover in his own name, though the property be taken and converted by a stranger." See, also, the following cases: Thorp v. Burling, 11 Johns. 285; Stephenson v. Little, 10 Mich. 433; White v. Dolliver, 113 Mass. 400; Donahoe v. McDonald, 92 Ky. 123, 17 S. W. 195; Linscott v. Trask, 35 Me. 150; Tuthill v. Wheeler, 6 Barb. 362; Waterman v. Robinson, 5 Mass. 303; Brownell v. Manchester, 1 Pick. 232; Rosentreter v. Brady, 63 Mo. App. 398; Baker v. Campbell, 32 Mo. App. 529; Rockwell v. Saunders, 19 Barb. 473; Faulkner v. Brown, 13 Wend. 64. These authorities abundantly settle the proposition that a mere agent or servant, having no special property therein, cannot, on bare possession alone, maintain an action to recover the goods from a person wrongfully in possession thereof; and this for the reason that his possession is that of his principal. The rule that a person wrongfully in possession of goods taken from another cannot set up title in a third person, or dispute the plaintiff's title, is perfectly consistent with the principle above announced. As stated above, a general or a special property in the personalty is essential to maintain trover; but, as against a wrongdoer, possession will be held to be conclusive evidence of such a property. But certainly a defendant, though a wrongdoer, will be per-in that of another. As the plaintiff's right of recovery rested in the present case upon bare possession, and as the evidence introduced in his behalf shows that such possession was in the right of his wife, and not in his own right, and that he had no interest whatever in the property, the presumption of ownership arising from possession was rebutted; and, under the authorities above referred to, he was not entitled to recover.

It is said, however, that section 3038 of the Civil Code changes the rule recognized by the decisions and authorities above referred to. That section is as follows: "An agent having possession, actual or constructive, of the property of his principal, has a right of action for any interference with that possession by third persons." If this section be construed literally, its language is such as to support the position that the possession of an agent is sufficient to sustain an action in his own name against one who wrongfully interferes with such possession. The rule on this subject as it existed at common law is thus stated in 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1166: "An agent who is in possession of or entitled to the possession of property belonging to his principal by virtue of the agency, and having a special or general property therein, has a right of action against a third person who unlawfully injures or converts such property." The rule is stated in substantially the same language in Mechem, Ag. § 765. The provisions of section 3038 of the Civil Code appear for the first time in the statute law of this state in the Code of 1863. The section as it appears in that Code has been embodied in every Code since adopted, and now appears in the Civil Code in identically the same language. If this section be so construed as to authorize an agent to maintain an action in his own name on a possession which is founded on nothing more than a right of property in his principal, the effect of the section was to make a radical change in the law as it existed at the time of the adoption of the Code of 1863. The authorities above cited demonstrate clearly that there can be no escape from this proposition. Was it the intention of the codifiers in framing this section, and of the legislature in adopting it, to change the law existing at the time the Code was adopted, or was it intended merely as declaratory of the law as it then stood? The codifiers were not authorized to make new law, but "to prepare for the people of Georgia a Code, which should, as near as practicable, embrace in a condensed form the laws of Georgia, whether derived from the common law, the constitutions, the statutes of the state, the decisions of the supreme court, or the statutes of England, of force in this state." See the preface to the Code of 1863. In Shumate v. Williams, 34 Ga. ute, which the codifiers found already established." In Bank v. Heard, 37 Ga. 401, 412, Judge Harris uses this language: "It should be kept in mind that the codifiers were commissioned to embody the principles of the common law in force in Georgia. They had no authority to originate new matter for legislative sanction. It, therefore, is incumbent on those who assert that they went beyond their commission * * * to prove it." In Phillips v. Solomon, 42 Ga. 192, 195, Judge McCay said: "It must be remembered that the object of the codification was not to make laws, but to codify or declare those already in existence. Act Dec. 9, 1858. It is true that in some instances the Code has changed the law, though these changes are less frequent than is supposed. But in the main it cannot be doubted that the Code is to be looked at as what it purports to be,—a codification of our laws as they existed at the time,—and its provisions are not to be considered as changing the law unless the intent to change be clear." In Gardner v. Moore, 51 Ga. 269, the same judge remarked: "The Code is not to be construed as changing the old law unless the change be very apparent, and it would be specially dangerous to take the definitions of the Code as absolutely accurate, and as excluding the common-law definitions, unless it be plainly manifest that the intent was to make an exclusive and inclusive definition." The language of Judge McCay in 42 Ga., supra, was quoted approvingly by Mr. Justice Hall in City of Atlanta v. Gate City Gaslight Co., 71 Ga. 119, 120, who took occasion to add that: "Many similar views may be found scattered through our Reports and the Reports of other states, but these are deemed sufficient. We are well satisfied that in this instance no change of the provision in question was intended, or was in fact made." In that case the court was dealing with a section of the Code which apparently changed the existing law. In Gillis v. Gillis, 95 Ga. 1, 10, 23 S. E. 107, 110, 30 L. R. A. 143, 146, Mr. Justice Lumpkin, in dealing with a section of the Code which it was claimed altered the existing law with reference to witnesses attesting wills by their marks, used this language: "There is no act of our legislature or decision of our supreme court, before the adoption of our Code, that ever changed or attempted to change the old law as to witnesses attesting wills by their marks; and there is at least one case decided by this court, before the Code went into effect, which is in harmony with and upholds that law. See Horton v. Johnson, 18 Ga. 397. How, then, can it be said that the compilers of our Code intended to incorporate into it any other than the prevailing rule of law? It is not to be presumed that they, learned in the law, would, except in rare instances, them'es make a rule of law, when they were r empowered to codify existing laws of 'e in this state." In Lamar v. McLaren,

Ga. 591, 598, 34 S. E. 116, 119, Mr. Jus-Fish uses this language: "The rule is t, unless the contrary manifestly appears n the words employed, the language of a e section should be understood as intend-to state the existing law, and not to nge it." The court was dealing with a ion of the Code in that case which, if strued literally, clearly changed the ex-ıg law. In Rome Grocery Co. v. Green-h Ins. Co. (Ga.) 36 S. E. 63, Mr. Justice 'is, in dealing with a section which, ac-ling to its literal terms, changed the ex-ıg law, says: "The object of the codifiers
'ompiling the first Code was to embody, only the statute law, but the common of force in this state. As there was no rt to codify any statute upon that subby the codifiers, we think it clearly prop-ln determining the meaning of this sec-
, to ascertain what was the general law orce in this country at the time of the )tion of the Code." The ruling in that followed what was the law existing at time of the adoption of the Code, and not t the terms of the section, literally con-ed, would have required. The rule on subject under investigation in the pres-case being well settled when the Code adopted, and there being no sufficient on suggested why such rule should not e been allowed to remain unchanged, and )t being "clear" that there was an "into change the law on the subject," the on of the Civil Code now under considion should be construed as a mere codi-ion of the existing law; and therefore word "agent," as used therein, should be to mean an agent who has a special erty or interest in the chattel. Without an interest, his possession is the actual ession of his principal, as was held in ver v. Brogden, 67 Ga. 24. The word nt," appearing after the plaintiff's name e," and is to be treated as surplusage; hence the action is to be regarded as

LEWIS, J. (dissenting). It is inferable from the testimony in this case that, prior to the conversion of the property in dispute by the defendant, the transactions the husband had with the railway company were in his individual name. It is true, he stated that the real title to the property was in his wife; that he was manager of his wife's business, and the property was actually in his peaceable and lawful possession. I think it quite evident that the nonsuit was granted in the present case upon the ground that the evidence showed that the title to the property was not in the plaintiff, but his wife.
The entire argument of counsel for defendant in error, in endeavoring to uphold the judgment of the court below granting the non-suit, is based purely upon this idea. While the plaintiff testified that the lumber belonged to his wife, and that it was cut on her land, and sawed with her engine and mill, yet he further testified, positively and without contradiction: "I had an interest in it, by reason of acting as agent for her and having charge of her business." There is no doubt but that at common law an action of trover is maintainable in favor of any one having possession of property against any wrongdoer who deprives him of such possession, and this peaceable possession on the part of the plaintiff, without further proof of title, is amply sufficient to maintain the action. In Dicey, Parties (2d Am. Ed.) p.
376, it is declared: "A person who has the actual possession of goods has a right to possess them against any one who cannot show a better title, or, what is the same thing, who cannot show that in interfering with possession of the goods he is acting under the authority of some one who has a better title than the possessor." In the case of Jeffries
v. Railway Co., 25 Law J. Q. B. 109, 110, Lord Campbell, C. J., enters into a discus-

in possession of a chattel as his own property, that a person who takes it from him, having no good title, is a wrongdoer, and that such person cannot defend himself by showing that the chattel is not the property of the plaintiff, but the property of a third person. * * * It is of the greatest importance that a man shall not, having no good title of his own to the property, be allowed to seize it, and thereby probably bring about a breach of the peace, and occasion great mischief and confusion. * * * It is allowed that, if an action of trespass is brought by the party in possession, the defendant cannot set up the jus tertii, he having no right in himself. I think there is no difference whatever, for this purpose, between an action of trespass and an action of trover. In both cases the plaintiff rests on his possession of the property, and the question is whether the person who has no title whatever of his own shall be allowed to show that the plaintiff has not the right of property. The right of property is presumed from the possession; and is that presumption to be rebutted by evidence on the part of the defendant, a mere stranger and wrongdoer, showing that the plaintiff was not the real owner of the chattel?" See, also, Rogers v. Spence, 13 Mees. & W. 579, 580. In discussing this right of a mere possessor of property to maintain trover against a wrongdoer, it was decided in that case: "These rights of action are given in respect of the immediate and present violation of the possession of the bankrupt, independently of his rights of property. They are an extension of that protection which the law throws around the person, and substantial damages may be recovered in respect of such rights, though no loss or diminution in value of property may have occurred." The decision of Lord Campbell in the case of Jeffries v. Railway Co., above cited, is extensively quoted in Dicey, Parties, p. 378. The same case is also reported in 85 E. C. L. 802. See, also, Faulkner v. Brown, 13 Wend. 64; Sutton v. Buck, 2 Taunt. 302.

Our Civil Code (section 3886) clearly adopts that common-law rule, in the following language: "Mere possession of a chattel, if without title, or wrongfully, will give a right of action for any interference therewith, except as against the true owner or the person wrongfully deprived of possession." In the case of Harpes v. Harpes, 62 Ga. 394, it is decided: "One from whose hands property of an estate has been wrongfully taken may bring trover for its recovery against the tortious holder, although there has been no administration." Chief Justice Warner, delivering the opinion in that case, says: "The mere possession of a chattel, if without title or wrongfully, will give a right of action for any interference therewith, except as against the true owner or the person wrongfully deprived of possession." In the case of Harpes v. Harpes, 62 Ga. 394, it is decided: "One from whose hands property of an estate has been wrongfully taken may bring trover for its recovery against the tortious holder, although there has been no administration." Chief Justice Warner, delivering the opinion in that case, says: "The mere possession of a chattel, if without title or wrongfully, will give a right of action for any interference therewith, except as against the true owner or the person wrongfully deprived of possession." In the case of Harpes v. Harpes, 62 Ga. 394, it is decided: "One from whose hands property of an estate has been wrongfully taken may bring trover for its recovery against the tortious holder, although there has been no administration." Chief Justice Warner, delivering the opinion in that case, says: "The mere possession of a chattel, if without title or wrongfully, will give a right of action for any interference therewith, except as against the true owner or the person wrongfully deprived of possession." In the case of Harpes v. Harpes, 62 Ga. 394, it is decided: "One from whose hands property of an estate has been wrongfully taken may bring trover for its recovery against the tortious holder, although there has been no administration." Chief Justice Warner, delivering the opinion in that case, says: "The mere possession of a chattel, if without title or wrongfully, will give a right of action for any interference therewith, except as against the true owner or the person wrongfully de-estate, and it was clear that the plaintiff in that case had no title whatever in the property. It is said in the opinion: "If the plaintiff had sued for the horse as a part of the estate of her deceased husband, then a grant of administration would have been necessary to have entitled her to recover; but she declared against the defendant as a wrongdoer, upon her own possession of the property sued for. The dismissal of the plaintiff's action was error." This doctrine is recognized in Greenleaf on Evidence (volume 2, § 637), in his chapter on trover. In discussing the right of one having a special interest in property to maintain an action of trover for same, he adds: "But a lower degree of interest will sometimes suffice, against a stranger; for a mere wrongdoer is not permitted to question the title of a person in the actual possession and custody of the goods, whose possession he has wrongfully invaded." See, also, 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) pp. 744–748. The idea, therefore, of the law embodied in the section of the Code above recited is evidently to give one who has possession of property, even if he has wrongful possession of it, a right of action against any one who interferes therewith, unless he should be the true owner, or the person wrongfully deprived of possession. The bare possession of the plaintiff makes out, in law, title sufficient to recover in such a case; and the wrongdoer is estopped from denying his title by showing a legal title in another. This, however, is a stronger case than a suit by one in wrongful possession of property; for there is no question, under this evidence, but that the plaintiff was in its rightful possession. The defendant was guilty of a conversion of the property when it moved the same from where the plaintiff had placed it without his authority or consent.

But it is contended that, the evidence in this case showing that the plaintiff was not the owner of this property, he was not, in contemplation of law, in possession thereof in his own right, and that his possession was therefore not his own, but really that of his principal. I do not think the word "possession," in Civ. Code, § 3886, will bear any such construction. The term "mere possession" must have some significance, and I think it necessarily means the party having the actual, manual custody of the property at the time his actual possession thereof is interfered with. It seems, from the ingenious argument of Mr. Justice COBB in his opinion in this case, that he has reached the conclusion that in order to maintain an action of trover the possession of the plaintiff, which has been interfered with, must have been coupled with some interest in the property sued for. But that is entirely inconsistent with the language of this section; for it is therein plainly stated that even if the party, as against the true owner or the person wrongfully deprived of possession. This language, then, is entirely inconsistent with the idea that such a possession, to authorize the action, must be in a person having some interest in the property. If that had been the intention of the codifiers, evidently lawyers of their learning would have made it appear in language unmistakable,—for instance, by simply adding that the possession of a chattel, "coupled with an interest in the same," will give a right of action, etc. They would not have written, "Mere possession of a chattel," etc., will give a right of action; for the expression "without title or wrongfully" implies that the party need not have had any interest whatever in the property in dispute. But, apart from this, from the evidence in the case above referred to it will be seen that this plaintiff, while he did not claim title to the property, did actually claim an interest therein by virtue of the services rendered in the management of his wife's affairs.

It is contended, however, that, being the agent of the owner, he was not, in contemplation of law, in possession of the property; that his possession was the possession of his principal. This proposition is completely answered by the provisions of Civ. Code, § 3038, which declares, "An agent having possession, actual or constructive, of the property of his principal, has a right of action for any interference with that possession by third parties." So, if there was ever any doubt about the right of an agent to bring this action against a wrongdoer, it strikes me that it is forever set at rest by this provision in the Code. In the opinion of Mr. Justice COBB, however, it is contended that this section of the Code was intended as an embodiment of the common law, and that under the common law an agent had no such right of action, even against a wrongdoer, unless the agent's possession was coupled with an interest he had in the property. In the first place, I do not think this is a correct view of the common law. There can be no doubt but that, as a general rule of law, to maintain an action of trover the plaintiff must have had either a general or special property in the goods seized; and abundant authority can be cited from text-books, as well as from decisions of courts, which recognizes this general principle. The truth is, actions of trover in this country are not often based upon a mere possession of the plaintiff, of which he has been deprived by a wrongdoer who has no interest whatever in the property. The majority of trover cases are of such a nature that the plaintiff cannot recover unless he shows title to or interest in the property sued for. Often is it the case that the defendant never derived any possession from the plaintiff at all, and that he claims a right to the property entirely under a different from that of the plaintiff, and in which he has no interest whatever, and in which the plaintiff has an interest. Under such circumstances, I do not think that the plaintiff can maintain an action of trover unless he has a general or special property in the goods. Nor do I think that the section of the Code above referred to was intended to change the common law in this respect. I do not think that the language of the section will bear such a construction. I do not think that it was intended to authorize an action of trover by a mere agent who had no interest in the property, as against the true owner or the person wrongfully deprived of possession. This language, then, is entirely inconsistent with the idea that such a possession, to authorize the action, must be in a person having some interest in the property. If that had been the intention of the codifiers, evidently lawyers of their learning would have made it appear in language unmistakable,—for instance, by simply adding that the possession of a chattel, "coupled with an interest in the same," will give a right of action, etc. They would not have written, "Mere possession of a chattel," etc., will give a right of action; for the expression "without title or wrongfully" implies that the party need not have had any interest whatever in the property in dispute. But, apart from this, from the evidence in the case above referred to it will be seen that this plaintiff, while he did not claim title to the property, did actually claim an interest therein by virtue of the services rendered in the management of his wife's affairs.

It is contended, however, that, being the agent of the owner, he was not, in contemplation of law, in possession of the property; that his possession was the possession of his principal. This proposition is completely answered by the provisions of Civ. Code, § 3038, which declares, "An agent having possession, actual or constructive, of the property of his principal, has a right of action for any interference with that possession by third parties." So, if there was ever any doubt about the right of an agent to bring this action against a wrongdoer, it strikes me that it is forever set at rest by this provision in the Code. In the opinion of Mr. Justice COBB, however, it is contended that this section of the Code was intended as an embodiment of the common law, and that under the common law an agent had no such right of action, even against a wrongdoer, unless the agent's possession was coupled with an interest he had in the property. In the first place, I do not think this is a correct view of the common law. There can be no doubt but that, as a general rule of law, to maintain an action of trover the plaintiff must have had either a general or special property in the goods seized; and abundant authority can be cited from text-books, as well as from decisions of courts, which recognizes this general principle. The truth is, actions of trover in this country are not often based upon a mere possession of the plaintiff, of which he has been deprived by a wrongdoer who has no interest whatever in the property. The majority of trover cases are of such a nature that the plaintiff cannot recover unless he shows title to or interest in the property sued for. Often is it the case that the defendant never derived any possession from the plaintiff at all, and that he claims a right to the property entirely under a dif-

in them at all inconsistent with the view I entertain in this case. Take, for example, some of the cases cited by Mr. Justice COBB. To support an action of this character, he cites a number of authorities to the effect that the plaintiff at the time of the action must have either a general or a special property in the personalty. In Manufacturing Co. v. Wiggin, 14 N. H. 441, 40 Am. Dec. 198, it was decided that replevin cannot be maintained unless the plaintiff has at the time of the taking either a general or special property in the goods. But that case did not involve any principle whatever touching the right of recovery on actual possession alone against a wrongdoer. That was a general principle in an action of replevin. On page 199, 40 Am. Dec., and page 446, 14 N. H., it will appear that the defendant was a deputy sheriff, and he set up title in the property in one Hayden, and that the same was seized by defendant, as deputy sheriff, by virtue of an attachment against Hayden. The same general principle is declared in Pattison v. Adams, 7 Hill, 126, cited by Mr. Justice COBB. It does not appear from the facts therein that it has any reference whatever to the questions involved in the case at bar. The same general principle is announced in Beckwith v. Philleo, 15 Wis. 223, likewise cited; but it will appear from the facts in that case, on page 229, that the defendants, instead of taking possession of the property involved, to wit, lumber, from the plaintiff, were rightfully in possession of the premises at the time of bringing the suit, and that the cutting of the timber by them, instead of being a wrongful act, was perfectly legitimate, under the contract they made, by virtue of which they acquired possession of the premises. He also cites 1 Chit. Pl. (16th Am. Ed.) *137, to the effect that the plaintiff must have a general or special property in the goods at the time the action was commenced; and he also quotes from page *167 of this work, to the effect that in order to support the action the plaintiff must, at the time of the conversion, "have had a complete property, either general or special, in the chattel." But in another place in his opinion he adverts to page *170 of the same work, where Mr. Chitty lays down the general rule that "the bare possession of goods, without any strict legal title, confers a right of action against a mere wrongdoer, having no right, and not clothed with any authority from the real owner." In the same connection, and on the same page, the author further adds, in addition to what is above quoted: "The only exception which appears to exist is in the case of a mere servant acting professedly as such, and having only the custody of goods." He also quotes from 2 Greenl. Ev. (15th Ed.) § 561, as follows: "A mere servant or a depositary for safe custody has not such property as will support this action, his pos-he takes quite a different view of a right of action against a mere wrongdoer, who is not permitted to question the title of a person in the actual possession and custody of goods, whose possession he has wrongfully invaded. Great reliance is placed by Mr. Justice COBB upon the decision of this court in the case of Lockhart v. Railroad Co., 73 Ga. 472. Upon a careful review of that decision and the facts in that case, I cannot see that it in the least sustains the view of the majority of this court. That was not an action of trover, but an action for damages resulting from an injury done to an oil painting by the defendant. Civ. Code, § 3886, has no application whatever to that case. It clearly appears that the defendant did not wrongfully get possession of the property from the plaintiff. On the contrary, the property that was damaged was received by the defendant for transportation. It appears in the case that the plaintiff was only a borrower, and acquired no title in the picture loaned. She brought suit against the defendant, not because of any unlawful possession of the picture by it, but because of injury it sustained while in its lawful possession. It is there expressly recognized that the carrier cannot dispute the title of the party delivering goods for transportation, either by setting up title in himself or in a third person, which is not being enforced against him; but, says the court, on page 474, "that is not this case. He sets up no adverse claim; does not refuse to deliver the property to the consignee." In such a case, where the plaintiff had no interest in or title to the property which has been damaged, she, of course, had no right of action; for she had not been damaged. I think this is really authority to sustain my view; for it is intimated in the opinion that, if the railroad company had unlawfully deprived the plaintiff of possession of the property, she could have maintained an action against it, although she had no title to same. I fail to find any of the authorities cited by Mr. Justice COBB which sustain his theory of what the common law is,—that possession of an agent of his principal's chattels will not enable him to maintain an action against a wrongdoer who has unlawfully deprived him of such possession, because his possession is in law possession of the principal. As a general rule, an agent cannot maintain an action in trover for the recovery of his principal's property; but that rule does not apply when he is in possession of the principal's property, and has been deprived thereof by the wrongful act of a person who has no interest whatever in that property. To say that Civ. Code, § 3038, refers not only to an agent who has possession, actual or constructive, of the property of his principal, but to one who has an interest in the property, would be giving it a construction which was evidently never contemplated by occupies some other relation than that of mere agent. If that is the only thing that gives him a right to sue, then his possession is not that of an agent, but of an owner, and he has the right to protect his interest in the property against a wrongdoer independently either of section 3038 or section 3886 of the Civil Code. Chitty, the authority relied upon by Mr. Justice COBB, recognizes but one exception which even appears to exist, and that is where the possession is that of a mere servant. I know of no authority that recognizes the possession of an agent as an exception. But suppose it did, and at common law an agent did not have a right of action of this sort; then, manifestly, under our Civil Code, that principle of the common law has been changed. Suppose the word "servant" had been used instead of the word "agent" in section 3038; no one could contend that the servant could not bring this action. If, therefore, under the common law mere possession by an agent of his principal's property will give him no right of action against a wrongdoer for interference with such possession, then that section of the Code (3038) changes the common law by declaring exactly the contrary.

It is true that the main purpose of the codifiers was to embody in the Code of laws of this state not only the statutes, but the common law in force, and also the decisions of this court, and that in case of a want of absolute clearness as to what a section might mean, or in case of ambiguity, if it relates to a principle of the common law, a determination of what the common law on the subject is is entirely proper, and often of great aid in arriving at the true intent of the codifiers, and of the action of the legislature in adopting their work. But, when we find in the Code a provision as clear and unmistakable in its meaning as is embraced in section 3038, the invariable rule of this court has been to treat it as law, although it may never have been law before the adoption of the Code. Now, that section says "an agent having possession, actual or constructive." Of what? Of the property of his principal. It necessarily implies, so far as the absolute legal title is concerned, that the principal alone is the holder thereof; and yet that section gives the agent in possession a right of action for any interference with that possession by third persons. What possession? Manifestly and unquestionably, the possession he holds for his principal. If the agent has an interest in the property himself, he would have a right of action, not by virtue of his possession as agent of his principal, but by virtue of his possession in an entirely different capacity. The effect, then, of the construction of the majority of the court, as I conceive it, is to change the clear and unmistakable meaning of the language employed in the Code, and to add to its words a thought that simply ren, and think that the court below erred in granting a nonsuit.

HANDEL v. CHAPLIN, Superintendent of Public Works.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Aug. 7, 1900.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—SEAMEN—DESERTION.

Congress not having legislated upon the subject of the offense of aiding articled seamen or apprentices to desert or leave a foreign vessel while in the waters of this state, the legislature of the state had the right and power to enact section 655 of the Penal Code, making it a misdemeanor for any person to aid or induce an articled seaman or apprentice to desert from or leave his vessel while in the waters of this state. The act in no way attempts to regulate or interfere with commerce, but is an aid thereto. Where the subject is local, and not national, in its nature, and does not require a uniform system of regulation, then, in the absence of legislation on it by congress, it may be regulated by the state.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Chatham county; R. Falligant, Judge.

Application by Edward Handel for a writ of habeas corpus against William F. Chaplin, superintendent of public works. Release refused, and petitioner brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Handel filed his petition for the writ of habeas corpus. The grounds of his petition are as follows: "(1) That your petitioner is restrained of his liberty. (2) The person restraining the liberty of your petitioner is William F. Chaplin, and the mode of such restraint is compulsory work and labor, and confinement in the county chain gang of Chatham county, and the place of such detention is at the camps of said county chain gang, in the county of Chatham, as aforesaid. (3) The cause or pretense of such restraint of your petitioner as aforesaid is a sentence passed upon your petitioner on January 26, 1900, by the Honorable T. M. Norwood, judge of the city court of Savannah, a copy of which sentence is hereto annexed, and made a part of this petition. (4) Petitioner says that said restraint of him, your petitioner, by the said William F. Chaplin, superintendent of the public works of said county, is illegal, in that: First. Your petitioner was sentenced as hereinbefore set forth for violation of the provisions of section 655 of the Penal Code of 1895 of this state, as will appear from the accusation in said case, of file with the clerk of said city court, a copy of which is hereto attached, and made a part of this petition, and leave of reference to which is hereby prayed. Second. Said section 655 is void and unconstitutional for the following reasons: (a) The power to legislate upon the subject-matter of said section was and is the exclusive right said section 655, and the questions and interests involved in said law, the power to legislate thereon resides with, and should be exercised exclusively by, congress. (c) Congress had full power to legislate upon the subject-matter involved in said section 655, and to pass laws to prevent the evil consequences of the acts in said section aimed at by the legislature of this state, and in pursuance of such rightful power congress has passed a full and complete body of laws, and said laws are now still in force; and therefore said section 655 is void and unconstitutional, and especially so in that said section 655 is in many and material respects at variance with and in repugnance to the aforementioned laws of the United States. (d) Said section 655 is void by reason of its repugnance to the laws of the United States. (e) Said section 655 is void by reason of section 2, art. 6, of the constitution of the United States, and paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of section 1, art. 12, of the constitution of the state of Georgia. (f) That, if any part of said section 655 is valid, such valid part cannot be separated from the unconstitutional and void parts of said act, and that therefore said section should be declared to be void and ineffective. Third. The bark referred to in the attached accusation, and called the 'D. H. Morris,' is a Norwegian bark."

Accusation: "State of Georgia, County of Chatham, City of Savannah. And now, on this 26th day of January in the year of our Lord 1900, comes William W. Osborne, solicitor general of the Eastern judicial circuit of Georgia, who prosecutes for the state of Georgia in the city court of Savannah, and by accusation made on oath, and in accordance with the statute in such case made and provided, in the name or behalf of the citizens of Georgia, charge and accuse John Bowen and Edward Handel, of the county of Chatham and state aforesaid, with the offense of misdemeanor, for that the said John Bowen and Edward Handel, in the county of Chatham and state of Georgia aforesaid, on the 20th day of January in the year of our Lord 1900 did aid one John Bendecksen, an articled seaman on bark D. H. Morris, to desert from or leave his vessel while in the waters of this state, contrary to the laws of the said state, the good order, peace, and dignity thereof. W. W. Osborne, Solicitor General, E. J. C. of Georgia."

On return of the petition and answer thereto, and after argument had, the court rendered the following judgment: "Judgment of the Court. In Chatham Superior Court. Edward Handel v. Wm. F. Chaplin, Supt. of Public Works. Habeas Corpus. The petitioner was convicted and sentenced by the city court of Savannah, under section 655 of the Penal Code of 1895, for aiding one John Bendecksen, a seaman, to desert from the bark D. H. Morris. It is admitted that the of the Criminal Code does not conflict with any statute of the United States, nor interfere directly or indirectly with foreign or interstate commerce. It is claimed, however, that the United States having exclusive jurisdiction, and having legislated with reference to American seamen and ships, the silence of congress upon the subject of foreign ships and seamen amounts to the exclusion of state action; and the section is therefore claimed to be unconstitutional, for the reasons stated in the petition, and the conviction and sentence void and of no effect. Regarding this state statute as a purely local law, under the police power, affecting persons within this jurisdiction, and not in conflict with any law or jurisdiction of the United States, interfering in no respect with foreign or interstate commerce, or with any jurisdiction of the laws of the United States, but, rather, promotive of both, it is held that section 655 is a valid, constitutional law; and, petitioner having been lawfully convicted under said law, his application for release is refused, and he is hereby remanded back into custody, that the sentence of the city court of Savannah may be carried out. R. Falligant, Judge. In open Court, Apl. 7, 1900." To which judgment Handel excepted.

R. J. Travis and J. L. Travis, for plaintiff in error. W. W. Osborne, Sol. Gen., and J. R. Saussy, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed.

CATT v. OLIVIER et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 27, 1900.)

SUBSCRIPTIONS—PERFORMANCE OF CONDITIONS—EVIDENCE—WAIVER OF CONDITIONS.

1. In an action against the receiver of an institution to which subscription notes were executed on certain conditions, not expressed in the notes, to determine their liability to creditors, the subscribers may show the conditions on which such notes were given, and that they were not performed, as such evidence is not contradictory of the notes, but avoids their effect.

2. In an action against the receiver of an institution to which notes were given on certain conditions, not expressed in the notes, to determine the liability of the makers to creditors, that the notes were of the same date, alike, except as to amount, and were kept together and treated as belonging to the same fund, is sufficient to show that they were given on the conditions outlined when the plans for raising the funds were adopted.

3. In an action against the receiver of an institution to determine the liability of the makers on certain subscription notes to creditors, which were given on certain conditions, the fact that payments were made by such makers before the conditions on which they were given were complied with is not a waiver of such conditions, since such makers had the right to assume that the money paid by them would be used for the purpose for which they had agreed to pay it.

Reeves Catt, trustee of the Wesleyan Female Institute, to determine their liability on certain notes. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. C. Braxton, for appellant. Ranson & Ranson, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. The controversy in this appeal is whether W. L. Olivier and 25 other parties who filed their petition in this cause are liable to the creditors of the Wesleyan Female Institute, an insolvent corporation, on certain notes made by them, and now in the hands of Reeves Catt, the receiver of the court in this case. This question was referred to one of the commissioners of the court for investigation. He reported the facts and circumstances under which the notes were made, and reached the conclusion that the makers of the notes were not liable thereon. The court confirmed his report, and from that decree this appeal was allowed.

It appears from the commissioner's report, which, in all material matters, is, we think, sustained by the evidence, that in the year 1893 the friends of the institute, finding that it was financially embarrassed, set about to devise means to meet its indebtedness and to continue the school as a going concern; that the head of the movement was one W. W. Smith, an active worker in the Methodist Episcopal Church South; that he and parties interested held a public meeting at the Young Men's Christian Association Building in Staunton for the purpose of adopting some means to accomplish that end; that the plan proposed and adopted was that subscriptions to the amount of $25,000 should be secured, of which sum $10,000 was to be raised in and about Staunton by the friends of the institute, while the remaining sum of $15,000 was to be secured by the friends of the school at large; that this fund was to be kept as a separate one, and, when secured, was to be used to pay off the bonded indebtedness of the school, after which any surplus that might remain was to be used for its general benefit; that it was further understood that none of the subscription secured was to be binding unless the entire sum of $25,000 was secured, and that this sum, when secured, was to be turned over to the institute for the purpose named, and none other; that when this was done it was to give such subscribers a deed of trust on its real estate, by which it was to bind itself to return to them, without interest, the amount of their several subscriptions in the event it should cease to be conducted as a conference school in Staunton; that the next step taken was at a meeting of some of the subscribers to the fund held at the Virginia Hotel, in Staunton, at which it was agreed that J. A. Fauver should act as trustee to hold the fund for the purpose named, and that he and one ›rge S. Lightner should reduce to writing conditions above stated, upon which subptions had been or were to be received; t this writing was never prepared; that :e was no subscription paper, and that promises to pay were embodied in the ›s given by the subscribers, which were executed after the last-named meeting; : the subscription notes were obtained by ›rent solicitors (just who those solicitors e is not shown, but many of them were ›n by W. W. Robertson, president of the ›ol, but not a member of the board of tees of the corporation); that some time r the notes were made "J. A. Fauver, surer," to whom they were all payable, e the following indorsement upon each of n, "J. A. Fauver, Treasurer of the Board rustees of the Wesleyan Female Institute, ınton, Va.," and left them with Mr. Rob›n, at whose instance the indorsements › made, and in whose possession the notes ı to have been from the time they were uted until the corporation made an asment of all its property to Reeves Catt, ee.

further appears that Robertson, presi- of the institution, Fauver, the payee in notes, Catt, trustee, now receiver, and › if not all of the members of the board rustees of the institute, knew the pur› for and the conditions upon which the ı were made.

further appears that none of the condi- upon which the notes were given were n be performed by the institute.

e of the grounds upon which the cred- of the institute insist that the makers ıe notes are liable thereon is that the formed a large and material part of the s of the corporation, and were used by it, the full knowledge and consent of the rs of the notes, as a basis of credit, and as they (the creditors) relied largely upe notes as a valid asset of the corporain extending such credit, it would be itable and illegal not to hold the mak‹ the notes liable.

ıatever merit there might be in this ntion if true, it is unnecessary to consid› the evidence does not show that the ors (the appellants here) relied upon notes in extending credit to the cor›on, or even knew of their existence un›er their debts were created, and the as.ent made to Catt, trustee.

s insisted that the notes, being plain, ditional, and unambiguous promises to ıoney, cannot be varied, altered, or con›ted by any verbal evidence of a prior or nporaneous agreement between the ›s of the notes and the corporation.

rule of law is better settled or of great›portance than that a written contract › be contradicted or varied by evidence oral agreement between the parties before or at the time of such contract. ›ject of the evidence introduced in this as not, however, for the purpose of contradicting or varying the writings in question, but to show that the conditions upon which they were to become operative never occurred. That this may be done, within certain limitations, by oral evidence, is also well settled.

"In such cases," as was said by this court in Nash v. Fugate, 32 Grat. 595, 609, "the oral evidence tends to prove independent facts, which, if established, avoid the effect of the written agreement by facts dehors the instrument, but do not tend to contradict or vary it. * * *

"And in Woodward v. Foster, 18 Grat. 200, 207, Judge Joynes, in discussing the same subject, says: 'So it has been held that, between the immediate parties, evidence may be given of a contemporaneous agreement consistent with the written contract,—as, for example, that the bill was indorsed and handed over for a particular purpose, as for collection, without giving the trustee the usual rights of an indorsee (Manley v. Boycot, 75 Eng. Com. Law, 45), or that the bill was transferred as an escrow, or upon an express condition which has not been complied with.'"

In Ward v. Churn, 18 Grat. 801, 813, it was said that: "When the instrument is delivered directly to the obligee, the delivery cannot be regarded as conditional, in respect to the party who makes it, unless the condition is made known to the obligee. * * * If the delivery is upon a condition made known to the obligee, his assent to it will be presumed from the acceptance of the instrument, and he will not be allowed to repudiate the condition thus asserted, and treat the delivery as absolute and unconditional." See, also, Solenberger v. Gilbert's Adm'r, 86 Va. 778, 11 S. E. 789; Humphreys v. Railroad Co., 88 Va. 431, 13 S. E. 985.

The supreme court of the United States held in the case of Burke v. Dulaney, 153 U. S. 228, 14 Sup. Ct. 816, 38 L. Ed. 698, that, in an action by the payee of a negotiable note against the maker, evidence was admissible to show by parol an agreement between the parties, made at the time of making the note, that it should not become operative as a note until the maker could examine the property for which it was to be given, and determine whether he would purchase it.

The controversy in this case is really between the same parties, for the receiver and the creditors in the case took no other or greater interest in the notes than the institute had. The evidence was not only admissible to show, but it does show, we think, that the notes were made upon conditions which were never complied with, some of which, at least, if not all, were known to and recognized by the corporation.

It is also contended that the record does not show, except as to a very small number of the makers of the subscription notes, that they knew of or made their subscriptions upon the conditions named. While only three of the subscribers to the fund for which the ditions which have never been, and cannot be, complied with. The notes given, except in two instances, are of the same date, most of them payable at the same time, alike in all other respects, except as to amounts and makers, and they were kept together and treated by all parties as belonging to the same fund. The record, we think, satisfactorily shows that the notes were given for the purposes and upon the conditions outlined when the plan for raising the money was proposed and adopted.

Neither were those conditions waived, as is contended, by the subsequent conduct of the makers in making payment on their notes before the conditions were complied with. They had the right to expect that the conditions would be complied with, and that the money paid by them would not be used for any other purpose than that for which they agreed to pay it. That this was their expectation is shown by the fact that when Robertson, the president of the institute, used the money collected by him on the notes to pay the running expenses of the school, the attention of the executive committee of the board of trustees was called to it, when they, recognizing that the money could not be used for any such purpose, directed that the note of the corporation for the amount so used be executed payable to Fauver, the same person to whom the notes were payable upon which collections had been made and misappropriated by Robertson. There is not sufficient evidence in the case to justify the court in holding that the makers of the notes had waived the conditions upon which their notes were made, after full knowledge that the conditions upon which they were made had not been and could not be complied with.

Without discussing further the objections urged to the decree complained of, we are of opinion that, upon the whole case, the makers of the notes, who are parties to this suit, are not liable thereon, and that the hustings court did not err in so decreeing and directing their notes to be canceled and surrendered to them.

HARRISON et al. v. WISSLER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 27, 1900.)

VENUE—ACTION BY CIRCUIT JUDGE—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—CONSTRUCTION.

Under Code, § 3214, subd. 7, providing that, where a circuit court judge is interested in a case, which, but for such interest, would be proper for the jurisdiction of his court, the action may be brought in any county in an adjoining circuit, a circuit court judge can bring an action in the circuit court of any county in his circuit in which the defendants reside.

Appeal from circuit court, Clarke county.

M. McCormick and Conrad Kownslar, for appellants. R. T. Barton, for appellee.

BUCHANAN, J. This action was instituted against the defendant in error in the circuit court of Shenandoah county, where he resided, by the plaintiffs in error, one of whom was then, and still is, the judge of that court. A plea to the jurisdiction of the court was filed, and the cause removed by an order in vacation to the circuit court of Clarke county, where two other pleas to the jurisdiction of that court were filed. Upon the hearing the pleas were sustained, and the action dismissed.

The question involved in this writ of error to that judgment is whether a judge of a circuit court can bring an action or suit in the circuit court of any county or corporation in his circuit in which the defendant resides, or can only bring such action or suit in some county or corporation in an adjoining circuit.

The provisions of law, so far as they affect this question, are found in sections 3214 and 3215 of the Code. The former section was amended and re-enacted by acts approved February 14 and March 3, 1900 (Acts 1899–1900, cc. 329, 736), but the amendments made do not affect the question involved in this case.

Section 3214, so far as applicable to this case, provides that: "Any action at law or suit in equity, except where it is otherwise specially provided, may be brought in any county or corporation: First, wherein any of the defendants reside; * * * seventh. If a judge of a circuit court be interested in a case, which but for such interest, would be proper for the jurisdiction of his court, the action or suit may be brought in any county or corporation in an adjoining circuit."

By section 3215 of the Code "an action may be brought in any county or corporation wherein the cause of action, or any part thereof, arose, although none of the defendants reside therein," subject to the limitations prescribed by section 3220 of the Code.

Under the provisions of these sections the judge of a circuit court may sue the defendant in the county or corporation in which the latter resides, or in which the cause of action, or any part thereof, arose, or in any county or corporation in an adjoining circuit, unless the word "may," in the seventh clause of section 3214, be construed as imperative, and not permissive, as if it were written "shall" or "may only," as is contended by the counsel of the defendant in error, and as was held by the trial court.

The object of all interpretation and construction is to ascertain the legislative intent, and in order to do this the general rule is that words must receive their ordinary meaning, unless it can be seen that the legislature intended that they should have Ron's Lessee, 22 How. 422, 434, 16 L. Ed. 391, Mr. Justice Greer, in discussing the question when the word "may" should be construed "must," said: "It is only where it is necessary to give effect to the clear policy and intention of the legislature that such a liberty can be taken with the plain words of a statute." And in Minor v. Bank, 1 Pet. 46, 64, 7 L. Ed. 55, Mr. Justice Story, in considering the same subject, said: "Without question, such a construction is proper in all cases where the legislature meant to impose a positive and absolute duty and not merely give a discretionary power. But no general rule can be laid down upon the subject, further than that that exposition ought to be adopted in this, as in other, cases which carries into effect the true intent and object of the legislature in the enactment. The ordinary meaning of the language must be presumed to be intended unless it would manifestly defeat the object of the provision." Suth. St. Const. §§ 460–462; Sedg. St. & Const. Law, pp. 375–377.

In determining what is the proper construction of the clause under consideration, we may, I think, be aided by a reference to previous legislation on that subject.

We have not access here to the statute law of the state prior to the Code of 1819. Under the provisions of that Code an action or suit might be instituted in the court where the defendant resided, or where the cause of action arose (chapter 128, § 41), and, if either of the judges of the general court was interested in any suit which, in the case of any other person would have been proper for the jurisdiction of such judge, it was provided that "it shall be lawful to institute such suit in any court within an adjacent circuit" (chapter 69, § 53; 1 Rob. Prac. [Old] 19, 20). When the revision of our laws was made in 1849, the several statutes providing where actions or suits should be commenced were gathered together, and placed in chapter 169 of the Code of 1849.

In the fifth clause of section 1 of that chapter, which is identical with the seventh clause of section 3214 of the Code of 1887, the revisers, instead of using the words "it shall be lawful," as in section 53 of chapter 69 of the Code of 1819, substituted the word "may." It would hardly be contended that the words "it shall be lawful" in that section were imperative, and meant "must," or "shall," or "may only." Those words, in a statute like that, of themselves merely make that legal and possible which there would otherwise be no authority or right to do. The presumption is that in substituting the word "may" for the term "it shall be lawful" it was only intended to shorten the statute by using a word which, in its ordinary signification, had the same meaning as the term for which it was substituted.

The rule of construction when there has been a revision is that the old law was not [illegible] native mind," as was said by Judge Moncure in Parramore v. Taylor, 11 Grat. 220, 242, in speaking of the revision of 1849, "was fixed on the then existing law as the text, to be altered only as occasion might seem to require. Great alteration was made in words and phraseology, while comparatively little was made in substance." And in the case of The Wenonah v. Bragdon, 21 Grat. 685, 695, the same learned judge in considering the meaning of a section found in the Codes of 1803, 1814, 1819, 1849, and 1860, said: "The established rule of construction of the latter Codes, or rather of the Code of 1849, is that an intention not to change the law will be presumed unless a contrary intention plainly appear."

There is nothing in the provisions of the Code of 1849 or of the Code of 1887 on the subject which shows any intention to alter the law, nor did any reason exist, so far as we can see, when these revisions were made, why a judge of a circuit court should not be allowed to sue or be sued in any county or corporation in his circuit which did not equally exist when the provisions of the Code of 1819 were enacted. In addition, the report of the revisers, who were among the most learned lawyers of the commonwealth, shows that in substituting the word "may" for the term "it shall be lawful" they did not intend to make any change in the law. The third section of chapter 169 as reported by them provided that "any action or suit mentioned in the two preceding sections [which were the same, so far as they affect this case, as sections 3214 and 3215 of the Code of 1887] may be in a circuit, county, or corporation court of any county or corporation wherein it is allowed thereby to be brought, except that an action or suit against a judge of a circuit court shall not be in a county or corporation court unless it be brought under some other clause of the first section than the fifth."

If it was intended that a circuit judge could not sue or be sued (in such a case as is contemplated by the fifth clause of section 1 of chapter 169 of the Code of 1849) under the first clause of that section, or under the second section of that chapter, but only under the fifth clause of section 1, why make any such provision as is contained in the latter part of section 3?

There is nothing, as it seems to us, in the clause under consideration, or in its context, or in the revisions which our laws have undergone, to show that it was the intention of the lawmaking power to use the word "may" in the clause in question in the sense of "may only."

If the construction insisted upon had no other effect than to prevent a judge from suing and being sued in his own court, and thereby did away with the necessity of removing the cause to some court of which he was not the judge or of having some other sult that would follow. Such a construction would take away the jurisdiction of courts other than his own, which, but for such construction, would have jurisdiction of the case. It would prevent a circuit judge in such a case from suing or being sued in any corporation or other court in any county or corporation in his circuit which might otherwise have jurisdiction of the case. If, in the case under consideration, the debt or demand asserted had been against two persons, one of whom resided in Shenandoah county and the other in the city of Richmond, upon a cause of action which arose in the city of Lynchburg, or if the judge, with another who resided in Richmond, was liable upon a cause of action which arose in Lynchburg, no action or suit could be brought in any court in the judge's circuit, nor in the city of Richmond, nor in the city of Lynchburg, but could only be brought in some court in a circuit adjoining the Twelfth circuit.

What reason is there in the cases supposed why the actions or suits should not be brought in some court in Richmond or Lynchburg? Yet if the word "may" must be construed as "may only," actions or suits could only be brought in an adjoining circuit.

We are of opinion that the circuit court of Shenandoah county had jurisdiction of the case, and that the demurrer to the plea ought to have been sustained. We are further of opinion that the demurrers to the pleas to the jurisdiction of the circuit court for Clarke county, to which the case had been removed, should also have been sustained. Section 3216, Code.

The judgment complained of must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

TATE v. JONES et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 13, 1900.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS—LEGACIES—PAYMENT—PRESUMPTION—EQUITY—LACHES.

1. An administrator had a settlement with the residuary legatees, and received receipts from them in full of their interests in the estate. He afterwards collected money on judgments in his favor as administrator. After the execution of such receipts, and until the administrator's death, a period of some 17 years, all parties in interest treated the accounts as settled; and after the administrator's death no claim was made against his estate, except by complainant, an assignee of one of such legatees, who sued the administrator's estate for a settlement of his accounts. Held, that it must be presumed that the money collected on the judgment was embraced in the receipts.

2. In a suit by an assignee of a residuary legatee against the administrator's estate for a settlement of his accounts, it appeared that in 1874 complainant became assignee of the claim; that he never notified the administrator of its assignment, nor made a demand for its payment; that in 1875 the administrator paid the legatee a small sum, and received his receipt in full; that suit was not brought until 1895. Complainant gave no explanation for his long delay in asserting his claim. Held, that complainant's right of action was barred by laches.

Appeal from circuit court, Smyth county.

Bill by one Jones and others against one Tate, administrator, for a settlement of accounts. From a decree in favor of complainants, defendant appeals. Reversed.

James H. Gilmore and White & Buchanan, for appellant. A. L. Robinson and C. B. Thomas, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. John McCready died in the year 1862 testate. His son William J. McCready, one of the executors named in the will, qualified as such in November of that year. In the year 1871 he refused to give additional security, and his powers as executor were revoked. M. B. Tate was appointed administrator of the unadministered estate, with the will annexed. Neither the executor nor the administrator de bonis non returned an inventory of the assets which came to their possession or knowledge; nor did either of them lay before the commissioner of accounts a statement of his receipts for any year, or cause a settlement of his accounts to be made, as required by chapter 121 of the Code. The executor died in the year 1877, and the administrator de bonis non in the year 1892. This suit was instituted in the year 1895 by the assignee of one of the residuary legatees, for a settlement of the accounts of the administrator. The defense relied on is the long and unexplained delay of the complainant in asserting his claim, which was acquired by assignment from Thomas F. McCready, one of the residuary legatees, in the year 1874.

Neither in the complainant's bill nor in his proof is there any explanation furnished of his great delay in bringing suit. While it is true that the administrator returned no inventory and made no settlement of his accounts before the commissioner of accounts, it seems that he had some kind of a settlement or accounting with the residuary legatees in the year 1874 or 1875. In August, 1873, William J. McCready, the late executor, assigned all his interest in the personal estate of the testator, which had or would come to the hands of the administrator de bonis non for administration, to M. McCormick; and on the 4th of September, 1874, McCormick executed a receipt to the administrator in full settlement of that interest in the testator's estate.

On the 29th day of August, 1874, W. R. McCready, one of the residuary legatees, gave the administrator a receipt in full of the interest which he took under the will; and on the 2d day of September following he executed as assignee of his brother John L. McCready, another residuary legatee, a receipt to the administrator in full settlement of that interest.

claims, executed a receipt to the administrator in full of his interest in the estate. The genuineness of this receipt is disputed by the complainant.

Subsequent to the date of those receipts the administrator collected more than $300 on judgments rendered in his favor as administrator before the receipts were given. The receipts being in full of all the interests which the parties giving them had in the testator's estate, the presumption is that the amounts due on those judgments were embraced in the settlement or calculation made when the receipts were given. That presumption, however, is only prima facie, and in a case like this would be more easily rebutted than where the party taking the receipt did not occupy a fiduciary relation.

There is nothing, however, in this case tending to rebut that presumption. After the execution of those receipts, and until the administrator's death,—a period of 17 or 18 years,—all the parties in interest seem to have treated the accounts of the administrator as settled, so far as their interests were concerned. After the administrator's death, and until the institution of this suit, no claim was made against his estate on that account by any of the parties except the complainant; and during the progress of the cause none of the parties in whose favor the decree was rendered appeared, so far as the record shows, and claimed that anything was due them, or that the receipts in full did not include all their interests in the testator's personal estate.

In December, 1892, within a few months after the administrator's death, the complainant asserted his claim, and in the year 1895, as before stated, instituted this suit.

Although the complainant became the assignee of the claim now asserted in the year 1874, it does not appear that he ever notified the administrator of its assignment to him, or made any demand upon him, or sought a settlement of his accounts as administrator. In August, 1875, nearly a year after the complainant became the assignee of Thomas F. McCready's legacy, the administrator paid McCready a small sum, and took his receipt in full for his interest in the estate.

In the year 1891 the administrator and the complainant had a settlement, in which a judgment in favor of Tate, as administrator of the testator's estate, against the complainant, and the private dealings between them, were settled, yet it clearly appears that at that time no mention was made of the claim now asserted.

As before stated, the complainant neither in his pleadings nor his proof gives any explanation for his long delay in asserting his claim.

In the case of Covington v. Griffin's Adm'r, 98 Va. —, 34 S. E. 974, 975, this court, in discussing the question of laches, held, upon

It cannot be said that there has been reasonable diligence in this case. The complainant delayed asserting his claim (notwithstanding the receipts in full had been given to the administrator 20 years before, of which he must have had notice) until the original transactions out of which it arose had become obscure by time, parties had died, and evidence had probably been lost, so that it would be impossible now, with any degree of certainty, to do justice between the parties.

The decree appealed from must therefore be reversed, and the complainant's bill dismissed.

GARDNER v. GARDNER.

GARDNER et al. v. SAME.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 13, 1900.)

DOWER—DEED—CANCELLATION.

1. A widow is entitled to dower in lands of which her husband was seised during the marriage, unless the lands were bought and paid for by another, and conveyed to him by inadvertence.

2. Evidence raising only a strong suspicion that a deed from a son to his father was obtained by the grantee's fraud and undue influence is insufficient to entitle the grantor's heirs to a decree setting it aside.

Appeals from circuit court, Washington county.

Actions by Jennie M. Gardner against John W. Gardner, and by Bessie Gardner and another against same defendant. From a decree dismissing both causes, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed as to the first case, and affirmed as to the second.

J. J. Stuart, L. P. Summers, and White & Penn, for appellants. D. Trigg and D. F. Bailey, for appellee.

CARDWELL, J. This is an appeal from two decrees of the circuit court of Washington county entered in the above-styled causes, heard together; the one on July 12, 1897, refusing to assign dower to the appellant in the first-named cause in the lands in controversy, and the other on October 2, 1897, denying the prayer of appellants in the second-named cause that a certain deed made by their father, John Gardner, conveying the lands to the appellee, John W. Gardner, be declared null and void,—and dismissing both causes.

The facts out of which the suits arise are as follows: By four several deeds of conveyance made in the years 1882, 1884, and 1885, John Gardner, son of appellee, John W. Gardner, acquired title of record to certain undivided interests in the lands in controversy, lying in Washington county, and known as the "Fullen Lands." In 1889 John Gard-the following deed:

"This deed, made this March 24th, 1891, between John Gardner, of the first part, and John W. Gardner, of the second part, all of the county of Washington and state of Virginia:

"Witnesseth, that for and in consideration of one hundred dollars in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, John Gardner, party of the first part, has this day bargained, sold, and does hereby convey to the said John W. Gardner, of the second part, all of my interest in the Hiram Fullen and Minnick land, or Peggy Fullen and Hiram Fullen land, lying on both sides of Poor Valley road, adjoining the lands of Hamilton and others; John W. Gardner having bought and paid for the above-named lands, and the deeds was made to John Gardner, when they should have been made to John W. Gardner, and as the said John Gardner cannot pay him, the said John W. Gardner, for the land, has taken the above one hundred dollars, and conveys his interest in said lands; and John Gardner, party of the first part, warrants generally the title of the lands hereby conveyed.

"Witnesseth the following signatures and seals.

"John W. Gardner. [Seal.]"

Shortly after making this deed, John Gardner instituted his suit in equity against John W. Gardner in the circuit court of Washington county to have the deed set aside and annulled on the ground that it was obtained from him by fraud, and when he was in such a state of intoxication that he was without knowledge of what he was doing; but there were no further proceedings in the cause,—John Gardner having on the 1st day of September, 1891, died intestate, leaving surviving him his said wife and their two infant children, the said Bessie and Sister Gardner.

In April, 1894, appellant Jennie M. Gardner instituted her suit in the circuit court of Washington county against appellee, John W. Gardner, seeking to have dower assigned to her in the lands conveyed to him by the deed above set out; and at the same time, and in the same court, Bessie and Sister Gardner, by their mother, Jennie M. Gardner, as their next friend, instituted their suit against appellee, John W. Gardner, to have the said deed set aside on the ground that it was obtained from their father by fraud and undue influence.

The appellee, John W. Gardner, set up as a defense to these suits that the lands in question were bought and paid for by him and conveyed to him, but by inadvertence or otherwise the middle letter of his name, "W.," was omitted, and that John Gardner, his son, recognizing this fact, in order to correct the mistake, conveyed the lands to him by the deed of March 24, 1891.

Upon oral testimony taken before a commissioner in chancery the circuit court made the decrees appealed from.

It is unnecessary for us to determine whether this oral testimony was admissible to alter the documentary evidence showing that John Gardner had such seisin in the lands in controversy after his marriage with appellant Jennie M. Gardner as to entitle her to dower therein; for, if it were conceded that it was admissible, it is by no means sufficient to sustain appellee's contention that the lands in question were in fact conveyed to him, and the confusion as to title thereto caused by the middle letter of his name being inadvertently or otherwise omitted from each of the four deeds above mentioned. One or more of the deeds to John Gardner describe the land conveyed as adjoining the lands of John W. Gardner; the latter having acquired other interests in the Fullen lands, and owning other lands adjoining. It is true that "title bonds" for two of the interests in the land were taken by John W. Gardner to himself, and it may be that he paid a part of the purchase money, but he knew that his son, John Gardner, claimed and exercised ownership over the lands. He said on several occasions during the period in which John Gardner acquired the deeds to the lands that he was helping the latter (his son) to buy the lands. He united with John Gardner in employing counsel to file a bill in the circuit court of Washington county against other parties owning the remaining interests in the Fullen lands to have partition of the lands, and in which bill it was averred that John Gardner's interest in the lands was acquired by the four deeds above referred to, and his (John W. Gardner's) interest therein acquired by deed from certain other grantors than those to the deeds to John Gardner. On the 25th day of July, 1887, appellee united with John Gardner in a deed of trust conveying their interests in the Fullen lands and other lands of appellee, upon which he resided, to indemnify and save harmless an indorser of a note made by John Gardner to appellee's order, and by him indorsed. Under these circumstances, it is inconceivable that in each of the four deeds conveying an interest in the Fullen lands to John Gardner the mistake was made that appellee contends for; and it is incredible that such a mistake could have been made, and appellee not have discovered it and demanded a correction till March, 1891, when he procured the deed from John Gardner of March 24, 1891. Appellant Jennie M. Gardner not having united with her husband in that deed, she is clearly entitled to dower in the lands thereby conveyed. Therefore the decree of July 12, 1897, is erroneous. Sections 2267 and 2502 of the Code.

While the evidence in the cause is sufficient to raise a strong suspicion that the these causes, it is, in our opinion, insufficient to sustain the allegation, and therefore the decree of October 2, 1897, in so far as it dismissed that bill, must be affirmed, but reversed and annulled in so far as it dismissed the bill in the first-named cause; and the decree of July 12, 1897, entered in the first-named cause, will also be reversed and annulled, with costs to appellant Jennie M. Gardner, and that cause remanded to be further proceeded with in accordance with this opinion.

ROLLER'S ADM'R v. PITMAN'S ADM'R.

TRUST DEED—SALE—COMMISSIONS—ESTOPPEL—RES ADJUDICATA.

1. The trustees under a deed of trust were appointed special commissioners to sell the incumbered property, and included a charge for commissions in their report. The report was confirmed by the court without objection, and was afterwards confirmed in the supreme court. The beneficiary afterwards deducted such commissions from the property in computing a dower interest in the property which was due another. Held to estop the beneficiary from insisting that the allowance was too large.

2. The trustees under a deed of trust were appointed by the court as special commissioners to sell the incumbered property, and they included a charge for commissions in their report. Appeal from circuit court, Rockingham county.

Suit by Roller's administrator against Pitman's administrator. From an order requiring commissioners to account for certain moneys charged by them as commissions for the sale of land, the commissioners appeal. Reversed.

J., J. L. & R. Bumgardner, for appellants. Sipe & Harris, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. The suit out of which this controversy grows was brought to subject the land of Charles A. R. Moore to the satisfaction of the liens thereon. A number of liens were audited, but it is only necessary to mention that the first in order of priority was a deed of trust debt in favor of Samuel Shacklett, which provided for 5 per cent. commissions to the trustee in the event of a sale; the second, an annuity charge in favor of Mrs. E. G. Moore; and the third, a deed of trust debt in favor of John L. Pitman.

On April 14, 1887, the trustees named in the deeds of trust, constituting the first and third liens, were appointed special commissioners of the court to sell the real estate in trustees, from which it appears that the land was sold to John L. Pitman at the price of $18,323.21. This sum was credited by the trustees in their report with an itemized statement of the costs of suit and sale, including therein a commission on the gross sale of 5 per cent., showing a balance in hand of $17,282.66, which was not sufficient to pay in full the third lien in favor of John L. Pitman. On April 19, 1889, this sale was, without objection, duly confirmed, and W. W. Roller, trustee in the Shacklett deed of trust, appointed special receiver to collect the proceeds of sale and disburse the same in accordance with the report of liens confirmed April 14, 1887.

From this decree of April 19, 1889, which, in addition to confirming the sale, finally disposed of a controversy as to the priority of the Pitman deed of trust, an appeal was taken to this court by one of the subsequent lienors of Moore, attacking the priority given the Pitman deed of trust upon the ground that it was not properly acknowledged for recordation. The result of this appeal was an affirmance of the decree of April 19, 1889. See Corey v. Moore, 86 Va. 721, 11 S. E. 114. After the case went back from this court an order was made directing W. W. Roller, as trustee and special receiver, to settle his accounts. This settlement was promptly made by a master commissioner, whose report shows that the entire proceeds of sale had been properly applied, and the special receiver's disbursements supported by proper vouchers. Among the credits allowed in stating this account is the following: "Commissions stated in the report of sale, $916.16." The allowance of this item was excepted to by John L. Pitman upon the ground that the commissions were excessive; the contention being that W. W. Roller and L. Triplett, Jr., were not acting in their capacity as trustees in making the sale in question, but as special receivers of the court, and were therefore only entitled to the commissions allowed by statute. The circuit court subsequently sustained this view, and by decree of January 11, 1897, ordered that W. W. Roller, special receiver in the cause, pay to the administrators of John L. Pitman $765.54, with interest on $577.77 from April 1, 1896, and the costs attending the controversy; that being the amount of commissions reserved by the trustees in excess of the statutory allowance. W. W. Roller having died, his administrator was made a party defendant, and in October, 1897, asked leave to file a bill to review the decree of January 11, 1897, which motion was overruled by decree of November 1, 1897.

From both these decrees (namely, that of January 11, 1897, and that of November 1, 1897) this appeal was allowed.

In the view we take of this case, it is unnecessary to consider whether or not the trustees or special commissioners were, as sale made by them. They acted upon the view that they were entitled to such commissions. When the sale was made they collected as the cash payment $1,040.55,—a sum exactly sufficient to pay the costs of suit and sale, including the commission of 5 per cent.; and in making their report of sale to the court, which they do as trustees, they return therewith an itemized statement of their disbursement of the cash payment, one item of which is, "Coms. on $18,323.21, 5 per cent., $916.16." John L. Pitman, who alone was affected by the sum retained for commissions, was a party to this suit; he was the purchaser of the land sold; he made the cash payment by check to cover the costs of suit and sale, which included the 5 per cent. commissions; he allowed the sale to be confirmed to himself upon the basis of the report of sale as made, without one word of objection to the commissions allowed by the report; and in this court, as appellee in the case of Corey v. Moore, supra, he had the decree confirming the report of sale affirmed, without a suggestion that there was any error in respect to the rate of commissions reserved by the trustees.

After the case went back to the circuit court, Mrs. E. G. Moore filed her petition therein, claiming a right to contingent dower in the land sold, and asking that the same be commuted and paid to her in money. To this petition John L. Pitman filed an answer denying the contingent dower right, but saying that inasmuch as he had been greatly harassed in securing his debt, and was very desirous of finally and forever putting an end to the protracted litigation, he would make no objection to the decree in favor of the petitioner. He then proceeds to show what proportion of the proceeds of sale is subject to the contingent dower right, by deducting the items paramount thereto; and among other deductions he includes this item, "The cost of sale and suit, $1,040.55," thus again recognizing and acquiescing in the 5 per cent. commissions retained by the trustees. Apart, however, from the acquiescence of John L. Pitman in the charge of 5 per cent. commissions made by the trustees at the time of the sale, which abundantly appears from the record, we are of opinion that the question is res adjudicata, and cannot be reopened. Where a given matter becomes the subject of litigation in, and of adjudication by, a court of competent jurisdiction, the court requires the parties to the litigation to bring forward their whole case, and will not (except under special circumstances) permit the same parties to open the same subject of litigation, in respect of matter which might have been brought forward as a part of the subject in contest, but which was not brought forward only because they have, from negligence, inadvertence, or even accident, omitted part of their case.

The plea of res adjudicata applies, except parties to form an opinion and pronounce a judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation, and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward at the time. Henderson v. Henderson, 3 Hare, 115; Diamond State Iron Co. v. Alex. K. Rarig Co., 93 Va. 595, 25 S. E. 894. The question presented in the case at bar could have been raised by an exception to the report of sale in which the commissions were credited to the trustees, and, in justice to all parties, this should have been done. Having permitted the report of sale to be confirmed, and the decree confirming the same to be affirmed by this court, without raising any question as to the propriety of the commissions charged, the rights of the trustees in respect to such commissions must be regarded as finally settled and beyond the reach of judicial inquiry.

For these reasons the decree complained of must be reversed and set aside, and this court will enter such decree as the circuit court ought to have rendered.

DEATON GROCERY CO. v. PEPPER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 27, 1900.)

JUDGMENTS—PAYMENT—NOVATION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. Where a deed of trust is given to a creditor as collateral for a debt, and the property is afterwards purchased by the creditor at a sale under the trust deed, but is subsequently taken from him under a vendor's lien existing against the property when the trust deed was made, the debtor is not entitled to credit on the judgment for the price which the creditor agreed to pay for such property.

2. Evidence that, when a trust deed was given by the son of a judgment debtor to the creditor, the parties knew that there had been a vendor's lien on the property, but that the debtor insisted that it had been extinguished, is admissible, but not conclusive, to determine whether the transfer was for security or was a novation.

3. A son executed a trust deed to certain property to the judgment creditor of the father. In the transaction, in which all were present, the creditor and his attorney testified that it was expressly agreed that the deed was given as security, and not in settlement of the judgment. The attorney testified that the debtor afterwards admitted his liability on the judgment, and an employé of the creditor testified that the debtor stated that the only defense he had against the judgment was that he was not served with notice. These facts were denied by the debtor, but his statements were inconsistent. The son testified that he did not hear all the conversation at the time of the execution of the deed, but that it was given to release his father, but on cross-examination he admitted that the creditor was to have the first lien on the property. One witness testified that he heard the creditor say that the deed released the debtor. Held not sufficient to establish a novation.

against J. E. Pepper. Petition by plaintiff to enforce its judgment against defendant. From the decree, plaintiff appeals. Modified.

Henry & Graham and J. Hampton Hoge, for appellant. Phlegar & Johnson, for appellee.

CARDWELL, J. The Deaton Grocery Company, assignee of Jones & Deaton, held a judgment against A. J. Deyerle & Sons and J. E. Pepper for $810.61, with interest and costs, obtained in the hustings court of the city of Roanoke at its March term, 1893. A. J. Deyerle & Sons were at the time, or soon thereafter became, insolvent, leaving J. E. Pepper as the only solvent judgment debtor from whom the judgment could be made. The Deaton Grocery Company, not desiring to press Pepper, in their negotiations relative to the judgment took a deed of trust from F. P. Pepper, a son of J. E. Pepper, to B. Lacy Hoge, trustee, dated October 20, 1893, and conveying, with covenants of general warranty, a house and lot in the town of Elliston, to secure a note of F. P. Pepper of even date with the deed, drawn to the order of the Deaton Grocery Company, payable one year from its date, for the sum of $1,028.79, the aggregate of the said judgment, including interest, costs, and attorney's commissions for its collection. Default having been made in the payment of the note secured, the trustee sold the house and lot at public auction on the 1st day of December, 1894, and the property was purchased by the Deaton Grocery Company at the price of $750, and on or about that date the trustee conveyed the property to the purchaser.

A short time after this sale Mrs. A. D. Campbell brought her suit in equity in Montgomery county circuit court to enforce a vendor's lien held by her on lands in the town of Elliston that she had previously sold to the Elliston Development Company,—the lot in question being a part of the land to which this vendor's lien attached, and the Elliston Development Company having sold it to R. M. Deyerle, a member of the firm of A. J. Deyerle & Sons; but at Deyerle's request, he being financially embarrassed, it was conveyed to F. P. Pepper.

The Deaton Grocery Company, relying upon the representations made to its representative and to its attorney by R. M. Deyerle and J. E. Pepper when the deed of October 20, 1893, was executed, to the effect that Mrs. Campbell had agreed with R. M. Deyerle that, if he would build a drug store upon the lot in question, she would release her vendor's lien thereon, and that the agreement had been complied with on the part of R. M. Deyerle, thereby entitling him and F. P. Pepper to the release of the house and lot from the vendor's lien, appeared in that suit Campbell, and the house and lot entirely lost to the Deaton Grocery Company.

At the November term, 1897, of the circuit court of Montgomery county, appellant filed its petition in the suit of the New York Enamel & Paint Company against A. J. Deyerle & Sons et al., pending in said court, seeking to enforce its original judgment against A. J. Deyerle & Sons and J. E. Pepper; the latter being solvent, and owning lands upon which the judgment became a lien at its rendition. J. E. Pepper resisted the enforcement of the judgment upon two grounds: One, that he had not been summoned in the action at law in which the judgment was obtained; the other, that there had been a substitution of securities. In other words, that by the giving of the deed of trust of October 20, 1894, by his son F. P. Pepper, there was a novation of the judgment, and he (J. E. Pepper) had been released from it.

It was conceded finally that there was no merit in the first contention; and as to the second the circuit court, upon the evidence pro and con, held that the execution of the deed of trust by F. P. Pepper was not a novation of the judgment, but was intended as additional or collateral security for its payment, but further held by its decree then made that the judgment should be credited with the net amount of the proceeds of the sale of the property conveyed in the deed of trust made by the trustee, and bid in by the Deaton Grocery Company.

From so much of this decree as requires that the judgment of the Deaton Company shall be credited with the net proceeds of the sale of the house and lot by Hoge, trustee, it obtained an appeal to this court; and appellee, J. E. Pepper, assigns as cross error that part of the decree which decides that the deed of trust was not a novation of the judgment.

The grounds upon which the circuit court bases that part of its decree complained of by appellant are: First, that at the time of the execution of the deed of trust it was known to all parties, including appellant and its counsel, that there was a vendor's lien on the property conveyed in the deed of trust in favor of Mrs. A. D. Campbell, and that the trustee did sell the property, subject to the vendor's lien, and it was purchased by appellant at the price of $750; and, second, that it appeared from the record in the suit of Mrs. A. D. Campbell against the Elliston Development Company et al. that after obtaining its deed the appellant appeared in that suit and tried to show that there was no subsisting vendor's lien on the property in favor of Mrs. Campbell.

If the deed of trust was not a novation of the judgment, but was intended only as additional or collateral security for the payment of the judgment, and this security was entirely lost to appellant, it would seem clear

That it was known to all the parties, including the appellant and its counsel, that there was a vendor's lien on the property conveyed, in favor of Mrs. Campbell, and that appellant tried to show that it was not then a subsisting lien in favor of Mrs. Campbell, are circumstances to be considered in determining whether or not there was a novation of the judgment or a substitution of securities, but they are by no means conclusive of the question.

This is the only question in the case that requires our consideration. A decision of it turns upon the evidence as to the intention of the parties, and what was their understanding when the time for the payment of the judgment was extended and the deed of trust executed.

B. Lacy Hoge, the trustee in the deed of trust, was a member of the law firm of Hoge & Hoge, which firm was in charge of the collection of the judgment. He testifies that a day or two prior to the execution of the deed he examined the title to the property to be conveyed, and found of record a small judgment which was a lien thereon, and also the vendor's lien of Mrs. Campbell; that afterwards he and W. E. Deaton (of the Deaton Grocery Company) saw R. M. Deyerle and J. E. Pepper, and told them of these liens; that Pepper and Deyerle both stated that an execution had been levied on the stock of goods in the drug store, which would be sufficient to satisfy the judgment, and that, as to the vendor's lien, an agreement had been made with Mrs. Campbell that if R. M. Deyerle would build a house upon the lot she would release the vendor's lien on it; that Deyerle had built the house (a drug store) on the lot, and Mrs. Campbell would release the lien; that J. E. Pepper then and there agreed that, if the deed of trust was taken, he would see that the judgment was satisfied, and that the vendor's lien was marked "Satisfied." He further states that J. E. Pepper agreed that if Mr. Deaton would extend the time 12 months, and take a deed of trust upon the property as collateral security for the judgment, he (J. E. Pepper) would see that the judgment was satisfied, and that the vendor's lien would be marked "Satisfied" as to this property, and upon his agreeing to do this Mr. Deaton remarked "that he had no disposition to press Mr. Pepper, and was perfectly willing to give him the time, if he was made perfectly safe, and that he would take the deed of trust"; that thereupon he (witness) drew up the deed of trust, and F. P. Pepper was sent for, who, upon arriving, wanted to know if what was being done involved him in any way, saying that the debt was not his and the property was not his, and when assured that he would only be affected to the extent of the property deeded, and would and J. E. Pepper, and was taken as collateral security for the judgment; that it was expressly stated by him to J. E. Pepper, at the time the deed of trust was taken, that he would not be released from the payment of the judgment, and that Mr. Pepper said he readily understood that, but he expected that, if he got the time, R. M. Deyerle would pay the judgment, and he would be saved harmless; that as they started away Mr. Deaton remarked to Mr. Pepper, "Now, you see that that judgment and vendor's lien are marked 'Satisfied,'" and Mr. Pepper said, "I will attend to that at once." Witness further states that before the property was advertised for sale he saw J. E. Pepper, and told him that the note secured by the deed of trust would be credited with any amount the Deaton Grocery Company would purchase the property for, whenever he (Pepper) would have the vendor's lien marked "Satisfied," and he agreed to do so; that after the purchase of the property by appellant he went to see J. E. Pepper, and Pepper agreed to have the lien marked, "Satisfied."

As to the representations made by R. M. Deyerle and J. E. Pepper, and as to what transpired at the time of the execution of the trust deed and before, witness Hoge is corroborated by W. E. Deaton. He positively states that it was understood that the deed of trust was not a novation of the judgment or a substitution of securities, and that J. E. Pepper came to witness in the spring or summer of 1897 to get him to refrain from the enforcement of the judgment, saying that it was a just debt, and that he would sell the last thing in the world to pay his just obligations; that if he (witness) would be patient, and not press him, he would make an arrangement to pay the debt, —referring to the fact that witness had been kind to him, in not sooner enforcing the judgment. Witness explains that the object appellant had in extending the time for the payment of the judgment and taking the trust deed, and in defending the suit of Mrs. Campbell to enforce her vendor's lien on the drug-store lot, was to befriend J. E. Pepper, who was only security for the debt, and towards whom witness felt very kindly. Witness further says that J. E. Pepper in no way claimed, or even intimated a claim, that he was released from the judgment by the deed of trust, and that Pepper never applied to witness or to the Deaton Company to have the judgment in question marked "Satisfied."

Witness Straus, who is also connected with the Deaton Grocery Company, appellant, says that in August, 1897, J. E. Pepper came into his office, looking for Mr. Deaton, saying that he wanted to see Mr. Deaton about a debt he had against him; that he had seen Mr Deaton, and had some talk

:h him about it, a few weeks before. In : conversation with this witness, J. E. pper said that he did not know what to about it, as his attorney had advised him it he did not think he ought to pay the ot, because he had not been notified that udgment would be taken, whereupon wit-ss asked Pepper if that was the only thing the way, and he said it was.

R. M. Deyerle having died before the depo-ions in the case were taken, his version to what was said or what was understood ien the deed of trust was given by F. P.
pper is not known.

J. E. Pepper, in his deposition, claims to ve known nothing of the judgment until it before he had the interview with W. E. aton in the summer of 1897, but afterards abandons his claim that no notice was :ved on him in the suit in which the judg-nt was obtained. He denies the material itements made by witnesses Hoge and aton, and gives a different version of iat was said or understood when the deed trust was given, but testifies in an eva-e manner and makes inconsistent statents. He admits that he wrote on Aust 16, 1897, to Hoge & Hoge, attorneys, in ply to a letter from them asking a settle-nt of the judgment, saying: "F. P. Pep-r will be at home in a few days. Then I n answer you more fully. It is not worth ile bringing suit in the circuit court. If
: have to pay it, we can arrange to pay it thout further costs." He again wrote to ese attorneys on August 28, 1897, in reply a letter from them, in which he says:
'. P. Pepper says that he agreed with R.
Deyerle to join him in the deed of trust the drug store to release me on the Dean Grocery debt. R. M. Deyerle so underod it in that way." He therein claims at no notice was served on him when the dgment was gotten, but makes no claim or ention, even, in that letter or the one of igust 16th, of any other defense to the dgment, or that he had any understanding th appellant or its attorney that he was eased from the judgment by the deed of ist.

F. P. Pepper claims in his deposition that e deed of trust was given in order to reise his father (J. E. Pepper) from the judg-nt, but he admits that he did not hear all the conversation between J. E. Pepper
d R. M. Deyerle, W. E. Deaton, and B. icy Hoge, when it was agreed that the ne for the payment of the judgment would extended 12 months, and the deed of trust is executed by him; and he finally admit-l on cross-examination (whereby the :ight of his testimony is greatly impair) that it was agreed by all at the time the ed of trust was given that appellant was have a first lien upon the drug-store prop-ty. It is manifest that this witness was stifying from impressions made upon him to his father being released, by conversans he had with R. M. Deyerle about giving the deed of trust on the drug store, and not from anything that was said to him or in his presence by W. E. Deaton or appellant's attorney. His statements are inconsistent, and at variance with the rational version of the transaction as given by witnesses Deaton and Hoge, and with their statements of the reasons for taking the deed of trust, and at variance with the statement of J. E. Pepper.

The testimony given by the remaining witnesses examined by appellee is unimportant, except the statements made by G. W. Foster that he heard F. P. Pepper ask Mr. Deaton or Mr. Hoge if the trust deed released his father, and they told him it did. This is contradicted by both Deaton and Hoge. Even if it were true, it does not impair the weight of the testimony of Deaton and Hoge as to what was understood at the time, viz. that J. E. Pepper was not to be released from the judgment; for it is shown that all then thought the drug store worth enough to pay the judgment, if the prior liens thereon were removed, as F. P. Pepper admits they agreed to cause to be done. It further appears that the property could have been sold, after the deed of trust was given, for $1,000, had the prior liens been removed, whereby J. E. Pepper would have been relieved.

Much stress is laid, in support of the cross error assigned, upon the interpretation given by the court below of Hoge's statement of how the property was sold under the trust deed, viz.: "Sold it subject to the vendor's lien." He could only have meant, under the circumstances, that the lien had not been formally marked "Satisfied"; for Pepper had promised before, and promised after, to have it so marked.

It is not a reasonable supposition that appellant, by bidding in the property at $750, agreed to take it at that price, subject to the vendor's lien thereon or regardless of it; i. e. assume practically its payment. Appellant was bound to have known, as the evidence clearly shows, that unless this lien was removed the property would be of little or no value to it. If J. E. Pepper was to be released from the judgment by the substitution of the deed of trust as the security for its payment, it was an easy matter for him to have had the judgment so indorsed on the record; and it is not at all probable that the successful business man he is shown to be would have failed to require that the judgment be released as to him, or failed to claim promptly, when demand was made upon him for its payment, after the drug-store lot had been sold under the deed of trust, that he was entitled to the release by reason of an understanding he had with appellant when the deed was executed. Instead of this, he sought to obtain further time within which to pay the judgment, recognizing his liability therefor; and not until he was advised by his son, F. P. Pepper, of some understanding that the latter claimed to have had

We are of opinion that the decree appealed from, in so far as it requires the judgment of appellant asserted in this cause to be credited with the net proceeds of the sale of the drug store and lot made by Hoge, trustee, is erroneous. Therefore in this respect the decree will be reversed and annulled, but in all other respects affirmed, with costs to appellant; and the cause will be remanded, to be further proceeded with in accordance with this opinion.

BURDINE v. BURDINE'S EX'R et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 13, 1900.)

WILLS—CONTRACT TO DEVISE—VALIDITY—ENFORCEMENT—CONSTRUCTION—EVIDENCE—DOWER.

1. Emancipated slaves (mother and daughter) remained in the service of their former master until a short time before he gave them a bond conditioned that he would devise certain real and personal property, definitely described, "provided they would return and live and remain with" him and his wife during their natural lives. Held, in an action brought after his death to compel his personal representatives to convey and deliver the property, that the contract was sufficiently definite, both as to the property to be devised and the services to be performed.

2. Parties who have complied with the terms and conditions of a contract to devise property to them are entitled to specific performance thereof, though they did not sign it.

3. A master contracted to devise property to his former slaves (mother and daughter), who had been emancipated, provided they would live and remain with him and his wife during their natural lives. Held, that the daughter's right to the property to be devised to her depended upon the performance of the agreement on her part, and not on the duration of the life of her mother, who died before the master.

4. Where a master contracted to devise property to a former slave, who had been emancipated, provided she would remain in his service during his life, and then retained her in his service until he died, notwithstanding her misconduct, for which she might have been discharged, he thereby condoned her acts, and she was entitled to the property.

5. Evidence that illicit relations had existed between the parties to a contract to devise property, before it was made, was insufficient to show that the contract was founded on an immoral consideration, where the contract purported to be for future services which were lawful, and which were rendered.

6. A widow is not entitled to dower in land which her husband had agreed to devise to another before his marriage.

Appeal from circuit court, Russell county.

Bill in equity by Nancy Burdine against N. E. Burdine's executor and others. From a decree dismissing complainant's bill, she appeals. Reversed.

White & Penn, Chapman & Gillespie, and Bailey, Price & Byars, for appellant. E. S. Finney and J. C. Gent, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. The record shows that in the year 1883 N. E. Burdine, of Russell county, and two of his former slaves, Roena and is in the following words:

"Know all men by these presents, that I, N. E. Burdine, of the county of Russell and state of Virginia, am held and firmly bound in the sum of ten thousand dollars to Roena and Nancy Burdine, colored, of the same county and state.

"The conditions of the above bond are as follows: That I, N. E. Burdine, will make or cause to be made a good will to the land that I purchased of Christopher Frick, and reference can be had to said deed; the said land to be divided between the two parties last named as follows: Roena to have the land running from John Alderson's east, commencing at a water gap; thence up the bluff through a sugar orchard, and with the top of Cedar Ridge, in the direction of Clinch Mountain, as far as said land extends, and with the lines of same to the lands of Barnett Reynolds, dec'd, and J. W. Darton's land to the public road, and with the same to the beginning, except four acres, including the Lastly house. And Nancy Burdine, colored, daughter of Roena, is to have four acres last named, and all of said tract east of Cedar Ridge, and all north of the public road. I also give to Roena Burdine, colored, one-fourth part of the stock and of the grain and meat, &c., and growing crops, that may be on the farm at my death; all the household and kitchen furniture at said farm. I also give to her my bank stock, amounting to one thousand dollars, in the Bank of Abingdon.

"And I give to Nancy Burdine five hundred dollars cash, all this property and cash to pass to the other parties by will at my death, provided they live and remain with myself and wife during our natural lives; and, in the event that Roena Burdine should die first, she is to have the bank stock mentioned above; and provided, further, that she return to my home at once, and remain, as above stated. I furthermore bind myself to treat both parties with kindness and respectability, they treating me and my wife in like manner.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal this 6th day of April, 1883.

"N. E. Burdine. [Seal.]"

From the close of the Civil War, which resulted in the emancipation of Roena and her daughter Nancy, they had remained with or in the service of their former master until a short time before the said agreement was entered into, when they determined to quit his service and remove to Washington county. The mother did leave, taking with her her own and a part of her daughter's personal effects; but the latter, on account of the severe illness of her old mistress, had remained, and was still in his service when the contract sued on was made. The mother had been a trusted and faithful servant, who for many years had been, on account of the feeble health of Mrs. Burdine, charged with the oversight and management of much of in the home of Mr. Burdine and wife, who were childless, and treated more like a child than a servant. Among her duties was that of caring for Mrs. Burdine, who had been for many years subject to some chronic disease.

In a few days after the mother quit Mr. Burdine's service, he set about, directly and through others, to secure her return to his home, and to get her and her daughter to continue to live with them, and succeeded in getting them to agree to do so upon the terms stipulated in the writing sued on.

The daughter, after setting out in her bill the agreement with herself and mother, her construction of it, and the circumstances under which it was made, alleged that, pursuant to the agreement, her mother did at once return to Mr. Burdine's, and they together lived with and served him and his wife until the death of her mother, which was in the year 1885, and that after the death of the latter she continued to live with and serve them until his wife's death, and afterwards until his death; that she did not live all the time at the home of Mr. Burdine, for the reason that after the death of her old mistress Mr. Burdine married again, and, the second wife not desiring her to live at the house with them, he moved her to one of his farm houses, where she remained in his employment and rendered him valuable services until his death; that, she and her mother having done and performed all they were required to do under the agreement, it became the duty of Mr. Burdine to keep and perform it on his part; that, having failed to make a will and give them the property mentioned, as he had agreed to do, it became the duty of his representative and heirs to deliver and convey the property mentioned in the agreement to the complainant and her mother's heirs and representatives, according to their respective rights, and this she prayed the court would compel them to do.

Strictly speaking, an agreement to dispose of property by will cannot be specifically enforced,—not in the lifetime of the party, because all testamentary papers are, from their nature, revocable; not after his death, because it is no longer possible for him to make a will. Yet courts of equity can do what is equivalent to a specific performance of such an agreement, by compelling those upon whom the legal title has descended to convey or deliver the property in accordance with its terms, upon the ground that it is charged with a trust in the hands of the heir at law, devisee, personal representative, or purchaser with notice of the agreement, as the case may be. 3 Pars. Cont. (6th Ed.) § 406; Hale v. Hale, 90 Va. 728, 730, 19 S. E. 739.

Several grounds of defense are relied on. The first is that the agreement cannot be specifically enforced, because it is uncertain its language is not as clear as it might be, we do not think there is any serious difficulty in determining either the duties or the rights of the parties under it, when considered in the light of the circumstances under which it was made.

The mother and the daughter had for many years, as the record shows, lived with, and performed certain duties for, Mr. Burdine and his wife, which were well known to both parties. The agreement of the servants, on their part, was that the mother should return to the home of Mr. Burdine, and that she and her daughter "live and remain with" Mr. Burdine and his wife during their natural lives, for the purpose of rendering such services as they had been accustomed to render them. This was manifestly the intention of the parties, and the meaning of the agreement. In consideration of such services, they were each entitled to receive from Mr. Burdine, by devise and bequest, certain real and personal property, definitely described; but, in the event the mother died before Mr. and Mrs. Burdine, she, or rather her estate, was only entitled to receive his stock in the Bank of Abingdon.

The next objection made to the specific enforcement of the agreement is that it is lacking in mutuality, being signed only by Mr. Burdine, and, as he could not have it specifically enforced against the other parties, they cannot enforce it against him.

The question of the specific execution of unilateral contracts for the sale of real estate was considered and passed upon by this court in the recent case of Land Co. v. Johnston, reported in 95 Va. 223, 28 S. E. 175, which seems to have been overlooked by counsel. It was held in that case that specific performance of a unilateral contract will be enforced against the party who signed it, the other requisites for specific performance existing, although the other party did not sign, and there was no mutuality of remedies between them at the time the agreement was made; the filing of the bill by the other party for specific performance making the remedy and the obligation mutual.

In the case of Cox v. Cox, 26 Grat. 310, which was a suit brought by the widow and heirs of a son for the specific execution of a verbal agreement made with his father that, if the son would support him and his wife during their lives, the father would give the son the tract of land on which they lived, the mutuality required in such cases was discussed. Judge Staples, who delivered the opinion of the court, after stating that courts of equity, as a general rule, will not decree in favor of a plaintiff who is himself not bound by the agreement, said: "It is very true that, if Joseph Cox had complied with all the terms and conditions upon which the land was to be devised to him, he or his representatives would be entitled to a decree for specific performance. The vendor, having received the full consideration, would, of course, be bound to convey." And the same is true in this case, although the complainant and her mother did not sign the agreement sued on, if they complied with the terms and conditions upon which Mr. Burdine agreed to make the devise and bequest to them.

Another objection is that the mother and daughter were botn to serve Mr. Burdine and wife during their lives, as a condition precedent to the gift of the property, and, being a condition precedent, there could be no recovery by either, since the mother died before the condition was complied with.

While the agreement is between the mother and daughter on one side, it does not make the rights of one depend upon the service or the life of the other. The mother, in consideration of her returning to and living with Mr. Burdine and wife, was to receive, if she outlived them, certain definitely described property; but, in the event she died before they did, she was only entitled to receive a part of that property, viz. the bank stock. The daughter, for continuing to live with them as long as they lived, would become entitled to certain other property, equally well defined. Her right to that property depended, not upon the duration of her mother's life, but upon the performance of the conditions of the agreement on her part.

This brings us to the next objection, viz. that the daughter did not keep and perform the contract.

The answer avers that the daughter not only failed and refused to render the services she owed to Mr. Burdine and wife, and especially to the wife, but became unruly, vicious, aggravating, disobedient, and lewd; that she became the mother of five illegitimate children, thereby disqualifying herself from carrying out the contract on her part if she had desired to do so; and that her conduct became so notoriously bad that Mr. Burdine had to move her away from his mansion house to another part of his premises, two or three miles distant.

Such misconduct as is set out in the answer furnished ample grounds for her discharge, and, if she had been dismissed therefor, it is clear that she could not maintain this suit.

The evidence fully sustains the answer as to some of the acts of misconduct averred, but it does not show that the daughter was discharged for them. On the contrary, it appears that she lived at the home of Mr. Burdine until his wife's death, and afterwards until his second marriage. The second wife and the daughter not getting on pleasantly together, the latter was removed to a small house, not far from his dwelling house, near his store, where she lived until he desired to use or lease that house in connection with his storehouse, when he removed her to another house on his farm. After removing her two or three times from one place to another on his during which time she was render more or less service, he finally remove a house in the yard at his farm house, she lived until his death, in the ye While living there, where Mr. Burdine bed and furniture, and spent from to one-half of his time, the daughter his cows, kept the keys of his gran crib, and looked generally after things the house. During the last two yea life, being old and feeble and unwell other person living in the farm slept much of his time in the da house, and was waited on and cared her.

It is not shown that there was any between them during all this peri than that which the daughter is se have enforced, or that either she or M dine treated that agreement as at Having retained her in his service expiration of the term, notwithstan acts of misconduct for which she mig been discharged, but was not, they considered as having been waived doned by him. Wood, Mast. & S. § 1

It is also urged in argument that agreement cannot be enforced becau founded upon an immoral consider namely, for the future illicit associa cohabitation between Mr. Burdine a ena, the mother.

There is evidence showing that i relations had existed between Mr. B and the mother, and that he had ad that he was the father of the da though not of her other children. T also evidence tending to show that re son why the mother left his house w went to Washington county was t might lead a different life. It does pear, however, either from the agree otherwise, that the consideration agreement was the future illicit coha of the parties. It purports to be for on her part which were lawful, and were rendered.

In order, says Mr. Wood in his Master and Servant (section 204. to render a contract void for illeg must necessarily involve the breach statute or of the common law, or bonos mores; and when it may or may so, according to the circumstances be presumed that it only involves the of a lawful and proper act, and will tained, as illegality is never presum must be proved, or must clearly appe the face of the contract. 10 was made a party defendant to this suit an amended bill, is entitled to the bank ock mentioned in the agreement of April 1883.

We are further of opinion that the widow N. E. Burdine is not entitled to dower in e land which he agreed to devise to the nplainant. The agreement which bound n to make the devise was of record when e second marriage occurred. The rights ich his widow acquired by that marriage re subordinate to those of the complain- t. The title of a widow to dower in her sband's land, being derived through the sband, is liable to be defeated by every osisting claim or incumbrance existing be- e the inception of her right, and which uld have defeated the husband's seisin. Scrib. Dower, 591, 594; 4 Kent, Comm. 2 Minor, Inst. (4th Ed.) 146, 147; 1 ashb. Real Prop. 163.

t is well settled that if a man, before rriage, enters into a contract for the sale land, upon certain terms and conditions, l the terms and conditions are performed, widow is not entitled to dower in the d, although the husband dies without king a conveyance. David E. Moore, for plaintiff in error. The Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

KEITH, P. Plaintiff in error was indicted in the county court of Rockbridge county for selling liquor without a license, and was sentenced to pay a fine of $50; and, that judgment having been affirmed by the circuit court of Rockbridge county, the case is now before us for review upon a writ of error.

There were two counts in the indictment, the first of which charges the defendant with unlawfully selling by retail to P. I. Huffman and H. T. Robinson wine, ardent spirits, malt liquors, or some mixture thereof, without having obtained license therefor as required by law; and the second count charges him with selling to the same persons in quantities of less than a gallon, without first obtaining a license as required by law.

There was no demurrer to the indictment, and no ground upon which one could have been interposed (Peer's Case, 5 Grat. 674); and when the case was tried in the county court the plaintiff in error, without entering any plea, submitted the case to the court without a jury.

The facts proved are: That the plaintiff in error is a licensed distiller, and as such sold whisky to P. I. Huffman and H. T. Robinson. That the sale was not made to them jointly, but separately; each buying for himself a gallon or more, which was measured out and placed in jugs left in the custody of the plaintiff in error subject to the order of the purchasers. The sales were made during the months of September, October, and November preceding the trial, and the price was paid at the time of the purchase, or charged on a running account. Huffman's whisky was put in a jug tagged "P. I.," and was taken away by him in quantities of less than one gallon, or delivered in quantities of less than one gallon, on his order, to Robinson, who conveyed and delivered the same to Huffman. That Robinson had his gallon put in a jug, which was left in the custody of McKeever under substantially the same circumstances as that which was sold to Huffman.

The errors assigned to this judgment are, first, because plaintiff in error is a licensed distiller, and under the law had a right to sell liquor manufactured by him, in quantities not less than a gallon, and there is no proof that he did sell in quantities less than a gallon.

This assignment of error is disposed of by Richardson's Case, reported in 76 Va. 1007. The jury was there instructed that, to constitute a sale by the gallon, there must be a sale and delivery to the buyer of an entire gallon; that a contract for a gallon, and the delivery of the same in parcels at different times, is a violation of the law. This instruction was held to be correct; the court saying in the course of its opinion "that the purpose of the law would be defeated by the interpretation that the distiller might say, of a pint or half pint at a time,—as he might call for it. Such sales of spirituous liquor would be mere shifts to violate the statute."

The second error assigned is because the indictment charges the sale of liquor to two persons jointly, and the proof was of separate and distinct sales to each of them.

We are of opinion that there is no such variance between the averment and the proof as would warrant us in reversing the judgment. The indictment, it is true, charges a sale to Huffman and Robinson, and the facts proved show a separate sale of liquor to each of them. The offense charged against plaintiff in error is the sale of ardent spirits without first having obtained a license as required by law, in the first count; and in having sold it in a quantity of less than a gallon, in the second count. There was no plea interposed, no objection made to the introduction of the evidence, and the case is before us as upon a demurrer to the evidence; and, so treated, we cannot say that the facts proved are insufficient to support the judgment, which is affirmed.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. DAWSON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 20, 1900.)

CARRIERS—PASSENGERS—PERSONAL INJURIES—PRESUMPTION—BURDEN OF PROOF—APPEAL—DAMAGES.

1. Where a freight train, with a caboose attached, in which passengers are seated, separates, and the separated cars collide with such force that a passenger is thrown from his seat and injured, the presumption is that the accident resulted from the company's negligence, and the burden of proof is on the company to establish want of negligence.

2. The appellate court will not set aside a verdict unless the evidence is plainly insufficient to support it.

3. A verdict in an action for personal injuries will not be disturbed on the ground that the damages awarded are excessive, when there is nothing to indicate that the jury acted under the impulse of an improper motive, gross error, or misconception.

Error to circuit court, Nelson county.

Action by one Dawson against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Chas. M. Blackford, for plaintiff in error. S. B. Whitehead and Diggs & Perkins, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. The defendant in error bought a ticket which entitled him to transportation on a freight train of the plaintiff in error, which was provided with a car for the use of passengers, from Covesville, in Albemarle county, to Fabers Mills, in Nelson county. While on the way the train, consisting of about 30 cars, separated, from some collided with such force that the defendant in error was thrown from his seat with great violence and seriously injured.

This suit for damages followed, and resulted in a verdict in favor of the defendant in error for $2,000.

The sole ground of error assigned is that the circuit court refused to set aside the verdict upon the ground that it was excessive and contrary to the law and the evidence.

The plaintiff in error contends that the accident was inevitable, and that no skill or care on its part could have avoided it, and that the risk of such an accident was assumed by the defendant in error when he bought his ticket.

It is well settled that a railroad company is held to as strict an accountability for the negligence of its employés in the management of a freight train with a caboose attached, in which passengers are seated, as the law imposes in the transportation of passengers on trains specially provided for that purpose.

When a person becomes a passenger on a freight train, he assumes the risks and inconvenience necessarily and reasonably incident to that mode of travel; but life and limb are as valuable in the caboose as in the palace car, and the degree of care required to avoid damage to the passenger is as high in the one case as the other. Thomp. Carr. p. 234, § 20; Railroad Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291, 23 L. Ed. 898.

Where an injury happens as the result of an accident such as the record discloses, the presumption is that it occurred by the negligence of the railroad company; and the burden of proof is on the company to establish that there has been no negligence whatsoever, and that the damage was caused by inevitable casualty, or by some cause which human care and foresight could not prevent. Railroad Co. v. Noell's Adm'r, 32 Grat. 394.

In the case at bar the plaintiff in error has failed to sustain the burden thus imposed upon it. The evidence, which has been certified, was sufficient to justify the jury in the conclusion reached,—that the accident was the result of negligence on the part of the plaintiff in error. Certainly it cannot be said that the evidence is plainly insufficient to support the verdict,—a conclusion necessary to justify this court in setting the verdict aside because contrary to the evidence. Kimball v. Friend's Adm'r, 95 Va. 125, 27 S. E. 901.

Nor can the verdict be disturbed upon the ground that it is excessive; there being nothing to indicate that the jury, in ascertaining the damage, acted under the impulse of an improper motive, gross error, or misconception of the subject. Railroad Co. v. Shott, 92 Va. 34, 22 S. E. 811.

For these reasons, the judgment must be affirmed.

ANKIN v. SIEVERN & K. R. CO. et al.

ESPASS—COMPLAINT—DEMURRER — PLEADNG—CONCLUSION OF LAW—RAILROAD—RIGHT F WAY—CONSENT OF LANDOWNER—PREUMPTION OF—ASSAULT AND BATTERY—OMPLAINT.

1. In determining a demurrer to a complaint trespass on real property on the ground at the complaint does not state facts suffint to constitute a cause of action, all alleged cumstances of aggravation must be elimted.

2. Where a complaint for trespass on real perty alleges that defendant, a railroad corration, entered on plaintiff's land, and did tain acts, "without having acquired a right way through the lands of this plaintiff," the rds, "without having acquired a right of y," etc., present a mere conclusion of law, d hence must be eliminated in determining a murrer on the ground that the complaint es not state facts sufficient to constitute a ise of action.

3. Where a complaint for trespass alleges t defendant, a railroad corporation, by its ployés, entered on plaintiff's land to grade d lay the tracks; that such employés were in act of cutting down two oak trees, when intiff requested them not to do so, whereup- the foreman threatened to strike her, and erwise abused her; that her son came up to quire the cause of the trouble, whereupon the eman and the employés, with loud cursing, lowed him towards plaintiff's house, threating him, and thereupon proceeded to lop off veral of the branches of such trees, but did t cut them down, and that defendants "thus oke plaintiff's close,"—the words "thus broke intiff's close," etc., being a mere characterion of facts previously alleged, which in mselves must show a breaking of plaintiff's se, must be eliminated in determining a deurrer on the ground that the complaint does t state facts sufficient to constitute a cause action.

4. A complaint against a railroad company trespass on plaintiff's land, which fails to ege that defendant entered on the land for purpose of constructing its road, without intiff's consent, is fatally defective, since a lroad company chartered under the laws of s state, and authorized to construct a road, not a trespasser for entering on lands for the pose of such construction, unless such entry made without the owner's consent.

5. Where a landowner has knowledge of the t entry on his land by a railroad company the construction of its tracks, and makes objection thereto in the manner prescribed statute, his consent will be presumed; and cannot maintain an action against the comy for trespass, his only remedy being for mpensation under the condemnation statutes.

6. Plaintiff alleged that defendant, a railroad mpany, by its employés, entered on plaintiff's d to grade and lay the road; that such emyés were in the act of cutting down two trees, when plaintiff requested them not do so, whereupon the foreman cursed her, lered her to get away from there, or he uld put her in the penitentiary, threatened strike her, and greatly frightened and intimied her, and otherwise maltreated and abused . Held, that the complaint does not state a d cause of action for trespass on the per, as no assault on plaintiff is alleged, and mere words, under the circumstances, are civilly actionable.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of ington county; James Aldrich, Judge.

Action by L. C. Rankin against the Sievern Knoxville Railroad Company and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of the court below:

"This case comes before the court upon a motion, in the nature of a demurrer to dismiss the complaint herein upon the grounds that said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in said complaint, and the notice of the motion to dismiss the same must be read at this point as a part of this decree. A demurrer admits all the facts properly pleaded in the complaint. Therefore all of the facts stated in the complaint in this action must be regarded as true for the purposes of this motion. This rule does not refer to or include statements of conclusions of law. What are the facts stated in the complaint? Paragraphs 2 and 3 specifically state that both of the defendants are railroad corporations 'duly organized and existing' under the laws of this state. As such they are common carriers, and authorized to enter upon and acquire rights of way. Paragraph 1 alleges that the plaintiff was at the time stated in the complaint, and still is, the owner in fee of a certain tract of land 'through which the line of the Sievern & Knoxville Railroad has since been constructed, and that she was at that time, and still is, residing on said tract of land.' Paragraph 4 states that on or about the 3d day of May, 1898, 'the defendants had in their employ' a certain gang of hands 'then engaged in finishing and grading and laying the track and putting up telegraph poles along the line of the said Sievern & Knoxville Railroad Company,' the said gang being 'jointly employed by the Carolina Midland Railroad Company and the Sievern & Knoxville Railroad Company under some arrangement or agreement the terms of which are unknown to the plaintiff.' Paragraph 5: 'That the said gang of hands under one Rutledge, as foreman, was employed by both of the said defendants, and in the course of their engagement as such were proceeding along the line of the proposed track of the Sievern & Knoxville Railroad Company, and without having acquired a right of way through the lands of this plaintiff, and were in the act of cutting down two large oak trees of great beauty and value, which stood near the residence of this plaintiff, when she approached them, and requested them not to do so, whereupon the said Rutledge, foreman of said gang of hands, cursed this plaintiff, and ordered her to get away from there, or he would put her in the penitentiary, and threatened to strike her, and greatly frightened and intimidated her, she being an old woman; and otherwise maltreated and abused her to her great damage.' It is also alleged that said Rutledge and hands, 'with great violence and loud cursing,' followed Hiram Rankin, the son of plaintiff, who came up at the time, towards plaintiff's house. Hiram Rankin is not a party to this action. The complaint, after stating these facts, adds 'and thereupon' the oak trees, but did not cut them down." It is possible to read this complaint in various ways. The cause of action may be either: (1) The lopping off of 'several of the most beautiful branches' of 'two large oak trees of great beauty and value, which stood near the residence' of plaintiff; (2) trespass upon the realty; or (3) trespass upon the person of plaintiff. As the question is, does the complaint state facts sufficient to constitute any cause of action? and not, does it state facts sufficient to constitute a certain cause of action? we must answer the first query: As the lopping off of the branches of the oak trees was an injury to the realty, and may be included in the second cause of action above stated, we will divide the alleged trespasses into two classes: First, what is alleged as a trespass upon the realty; and, second, what is alleged as a trespass upon the person of plaintiff. The complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute an action of trespass upon the realty. The complaint states that defendants, railroad corporations, had entered and taken possession of the land, the strip on which the hands were 'then engaged in finishing and grading and laying the track and putting up telegraph poles along the line of the said Sievern & Knoxville Railroad Company.' This allegation and the complaint, read as a whole, clearly state that the defendants had not only entered upon the strip of land, but were also actually and actively engaged in the construction of their railroad thereon. It was argued that the allegations in paragraph 1 that the plaintiff was and is the owner of the land 'through which the line of the railroad has since been constructed' negatives the idea that the defendants were in possession of the land, and constructing a railroad thereon, the argument being that, 'if the railroad has been constructed "since" the date of the alleged trespass, it was not constructed at said date.' Section 1752, Rev. St. 1893, reads: 'Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent entry upon any lands for purposes of survey and location; and if in any case the owner of any lands shall permit the person or corporation requiring the right of way over the same to enter upon the construction of the highway without previous compensation, the said owner shall have the right, after the highway shall have been constructed, to demand compensation, and to petition for an assessment of the same in the manner hereinbefore directed: provided, such petition shall be filed within twelve months after the highway shall have been completed through his or her lands.' Under this act, if a railroad corporation is permitted, by the owner of any land, 'to enter upon' or begin 'the construction of the highway,' then the entry, possession, and subsequent construction, as we shall see hereafter, is lawful, and in no wise a trespass. If the owner of the lands permit the corporation 'to enter upon the construction of the highway,' as termed in the statute—was then located, the defendants were in possession, and had entered upon the construction of said highway under the law, and under this state of facts the defendants were lawfully in possession of the land, and with the permission of plaintiff. Counsel for plaintiff argue that the allegations in the fourth paragraph of the complaint that the hands were 'then engaged in finishing, grading, and laying the track, and putting up telegraph poles along the line of the road,' is consistent with the idea that said hands were at work on the part of the line which did not traverse the land in question; therefore that paragraph does not amount to an allegation that defendants were in possession of the land in question. This construction of the language of the complaint cannot be sustained. It is the duty of plaintiff to state her case

"On May 3, 1898, at the very time of the trespass, the allegation is that 'the gang of hands' were 'then' engaged in 'grading,' etc., the 'line'; that 'in the course of their engagement' they were 'proceeding along the line,' and were 'in the act' of cutting the oak trees, 'near the residence' of plaintiff, when she 'approached them,' etc. No one would, 'under these allegations,' suppose that the 'foreman' and 'gang of hands' were upon the premises of the plaintiff merely 'for the purposes of survey and location' (Rev. St. § 1752); but the natural inference is that they had entered upon, begun 'the construction of the highway.' The allegation in paragraph 5 that defendants had not 'acquired a right of way through the lands of this plaintiff' was insufficient. Tompkins v. Railroad Co., 33 S. C. 218, 11 S. E. 692. Plaintiff contends that the complaint alleges that the defendants had not acquired, in any way, a right of way across plaintiff's lands; therefore they had no right of entry except for the purpose of survey and location, which does not allow defendants to cut down valuable trees, or to make any alteration of the premises; that the foreman and hands were committing 'a trespass in the name of the defendants,' and that 'the line of authorities in South Carolina, which hold that the land once taken possession of by a railroad company under the exercise of the right of eminent domain cannot be recovered in an action is entirely inapplicable to the case,' and in support of this position cites Tompkins v. Railroad Co., 37 S. C. 387, 16 S. E. 149, as conclusive upon the point: 'I have at some length analyzed the complaint, and held that it does allege that the defendant companies had entered upon the land in question, and were engaged in the construction of their road or highway; and a comparison of the complaint in this action with that in Tompkins no allegation in the complaint herein that the entry of the defendant companies upon the land was without the consent of plaintiff, which, under the Tompkins Case, is essential. There are no allegations in the complaint that defendants entered upon the land after notice from the owner refusing consent, or of like matters; but all that is said is, in substance, that the defendants, by their servants, were proceeding along the 'line' which was 'then' being graded, etc., 'without having acquired a right of way through the lands of this plaintiff,' which allegation amounts to nothing; for the statute expressly provides the mode of enforcing the right to obtain compensation after a railroad company has entered upon the construction of its road, and the sole question here is whether or not defendants had entered upon the construction of their road under the right of eminent domain, which frees defendants from the charge of being trespassers. As the Tompkins Case is relied upon by plaintiff, I will refer to it again. At page 383, 37 S. C., and page 149, 16 S. E., the allegations in the complaint are substantially stated. Then plaintiff distinctly and affirmatively alleges that when the railroad compeny went upon the premises said company did not notify plaintiff that the right of way would be required; and, also, that the plaintiffs, as soon as they ascertained that the railroad would probably extend or run through the premises, gave notice to the railroad company that they objected to the same, and required that the company should proceed according to law. It was alleged that this notice was 'formally' given, and because the allegation did not state that the notice was 'in writing' the complaint was demurrable. In the complaint under consideration there is not the slightest allegation that any notice was ever given by the plaintiff, nor that she did not consent to the use of the land by the railroad; and there is a statement that the 'line' was 'then' being 'constructed.' Under the law, as we shall see, it must be presumed that she permitted defendants to 'enter' upon her land. 'It is true that there is an allegation in the complaint that the defendants never notified the plaintiffs that the right of way over their lands was required for the purpose of constructing the railroad, but, as held in Verdier v. Railroad Co., 15 S. C. 476, such notice was necessary when, as is alleged in this complaint, the plaintiffs had knowledge of the intended entry, and failed to signify in writing their refusal of consent, from which failure the statute expressly says it shall be presumed that consent was given.' Tompkins v. Railroad Co., 37 S. C. 386, 16 S. E. 150. There is no allegation in the complaint in this action that any objection was made to the entry of defendants, or that any notice was given to the railroad company. It follows, therefore, under the statute, that plaintiff permitted—consented to—the laying of the track, etc. Under the statute law of the defendants herein, railroad corporations, for trespass upon her lands; and all special damages connected with the entry upon the land and the construction of the railroad thereon, such as the cutting down of shade trees, must be recovered in the special and exclusive mode laid down and provided in the statute, viz. by the method of condemnation. Without discussing, I will cite as authority for this ruling a few of the authorities: Tutt v. Railway Co., 28 S. C. 397, 5 S. E. 831; McLauchlin v. Railroad Co., 5 Rich. Law, 598; Fuller v. Edings, 11 Rich. Law, 247; Sams v. Railway Co., 15 S. C. 487; Verdier v. Railroad Co., Id. 481; Garraux v. City Council, 53 S. C. 575, 31 S. E. 597; Bowen v. Railroad Co., 17 S. C. 574; Leitzsey v. Water-Power Co., 47 S. C. 484, 25 S. E. 744, 34 L. R. A. 215; and authorities then cited Under these authorities and our statutes (Rev. St. §§ 1743–1755) no cause of action lies at common law, as stated, for the trespass upon the realty in question.

"I will next consider the other branch of the case the alleged trespass upon the person of the plaintiff. While the allegations of the complaint that Rutledge, the 'foreman' of the hands, 'cursed' the plaintiff, 'an old woman,' ordered her 'to get away from there, or he would put her in the penitentiary,' 'threatened' to strike her, frightened and intimidated her, and 'otherwise maltreated and abused her,' place said Rutledge in an unenviable and contemptible position, does said complaint, in any way, allege an actionable act or assault against plaintiff, or injury of any kind to her person or her character which is actionable? Suppose the complaint charged that Rutledge had assaulted plaintiff,—which it does not,—would that give to the plaintiff a cause of action against these defendants, or either of them? I think not, for the reason that the language and conduct complained of were outside of the scope and employment of Rutledge, and the defendants are not responsible for any voluntary assault or trespass which Rutledge may have committed. Williams v. Car Co. (La.) 4 South. 85, 8 Am. St. Rep. 538, Rounds v. Railroad Co., 21 Am. Rep. 602, and Rucker v. Smoke, 37 S. C. 381, 16 S. E. 40. If defendants were persons, and not corporations, and had spoken and acted as the complaint charges against Rutledge, as their agent, plaintiff could not maintain an action against them, similar to the present action, for the reason that curses and threats, while immoral, are not actionable in law. If a principal would not be liable for personally committing a certain act, he would not be liable for that act if it was committed by an agent. In Rucker v. Smoke, 37 S. C. 381, 16 S. E. 41, the supreme court quotes with approval the rule as stated in 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, at page 410, which is as follows: 'A principal is liable to third parties for whatever the agent does or says; whatever contracts, representations, or admissions he makes; whatever negligence he is guilty of, his apparent authority: and provided, a liability would attach to the principal if he was in the place of the agent.' The last clause cited is full and clear, and sustains the proposition stated. The doctrine is then stated in Wood, Mast. & Serv. § 322: 'The master can never be held chargeable for an act of the servant unless he would have been liable if he had done the act himself. Therefore, unless an injury results from a negligent or unlawful act, no liability attaches.' If Rutledge had been the agent of a common carrier of passengers, and plaintiff had been a passenger under the contractual relations of carrier and passenger to safely carry her, etc., and, while being transported as a passenger, Rutledge, as the agent of defendants, had addressed her as stated in the complaint herein, his curses, threats, etc., would have created a cause of action against the railroad company. The complaint does not allege the existence of any contractual relations between plaintiff and defendants. Defendants' agents were where they had a right to be, engaged in lawful duties, when the plaintiff 'approached' them, and 'requested' them not to do that which they had a legal right to do. She was an outsider. Rutledge, for the language, curses, etc., addressed to plaintiff, might be held criminally, by binding him over to keep the peace, or perhaps for a breach of the peace; but no liability would result therefrom to the defendants. 'To constitute a tort two things must concur,—actual or legal damage to the plaintiff, and wrongful act committed by the defendant.' 1 Add. Torts, c. 1, § 1. 'There may, on the other hand, be a wrong done to another, but, if it has not caused what the law terms "actual" legal damage to the plaintiff, there is no tort in respect of which an action is maintainable.' Id. § 8. 'An act or omission may be wrong in morals, or it may be wrong in law. It is scarcely necessary to say that the two things are not interchangeable. No government has undertaken to give redress whenever an act was found to be wrong, judged by the standard of strict morality; nor is it likely that any government ever will.' Cooley, Torts, p. 3. 'A threat to commit an injury is also sometimes made a criminal offense, but it is not actionable private wrong. Many reasons may be assigned for distinguishing between this case and that of an assault; one of them being that the threat only promises a future injury, and usually gives ample opportunity to provide against it, while an assault must be resisted on the instant. But the principal reason, perhaps, is found in the reluctance of the law to give a cause of action for mere words. "Words never constitute an assault" is a time-honored maxim. Words may be thoughtlessly spoken; they may be misunderstood; they may have indicated to the person threatened nothing but momentary spleen or anger, though when afterwards reported by witnesses they seem to express deliberate careful to require something more than expressions of anger, reproach, or contempt before it will interfere; justly considering that it is safer to allow too much liberty than to interpose too much restraint. And, comparing assaults and threats, another important difference is to be noted. In the case of threats, as has been stated, preventive remedies are available; but against an assault there are usually none beyond what the party assaulted has in his own power of physical resistance.' Id. p. 29.

"To recapitulate, I hold that any claim that plaintiff may have against the defendants for the entry upon her land by the defendant companies, either by way of compensation or special damages, must be sought and obtained by the special proceeding provided in the statute; that said special proceeding or remedy is not cumulative, but it is exclusive, and precludes and bars plaintiff of the remedy she here seeks, which is a suit for a trespass vi et armis. Further, the other elements of damage alleged by plaintiff in her complaint in the nature of threats and abuse on the part of Rutledge as the agent of defendants are not actionable for the reason that they were not within the scope of his employment, even had they been assaults and batteries, and other personal enormities; but they were threats and abuse, which, while immoral, are not actionable in law. Wherefore it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the complaint herein does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the said complaint be, and hereby is, dismissed, and that the plaintiff do pay the costs of this action."

Edwin Folk Strother, for appellant. Hendersons, for respondents.

JONES, J. The circuit court sustained a demurrer to (or motion to dismiss) the complaint for insufficiency in stating a cause of action. The complaint, which we copy in full, is as follows: "(1) That the plaintiff is, and was at the times hereinafter stated, the owner in fee of a certain tract or parcel of land situate in the state and county of Lexington, above named, through which the line of the Sievern & Knoxville Railroad has since been constructed, and that she was at the time, and still is, residing on said tract of land. (2) That the defendant Sievern & Knoxville Railroad Company is a corporation duly organized and existing under the laws of the state of South Carolina. (3) That the defendant Carolina Midland Railway Company is a corporation duly organized and existing under the laws of the state of South Carolina. (4) That on or about the 3d day of May, 1898, the defendants had in their employment a certain gang of hands then engaged in finishing and grading and laying the track and putting up telegraph poles along the line of the said Sievern & Knoxville Railroad Company; the said gang being, as plaintiff is informed and arrangement or agreement the terms of which are unknown to this plaintiff. (5) That said gang of hands, under one Rutledge as foreman, was employed by both of said defendants, and in the course of their engagement as such were proceeding along the line of the proposed track of the Sievern & Knoxville Railroad Company, and without having acquired a right of way through the lands of this plaintiff, and were in the act of cutting down two large oak trees of great beauty and value, which stood near the residence of this plaintiff, when she approached them, and requested them not to do so, whereupon the said Rutledge, foreman of said gang of hands, cursed this plaintiff, and ordered her to get away from there, or he would put her in the penitentiary, and threatened to strike her, and greatly frightened and intimidated her,—she being an old woman,—and otherwise maltreated and abused her, to her great damage; whereupon her son, Hiram Rankin, came up, and inquired the cause of her trouble, whereupon the said Rutledge called the hands employed on the material train in the employment of both the defendants, and with great violence and loud cursing followed the said Hiram Rankin towards the plaintiff's house, threatening and abusing him in a violent manner, and thereupon proceeded to lop off several of the most beautiful branches of the said oak trees, but did not cut them down. (6) That the said defendants, by the said Rutledge and their hands, whose names are unknown to this plaintiff, thus broke plaintiff's close, trod down the grass, and in a most violent and outrageous manner insulted, intimidated, and threatened this plaintiff, to her damage ten thousand ($10,000) dollars, together with the costs of court." We think the demurrer was properly sustained, and that the conclusions reached were amply vindicated in the elaborate and learned opinion of the circuit court, which is officially reported herewith. We will only make a brief observation or two. First, treating the complaint as one for trespass upon real property, with circumstances of aggravation alleged with a view to exemplary damages, the alleged circumstances of aggravation must be eliminated in determining the demurrer, since, to avoid demurrer on this ground, the complaint must show facts sufficient to constitute a trespass upon land. We must also eliminate from the complaint the words, "without having acquired a right of way through the lands of this plaintiff," in the fifth paragraph of the complaint, since they present a mere conclusion of law, which is not admitted by the demurrer. We must also eliminate the statement in the sixth paragraph of the complaint that defendants "thus broke plaintiff's close," etc., since such statement is a mere characterization of facts previously alleged, which in themselves must show a breaking of plaintiff's close. A railroad corporation chartered construction, unless such entry is made without the consent of the owner; and it is necessary to the cause of action to allege the absence of such consent. Tompkins v. Railroad Co., 37 S. C. 382, 16 S. E. 149. The complaint, then, is fatally defective for failure to make such allegation. So far as the complaint shows, the only objection ever made by plaintiff was as to cutting down the two oaks, and it appears that they were not cut down. As the route of the railroad was very near plaintiff's dwelling, she must have had knowledge of the first entry for construction, and, having made no objection thereto in the manner required by statute, her consent would be presumed, and her only remedy would be for compensation under the condemnation statutes. Verdier v. Railroad Co., 15 S. C. 476; Tompkins v. Railroad Co., supra; Leitzsey v. Water-Power Co., 47 S. C. 477, 25 S. E. 744, 34 L. R. A. 215. If the complaint may be treated as one for trespass upon the person, no assault upon the plaintiff is alleged, and mere words, under the circumstances stated, would not be civilly actionable. We are quite satisfied with the conclusion of the circuit court herein. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

HALL v. BOATWRIGHT et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 13, 1900.)

TRIAL—RECOVERY FOR IMPROVEMENTS—NONSUIT—IMPROVEMENTS—TENANT IN COMMON—PARTITION.

1. Since, under the betterments act (Rev. St. c. 64, art. 4), it is incumbent on plaintiff, who has been ousted of possession of land, to show not merely the value of his improvements, but to present evidence from which the jury can find a special verdict, stating the value of the land without the improvements and its value with the improvements, evidence, in an action thereunder after partition, tending to show that improvements of some considerable value had been made, will not warrant sending the case to the jury.

2. Since the betterments act (Rev. St. § 1952), providing "that after final judgment for plaintiff in an action to recover lands, if defendant purchased the lands recovered in such action supposing at the time such title to be good in fee, defendant shall be entitled to recover of plaintiff in such action the full value of all improvements," etc., was intended to give a remedy where none existed before, such act does not apply to a tenant in common who, believing himself sole owner, has made improvements on the common property, as he has ample relief by being allotted on partition the portion improved by him, or, in case of a sale, by being allotted the increased purchase price by reason of such improvements.

3. Where the purchaser at a tax sale of a homestead which was assigned to a widow and her children goes into possession, and the children bring an action for partition against him, alleging that he acquired by such purchase the widow's one-third interest in the land, and the answer does not deny any of the facts alleged in the complaint, but denies that the children have any title to the land, and a judgment is recover lands," if defendant purchased the lands recovered in such action, supposing at the time such title to be good in fee, defendant shall be entitled to recover of plaintiff the full value of his improvements, etc., since the action against him was strictly for partition, and not "an action to recover lands."

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Aiken county; D. A. Townsend, Judge.

Action by W. W. Hall against Daniel Boatwright and others to recover the value of improvements made by plaintiff on certain lands. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Sawyer & Owens and G. W. Croft & Son, for appellant. Hendersons, for respondents.

JONES, J. This is an action under the betterments act, and the appeal is from an order of nonsuit. The documentary evidence introduced showed that Erwin J. Boatwright died intestate, seised of a tract of land in Aiken county, leaving as his only heirs at law his widow, Olivia Boatwright, and the defendants, his children; that after the death of Boatwright this land was assigned to said widow and children as a homestead; that said land assessed in the name of Olivia Boatwright was sold for taxes, and the plaintiff became purchaser, took sheriff's title, dated October 7, 1895, and immediately entered into possession of the land, enjoying the rents and profits. In May, 1889, the defendants brought action for partition of said land against said Hall, alleging substantially the foregoing facts, and also that said Hall had acquired by purchase at a tax sale the one-third interest of Olivia Boatwright in said land. Hall, in his answer to said suit, did not deny any of the facts alleged in the complaint. He contented himself with denying "that the plaintiffs have title to the land described, or any part thereof, or that they are entitled to the relief demanded," alleging also that he has legal title to the premises, and as a third defense alleging that he had purchased said land at a tax sale more than two years before the commencement of the action. As if this raised an issue of title paramount, the matter was submitted to a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff "for a two-thirds undivided interest in the land in dispute." Thereupon a decree was rendered for a sale of the land for partition, allotting to said Hall one-third of the proceeds. Within 48 hours after such judgment, plaintiff brought this action for betterments. In addition to the foregoing, it appears in the original "case" that plaintiff introduced oral testimony "tending to show that improvements of some considerable value had been put by him on the land described in the complaint." At the hearing the "case" was amended by consent so as to state that the plaintiff also introduced testimony that at ed thus: That the betterments act contemplated a recovery of land in toto, and not a mere interest therein; that the object of the act was to supply a remedy for one who was ejected in a suit at law; and that a cotenant who makes improvements has a complete remedy in equity. We tuink there was no error in granting the nonsuit.

By his first exception, appellant imputes error in holding that he could not recover the value of his improvements placed upon the land, in a separate action. Under the betterments act, it is incumbent on the plaintiff not merely to show the value of his improvements, but he must present evidence from which the jury can find a special verdict stating the value of the land without the improvements and the value of the land with the improvements; the value of the improvements being the sum which the land should be found at the rendition of the judgment to be worth more in consequence of the improvements than it would have been worth had no improvements been made. Evidence merely tending to show that improvements of some considerable value had been put on the land would not warrant sending the case to the jury. On this ground the nonsuit is sustainable, although it was not placed upon such ground.

But, further, the betterments act was not intended to furnish a remedy for a tenant in common who makes improvements on the common property. By the common law the owner of the fee is the owner of all the structures and improvements on the land. Therefore one making improvements upon land of another would lose his improvements on recovery of the land from him by the true owner, and he would be without remedy. The betterments act was intended to relieve this condition and give a remedy. As stated by Mr. Justice Gary in Tumbleston v. Rumph, 43 S. C. 279, 21 S. E. 86, "The statutes in regard to betterments were * * * for the purpose of softening the asperities of the law, and affording relief where none otherwise existed." And Judge Cooley, in Const. Lim. (5th Ed.) 480, says, "Betterments laws recognize the existence of an equitable right, and give a remedy for its enforcement where none existed before." At the time of the enactment of this statute, in 1870, there was, and there is now, ample remedy for a cotenant who, believing himself sole owner, has made improvements on the common property, and there was no necessity to pass such a statute in his behalf. The cases of William v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq. 476; Scaife v. Thomson, 15 S. C. 337; Buck v. Martin, 21 S. C. 591; Johnson v. Pelot, 24 S. C. 264,—and other cases that might be cited, show that a court of equity can and will give relief to a co-tenant who, under the belief that he has exclusive title in fee, makes improve-allotting to him the increased purchase price by reason of such improvements. If the betterments act was to give a remedy where none existed, it could not have been intended to give a cumulative remedy to a co-tenant. He does not improve another's land. He improves his own land; that is to say, land in every inch of which he has an undivided interest. Even if the improved portion is not allotted to him, and if no provision for compensation is made in case of a sale, still he secured in the division of the purchase price a portion of the value imparted by his improvements. The case of McGee v. Hall, 28 S. C. 562, 6 S. E. 566, appears to be in point. In that case it was held that where a co-tenant, supposing himself to be the exclusive owner, has added to the value of the common property by improvements, and is liable for rents and profits thereof, his account for rents should be credited with the increased value imparted by the improvements, and that the remedy under the betterments act was not applicable.

There is another reason why the said act does not apply in this case. The statute provides, "After final judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action to recover lands and tenements, if the defendant purchased the lands and tenements recovered in such action, supposing at the time of such purchase such title to be good in fee, the defendant shall be entitled to recover of the plaintiff in such action," etc. Rev. St. § 1952. Whether lands were recovered of the plaintiff herein in an action of ejectment must be determined by the complaint in the case. In the case of Elmore v. Davis, 49 S. C. 2, 26 S. E. 898, this court, construing subdivision 2, § 98, Code, providing that, "the plaintiff in all actions for the recovery of real property," etc., "is hereby limited to two actions," etc., held that an action for partition, in which the issue of title was raised in the answer, was not an action to recover real estate, in the sense of that statute; and in determining the question the court was controlled by the allegations in the complaint. So, in the proceedings in question, if we are to be controlled by the allegations of the complaint, the case of the Boatwrights against Hall was not an action to recover real estate, but was a case for partition, strictly. If we could be justified in resorting to the answer to determine whether an action strictly and solely for partition was converted into an action in ejectment, also, there is nothing in the answer to show title paramount in defeat of the right to partition, since all the facts upon which the right to partition rested stood admitted by the pleadings. Appellant, in support of his contention that said partition proceeding was an action to recover land, and so within the betterments act, quoted the following from Reams v. Spann, 20 S. C. 1: "The action is purely legal, for the recovery of the land from the Reams, and the other equitable, for partition after the land was recovered. The legal title should have, therefore, been first tried by a jury; and, if that resulted in favor of the plaintiff, then, and not till then, could the court decree partition, as in Adickes v. Lowry, 12 S. C. 97. In the trial of the legal issue, the action being for the recovery of specific real property, the question of title should have been submitted to a jury upon the issues made by the pleadings." "So far as the McReas are concerned, this is simply an action for the recovery of a tract of land." But it must be noted that the McReas were not made defendants as co-tenants, but as strangers in possession, claiming adversely. The allegations of the complaint were such that the court was induced to say: "This was an action to recover real estate, and incidentally to partition the same." Under such circumstances the court might be justified in saying that the action was to recover real estate, so far as those parties were concerned who were not co-tenants with the plaintiffs, but were in possession, claiming by an independent and paramount title. The language above quoted from Reams v. Spann was quoted with approval in subsequent cases,—as in Carrigan v. Evans, 31 S. C. 266, 9 S. E. 852, and in Sumner v. Harrison, 54 S. C. 359, 32 S. E. 572; but in these cases, as in Reams v. Spann, the complaint tendered an issue of title as to those defendants who were not concerned with the plaintiffs as co-tenants, but were strangers in possession, and alleged in the complaint to claim some interest therein. In the action in question the complaint showed that the defendant therein was a tenant in common with the plaintiffs in the premises sought to be partitioned, and did not allege any ouster. Elmore v. Davis, 49 S. C. 2, 26 S. E. 898. The decisions also show that when it is sought to carry this supposed theory, that an issue of title raised in the answer in a strict action for partition makes two independent causes of action, —one in law, for the recovery of real estate, and the other in equity, for partition,—to its logical consequences, the theory is repudiated. For example, a nonsuit of the legal issue of title raised in an equitable action will not be permitted (Woolfolk v. Manufacturing Co., 22 S. C. 332; McClenaghan v. McEachern, 47 S. C. 451, 25 S. E. 296); and the prevailing party on the issue of title does not, as a matter of right, become entitled to the costs, as in a legal action in ejectment (McCarter v. Caldwell, 58 S. C. 65, 36 S. E. 507).

Our conclusion is that no recovery of land in an action of ejectment has been had against the plaintiff, and therefore he is not within the betterments act. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

WILLS—REMAINDERS—ACCOUNTING.

1. A will gave a life estate to testator's wife, with remainder for life to certain other persons who should be alive at the death of his wife; remainder in favor of such persons' heirs. It was further provided that, if such third persons should die before testator's wife, their children should take the interest of the deceased parent. Held, that the children of the persons given the life estate in remainder, who were living at the time of the death of the testator and his wife, took vested remainders in the property, subject to open and let in children subsequently born.

2. A decree that a trustee appointed to succeed another trustee, and in possession of certain property, should account for the rents and profits of the property, is to be construed as only requiring him to account for the rents and profits received by him.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Sumter county; W. C. Benet, Judge.

Action for partition by Susan S. Tindal, individually and as administratrix of the estate of Mary E. Tindal, against John L. Neal and others. From a decree in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The following is the decree of the circuit judge:

"The above-styled cause was brought to partition a tract of three hundred and fifty acres of land, more or less, situate in said county and state, and bounded on the north by lands of Mrs. Susan S. Tindal (the plaintiff), on the east by lands of the estate of Jared Norton, on the south by lands of Mrs. Susan S. Tindal, and on the west by lands now or formerly of the estate of H. H. Wells. It was alleged in the complaint that this tract of land descended to the parties to this cause as the heirs at law of Mary E. Tindal, who died intestate, seised and possessed of the same, and that the plaintiff, her daughter, is entitled to one-third, and her grandsons John L. and C. M. Neal are each entitled to one-sixth, and that her grandchildren Charles L. Cuttino, Thomas P. Cuttino, S. James Cuttino, David W. Cuttino, and S. Lula McKnight were each entitled to one-fifteenth. The complaint further alleged that the plaintiff and the defendants were seised and possessed of said tract of land as tenants in common, and owned no other lands in common. The complaint further alleged that the defendant John L. Neal was in possession of more than his proportionate share of said premises, and had rented out parcels of said land and collected the rent, and prayed that he be required to account for the same. The defendants answered, denying the allegations of the plaintiff that the parties to said action owned no other lands in common; and they alleged that they, with the plaintiff, were seised and possessed, as tenants in common, of an additional tract of land situate in the county and state aforesaid, containing one hundred acres, more or less, adjoining lands of estate of Richard F. Wells, Elihu [illegible] tract of land were in same proportion as those set forth in the complaint in regard to the tract of land therein described. The defendant John L. Neal admitted that he was occupying a part of the land described in the complaint, but denied the remaining allegations of paragraph 3 of the complaint. Subsequent to the commencement of this action the defendant David W. Cuttino departed this life intestate and unmarried, leaving as his only heirs at law and distributees the defendants S. Lula McKnight, Charles L. Cuttino, Thomas P. Cuttino, and S. James Cuttino; and by an order made in said cause the action was continued against the said parties as his heirs at law, and they are now entitled to one-twelfth each in the estate. There is no controversy as to the tract of land described in the complaint, and the interests of said parties therein, and the contention arises as to the tract of one hundred acres of land referred to and described in the answers of the defendants.

"The cause was referred to the master for said county, to take and report the testimony, and the master duly filed his report thereof. It appears from the testimony and record evidence taken and proved before the master that one Samuel Perdriau made his will, dated July 15, 1842, which was duly admitted to probate in said county on October 2, 1843. By the second clause of said will the testator devised his estate to his wife, Esther Perdriau, for life, with right to dispose of one half by will, etc. The other half of said estate he directed his executors to sell, and divide the proceeds; the words of the devise being as follows: 'The proceeds of said sale of said half of the estate, given as aforesaid to my wife for life, to be divided between Ann M. China, wife of John China, Jr., the children of my deceased brother Peter Perdriau, and also the children of my sister Esther Wells, alive at the death of my wife, share and share alike, for and during the term of their natural lives, and after their deaths to their respective children, forever. It is my will that if the said Ann M. China, either of the children of my brother Peter or sister Esther, should die in my lifetime or the lifetime of my said wife, that the child or children of such one or more of them as may so die take the part of their deceased parent.' At the time of the death of the testator, his brother Peter Perdriau and his sister Esther Wells were dead; and at the time of the death of Esther Wells she left surviving her, among other children, her daughter Mary E. Wells, who married one Charles Lynam some time previous to the year 1832, and the children of the said Mary E. Lynam, Charles Lynam, and Mary A. Lynam, who subsequently married one Neal. And at the death of Mary E. Lynam, who had married one John B. Tindal, her daughter Susan S.

ynam, then the wife of John M. Tindal, one survived her; the said Mary A. Neal ıving predeceased her mother, leaving as :r only heirs at law the defendants John and C. M. Neal, and the said Charles Ly-ım having also predeceased his mother, ary E. Lynam (then Tindal), leaving one ıild, Portia, who intermarried with one T. Cuttino. Portia died in 1884, her husband :ing then dead, leaving the Cuttinos and rs. McKnight as her only heirs at law. he said Charles Lynam and his sister Mary Neal, the children of Mary E. Lynam, e Wells, and grandchildren of Esther Wells, ere alive at the date of the will, death of e testator, and at the death of the testator's ife, Esther, the first life tenant. Susan Tindal, née Lynam, a daughter of said ary E. Lynam, was born some time after 37,—about 1840; her sister, Mary A. Neal, ıving been born about 1837. About the year 52 the said Mary E. Lynam, who was the ughter of Esther Wells, and the second 'e tenant under the will of the testator, ıermarried with one John B. Tindal, and on e 6th day of January, 1852, joined in a mar-ıge setlement, by deed executed on that day, ıd recorded in the office of the clerk of the urt for Sumter county, in Book O, at page 7, and thereby conveyed to Richard F. 'ells, as trustee, among other property, ll and singular the undivided interest and tate whatever, real or personal or both, remainder or in expectancy or in præsenti, the party of the second part [Mary E. Ly-ım], under the provisions of the will of muel Perdriau, deceased, to the sole and parate use during her life of the party the second part; and at the death of the rty of the second part, she leaving issue lve at her death, all the said last-mention-negroes, and her interest as aforesaid un-r the will aforesaid, shall go to and be sted absolutely in the issue of the said par-of the second part in such manner and oportion as the said issue would be enti-ıd under the statutes of distribution were e to die a widow and intestate.'

"In 1851 Esther Perdriau, the widow of e testator, filed a bill in the court of equity said county and state to obtain the assent the court to her relinquishing one-half of e estate passing to her under the will of r deceased husband, Samuel Perdriau, and aying for a sale of that half, and a esent distribution of the proceeds among e parties to whom they were bequeathed at e expiration of her life estate. A decree that effect was obtained, to which no ap-al was taken, except upon a single point, :.: The decree divided the proceeds of le into three equal parts,—one to Ann M. ina, one to the children of Peter, and one the children of Esther; and the contention ıs that Ann M. China did not take one-third the proceeds, but should take an equal rt with each of the children of Peter Per-lau and of Esther Wells. The court of ap-al held that they took equally and per capita, upon the clear reason that the contingency of surviving testator's wife bore the same relation to Ann M. China as it did to the children of Esther Wells and Peter Perdriau. See the case of Perdriau v. Wells, 5 Rich. Eq. 20. Under the decree in said cause the interests going to the children of Esther Wells and Peter Perdriau were assigned to them; the shares going to the married women being delivered to trustees. The share of Mary E. Lynam was delivered to R. F. Wells, trustee, to be held in accordance with the terms of the will of Samuel Perdriau; the said Richard F. Wells being the trustee named in the marriage settlement between Mary E. Lynam and John B. Tindal. The proceeding above referred to was solely to divide the estate among the life tenants; and none of the children of Mary E. and Charles Lynam, the remainder-men under said will, were made parties to said cause, although they were in esse at the time. See Equity Roll, Bill 166.

"In 1880 a petition was filed in this court by Mary E. Tindal (formerly Lyman) and her daughter Susan S. Tindal, wherein it was alleged that Richard F. Wells, the trustee aforesaid, had died, and praying that John M. Tindal, the husband of Susan S. Tindal, the petitioner, be appointed trustee in his stead, and further alleging that an action had been previously commenced against the said Richard F. Wells for an account of the trust fund turned over to him as aforesaid; that he had departed this life pending said proceeding, but that a compromise had been effected with his heirs at law, whereby 100 acres of land of his estate should be turned over and delivered to a trustee in full settlement of the trust funds theretofore held by him. The said proceedings referred to in said petition are enrolled as judgment roll 5719 in said county; and the said case was compromised, and the land duly turned over and delivered by the heirs at law of said Richard F. Wells to John M. Tindal as trustee, he having been appointed as such by order made under said petition, as appears from judgment roll 2629; and the said John M. Tindal admits in his testimony in this cause that he is in possession of said tract of land as trustee, and has collected the rents, income, and profits from the same for a number of years last passed.

"I find as a matter of fact from the testimony and from the record evidence proven before the master, and heretofore referred to that the 100 acres of land described in the answers of the defendants herein, and sought to be partitioned in this cause, represent the interest and estate passing under the will of Samuel Perdriau to Mary E. Lynam (afterwards Tindal) for life, and that under the terms of said will said land is now owned by the parties to this cause as tenants in common, in the proportions set forth in the complaint in regard to the tract of 350 acres therein described. It appears from the testimony that the one hundred acre tract of land proprietors, and the correct description at this time is as follows: That tract of 100 acres of land in said county and state known as the 'Swamp Place,' adjoining lands of estate of John Betts, lands formerly of Hattie E. Lawrence, now of Marion Moise, lands of S. S. Tindal, and Pocotaligo swamp. The question as to the interest of the defendants in said tract of land turns upon the construction of the will of Samuel Perdriau, and I hold, as matter of law, that the children of Mary E. Lynam (afterwards Tindal) who were alive at the death of the testator and at the death of his wife took vested remainders, subject to open, if necessary, and let in other children of Mary E. Lynam who should come into existence. The testator evidently so intended, as he provided in his will against a lapse, as follows: 'It is my will that if the said Ann M. China, either of the children of my brother Peter or sister Esther, should die in my lifetime, or the lifetime of my said wife, that the child or children of such one or more of them as may so die take the part of their deceased parent.' Thus it follows that, if Mary E. Lynam had died during the lifetime of the testator or his wife (the first life tenant), the children of Mary E. (the second life tenant) would have taken a vested interest under the express terms of the will. If the grandchildren of his sister Esther, mother of Mary E. Lynam, were special objects of his bounty and affection, should their parents die in the lifetime of himself or wife, why not equally so should the children of Esther outlive himself and wife and die thereafter? The testator used neither word nor expression to indicate that the estate given under his will should not vest in the grandchildren of his sister Esther as of the date of the will. He did not use the words 'surviving children,' or an equivalent expression, to indicate that only those grandchildren who might survive their parents (the second tenants for life) should take the whole. It would be doing violence not only to the expressed intention of the testator, but to all the springs of human affection, to exclude the grandchildren of his sister Esther, who were evidently in the testator's mind at the time he drew his will.

"By reference to the case of Barnes v. Provoost, 4 Johns. 61, as annotated in 2 Shars. & B. Lead. Cas. Real Prop. p. 260, it appears that the perplexing questions arising in cases of remainders are those which depend in some way upon a specified contingency or condition, or upon different contingencies or conditions. Where there is no condition or qualification named in the will or deed, the remainder is regarded as vested in the persons to take it; and they become so far the owners of the estate as soon as the time of vesting arrives,—usually the death of the testator, although the time when he was to be entitled to the possession did not arrive or fail to happen as precedent incidents, that the discriminating conclusions of courts are necessary to determine the rights of parties. The vested remainder is that part of the estate bestowed upon one person, to take effect in possession at the close of the interest of another person, with no contingent provision, condition, or event intermediate which can possibly defeat the rights of the remainderman. A remainder is contingent when the person named to take it may possibly be defeated in his right of property by some event designated and provided to have that effect, or when the persons to take depend upon some contingent event, which is not contingent merely because the time of possession or enjoyment is made to depend upon contingent events. In the first class named there is no contingency as to the person who is to take, but only as to the time when the persons designated are to enjoy or to possess; in the other, the contingency relates to the persons who are to take, etc. It is not necessary that the party named to take in remainder shall be certain ever to enjoy the possession, —as, for example, an estate may be conveyed to one for life, with remainder to another in fee. The foregoing principles apply equally and as exacting when a vested estate is limited in remainder to a family of children who may be thereafter born. If one is alive when the testator dies, all succeeding children are let in and vested as of that period. If none are alive, then the remainder vests in the first one born, and all succeeding children become vested as of the time of the birth of the first. And this is the rule in all cases where a remainder is limited to a class of persons. The foregoing principles are gathered from the annotations to the case referred to, the exact language being used in many instances. It is the policy of the law to give to deeds and wills such construction, where permissible, as will effect the early vesting of estates. Boykin v. Boykin, 21 S. C. 529; Wilson v. McJunkin, 11 Rich. Eq. 530; Durant, v. Nash, 30 S. C. 192, 9 S. E. 19. When the remainder is to persons in esse at the time the limitation is made, and upon an event certain, —as at the death of a life tenant,—it is a vested transmissible remainder in such person. Haynsworth v. Haynsworth, 12 Rich. Eq. 114. If a devise is to a class, as children, at the death of the life tenant, the remainder is vested in those living at the death of the testator. Rainsford v. Rainsford, Spear. Eq. 397; Evans v. Durant, 1 Strob. Eq. 82; Bentley v. Long, Id. 43; Shuler v. Bull, 15 S. C. 432; Bannister v. Bull, 16 S. C. 220; McCreary v. Burns, 17 S. C. 45. Also, see 2 Jarm. Wills (2d Am. Ed.) pp. 54-56.

"In the case at bar there is no intervening circumstance which was to happen before the grandchildren of Esther Wells could take. They could take immediately upon the death of their parent,—an event certain occur; their enjoyment and possession be- g alone postponed. There was no intern- ning circumstance, such as the death of a ird party, before the grandchildren could ke, but they were entitled to take imme- ately upon the falling in of the life es- tes. In 2 Washb. Real Prop. (2d Am. Ed.) 599, the rule is stated as follows: 'There however, a class of cases where a re- ainder is regarded as vested, although all e persons who may take are not ascer- ined or in esse, and cannot be until the ppening of some future event. And that where there is a devise of a remainder to class of which each member is equally the ject of the testator's bounty, as to "the ildren" of a person, some of whom are ing at the testator's death. As for in- nce, upon a devise to A. for life, remain- r to the children of J. S., if J. S. has chil- en at the testator's death, they would te a vested remainder; and if he were to ve other children during the life of A., d before the remainder was to take effect possession, it would open and let in the ldren born during A.'s life, who would te shares as vested remainders.' The ne author concludes his discussion of the bject as follows: 'If the limitation be by rise to a class of persons, any of whom alive and capable of taking at the death the testator, the enjoyment of which is stponed until after the expiration of a rticular estate, the estate will vest in such are capable of taking at the death of the tator, and will open and let in such of the ne class as may come in esse during the ntinuance of the particular estate.' Un- the subject of devises and bequests to ldren in 2 Jarm. Wills (2d Am. Ed.) pp. 56, the rule is stated as follows: 'But question which has been chiefly agi- ed in devises and bequests to children s to the point of time at which the class o be ascertained, or, in other words, as the period within which the objects must born and existent; supposing the testa- himself not to have expressly fixed the iod of ascertaining the objects, which, of rse, takes the case out of the general e. For example, a gift to children now ng applies to such as are in existence at date of the will, and those only; and a to children living at the decease of A. extend to children existing at the pre- bed period, whether the event happens the testator's lifetime (supposing that y survive him), or after his decease. The owing are the rules of construction reg- ing the class of objects entitled, in re- ct of period of birth, under general gifts hildren: First. That an immediate gift hildren (i. e. a gift to take effect in pos- ion immediately on the testator's de- se), whether it be to the children of a ng or a deceased person, and whether to children, simply, or to all the children, whether there be a gift over in the case he decease of any of the children under age or not, comprehends the children living at the testator's death, if any, and those only, notwithstanding some of the early cases, which make the date of the will the period of ascertaining the objects. It is scarcely necessary to observe that this and the succeeding rules apply to issue of every degree, as grandchildren, great grandchil- dren, etc., though cases to the contrary are to be found, especially at an early period. Secondly. That where a particular estate or interest is carved out, with a gift over to the children of the person taking that in- terest, or the children of any other person, such gift will embrace not only the objects living at the death of the testator, but all who may subsequently come into existence before the period of distribution. Thus, in the case of a devise or bequest to A. for life, and after his decease to his children, or (which is a better illustration of the limits of the rule, since, in the case suggested, the parents being the legatee for life, all the children who can ever be born necessarily come in esse during the preceding interest) to A. for life, and after his decease to the children of B., the children (if any) of B. living at the death of the testator, together with those who happen to be born during the life of A., the tenant for life, are en- titled, but not those who may come into existence after the death of A. The rule is the same where the life interest is not of the testator's own creation, but is anterior to his title. In cases falling within this rule, the children, if any, living at the death of the testator, take an immediately vested interest in their shares, subject to the dimin- ution of those shares (i. e. to their being de- vested pro tanto) as the number of objects is augmented by future births during the life of the tenant for life; and consequent- ly, on the death of any of the children dur- ing the life of the tenant for life, their shares, if their interests therein are trans- missible, devolve to their respective repre- sentatives, though the rule is sometimes in- accurately stated as if existence at the pe- riod of distribution was essential.' The au- thor cites Matthews v. Paul, 3 Swanst. 339, and Hoghton v. Whitgreave, 1 Jac. & W. 150, as cases where the rule was inaccurate- ly stated. In support of the foregoing prop- ositions, see, also, 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 854; 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 411; 2 Washb. Real Prop. (2d Am. Ed.) 603.

"In Gourdin v. Deas, 27 S. C. 484, 4 S. E. 66, the rule is stated by the chief justice as follows: 'The authorities in this state ap- pear to be somewhat conflicting, but it seems to us that the more recent cases sup- port the view that the remainder is vested in such of the issue as were in esse at the date of the deed, at that time, opening to let in other issue as they come into exist- ence.' The same principle was announced in Shuler v. Bull, 15 S. C. 421; McCreary v. Burns, 17 S. C. 45; Bankhead v. Carlisle, 1 Hill, Eq. 357. In Brown v. McCall, 44 S.

had been given to comfort Terry for life, remainder to the sons of Spencer and Daniel Brummet, I take it to be equally clear that there would have been a vested remainder in the sons of Spencer and Daniel Brummet who were living at the time of the gift.' If, therefore, the 'sons of Daniel and Spencer Brummet who were living at the time of the gift' took vested remainders, the children of Mary E. Lynam who were alive at the time of the devise in the case at bar also took vested remainders. The word 'children' designates a class no less perfectly than the word 'sons.' 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, supra. In Crossby v. Smith, 3 Rich. Eq. 254, the point of the decision is clear that the chancellor treated the devise to the children of the testator as a class, and held that those who were in esse at the time of the testator's death took vested remainders, which, upon their dying in the lifetime of the tenant for life, were transmitted to their representatives, and not to the surviving children. See, also, Crim v. Knotts, 4 Rich. Eq. 340; Williman v. Holmes, Id. 475; Wilson v. McJunkin, 11 Rich. Eq. 527; Bentley v. Long, 1 Strob. Eq. 43; McGregor v. Toomer, 2 Strob. Eq. 51; Key v. Weathersbee, 43 S. C. 423, 21 S. E. 324; Gourdin v. Deas, 27 S. C. 484, 4 S. E. 66; 4 Kent, Comm. 197. In all these authorities the same principle is affirmed, viz. that the children in esse when the instrument took effect (i. e. the death of the testator in the case at bar) took vested, transmissible remainders, opening to let in all other children who come into existence before the falling in of the life estate.

"The following cases in South Carolina may appear to be in conflict with rules hereinbefore announced, but a careful analysis of them will show that such is not the case:

"Myers v. Myers (1827) 2 McCord, Ch. 256: In that case the effort was to include in the division children who were born subsequent to the death of the life tenant, or born subsequent to the period fixed for distribution, and it was held that they were not entitled. Throughout the entire case the doctrine of vested remainders in those children in esse at at testator's death, and in those born afterwards and before the period for distribution, seems to have been conceded.

"Swinton v. Legare, 2 McCord, Ch. 440: In that case the representatives of the children who died in the lifetime of the life tenant were excluded because by the express terms of the devise the remainder was limited over to the 'surviving children,' and hence the remainder was contingent.

"Cole v. Creyon (1833) 1 Hill, Eq. 311: This case was reviewed in Gourdin v. Deas, supra, and Brown v. McCall, supra, and was held to have decided only two points, viz. (1) that the application for partition was premature. In both Gourdin v. Deas and Brown v. McCall, Chief Justice McIver cites with approval the remarks of Chancellor Harper in Cole v. Creyon: 'There would be reason for making a different construction, and probably a different one ought to be made, when the child dying before the time fixed for distribution has left children, and this, also, to effectuate the intention; for it cannot be supposed that testator intended the object of his bounty not to be capable of transmitting to his children so as to provide for them.' Cole v. Creyon thus becomes an authority sustaining the contention of the defendants in the case at bar. The discussion there did not relate to a case like the one at bar, but simply as to what portions of an estate would vest in an individual, on the one hand, and a class, on the other.

"Conner v. Johnson (1834) 2 Hill, Eq. 41: The real question decided in this case was that the division should be per stirpes, and not per capita. Subsidiary to that question was the further one as to what should become of the shares of the remainder-men who died in the lifetime of the life tenant, leaving no issue; and it was, in substance, held that the remainders were devested by the express terms of the will, which provided that in case any of the children should die in the lifetime of the life tenant, leaving 'no issue,' then their shares should go over. It was upon a similar principle that the case of Brown v. McCall, supra, was decided, in which case Conner v. Johnson was also reviewed. Should the case of Conner v. Johnson be found in conflict with the contention of defendants herein, yet it will be remembered that it is one of the cases referred to in Gourdin v. Deas, supra, by name, where it was held that these old cases were controlled by the more recent cases sustaining a different doctrine, viz. that a devise to a class, as children, constitutes a vested remainder in all of the class in esse at testator's death, opening to let in other children born before the period fixed for distribution, and for the enjoyment of the estate in remainder.

"Lemacks v. Glover, 1 Rich. Eq. 145: The question involved in that case is not involved in the case at bar, although the chancellor, quoting from Matthews v. Paul, 3 Swanst. 339, does say: 'In all cases of legacies payable to a class of persons at a future period, the constant rule has been that all persons coming in esse and answering the description at the period of distribution shall take; and the same rule must be applied to persons excluded.' It will be observed that the case of Matthews v. Paul is one of the two cases in which Jarman says, supra, 'that the rule is sometimes inaccurately stated as if existence at the period of distribution was essential.' It is remarkable how an erroneous statement of the rule, as in Matthews v. Paul, becomes perpetuated by reference thereto with-"Deveaux v. Deveaux, 1 Strob. Eq. 283: The point decided there was that children coming in esse after the period fixed for distribution could not be included with those in esse at testator's death, or who were born before the period fixed for distribution, following Myers v. Myers, supra.

"Dickson v. Dickson, 23 S. C. 216: In that case it was held that 'the interests of the three sons were not vested, but contingent, by reason of the fact that they were dependent upon the uncertain event of Amelia's dying without issue.' That is the only point decided in the case, although it is true that the circuit judge and Chief Justice Simpson did casually discuss the doctrine of a devise to a class; the chief justice stating, without quoting any authority for the statement except Jarman, which has been shown not to apply here: 'There is a class of cases in which, when property is given by will to be distributed among a class of persons at some future time, or on some future contingency, all are let in who come into existence before the time of the happening of the event, provided they be in existence at the happening of said event, and no one but such as may be in existence at that time can take.' The statement of the chief justice was obiter dictum, being in no way necessary to a decision of the case, and Jarman does not sustain the position there taken by the chief justice. On the contrary, he lays down the rule that a devise to a class is 'a gift to a body of persons uncertain in number at the time of the gift, to be ascertained at a future time.' They are uncertain in number because subsequent births before the period of distribution let in after-born children. Hence the number is uncertain until the death of the life tenant. The quantity each child is to take is uncertain, but the quality of the estate is fixed, and not uncertain. It is a vested remainder in those in esse at testator's death, opening to let in after-born children, who eo instanti take vested interests in remainder. This is distinctly laid down by Jarman (2 Jarm. Wills [2d Am. Ed.] p. 54). It is thus seen that Dickson v. Dickson is not in conflict with the contention of the defendants. The idea which seems to have been in the mind of Chief Justice Simpson (that only those children alive at the death of the life tenant should take) was probably derived from the case of Wessenger v. Hunt, 9 Rich. Eq. 459, which, in Hayne v. Irvine, 25 S. C. 289, is said 'to have established the doctrine that a bequest to be distributed at a future time to the death of the testator, to wit, at the death of an intermediate life tenant, all who answer to the description at the time of the distribution are the parties alone entitled.' But Chief Justice McIver, in Gourdin v. Deas, supra, points out that Wardlaw, Ch., does not use the word 'alone' in the case cited; but, on the contrary, he held that 'the representathose children in existence at the death of the life tenant can take, to the exclusion of those who, although in esse at testator's death, yet die in the lifetime of the life tenant, is erroneous. On the contrary, the error in Dickson v. Dickson and Hayne v. Irvine is the same error that was pointed out by Chief Justice McIver as supposed to have been derived from Wessenger v. Hunt, and is also the same error derived from Matthews v. Paul, supra.

"Clark v. Clark, 19 S. C. 345: The devise was to William Clark for life, at his death to his children (there being two of them), and then to their children living at his death. One of the two children (Mrs. Sherwood) died after the making of the will, but before the testator, and hence took nothing; and it was held that by the express terms of the will the share she would have taken passed to her children, as purchasers by substitution. In the course of the opinion Mr. Justice McGowan does say that 'if a testator gives a legacy, to be divided among the children of A. at a particular time, those who constitute the class at the time will take,' and cites Cole v. Creyon and Swinton v. Legare, supra; but those cases do not support the doctrine claimed, and, besides, the statement was obiter dictum. Mrs. Sherwood had died before the testator, and before the will took effect. Moreover, the statement of Justice McGowan was not inconsistent with the rule here, because the contention is that the children of Mary E. Lynam (Tindal) were of the class at the testator's death, which was the time that the will took effect, and hence took vested remainders; the enjoyment being merely postponed until the death of the life tenant.

"Shanks v. Mills, 25 S. C. 362: The point decided in this case was in the following language of Mr. Justice McGowan: 'The devise over in this case, by its express terms, was to take effect at the time of the death of Christina, and was limited to her children who may be then living.' This was a clear case of a contingent remainder, excluding, of course, the representatives of a predeceased child.

"Brown v. McCall, 44 S. C. 503, 22 S. E. 823: The only point decided in that case was that by the express terms of the deed of settlement the Berry children took a fee defeasible upon dying leaving issue, and that therefore where one of them died in the lifetime of the life tenant, leaving issue, such issue, by the express terms of the deed, took by way of substitution, as purchasers.

"I therefore conclude, as matter of law, that Mary E. Lynam (afterwards Mary E. Tindal) took a vested remainder in fee simple in the interest passing to her under the will of Samuel Perdriau, and that by virtue of the terms of the marriage settlement aforesaid, and of the law of the land applicable to this case, her issue now own and possess such ferred to in the answers as tenants in common, their interest therein being as follows: Susan S. Tindal, the plaintiff, one undivided third part of the whole; John L. Neal and Charles M. Neal, one-sixth part each of the whole, and S. Lula McKnight, Charles L. Cuttino, Thomas P. Cuttino, and S. James Cuttino, one-twelfth part each of the whole of said lands. The plaintiff, being in possession of the tract of 100 acres of land, should account to the defendants for the income, rents, and profits thereof; and any of the defendants in possession of any part of the tract of 350 acres should account for the income, rents, and profits of the same. It is therefore ordered that it be referred to the master for Sumter county, to take testimony and report as to the rents, income, and profits accruing from said premises, and also to take testimony and report whether partition in kind among the parties be practicable or expedient; and, upon the filing of the master's report, either of the parties hereto has leave to apply for such further orders as may be necessary to effectuate the purport of this decree."

Haynsworth & Haynsworth, for appellant. Lee & Morse and Purdy & Reynolds, for respondents.

McIVER, C. J. There are but two questions presented by this appeal: (1) Whether the circuit judge erred in holding that the children of Mary E. Lynam (afterwards Tindal) who were alive at the time of the death of the testator, Samuel Perdriau, and at the death of his wife, took vested remainders in the property which is the subject of controversy in this case, subject to open and let in other children of Mary E. Lynam (now Tindal) who should come into existence; (2) whether the circuit judge erred in holding that "the plaintiff, being in possession of the 100 acres tract of land, should account to the defendant for the income, rents, and profits of the same," and in directing the master to take testimony and report as to such income, rents, and profits.

The first question has been so fully and satisfactorily discussed by the circuit judge in his decree (which will be incorporated by the reporter in his report of the case) as to supersede the necessity for any further discussion of that question. We therefore adopt his reasoning, enforced by the authorities which he cites, as amply sufficient to vindicate the conclusion which he reaches.

As to the second question, while it is true that the circuit judge does say in his decree that John M. Tindal, the husband of the plaintiff, who had been substituted as a trustee, under the marriage settlement between Mary E. Lynam and John B. Tindal, in the place of the original trustee, Richard F. Wells, who had died, was in possession, as such trustee, 100 acres of land, should account to the defendants for the income, rents, and profits thereof," yet this is mere error of statement, which certainly would not warrant a reversal of the judgment of the circuit court, as it can very easily be rectified, by construing the circuit decree to mean what we have no doubt the circuit judge did really mean, to wit, that any of the parties who were in the receipt of income, rents, and profits of any portion of the lands sought to be partitioned, either by the complaint or answer, should account for the rents and profits thereof. This is manifest from the language immediately following that just quoted, viz.: "And any of the defendants in possession of any part of the tract of 350 acres [as to which the right of partition was not questioned] should account for the income, rents, and profits of the same." Under this construction of the true intent of the circuit decree, the plaintiff, on the reference ordered, can only be required to account for so much of the income, rents, and profits of the 100-acre tract of land as she may have received from the trustee, John M. Tindal; and if any further accounting for such income, rents, and profits be desired, it will be necessary to make the said trustee a party to these proceedings. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court, as herein construed, be affirmed.

HENDRIX et al. v. HOLDEN et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 24, 1900.)

ADMINISTRATOR — TIME TO SUE — PARTIES — JUDGMENT—SALE OF LAND—VALIDITY—APPOINTMENT—CITATION TO HEIRS—PUBLICATION—PRESUMPTION—FINDING BY MASTER—FAILURE TO EXCEPT—EFFECT.

1. Where no exception was taken to a master's finding, it was binding on the circuit judge on the subsequent hearing of the case.

2. There being no evidence that the citation requiring persons opposing an administrator's appointment to show cause was not published as required by Rev. St. 1893, § 2027, the court will presume that the required publication was made.

3. Where an intestate died on June 30th, a judgment secured against her administrator on October 6th could be enforced by a sale of land belonging to her estate, without proceedings against the heirs, since the crops were assets in the administrator's hands under such conditions, and therefore the administrator must have had possession of the land.

4. Notwithstanding Rev. St. 1893, § 2322, providing that no action against an administrator shall be commenced until 12 months after the grant of administration, a sale of the intestate's land under a judgment secured against the administrator 2 days after the expiration of the 12 months will be upheld, though the suit was commenced before the expiration of that period.

5. Where an administrator was entitled to one-third of intestate's land, as her heir at law, his creditors could sell his share under a judgment secured against him in his individual capacity.

Gary, A. J., dissenting.

against William Holden, individually and as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

The following are the judgment and the exceptions thereto:

"On the 30th day of June, 1891, Naomi Holden departed this life intestate in Oconee county. At the time of her death she was seised in fee simple and in the exclusive possession of the several tracts of land described in the complaint, which are the subject-matter of this action. The said Naomi Holden left surviving her, as next of kin and heirs at law, her husband, the defendant William Holden, and her children, the plaintiffs above named. After the death of the said Naomi Holden her said husband and children continued in the uninterrupted possession, use, and enjoyment of the real estate of the said Naomi Holden up to the time the same was sold by the sheriff under an execution issued on the 15th day of October, 1892, to enforce the payment of a judgment in favor of John D. Verner, as plaintiff, against the said William Holden as administrator of the said Naomi Holden and in his own right. This judgment of John D. Verner was recovered under the following circumstances: On the 12th day of October, 1891, said William Holden was appointed administrator of the personal estate of Naomi Holden by Richard Lewis, Esq., judge of probate for Oconee county. I think it important that the petition and order of appointment should be set out at length. They are as follows:

" 'The State of South Carolina, County of Oconee. To Richard Lewis, Judge of Probate of the County and State Aforesaid: The undersigned most respectfully petitions for letters of administration upon the estate of Naomi Holden, dec'd. [Signed] Wm. Holden.'

" 'On hearing the above petition, it is ordered that William Holden be appointed administrator of the personal estate of Naomi Holden, dec'd, upon his giving good and sufficient bond. Given under my hand and seal this 12th day of Oct., 1891. [Signed] Richard Lewis, Judge of Probate. [Official Seal.]'

"This petition and order are both written on the same sheet of paper, just as appears in the above copy.

"On the same day the said William Holden entered into bond in the sum of eight hundred dollars, with W. F. Parker and R. E. Mason as sureties, conditioned for the faithful administration of the goods, chattels, and credits of the said Naomi Holden. On the 8th day of September, 1892, John D. Verner commenced an action in the court of common pleas for Oconee county against William Holden, as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, the one dated 1st November, 1888, for five thousand and four hundred dollars, and the other for one thousand and five hundred dollars, both due one day after date, and indorsed by the said William Holden. On October 6, 1892, judgment was recovered by default in favor of the said John D. Verner and against the said William Holden, both as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden and in his own right, for the sum of eight thousand nine hundred and nineteen and $^{38}/_{100}$ dollars; William Holden having accepted service of summons in this action both in his representative and individual capacity, and having failed to file any answer. On the 15th day of October, 1892, execution was issued to enforce said judgment, and under and by virtue of the same the sheriff sold the various lots of land herein sought to be partitioned. The title deeds of the various purchasers are in evidence before me, from which it appears that on the 7th May, 1894, he sold to Thos. N. Hall and L. G. Gaston a lot known as the 'Cox Lot,' in Westminster, containing one acre, and also the John W. Mason lot, in said town, containing one and one-half acres. On 5th February, 1894, the said sheriff sold to the defendant Josiah Holden two hundred and fifty acres in Oconee county, fully described in his answer in this cause. On 3d February, 1896, he sold to the defendant William M. Gossett lot No. 44 in the town of Westminster, and on same day he sold to the defendant John D. Verner a tract of land on Choestoe creek containing eight and one-tenth acres; also, the one-sixth interest in eight hundred and thirty (830) acres, known as the 'King Lands'; also, one other lot in said town, fronting Gum street; also, a part of lot No. 5, containing twelve and thirty-six one-hundredths (12 $^{36}/_{100}$) acres, in said town (Doyle survey); also, lot No. 38; also, a lot in said town known as the 'Fannie Nelson Lot,' containing one-half acre; also, the William Nix place, containing nine hundred and fifty acres, on both sides of Beon's creek; also, two lots in the town of Walhalla, known as 'Lot 58,' and containing one acre. It is admitted by the parties to this action that Naomi Holden is the common source, and that she died intestate, and was the owner in fee simple of all the lands which have been sold by the sheriff of Oconee county, and that she was the owner of two tracts of land in Oconee county which have not been sold,—one tract of seventy-five acres on Keowee river, and also a lot in Danville, known as 'Lot No. 2,'—and that she was also the owner in fee simple of three small tracts of land in the county of Pickens, one containing one hundred acres, one sixty acres, and the other containing six hundred and twenty-five acres.

"As already intimated, this suit is brought were sold on under the judgment and execution in favor of John D. Verner against the said William Holden in his own right and as the administrator of Naomi Holden, deceased, and to partition the same amongst the said heirs at law of the said Naomi Holden, and for the purpose, also, of partitioning the several tracts of land that have not heretofore been sold. The present action was commenced on the 15th day of January, 1898. On July 13 and 14, 1898, Judge Benet granted an order that as to the defendants John D. Verner, William M. Gossett, Josiah Holden, Thomas N. Hall, and L. G. Gaston the said cause be transferred to the court of common pleas for Oconee county for trial of the issues between the plaintiffs herein and said defendants, and for any other proceedings that might arise in the cause. On the 10th day of September, 1894, an order of reference was granted by the court, referring the said issues to the master of Oconee county to determine all the issues of law and fact involved in said cause. At the reference before said master it was adjudged that the administrator of Naomi Holden was a necessary party to the action, and William Holden, as such, was made a party defendant, and filed his answer in the cause. The reference then proceeded. The master has taken a large amount of testimony, and filed the same, together with his report on the issues of law and fact, in said cause. On this report and the exceptions thereto the cause was heard by me at Walhalla on the 10th day of November, 1899. At the conclusion of the arguments I reserved my decision until I could have an opportunity to formulate it in a decree. I should have stated that the master decided that the title to the several tracts of land described in the separate answers of John D. Verner, Wm. M. Gossett, L. G. Gaston, Thomas N. Hall, and Josiah Holden was good, and recommended that the complaint of the plaintiffs as to those defendants should be dismissed, with costs. The exceptions to the master's report raise the question, in various forms, whether there was error in the said report in concluding that the title of the various purchasers of the several tracts of land sold under the Verner judgment and execution was good and valid.

"The sixth allegation of the plaintiffs' complaint is as follows: 'That the defendant John D. Verner claims to have some interest in the lands situate in the county of Oconee, by reason of the sheriff's sale thereof under a certain judgment obtained against the defendant William Holden individually and as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, but these plaintiffs allege that as to them this judgment and sales thereunder are null and void, and the claims thereunder are worthless and cannot affect their interest in any of the said lands.' The defendants having admitted that Naomi Holden at the time ties to this case are claiming title, and it appearing that the plaintiffs are the children of Naomi Holden and heirs at law, the burden is then cast upon the defendants to show that the judgment of Verner, and execution thereon, were sufficient to devest said plaintiffs of their title to said land. And that question brings up the real issue in the case: Is the Verner judgment and sale thereunder sufficient to devest these plaintiffs? Bonham v. Bishop, 23 S. C. 96. In determining whether these purchasers have a good and valid title, I think it is well settled that, as a general rule, purchasers at sheriffs' sales are not required to look into the regularity of the process under which the sale is made, but that principle does not apply when the process under which the sale was made was absolutely void. Small v. Small, 16 S. C. 72. It is also well settled that the judgment, execution, levy, and sale are all links in the chain of title to property purchased at sheriff's sale. All are necessary to support the purchaser's title, and if any one is void the title of the purchaser fails. Sheriff v. Welborn, 14 S. C. 480; Bonham v. Bishop, 23 S. C. 102. The defendants seem to have recognized this rule in the management and conduct of their defense. The fourth allegation of the answer of John D. Verner is as follows: 'That on the 12th day of October, 1891, the defendant William Holden was duly appointed and qualified as administrator of the personal estate of the said Naomi Holden, deceased, by the judge of probate in and for Oconee county, in said state, and he is still such administrator.' We find from the testimony reported by the master the following extracts: 'Package No. 767 from the probate court, containing the record of the administration of the estate of Naomi Holden, introduced in evidence.' Again, we find: 'Judgment roll No. 1,932, in case of J. D. Verner, plaintiff, against William Holden, as administrator and in his own right, introduced in evidence.' It seems to me that the validity of the defendant Verner's judgment depends upon the appointment of William Holden as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, that being a link in the chain of title of the defendants. Roll No. 767, referred to by the master as containing the record of administration of the estate of Naomi Holden, is before me, and it consists of the petition and order set out at length in the statement of facts in the cause, and the bond of the said William Holden. If that is the evidence of the appointment of the administrator, I must conclude that it is defective, and that the defect is jurisdictional. The mode of granting administration is statutory. Section 2027 of the statute (Rev. St. 1893) is: 'The judge of probate shall grant administration in the following manner: After requiring the person or persons applying therefor to file a petition in writing, to show cause, if any they have, why administration shall not be granted to the person or persons applying therefor, and he shall cause the same to be published on the court house door of the county in which his office is for two successive weeks, and also by having it printed once a week for two successive weeks, after it has been issued, in some public gazette, if any be published, in the county.' Section 2028 of the statute is: 'Every administrator shall, in open court, when letters of administration are granted him, take the following oath or affirmation, as the case may be, to wit: "I do solemnly swear, or affirm, that A B, deceased, died without any will, as far as I know or believe, and that I will well and truly administer all and singular the goods and chattels, rights and credits of the said deceased, and pay all his just debts, as far as the same will extend, and the law require me, and that I will make a true and perfect inventory of all the said goods and chattels, rights and credits, and return a just account thereof when thereunto required. So help me God."' From the record offered in evidence, it does not appear that any of these requirements have been complied with, save the giving of the bond by the administrator, and the petition in writing, if such it may be termed. On the contrary, the order of the probate judge recites the fact that administration was granted 'on hearing the petition.' This does not come up to the requirements of the statute. In McRae v. David, 5 Rich. Eq. 484, it was decided that the duty of the ordinary to take a bond as prescribed by statute was ministerial, and not judicial. It is true, the bond is signed by two individuals as surety, but has the bond been approved by the court as the statute requires? In Hankinson v. Railroad Co. (S. C.) 19 S. E. 213, the court held that 'any competent evidence showing that the court undertaking to grant such letters of administration had no jurisdiction to do so would be alike admissible; for, if the court have no jurisdiction, then the alleged letters of administration would be mere nullities, and surely the certified copy would be no better.'

"It is contended, however, that the judgment of the court of probate, evidenced by the certified copy of the letters of administration, cannot be attacked in this collateral proceeding. That depends upon whether the judgment in question is absolutely void or is merely voidable. If the former, then it is a mere nullity, and may be so treated whenever it is encountered; but, if the latter, then it cannot be attacked in any collateral proceeding, but must be avoided by some direct proceeding instituted for that purpose. As we understand it, the test whether a judgment is void or merely voidable, for want of jurisdiction, is whether the lack of jurisdiction appears upon the face of the record, or whether the infirmity must be shown by evidence outside of the record. In the former case it the face of the record, while in the latter case such inquiry is necessary to ascertain the fact showing the lack of jurisdiction. See Turner v. Malone, 24 S. C. 398. In the very recent case of Hartley v. Glover, 56 S. C. 69, 33 S. E. 796, it seems that Mr. Justice Gary wrote the opinion for the supreme court, in which Mr. Chief Justice McIver did not concur, but wrote a dissenting opinion, in which Messrs. Justices Pope and Jones concurred. So that the dissenting opinion of Mr. Chief Justice McIver became the law of the case, two of the justices having agreed with him. It is true the court had under consideration a case where administration was granted on a derelict estate, but that would not change the reasoning, as the authority to grant such administration is under a different section of the statute; the point at issue being that the power or authority to appoint an administrator is derived from the statute, and the provisions of the statute must be observed. The departure from the statute in the Hartley v. Glover case consisted in the fact that the record, on its face, disclosed the fact that the 40-days notice required by the statute had not been complied with. The majority of the court held that this defect was jurisdictional and fatal, and that the record might be treated as a nullity 'whenever and wherever it is encountered.' The conclusion of the court was that the power conferred by a special statute can only be exercised in the manner and under the terms prescribed by such statute, citing Whitesides v. Barber, 24 S. C. 373. The record in the present case does not disclose that the requirements of the statute have been complied with, but, on the contrary, it discloses the fact that administration was granted on the petition of the administrator. The order appointing the administrator is conditional upon his giving good and sufficient bond. The act of giving the bond is ministerial. Approving the same is quasi judicial. At any rate, the record shows that the provisions of the statute have not been complied with, and this is jurisdictional, and fatal to the validity of the judgment set up by the defendants. Consequently the sheriff's deed did not convey the interest of the plaintiffs in the land sold by him under said judgment.

"It seems to me, however, that there is another and better reason why said sales should not be sustained. As already stated, it is admitted that Naomi Holden was the owner in fee and in the exclusive possession of said land at the time of her death. After her death these plaintiffs and their father, William Holden, succeeded her in that possession, and continued in the use and occupation of the same till ousted by the purchasers at the sheriff's sale. William Holden testified as to the possession in the following language: 'Q. From the time of her death up to the time the sheriff sold her land in this county, who was in possession of

I used it—me and my children—for taxes, and to live off of. * * * Me and my children was in possession of all the land that was sold under this judgment from her death up to the sales.' The law in this state governing sale of land under a judgment obtained against an administrator in an action to which the heir at law was not a party is clearly stated in Huggins v. Oliver, 21 S. C. 147, and also in the later case of Wheeler v. Floyd, 24 S. C. 413. In the former case the authorities are reviewed, and conclusion is announced that lands of an intestate may be sold under a judgment recovered against his administrator upon a debt of the intestate, but, if the lands have passed into the actual and exclusive possession of the heirs at law before the judgment was recovered, they cannot be sold under such judgment, and can only be reached by the usual proceedings to subject real estate in the possession of the heir to the payment of the debts of the ancestor, to which proceeding the heir would, of course, be a party. In Wheeler v. Floyd, 24 S. C. 419, the same rule is announced, the language of the court being: 'While it is true that the heir is generally liable for the debts of the ancestor, sealed or unsealed, to the extent of lands descended or devised, yet the land so descended or devised cannot be sold under a judgment obtained against the administrator or executor, obtained in an action to which the heir is not a party, if at the time of such judgment the heir is in the exclusive possession of the land, asserting the right of possession and enjoying its rents and profits. [My italics.] In such case the heir can only be made liable by direct action against him or them, in which, if judgment is obtained, the land can be levied upon, provided it has not been transferred before action brought,'—citing Bird v. Houze, Speer, Eq. 252, and Jones v. Wightman, 2 Hill, Law, 579. Now, the only question here is one of fact: Were the heirs in exclusive possession at the time this judgment was recovered? What is exclusive possession? I take it that it is such a holding as, if continued for the statutory period, would ripen into a title by adverse possession, and it does seem to me that these plaintiffs have come within that rule. Their father has rented the same out to tenants, collected the same, and expended them for the use of himself and children,—the highest proof of exclusive possession. It nowhere appears that he transferred or changed his possession of an heir at law to that of an administrator. He made no returns as such. Having reached this conclusion, I am constrained to overrule the master in his finding of fact on this subject. I therefore hold that the titles under said judgment of John D. Verner are invalid as against the heirs at law of Naomi Holden, and that they are entitled to have the same necessary to pass on them. It is therefore ordered that the exceptions of the plaintiffs and such of the defendants as have filed exceptions to the master's report be, and the same are hereby, confirmed in so far as they are consistent with the views announced in this decree, and that the report of the master is hereby reversed in so far as the findings of fact and conclusions of law are inconsistent with the conclusions announced in this decree. It is further ordered that the master in equity for Oconee county do sell, on sales day in February next, or on some convenient sales day thereafter, all of the lands in dispute in this cause, belonging to the estate of Naomi Holden, situate in the county of Oconee, after due and legal notice of said sale for twenty-one days, according to the rules of this court, upon the following terms: One-half cash, and the balance on a credit of twelve months; the credit portion to be secured by the bond of the purchaser or purchasers, and a mortgage of the premises sold; the credit portion to draw interest from day of sale. The purchaser at such sale is hereby permitted to anticipate payment by the payment of all cash. If the purchaser should fail, for any reason, to comply with terms of sale, the master in that event is directed to resell same on same or some subsequent day, as he may be advised. Leave is hereby granted for any of the parties to this suit to apply at the foot of this decree for any further order that may be necessary to carry out the views herein announced.

"Ernest Gary, Presiding Judge.

"Columbia, S. C., December 6, 1899."

The defendant John D. Verner excepts to the decree on the following grounds, to wit:

"(1) Because on the reference before the master on September 28, 1899, the plaintiffs recognized that William Holden was the duly-authorized administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, and that he was a proper party to the action in his representative capacity, whereupon the following admission and agreement was entered on the record, to wit: 'It is admitted by all parties that the administrator of Naomi Holden is a proper party to this suit in his representative capacity, and it is agreed that the summons and complaint be so amended as to make him a party; that his answer be filed as of this date.' That the summons and complaint should be considered thus amended, and there should be read into the complaint as amended an allegation, in the usual form, alleging the lawful appointment and qualification of William Holden as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden. That the answer of William Holden as such administrator was filed, alleging that he is the administrator of the estate of said Naomi Holden. That after the complaint was puting the legality of the appointment and qualification of the administrator, and the circuit judge erred in not so holding. (2) Because the validity of the appointment of William Holden as administrator of the estate of his wife, Naomi Holden, deceased, was not questioned on the trial before the master or the circuit judge, the plaintiffs making no contention or exception that there was any irregularity or defect in such appointment; and the circuit judge erred in presuming such irregularity or defect in the grant of letters of administration as to render the same null and void. (3) Because the master found as facts, to which no exception was taken, as follows, to wit: 'That Naomi Holden died intestate at Westminster, Oconee county, where she then resided, on June 30, 1891, leaving as her heirs at law her husband, the defendant William Holden, and seven children, the plaintiffs in this action. * * * On October 12, 1891, William Holden was duly appointed administrator of the personal estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, by Richard Lewis, judge of probate of Oconee county, and letters of administration were duly issued to him. He thereupon entered upon the discharge of his duties as such administrator, and is still acting as such.' That after this finding by the master, and no exceptions being filed thereto, the circuit judge erred in holding that William Holden was not the duly appointed and qualified administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased. (4) Because this case should have been heard and determined by his honor upon the report of the master and the exceptions thereto, or recommitted for further testimony, before making the assumption that citation was not duly published for letters of administration to William Holden on the estate of Naomi Holden. (5) Because, on the hearing of this case before the circuit judge on the report of the master and the exceptions filed, there was no question raised as to any irregularity or defect in the grant of letters of administration by the probate court, it having been conceded all along that William Holden was the duly appointed and authorized administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden; and the court erred in not so holding. (6) Because William Holden, the husband of Naomi Holden, deceased, is given preference by statute in the administration of his deceased wife's estate, and the court of probate had exclusive jurisdiction of the granting of letters of administration, and, having jurisdiction of the subject-matter upon which it acted in this instance, the maxim, 'Omnia præsumuntur rite esse acta,' is applicable; and the circuit judge erred in not so holding. (7) That, in the absence of affirmative evidence that there was no publication of citation, the circuit judge erred in making the assumption that there was no of the intestate. (8) Because it does not appear affirmatively from an inspection of the record in the grant of letters of administration to William Holden on the estate of his deceased wife, Naomi Holden, that the probate court of Oconee county acquired no jurisdiction to do so,—the legal presumption being that citation was duly published for two weeks; that the administrator took the statutory oath in open court; that the bond of the administrator was given and approved as the statute required,—and his honor erred in not so holding. (9) Because his honor erred in holding that at the time the judgment of John D. Verner against William Holden as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, was obtained, and the sales of the real estate made thereunder, the plaintiffs and the defendant William Holden were in such actual and exclusive possession of said land as would prevent a sale of the several tracts or lots of land under said judgment and execution issued thereon. (10) That a distinction should be drawn between the mere pedis possessio of the heirs on and after the descent cast, and that actual and exclusive possession which is manifested by partition, or some act of similar import, whereby the heirs are found to be not only in actual, but exclusive, possession against the claims of creditors; and his honor erred in not so holding. (11) Because his honor erred in holding that the burden of proof is on the defendants to show that as a matter of fact the plaintiffs and the defendant William Holden were not in exclusive possession of said land at the time of the recovery of said judgment and sale thereunder, whereas it is respectfully submitted that since plaintiffs are now seeking to recover possession of said land from defendants, who went into quiet and peaceable possession at the time of the purchase thereof, the burden of proof is now on the plaintiffs and the defendant William Holden to show that they were in such exclusive possession as would prevent a sale under the execution issued on said judgment. (12) Because his honor erred in holding the titles under said judgment of John D. Verner against William Holden as administrator of Naomi Holden to be invalid against her heirs at law; that the heirs of Naomi Holden can recover the same of the several purchasers at sheriff's sale thereof under said judgment, and are entitled to have partition among themselves. (13) Because, in any event, this defendant and other purchasers at said sale own the undivided one-third interest of William Holden in said lands,—said judgment being also against William Holden in his own right, and the one-third interest of William Holden in the unsold land belonging to said estate being worth more than one thousand dollars; and his honor erred in not so holding. (14) Because the judgment in the case of John D.

the circuit judge erred in not so holding. (15) Because the judgment of the probate court in re the appointment of William Holden as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden is not subject to collateral attack in this action; and the circuit judge erred in not so holding. (16) Because, as to plaintiffs and defendant William Holden, the appointment of William Holden as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, has become res adjudicata, and they are estopped from raising such question by the record in the case of John D. Verner against William Holden as administrator of Naomi Holden's estate, and in his own right."

The defendants William M. Gossett, Josiah Holden, Thomas N. Hall, and L. G. Gaston except to the decree on the following grounds:

"(1) It was error on the part of the circuit judge to find and hold that: 'The record shows that the provisions of the statute [relating to the appointment of William Holden as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased] have not been complied with, and that this is jurisdictional, and fatal to the validity of the judgment set up by defendants. Consequently the sheriff's deed did not convey the interest of the plaintiffs in the land sold by him under said judgment.' And the circuit judge should have found and held that it did not affirmatively appear upon inspection of the record that the probate court failed to comply with the statutory requirements before granting the letters of administration, and in the absence of such showing it must be assumed that the probate court conformed to the requirements of law, and that the appointment of William Holden as the administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, was properly made as required by law, and that the title of these defendants to the tracts of land purchased by them under the judgment of John D. Verner v. William Holden as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, and in his own right, are valid. (2) For that the circuit judge erred in finding 'that roll No. 767, referred to by the master as containing the records of administration of the estate of Naomi Holden, is before me; and it consists of the petition and order set out at length in the statement of facts in the cause, and the bond of the said William Holden. If that is the evidence of the appointment of the administrator, I must conclude that it is defective, and that the defect is jurisdictional.' But the circuit judge should have considered all the evidence in the cause tending to show that William Holden was the duly appointed and qualified administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, including the letters of administration granted to William Holden as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, which letters of administration were also contained in, and were and held that William Holden was the duly appointed and qualified administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased; and, in the absence of evidence either for or against anything necessary to have been done, he should have assumed that the formal requisites to its validity had been complied with. (3) It was error on the part of the circuit judge to consider the question of the appointment of the administrator, when the validity of such appointment was not questioned before the master, and after it had been alleged and admitted by the pleadings, and in the trial before the master, that William Holden was such administrator, and after the master had found that: 'On October 12, 1891, William Holden was duly appointed administrator of the personal estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, by Richard Lewis, judge of probate of Oconee county, and letters of administration were duly issued to him. He thereupon entered upon the discharge of his duties as such administrator, and is still acting as such.' And such finding of the master was not questioned by any exception thereto, nor was the validity of the appointment of the administrator. (4) For that the circuit judge should have found and held that the appointment of William Holden as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, was regular, and was duly made by the probate court for Oconee county. (5) The plaintiffs having admitted the representative character of William Holden as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, in the trial of the cause before the master, plaintiffs are estopped from raising such question afterwards. (6) For that it was error on the part of the circuit judge to consider the appointment of William Holden as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, and that the circuit judge should have held that the defendant William Holden and plaintiffs are estopped now from raising such question by the record in the case of John D. Verner v. William Holden as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, and in his own right, and that such question is now res adjudicata as to the defendant William Holden and the plaintiffs. (7) It was error on the part of the circuit judge to overrule the finding of the master that the heirs at law of Naomi Holden, deceased, were not in the actual and exclusive possession of the lands sold under the execution in the cause of John D. Verner v. William Holden as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, and in his own right, and to find and hold that the heirs at law of said Naomi Holden were in actual and exclusive possession of the said lands, and that the titles under said judgment of John D. Verner are invalid as against the heirs at law of Naomi Holden, and that they are entitled to have the same partitioned. (8) The defendants being in possession of the right to recover the said tracts of land from defendants by a preponderance of all the evidence; and the circuit judge erred in not so holding. (9) The defendants being in possession of the several tracts of land under written titles, as bona fide purchasers, the burden is upon the plaintiffs to show by a preponderance of the evidence that the heirs at law of Naomi Holden were in actual and exclusive possession of the tracts of land purchased by these defendants at the time of the sale of said lands under the judgment in the case of John D. Verner v. William Holden as administrator, etc.; and it was error in the circuit judge to hold otherwise. (10) It was error on the part of the circuit judge to find and hold that the titles of these defendants under said judgment of John D. Verner v. William Holden as administrator, etc., were invalid as against the heirs at law of Naomi Holden; and the circuit judge should have affirmed the finding of the master that these defendants were bona fide purchasers, for valuable consideration and without notice, at the sheriff's sales of the tracts of land purchased by them, and that the titles these defendants obtained under their purchases at such sales are valid. (11) It was error on the part of the circuit judge to find and hold that the titles under said judgment of John D. Verner are invalid as against the heirs at law of Naomi Holden, and that they are entitled to have the same partitioned, and in not holding that these defendants are entitled to the interest of the defendant William Holden in the several tracts of land purchased by them. (12) For that the circuit judge should have found that the defendant William Holden procured the defendant Josiah Holden to purchase the tract of land purchased by the defendant Josiah Holden, representing to him that the land was being sold to pay the debts of Naomi Holden, deceased, and the circuit judge should have held that such conduct on the part of the defendant William Holden estops the defendant William Holden and the plaintiffs from now claiming any part or interest in the tract of land purchased by the defendant Josiah Holden under the said John D. Verner judgment. (13) It is respectfully submitted that neither the judgment of the probate court of Oconee county in re the appointment of William Holden as the administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, nor the judgment of the court of common pleas in re John D. Verner v. William Holden as administrator, etc., can be attacked collaterally in this proceeding; and it was error on the part of the circuit judge so to hold."

Carey & McCollough, for appellant J. P. Carey. Stribling & Herndon, for appellants Josiah Holden, Thos. N. Hall, L. G. Gaston, and Wm. M. Gossett. Jaynes & Shelor, for appellant J. D. Verner. J. R. Earle, for respondent Wm. Holden.

Holden, and her children, the plaintiffs, who were all minors at that time. On the 12th day of October, A. D. 1891, the defendant William Holden procured letters of administration upon her estate to be granted to him by the probate court of Oconee county, S. C.; and her personal estate was very inconsiderable, but her real estate was considerable, lying partly in Oconee county and partly in Pickens county, although at her death she was residing with her said husband and with her said children in the little town of Westminster, in Oconee county, until the year 1888, when the plaintiff N. A. Holden intermarried with —— Hendrix, and never afterwards lived as one of the family. Mrs. Naomi Holden had given her note to the firm of Peden & Anderson, and also executed a mortgage of some of her lands to secure said note. Mrs. Holden had also in the year 1888 executed her two sealed notes to her husband, William Holden,—one for the sum of $5,500, due at one day after date, and dated the 1st day of November, 1888, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum, and another of the same date, and also due at one day after date, at 7 per cent. interest, for the sum of $1,500, thus aggregating the sum of $7,000. On the 17th day of October, 1891, upon the application of William Holden, he was appointed the administrator of the personal estate of his wife, Mrs. Naomi Holden, deceased. Upon bond as such administrator, with sureties thereto, letters of administration were duly issued to him by Mr. Lewis, the probate judge for Oconee county. William Holden transferred the two sealed notes given to him by his wife, Mrs. Naomi Holden, for value, unto John D. Verner. On the 8th day of September, 1892, John D. Verner brought his action in the court of common pleas for Oconee county, S. C., against the said William Holden as the administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, and also in his own right, summons in which was accepted in writing by William Holden as said administrator and as an individual. William Holden, as administrator and in his own right, neither answered, demurred, nor appeared in said action. On the 6th day of October, 1892, in regular term time, judgment was rendered in said action against William Holden as administrator, etc., of Naomi Holden, deceased, for the sum of $8,919.38, and for a like amount against William Holden as an individual. Executions were issued under said judgments. Levies were made upon certain pieces of real estate belonging to the estate of Mrs. Naomi Holden, deceased, in October, 1892, and some in 1894, and some in 1896. Sales were made of certain lands of the intestate, and some of intestate's lands were purchased by John D. Verner, some were purchased by Josiah Holden, some were purchased by William M. Gossett, and some were purchased by Thomas N. Hall and L. G. Gaston. These pur-ties are still in possession of said land so purchased. All the real estate in Pickens and Oconee counties not sold by the sheriff still remains in the possession of William Holden and his children. So on the 15th day of January, 1898, all the children of Mrs. Naomi Holden, deceased, as plaintiffs, began their action against William Holden, John D. Verner, J. P. Carey, W. M. Hagood, the Seneca Bank, W. P. Andrews, William M. Gossett, Josiah Holden, Thomas N. Hall, and L. G. Gaston, as defendants, alleging the foregoing facts, but claiming that the sales made by the sheriff of Oconee county under the judgment and execution thereon of J. D. Verner against William Holden as administrator, etc., of Naomi Holden, deceased, was null and void, and that such lands as were attempted to be sold, together with all the other lands of the intestate's estate, were seised by them and William Holden in fee simple as the heirs at law of Mrs. Holden, deceased, and they demanded partition. It should have been stated that the defendants J. P. Carey, W. M. Hagood, and the Bank of Seneca are made parties because they hold claims by lien against the defendant William Holden. The defendants John D. Verner, W. P. Anderson, William M. Gossett, Josiah Holden, Thomas N. Hall, and L. G. Gaston deny that the lands purchased by them at the sheriff's sale under the judgment of John D. Verner as plaintiff against William Holden as administrator of the personal estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, and against him as an individual, are now the property of the plaintiffs and the defendant William Holden as heirs at law of Naomi Holden, deceased, and that such lands remain for partition among such alleged heirs at law; but, on the contrary, the defendants allege that such lands are now owned and held by them as their own, respectively, freed from any and all rights or claims thereto by such heirs at law, or any one or more of them. The action of the children of Mrs. Naomi Holden was begun in Pickens county, as some of them resided in that county (Pickens), and some of the lands were there located; but upon the complaint of the defendant John D. Verner, and the others in like plight with him, an order by consent was passed transferring the record to the county of Oconee, where their lands were located, for trial in the latter county. Soon after the action was transferred to Oconee an order was passed by consent that, "trial by jury being waived," all the issues of law and fact were referred to J. W. Holleman, Esq., as master, with leave to report any special matter.

It was admitted by all the counsel engaged that Naomi Holden at the time of her death was the owner in fee of the lands in dispute in this case, and that she is the common source of title, from whom all the parties to it is agreed that the summons and complaint be so amended as to make him a party; that his answer be filed as of this date." Such answer of William Holden as administrator of the personal estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, was accordingly made, wherein he admitted that he was such administrator. Testimony was taken before the master in regard to the judgment, execution, and sales in the action of John D. Verner as plaintiff against William Holden as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased. "It was admitted and agreed by counsel for appellants and respondents that the levies on the several tracts and lots of land by the sheriff under said execution, the advertisement of the same for sale, and the deeds to defendants John D. Verner, Josiah Holden, Thomas N. Hall, L. G. Gaston, and W. M. Gossett, were regular in all respects; and no question is raised as to the regularity of any of said official acts of the sheriff in making levy, advertisement, sale, or conveyance of the several lots and tracts of land to said defendants, respectively." After hearing all the testimony, the admissions, and the pleadings, the master, J. W. Holleman, Esq., found, among other things, as follows: "That Naomi Holden died at the time, and survived by her husband and her children, as stated in the complaint, and that she was seised of the real estate as set out in the complaint. That William Holden on October 12, 1891, was duly appointed the administrator of the personal estate which belonged to her estate at her death, and letters of administration were duly issued to him. He thereupon entered upon the discharge of his duties as such administrator, and is still such administrator." That John D. Verner began his action against William Holden as such administrator, and against such William Holden as an individual, to obtain judgment against such William Holden, as said administrator and as an individual, for the $8,500 due by Naomi Holden in her lifetime to her husband, William Holden, which were duly transferred to the said John D. Verner by written assignment, which culminated in a judgment against said William Holden, as administrator as aforesaid and as an individual, for $8,919.38 and costs, on the 14th day of October, 1892. That the real estate as described in the answers of John D. Verner, W. M. Gossett, Thomas N. Hall, L. G. Gaston, and Josiah Holden was sold by the sheriff under the execution issued under said judgment, which execution "commanded said sheriff to satisfy said judgment out of the personal property belonging to the estate of Naomi Holden, deceased, and, if sufficient personal property cannot be found belonging to said estate, then out of the real property belonging to the estate of Naomi Holden." That the defendants above named purchased the same, took deeds therefor, went into im-late possession and remained in possession until now. Said sales of land took place he years 1894 and 1896. At the time of death of Naomi Holden, all her children plaintiffs) were minors. That no partiwas ever had of said lands among the heirs at law, nor any fact tantamount eto. That William Holden's possession aid lands was as administrator, and he debts of his intestate with rents. He s, also, that the judgment of Peden & erson, now owned by Anderson, is in ier condition. As conclusions of law, he s: That the judgment of John D. Verner ffective from all collateral attack. That administrator had a right to waive his llege of 12 months from suit. Of course, ase of fraud, it would be different. That plaintiffs are bound by the judgment takby J. D. Verner against their mother's inistrator. He finds no irregularities in judgment, nor in the levy and sales thereer. He holds the titles of the defendants purchasers valid, and recommends that complaint as to such defendants be dised. The plaintiffs and defendant Will Holden excepted to the master's report, it is deemed important that we have text of these exceptions before our eyes a future purpose, and therefore we first oduce the plaintiffs' exceptions, and then defendant William Holden's, to wit:

1) The master erred in holding that in case the burden of proof herein rests upthe plaintiffs to show that they, as heirs aw of Naomi Holden, deceased, were in ial and exclusive possession of the lands ispute at the time the alleged judgment nst the administrator of Naomi Holden, ased, was obtained and sale of the lands eunder had; it being respectfully subed that the said burden rests upon the ndants who claim title thereunder. (2) iot holding, as a matter of fact, that the ence in this case shows that at the time judgment was alleged to have been obed, and sale thereunder had, the plainherein and the defendant William Holwere in the actual and exclusive possesof said lands, and in not holding, as a ter of law, that the plaintiff in execution therefore no right to sell any of said ls thereunder, and that said sales were efore void, and passed no title to the haser or purchasers. (3) In not holding the judgments under which the pursers at said sale purchased never acquirany liens on said lands, for the reasons esaid, and that the heirs at law of Naomi den, deceased, were not parties to the suit, and therefore not bound by said ments. (4) In not holding that the gment and execution in this case, and er which defendants claim title, did not against the administrator de bonis tesris, and was therefore no authority to sell ls of Naomi Holden, deceased. (5) In not ling the judgment under which certain delants claim title to the lands in dispute void, in that the record shows upon its face that the suit was brought within the period inhibited by the statute from bringing suits by creditors against administrators. See section 2322, Rev. St. 1893. (6) In not holding, as a matter of fact, that there was collusion between the defendant John D. Verner and the administrator of Naomi Holden in obtaining said judgment, and in not holding, therefore, as a matter of law, that the defendant John D. Verner could acquire no title thereunder. (7) In not holding that the defendants, nor any of them, cannot hold the lands in dispute, for the reasons that the evidence shows that the lands were worth not exceeding $1,000 at the time of the alleged sales, and were exempt from sale under homestead laws of this state. (8) In not holding that as to heirs at law of Naomi Holden, deceased, the notes which the defendant John D. Verner claims to have obtained his judgment upon—being the judgment under which the lands were sold—were barred by the statute of limitations, and were void because they were not such contracts as Naomi Holden, being at the time a married woman, could lawfully make, and in not holding that said heirs at law could make such a defense in this action, and especially as against the defendant John D. Verner, who had notice thereof. (9) In not holding that the judgment of defendant W. P. Anderson proven in this case against Naomi Holden is void as to the plaintiffs in this case, for the reason that it shows upon its face that the plaintiffs were not properly served in the suit against them under which said judgment was obtained. (10) In not holding that the lands described in the complaint were subject to partition among the heirs of Naomi Holden as alleged therein, and in not recommending that the lands be sold and the proceeds divided among them as prescribed by law, subject to such liens as were proven against the interest of William Holden, to wit, the mortgages of J. P. Carey, Seneca Bank, and Wm. Hagood. (11) In not holding that plaintiffs had established all the material allegations of their complaint, and were entitled to the relief prayed for. (12) Because the master erred in holding that the testimony failed to show that William Holden was in possession for himself, as heir at law, and the other heirs at law, but does show that he was in possession as administrator (qualified possession), and used the rents for the estate. (13) Because the master erred in holding that the commencement of the action against the administrator before twelve months had elapsed after the grant of letters of administration did not render the judgment void on its face, but only voidable, and that the administrator could waive his right to resist the suit on that ground. (14) Because the master erred in denying the right of homestead to the plaintiffs and the defendant William Holden. (15) Because he erred in finding the judgment of W. P. Anderson regular and valid. (16) Because he erred ton, Thomas N. Hall, and Josiah Holden to be good. (17) In finding balance due on judgment of John D. Verner to be $1,639.18, and its priority."

The defendant William Holden, as administrator, filed the following exceptions: "(1) Because the master erred in holding that the possession of this defendant of the lands in dispute was as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, whereas he should have held that he, together with the other heirs at law of the said Naomi Holden, were in the actual and exclusive possession of the lands in dispute, claiming the same as heirs at law of Naomi Holden, from her death till the sale of same by the sheriff of Oconee county, and that a sale of said lands by the said sheriff was null and void and carries no title. (2) Because the master erred in not holding that this defendant was entitled to a homestead, as to his interest in the lands of his deceased wife, as to the judgment against him individually, and that sales were void as to him; his homestead right preventing the judgment under which said sales were made from being a lien on his interest in said lands. (3) Because the master erred in holding that this defendant was not entitled to a homestead. (4) Because the master erred in finding any amount due on J. D. Verner's judgment or W. P. Anderson's judgment, or any priority for them."

The cause then came on to be heard before his honor, Judge Ernest Gary, at the November term of the court of common pleas for Oconee county, on the exceptions to the master's report. When Judge Gary filed his decree, on 6th December, 1899, he held: First, that William Holden was not the administrator of the personal estate of Naomi Holden, deceased; and, second, that the lands having been in the exclusive possession of William Holden and his children from the moment Mrs. Naomi Holden departed this life until devested of such exclusive possession by the purchasers under the sheriff's sales of said lands, hence the sales made by the sheriff conferred no title upon the purchasers of said lands. He therefore adjudged as follows: "I therefore hold that the titles under said judgment [J. D. Verner v. William Holden as administrator of Naomi Holden, deceased, and as an individual] of John D. Verner are invalid as against the heirs at law of Naomi Holden, and that they are entitled to have the same [lands] partitioned. The judgment is assailed on several other grounds, but, having arrived at a satisfactory conclusion, I think it unnecessary to pass on them. It is therefore ordered that the exceptions of the plaintiffs and such of the defendants as have filed exceptions to the master's report be, and the same are hereby, confirmed in so far as they are consistent with the views announced in this decree, and that the report of the master is hereby further ordered that the master in equity for Oconee county do sell, on sales day in February next, or on some convenient sales day thereafter, all of the lands in dispute in this cause, belonging to the estate of Naomi Holden, situate in the county of Oconee, after due and legal notice of said sale for twenty-one days, according to the rules of this court, upon the following terms: One-half cash, and the balance on a credit of twelve months; the credit portion to be secured by the bond of the purchaser or purchasers, and a mortgage of the premises sold, the credit portion to draw interest from day of sale. The purchaser at such sale is hereby permitted to anticipate payment by the payment of all cash. If the purchaser should fail for any reason to comply with terms of sale, the master, in that event, is directed to resell same on some subsequent day, as he may be advised. Leave is hereby granted for any of the parties to this suit to apply at the foot of this decree for any further order that may be necessary to carry out the views herein announced. Ernest Gary, Presiding Judge. Columbia, S. C., December 6, 1899." From this judgment the defendants John D. Verner, William M. Gossett, Josiah Holden, Thomas N. Hall, and L. G. Gaston have appealed. But, before referring to the grounds of appeal, it might be well to insert the agreement of all the counsel as to the scope and effect of Judge Ernest Gary's judgment: "Addenda to Agreement. State of South Carolina, County of Oconee. Court of Common Pleas. N. A. Hendrix et al., Plaintiffs, v. Wm. Holden et al., Defendants. It is hereby agreed by and between all of the attorneys in the above-stated case that the decree rendered by Judge Gary in said case has only passed upon the rights of the plaintiffs and of the defendants who claim to have bought lands at the sheriff's sale under the judgment of John D. Verner v. William Holden, individually and as administrator of the estate of Naomi Holden, and has not considered or determined the rights of any of the other defendants in the said case, and that the rights of all the other defendants are to be determined by such future proceedings in this case as may be necessary in the event that the decree of the circuit judge is confirmed; and the time for any of the said defendants to appeal from this decree, if they should be advised that the decree of Judge Gary affects the rights and defenses set up by the defendants in this case, except those who have already appealed from said decree, be extended until the final determination of this case. March 16, 1900. Carey & McCollough, Plaintiffs' Attorneys, and Attorneys for Defendant J. P. Carey. Stribling & Herndon, Attorneys for Defendants Josiah Holden, Thos. N. Hall, L. G. Gaston, and Wm. M. Gossett. Jaynes & Shelor, Attorneys for John D. Verner, Defendant. J. R. Earle, At-ney for Wm. Holden,"—whereby it is man-it that the parties contesting have deter-ined to restrict the operation of Judge ry's judgment within those limits, to wit, rights of the plaintiffs and of the dedants who claim to have bought lands at sheriff's sales under the judgment of in D. Verner against William Holden in-idually and as administrator of the estate Naomi Holden. We will not reproduce the eptions in terms. They are intended to ail the judgment of Judge Gary on the findings and conclusions which we have eady set forth herein. In the abundance caution, however, we will direct that the gment of Judge Gary, and the exceptions reto, be reproduced in the report of this e.

he exceptions complain that the learned uit judge overlooked the fact that the ster, in his report, distinctly found that liam Holden was duly made the adminator by the probate judge of the county erein the intestate resided; that he quall as such on the 12th October, 1891, and so remained until to-day. The very ob-of exceptions is to point out the exact rs of law and fact made in the report of aster or a decree of a circuit judge. All issues of law and fact were committed to decision of J. W. Holleman, Esq., as ter. When his report was made, it was ling on all the parties, unless excepted to, such exceptions are required to set out in t particulars there was error committed he master. Unless exceptions are taken, circuit judge must make the findings of and the conclusions of law of the mas-the basis of his judgment or decree. It is in the power of the circuit judge to dis-rd the machinery provided by law for conduct of business in our courts. When ies litigant confide the trial of all is-of law and fact to the master, they are tled to have the report of such master on uch issues confirmed by the judgment of circuit court, unless excepted to; and, he event of exceptions, the circuit judge mited to those exceptions, and he can-of his own motion, go outside of these ptions. This is not to be viewed as a ship to the circuit judge, no more than requirements of our constitution that the eme court of the state shall not pass up-acts in a law case. Inasmuch as the mas-passed directly upon the validity of the inistratorship of William Holden, and that he was such administrator, and e were no exceptions to such findings of and conclusion of law by the master, it ot an open question, so far as the parties his action are concerned, whether such ng of the master is conclusive. And it st as imperative upon the circuit judge.
it, apart from this point, which we hold e conclusive, it is not so certain that the on of the probate judge in the matter of appointment of William Holden as admin-tor is not conclusive. Reliance is sought to be placed upon the case of Hartley v. Glover, 56 S. C. 69, 33 S. E. 796, as authority for the circuit judge in declaring the administration of Holden void. But a reference to that case will show wherein the difference exists, for in the case cited it was when Mr. Assman, as clerk of circuit court, had applied for letters of administration upon a derelict estate, under the statute of 1873 (section 2034, 1 Rev. St.). In such statute it was made imperative upon the probate judge to publish a notice for 40 days in some newspaper, and after such notice to grant such letters, but it appeared upon the face of the record itself that only about 30 days had expired; and this court held that it was necessary, in order for the probate court to have jurisdiction in the case of administration to be granted in a derelict estate, that such 40 days' previous notice be given. In the case at bar, under section 2023 of volume 1 of the Revised Statutes of this state, it is made the duty of the probate judge to grant administration to the husband of his deceased wife, if he applies therefor, and in section 2027 it is provided: "The judge of probate shall grant administration in the following manner: After requiring the person or persons applying therefor to file a petition in writing, he shall issue a citation to the kindred or creditors of the intestate or person deceased to show cause, if any they have, why administration shall not be granted to the person or persons applying therefor, and he shall cause the same to be published on the court house door of the county in which his office is for two successive weeks, and also by having it printed once a week for two successive weeks, after it has been issued in some public gazette, if any be published, in the county." It is suggested that in the record produced by the probate court it does not appear affirmatively that the probate judge published notice of the application by Holden for letters of administration. It must occur to any one that there is quite a difference between a record which shows upon its face that only 30 days' notice of application was had, when 40 days' notice was required, and one in which there is no paper produced showing that notice for 14 days had been given. One shows a positive or affirmative violation of the statute, and in the other there is no showing as to publication at all. One is positive and affirmative, and the other is negative. In the latter it may be shown that such notice was given. In the former the record could not be contradicted. In the former it is physically impossible to make 30 days become 40 days. In the case at bar, the bond is there, the appointment is there, the letters of administration are produced. Why may we not assume that this probate court is a court of record, invested by the constitution of 1868 with jurisdiction in all matters testamentary and of administration (see section 20, art. 4, Const. 1868), and also a court of which it has been said: "The court of probate, in its jurisdic-general jurisdiction. Herm. Estop. p. 148, § 140." Thomas v. Poole, 19 S. C. 336. See, also, Turner v. Malone, 24 S. C. 398, where it is declared that "the court of probate, though of limited jurisdiction, is a court of record, with very large powers, and, as to proceedings clearly within its jurisdiction, is not to be regarded as an inferior court, in respect to the dignity of its records." We would have no hesitation in agreeing with the circuit judge in his view of the invalidity of the records of the probate court in showing the appointment by that court of William Holden as administrator of Naomi Holden, deceased, if there was anything in the records of that court showing affirmatively that notice of 14 days was not given by publication. In such an event the case of Turner v. Malone, supra, when it did show affirmatively that service had not been made, or the case of Finley v. Robertson, 17 S. C. 438, when it was shown by the record affirmatively that service of summons was accepted for the infant defendants, or the case of Hartley v. Glover, 56 S. C. 69, 33 S. E. 796, where it appeared affirmatively upon the record that notice had not been published for 40 days, but only 30 days, would apply. Here there is no testimony that such notice was not published, —only an absence of such statement from the record. If in the case at bar the plaintiffs had pleaded that the appointment of their father as the administrator was procured from the probate court without any publication of the 14-days notice to heirs or creditors, and the proofs had been that the office or court of probate had been searched, and no such notice had there appeared, or that no such notice had been published in the newspaper at the time required by the statute, then the circuit judge would have been right; but no such allegation appeared in plaintiffs' complaint, nor were there any such proofs as we have just described offered. Turner v. Malone, supra, treats of what is void and what is voidable in judicial records. So that, even from this second consideration (which is not necessary to our holding the circuit judge in error), we think there was error in the court below.

2. As to the "exclusive holding" of the heirs at law of Mrs. Naomi Holden, deceased, from her death until the purchasers at the sale of her lands under the judgment in the action of John D. Verner v. William Holden, as administrator and as an individual, rendering the claims of the heirs at law valid: Consider these dates: Mrs. Naomi Holden died June 30, 1891; William Holden was appointed administrator of her estate October 12, 1891. Mrs. Holden, the intestate, thus appears to have died between the dates fixed by law when all her crops were assets in the hands of her administrator. Then her lands could not be in the hands of her heirs at law the judgment against William Holden as administrator of Mrs. Naomi Holden, deceased, and also against the said William Holden as an individual; and, under the law, executions are liens on lands as soon as judgment is entered up, if such executions are then issued. So, therefore, these judgments were liens upon all the real estate of Mrs. Naomi Holden on the 14th October, 1892. As Mrs. Naomi Holden died intestate, the law threw title to William Holden, her husband, for one-third of said lands; and this execution issued under the judgment, and the judgment itself against him individually, were liens upon his third part of said lands on the 14th October, 1892. When did William Holden ever render up his possession of his wife's lands which he took by virtue of his administration on October 12, 1891, but which the law refers back to the death of his wife, June 30, 1891? This court is well aware that under certain circumstances it is permitted to heirs at law to assert their rights to exclusive ownership of the lands which belonged to their ancestor, whose title was devolved upon them by operation of law. Jones v. Wightman, 2 Hill, Law, 579; Bird v. Houze, Speer, Eq. 250. But it is well aware that these decisions recognized D'Urphey v. Nelson, 1 Brev. 289, and Martin v. Latta, 4 McCord, 128. We greatly fear that there is gradually creeping into the legal mind of this state an idea that very slight causes will operate to defeat the right of creditors of an intestate to have the lands of such intestate sold under a judgment against an administrator which is recovered soon after the 12 months have expired during which, under our statute, an administrator is protected from suit. In the case at bar the creditor sued a little more than a month before the 12 months had expired, reckoning from the date of administration, 12th October, 1891, during which the administrator was protected from suit. On the 14th October, 1892, just 2 days after 12 months had expired, judgment was entered up, and on the 17th October, 1891, an execution was levied upon lands of the intestate. Now, it is patent that most of the cases which seem to sustain an heir at law when he occupies intestate's lands (such as Bird v. Houze, supra; Jones v. Wightman, supra; Vernon v. Ehrich, 2 Hill, Eq. 257; Huggins v. Oliver, 21 S. C. 147) all seem to point to something akin to laches on the part of the creditor, whereby personal assets have been done away with by administrator or executor. There is in none of these cases a denial of the fact that for nearly 100 years it has been the law in this state that, under a judgment obtained by a creditor against an administrator, lands of an intestate in the hands of intestate's heirs may be sold to satisfy such judgment. Huggins v. Oliver, supra, where Chief Justice McIver where the possession of an administrator, who is also heir at law, and seven infant heirs at law, for about three years from the death of an intestate, one of which years was when suit could not be brought, was held to repair into a right to oust purchasers of such lands at sheriff's sales under a creditor's judgment against the administrator of an intestate whose lands were sold. We must overrule this proposition of the circuit judge.

But, apart from all these things, the judgment of the circuit court cannot stand, because certainly the defendants here being considered had the right to have allowed them the one-third part of the lands to which William Holden was entitled as an heir at law of his deceased wife. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the action remanded to the circuit court for a new trial.

JONES, J. I concur in the conclusion reached in the opinion of Mr. Justice POPE. While it is true, in a case of this kind, the court cannot review the findings of fact by the circuit court, yet, if such findings are based upon or influenced by some error of law, the judgment based upon such finding is reversible for error of law. The conclusion of the circuit court that the heirs at law of Naomi Holden were in actual and exclusive possession of the land at the time of the rendition of the judgment against William Holden as administrator was not based wholly upon the evidence, but was necessarily influenced by his view (1) that William Holden was not the administrator of Naomi Holden; and (2) that the burden of proof rested on the defendants to show that the heirs at law were not in the actual and exclusive possession of said land. I concur in the view of Mr. Justice POPE that it was error of law for the circuit court to reverse the finding of the master that William Holden was duly appointed as administrator of Naomi Holden. Entertaining the view that William Holden was not the administrator, it was natural for the circuit court to conclude that the master was in error in holding that William Holden was in possession as administrator. In my opinion, also, the circuit court erred, as matter of law, in holding that the burden of proof was upon the defendants to show that the heirs at law of Naomi Holden were not in the actual and exclusive possession at the rendition of the judgment. It is true that when plaintiffs showed a common source of title in Naomi Holden, and that they were her heirs at law, this cast the burden upon the defendants; but, when it appeared that defendants were in possession as purchasers at a sale under a judgment against the administrator of Naomi Holden, this was a valid defense, unless plaintiffs should show that at the rendition of such judgment they were in exclusive and actual possession as heirs at law are in the actual and exclusive possession at the rendition of the judgment and the sale. But, to avail themselves of this exception, plaintiffs must show the facts upon which the exception is based, as against purchasers in possession.

GARY, A. J. (dissenting). The issue as to exclusive possession was properly triable by a jury on the law side of the court. The waiver of that mode of trial does not give this court the right to review the findings of fact by the circuit judge. I therefore dissent from the opinion of Mr. Justice POPE.

MEMORANDUM DECISIONS.

HILL v. MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASS'N. (Supreme Court of North Carolina. June 9, 1900.) Appeal from superior court, Craven county; Hoke, Judge. Action by E. G. Hill against the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed. Shepherd & Busbee, J. W. Hinsdale, and Sewell Tyng, for appellant. W. W. Clark, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, J. This case was argued with those of Strauss and Street against same defendant. 36 S. E. 352, 1024. As it involves the same principles of law and, with one exception, facts practically identical, it is governed by that decision. It appears that the plaintiff was present by proxy when the objectionable resolution was passed, but that fact does not affect our opinion. It is quite common for members of an association to send their proxies by request to the secretary or president, in order to permit a meeting to be held; but we cannot suppose that by any such formal act they intend to waive their vested rights, or to release the association from its contractual obligations. The judgment is affirmed.

McCALL v. GARDNER et al. (Supreme Court of North Carolina. May 29, 1900.) Appeal from superior court, Buncombe county; McNeill, Judge. Quo warranto by the state, on relation of R. S. McCall, against one Eaves and others, to try title to an office. From an order overruling relator's motion for a reference to ascertain emoluments of the office while defendant was in wrongful possession thereof, relator appeals. Affirmed. Frank Carter, for appellant.

FURCHES, J. This appeal relates to the defendant Eaves only, and the facts as to him are substantially the same as those in McCall v. Webb (at this term) 36 S. E. 174. This case is therefore governed by the opinion in that case, and the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

STATE ex rel. MOTT v. GRIFFITH. (Supreme Court of North Carolina. June 5, 1900.) Appeal from superior court, Forsyth county; Shaw, Judge. Action by the state, on relation of W. L. Mott, against E. A. Griffith, to try FURCHES, J. From the facts agreed in this case it appears to us that the same questions of law are presented for our determination that were presented in the case of White v. Murray (at this term) 35 S. E. 256, and this case is controlled by the opinion in that case. The judgment of the court below, that the plaintiff could not recover, must be affirmed. Affirmed.

STATE ex rel. WILSON v. NEAL. (Supreme Court of North Carolina. June 5, 1900.) Appeal from superior court, Forsyth county; Shaw, Judge. Action by the state, on relation of N. S. Wilson, against Stephen T. Neal, to try the title to the office of clerk of the Western district criminal court for Forsyth county. From a judgment dismissing his complaint, relator appeals. Affirmed. Holton & Alexander and Watson, Buxton & Watson, for appellant. Glenn & Manly, for appellee.

FURCHES, J. From the facts agreed in this case it appears that the same questions of law are presented for our consideration and decision that were presented in the case of White v. Murray (decided at the present term of this court) 35 S. E. 256. The opinion in that case must govern us in deciding this case, and the judgment of the court below, holding that plaintiff could not recover, is affirmed.

STREET v. MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASS'N. (Supreme Court of North Carolina. June 9, 1900.) Appeal from superior court, Mecklenburg county; Robert Strange, Judge. Action by Thomas Street against the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed. Burwell, Walker & Cansler, for appellant. Osborne & Maxwell, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, J. This case was argued with that of Strauss v. Association, 36 S. E. 352, and, as it involves the same principles and facts almost identical, it is governed by the decision in that case. The judgment is affirmed.

McCABE v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. (Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 10, 1900.) Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Richland county; O. W. Buchanan, Judge. Action by William McCabe against the Southern Railway Company for $25,000 for the negligent killing of intestate by defendant on its road within the state. Defendant's petition to remove the cause to the federal court was denied, plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals. Reversed. B. L. Abney and John P. Thomas, Jr., for appellant. Andrew Crawford and J. S. Muller, for respondent.

JONES, J. The appeal in this case raises the questions of the right of the defendant company to remove the cause to the circuit court of the United States on the ground of diverse citizenship and nonresidence, and the jurisdiction of the state court to proceed further after the due filing of the requisite petition and bond for removal. The question is disposed of in the recent case of Wilson v. Railway Co., 36 S. E. 701, followed in the recent case of Calvert v. Railway Co., Id. 750, which require a reversal of the judgment below in this case. The judgment of the circuit court is reversed.

POPE, J., dissents.

Where there is an interlock between two tracts, actual possession under the older title anywhere within its bounds gives actual possession of the whole tract, including the interlock, unless adverse party is in actual possession thereof.—Wilson v. Braden (W. Va.) 367.

§ 2. Pleading, evidence, trial, and review.
Though plaintiff made a prima facie case in ejectment by showing constructive possession under color of title, yet whether or not he had shown a good prescriptive title, or whether this constructive possession was overcome by the evidence, should have been submitted to the jury.—Cochran v. Warlick (Ga.) 762.

§ 1. Nature and grounds of appellate jurisdiction.

The supreme court will not pass on propositions of law not presented by exceptions or defects apparent on the face of the record.—Robinson v. Lamb (N. C.) 29.

§ 2. Decisions reviewable.

The supreme court has no jurisdiction of a writ of error complaining of the overruling of a demurrer to a sheriff's answer to a money rule, where there had been no final judgment on the rule.—United Glass Co. v. McConnell (Ga.) 58.

While defendant may bring up for review decision overruling demurrer to plaintiff's petition, he cannot also except to a decision striking his answer or a portion thereof.—Turner v. Camp (Ga.) 76.

Striking ground of motion for new trial held not reviewable.—Wood v. Collins (Ga.) 423.

Where, on petition to marshal assets of decedent's estate, the court adjudicated against a particular claim held by a corporation, but no final judgment was entered, the order was not proper subject-matter of direct bill of exceptions, but of exceptions pendente lite.—Atlanta Nat. Building & Loan Ass'n v. Jones (Ga.) 968.

Where a case is submitted to the court, a writ of error will lie, though no right to except was expressly reserved.—Gleason v. Traynham (Ga.) 969.

An appeal does not lie from an order denying a motion to dismiss the return of a justice of the peace to a writ of recordari.—Merrell v. McHone (N. C.) 35.

In an action wherein defendant pleads a plea in bar, an order referring the cause, made contrary to defendant's objection, prior to the disposition of the plea in bar, is appealable.—Austin v. Stewart (N. C.) 37.

Defendant having excepted to an order referring a cause before disposing of a plea in bar, an appeal from an order referring the cause after dismissal by referee will not be dismissed.—Austin v. Stewart (N. C.) 37.

An appeal may be taken from an order allowing to a receiver of an insolvent bank, before final settlement, commissions and charges objected to by the creditors.—Battery Park Bank v. Western Carolina Bank (N. C.) 39.

An appeal from a refusal of the trial court to grant a motion, and from an order allowing defendant to verify an answer, held premature.—Best v. Dunn (N. C.) 126.

Under Clark's Code, § 548, an appeal from an order dismissing an attachment against the assets of an insolvent, and directing the ascertainment of plaintiff's claim, in which other creditors might file pleadings, cannot be entertained; such order not being a final judgment.—Brown v. Nimocks (N. C.) 278.

Order sustaining demurrer to declaration, without judgment of dismissal, is not final, and writ of error will not lie therefrom.—Gillespie v. Coleman (Va.) 377.

A decree confirming and settling the accounts of the representatives of a deceased trustee, without directing judgment or making any disposition of the fund, held not a final decree, and hence no appeal was necessary, until a final decree was rendered, to review errors therein.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Glenn's Adm'r (Va.) 395.

in controversy, and determines the jurisdiction of appellate court.—Cash v. Humphreys (Va.) 517.

§ 3. Right of review.

Mere statement by a party or his attorney that there will be no appeal, made without consideration, does not preclude an appeal.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Glenn's Adm'r (Va.) 395.

§ 4. Presentation and reservation in lower court of grounds of review.

A complaint that the court erred in giving the particular instruction raises only the question of the soundness in the abstract of the proposition announced.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Bond (Ga.) 299.

Affidavits on motion for new trial as to newly-discovered evidence will not be considered, where there is no ground in the motion for new trial on account of newly-discovered evidence.—Fletcher v. Collins (Ga.) 646.

Grounds of motion for new trial which are not filed cannot be considered on appeal.—Fletcher v. Collins (Ga.) 646.

Defect in evidence showing plaintiff a receiver cannot be cured on appeal after argument.—Person v. Leary (N. C.) 35.

Defendant, by failing to object that court had no jurisdiction to try a case at an adjourned day of special term, where regular term intervened, held to have waived objection.—Short v. Gill (N. C.) 336.

Where testimony is objected to and excluded, and on a subsequent hearing admitted without objection, the supreme court, on appeal, properly regarded it as not objected to.—Ross v. Jones (S. C.) 1; Ormand v. Same, Id.; Miller v. Same, Id.

Where the only objections to testimony in the record are the words, "Objected to," the supreme court would be justified, on appeal, in regarding the testimony as not objected to.—Ross v. Jones (S. C.) 1; Ormand v. Same, Id.; Miller v. Same. Id.

Where no notice has been given by a party that the supreme court would be asked to sustain the judgment on a ground other than that on which the circuit judge rested his judgment, such ground cannot be considered.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Sarratt (S. C.) 504.

An instruction misstating the issues made by the pleadings, to which the court's attention was not called at the trial, cannot be considered on appeal.—Bowen v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 590.

A finding of fact cannot be reversed, in the absence of a specific exception assigning error therein.—British & American Mortg. Co. v. Bates (S. C.) 917; Same v. Peacock, Id.; Same v. All, Id.; Same v. Knepton. Id.

Under Code, §§ 3451, 3452, where defendants against whom a decree had been entered by default made no motion in the trial court to vacate it, errors in such decree will not be considered on appeal.—Smith's Ex'r v. Powell (Va.) 522.

§ 5. Parties.

A levying officer ruled for money, and having no interest in the result, is not necessary party to bill of exceptions sued out by one of the contestants for the fund.—De Vaughn v. Byrom (Ga.) 267.

All formal parties in a trial court are proper parties to a writ of error, though not always necessary.—Western Union Tel. Co. v. Griffith (Ga.) 859.

A bill of exceptions may be amended to include the names of necessary parties as plain-

Only such litigants as were co-parties below can properly appear as parties plaintiff in error.—Western Union Tel. Co. v. Griffith (Ga.) 859.

Person interested as a party in a trial court may be made plaintiff in error in the appellate court in connection with person suing out a bill of exceptions.—Macon Nav. Co. v. Schofield (Ga.) 965.

§ 6. Requisites and proceedings for transfer of cause.

Where bill of exceptions is not sued out in due time, the writ of error must be dismissed.—Chipman v. Cornwell (Ga.) 923.

On appeal from the court of ordinary, the bond under Civ. Code, § 4466, is properly made payable to the appellee, and not to the ordinary.—Sims v. Walker (Ga.) 966.

Judgment entered after adjournment of court is "rendered at chambers," within Code, § 345, providing that notice of appeal from judgment rendered at chambers must be served within 10 days after written notice of such judgment. (By divided court.)—Appleby v. South Carolina & G. R. Co. (S. C.) 109.

§ 7. Effect of transfer of cause or proceedings therefor.

Under Code, § 558, the trial court, after final judgment, which is appealed from, determining the right to an office, may properly order a restitution of the books and papers of the office, of which relators have taken possession without legal process and without defendant's consent.—Herring v. Pugh (N. C.) 287.

§ 8. Record and proceedings not in record.

Transcript of record must be written or printed on white paper, and, if written, with pen or typewriter on one side of the paper only.—In re Contempt by Four Clerks (Ga.) 237.

The various parts of the transcript must be arranged in order of time.—In re Contempt by Four Clerks (Ga.) 237.

As against a clerk of court, an illegible transcript will be treated as no transcript.—In re Contempt by Four Clerks (Ga.) 237.

If clerk of lower court delays transmission of original bill of exceptions or the transcript beyond 10 days from the time of the filing of the bill of exceptions on ordinary writ of error, it is his duty to certify on the transcript the cause of delay.—In re Contempt by Four Clerks (Ga.) 237.

It is the duty of clerk of trial court to transmit transcript, though plaintiff in error has neither filed a pauper affidavit nor paid the costs.—In re Contempt by Four Clerks (Ga.) 237.

When, in making suggestion of a diminution of record, it is alleged that brief of evidence has been changed, and it is not alleged that copy of brief in the transcript is not a true copy, the suggestion will not be entertained.—Clark v. State (Ga.) 297.

A ground of motion for new trial alleging error in an instruction must set forth the language complained of.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Bond (Ga.) 299.

Whether permitting an answer to a particular question was prejudicial cannot be determined where it is not shown what the answer was.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Bond (Ga.) 299.

Assignments of error complaining of rulings on new trial cannot be considered when the for in admitting and rejecting evidence cannot be reviewed, where the motion does not state the evidence to which such objections relate.—Commercial Pub. Co. v. Campbell Printing-Press & Mfg. Co. (Ga.) 756.

Grounds of motion for new trial not approved by the trial court cannot be considered.—Atlanta Mach. Works v. Pope (Ga.) 950.

Where bill of exceptions recites order passed on specified day, and record shows it was passed on a different day, the record will control.—Sweatman v. Wall (Ga.) 954.

Where assignment of error is in the granting of a nonsuit, and no effort has been made to brief the evidence, the judgment will be affirmed.—McLeod v. Florida Cent. & P. R. Co. (Ga.) 965.

The appellate court will not consider facts which appear only in the exceptions or in the argument of counsel, and which do not appear in the record.—Burkhim v. Pinkhussohn (S. C.) 908.

§ 9. Assignment of errors.

Assignment that the verdict is contrary to law will not authorize the court to pass on the question whether petition is good as against a general demurrer.—Roberts v. Keeler (Ga.) 617.

A general complaint in a motion for a new trial that the verdict is contrary to law held not a sufficient assignment of error.—Roberts v. Keeler (Ga.) 617.

Assignment of error held not sufficiently specific.—Long v. Harrison (Ga.) 925.

Assignments of error on appeal from a judgment denying a new trial held to present no cause for reversing the judgment.—Wight v. Schmidt (Ga.) 937.

Under Civ. Code, § 5584, the court cannot decide any question unless raised by special assignment of error in bill of exceptions.—Collins v. Carr (Ga.) 959.

Bill of exceptions considered, and held not to contain a special assignment of error.—Collins v. Carr (Ga.) 959.

Assignment of error in an action tried by the court held sufficiently specific.—Gleason v. Traynham (Ga.) 969.

§ 10. Dismissal, withdrawal, or abandonment.

Where it was plain that a writ of error was premature, the supreme court will refuse an application to allow the bill of exceptions to be withdrawn and filed in the court below as exceptions pendente lite.—United Glass Co. v. McConnell (Ga.) 58.

Writ of error will be dismissed for insufficient service of bill of exceptions, though no notice of motion to dismiss was given plaintiff in error.—Whitley Grocery Co. v. Walker (Ga.) 426.

Where bill of exceptions is prematurely sued out, writ of error will be dismissed.—Atlanta Nat. Building & Loan Ass'n v. Jones (Ga.) 968.

§ 11. Hearing and rehearing.

Remark of supreme court that it must not be understood as expressing any dissatisfaction with rulings of the lower court on the competency of certain evidence held a decision that such evidence was competent.—Ross v. Jones (S. C.) 1; Ormand v. Same, Id.; Miller v. Same, Id.

§ 12. Review—Scope and extent in general.

When the question in cross bill of exceptions controls the case as a whole, that question

Jackson v. Warthen (Ga.) 234; Warthen v. Jackson, Id.

Where the effect of a judgment on appeal is to leave the case to be again tried in the court below, questions raised in cross bill of exceptions as to matters probably arising at the next trial will be determined.—Holmes v. Langston (Ga.) 251; Langston v. Holmes, Id.

The supreme court has no jurisdiction to inquire whether an alteration had been made in original papers before the record for the supreme court was made up.—Clark v. State (Ga.) 297.

Where demurrer to petition is based on several grounds, and some are sustained, judgment of dismissal will be affirmed, whether those grounds were sufficient or not, if other grounds were good.—Crittenden v. Southern Home Building & Loan Ass'n (Ga.) 643.

Where issues submitted arise on the pleading, and every phase of the parties' contentions can be so presented thereunder, they cannot be reviewed.—Bradley v. Ohio River & C. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 181.

Where, several years subsequent to a decree in favor of plaintiff, a commission was appointed by the trial court to determine whether a note given in satisfaction of such decree had been accepted, on appeal from a decision on that question errors in the original decree will not be considered. — Smith's Ex'r v. Powell (Va.) 522.

§ 13. —— Parties entitled to allege error.

That court treated a deed as ambiguous, when it was not so, held not prejudicial to one whose contention as to its real meaning was not well founded.—St. John v. Leyden (Ga.) 610.

Error cannot be predicated upon exclusion of evidence, when court announces that it may be offered "later on," and offer is not renewed. —State v. Weaver (S. C.) 499.

An exception to instructions will not be considered on appeal, where the objecting party has no interest in the property in controversy. —Ex parte Neal Loan & Banking Co. (S. C.) 584; Lanahan v. Bailey Liquor Co., Id.

§ 14. —— Discretion of lower court.

First grant of new trial will not be reviewed, under Civ. Code, § 5585.—McNamara v. Cox (Ga.) 60.

Where the evidence on the sole issue submitted is conflicting, the court's discretion in refusing a new trial will not be reviewed on appeal. —Gramling v. Pool (Ga.) 430.

Discretion of court in refusing injunction, where the evidence is conflicting and there is no principle of law involved, will not be disturbed.—Cutliff v. Burk (Ga.) 459.

First grant of new trial under Civ. Code, § 5585, will not be reviewed.—Killian v. Banks (Ga.) 635.

First grant of new trial, where evidence was conflicting, will not be disturbed.—Zipperer v. Zipperer (Ga.) 921.

The appellate court will in no case overrule as erroneous a refusal to direct a verdict.— Western & A. R. Co. v. Callaway (Ga.) 967.

Under Code, § 379 (4), a receiver's allowance of commissions does not rest exclusively in the discretion of the court below, but its exercise may be reviewed when the allowance is made on a wrong principle, or appears clearly inadequate or excessive.—Battery Park Bank v. Western Carolina Bank (N. C.) 39.

§ 15. —— Questions of fact, verdicts, and findings.

Where two successive juries have found in favor of divorce, and there was some evidence to sustain the decree, the court, on appeal, will not interfere with refusal of a new trial.— Gordon v. Gordon (Ga.) 296.

Where it does not appear that general demurrer to petition was sustained, but case went to trial on the merits, held, petition was sufficient to sustain verdict for plaintiff.—St. John v. Leyden (Ga.) 610.

Where there are certain issues of fact which must be resolved affirmatively to sustain finding for defendant, and there is no evidence as to them, finding for defendant is contrary to law. —Davis v. Mims (Ga.) 689.

Evidence held to show defendant represented by attorneys, so that the agreement that a judgment might be rendered in a county other than that of trial was binding on him.—Ladd v. Teague (N. C.) 45.

A verdict on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.—McMillan v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. (N. C.) 129.

Findings of fact by the trial court cannot be reviewed on appeal.—Davison v. West Oxford Land Co. (N. C.) 162.

Findings of fact by referee, sustained by the trial court, held conclusive on appeal.—Dunn v. Beaman (N. C.) 174.

Right of review of findings on facts defined. —Lenoir v. Linville Imp. Co. (N. C.) 185.

A finding that defendant, in the exercise of ordinary care, might have seen plaintiff in time to have avoided injuring him, cannot be reviewed on appeal.—Wheeler v. Gibbon (N. C.) 277.

A referee's findings as to the laws of New York, confirmed by circuit judge, held findings of fact, and not subject to review on appeal; and hence a contract thereby determined to be binding is enforceable. — Ebaugh v. Eastern Building & Loan Ass'n (S. C.) 535.

An exception that the circuit judge erred in sustaining the finding of the referee that an alleged payment should not be allowed is not available, unless established by a preponderance of the evidence.—Allen v. Petty (S. C.) 586.

A verdict settling a boundary dispute, rendered on conflicting evidence, will not be disturbed on appeal.—Fry v. Stowers (Va.) 482.

A decree based on a commissioner's report, doing substantial justice, affirmed where the record on appeal was unsatisfactory.—Browning's Ex'r v. Browning (Va.) 525.

A commissioner's finding, based on conflicting evidence, will not be disturbed on appeal.— Carper v. Marshall (Va.) 526.

The appellate court will not set aside a verdict unless the evidence is plainly insufficient to support it. — Southern Ry. Co. v. Dawson (Va.) 996.

A verdict will not be disturbed for excessive damages when there is nothing to indicate that the jury acted from improper motive or misconception.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Dawson (Va.) 996.

§ 16. —— Harmless error.

Admission of parol evidence to explain a will held harmless error, where it supported the construction as shown by the will.—Cochran v. Hudson (Ga.) 71.

Whether an auditor erred in allowing amendment to pleading held immaterial, when his act had not been proved, is cured when execution is thereafter established.—Ray v. Camp (Ga.) 242.

Any errors of court in rulings complained of in motion for new trial held harmless.—St. John v. Leyden (Ga.) 610.

Rejection of evidence held harmless error where it could not have affected the result.—Hunnicutt v. Chambers (Ga.) 853.

Error of judge in propounding to defendant questions as to fact not stated in answer held not ground for reversal, where it had no material bearing on result.—Hartley v. McGee (Ga.) 926.

Where court had no jurisdiction of an action, refusal of new trial was not error.—Crawford v. Wheeler (Ga.) 954.

Where the court may have given instructions not applicable to issues involved, where it affirmatively appears that jury was not misled, the error was harmless.—Taylor v. Cantrell (Ga.) 968.

The joining of improper parties with a plaintiff is harmless error.—Carter v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. (N. C.) 14.

Where a special instruction, given at the request of a defendant, does not injure the plaintiff, and his exception thereto is in conflict with his prayer for judgment, the judgment will not be reversed therefor.—Lassiter v. Norfolk & C. R. Co. (N. C.) 48.

Remark of a judge in the hearing of the jury on denying defendant's motion to nonsuit plaintiff, on the ground that there was no evidence, to the effect that a certain fact was some evidence of liability, is harmless.—McMillan v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. (N. C.) 129.

The court's failure to submit whether or not an isolated fact was per se negligence is not reversible error, where it placed before the jury all the facts as a whole, and properly instructed in regard thereto.—Bradley v. Ohio River & C. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 181.

A judgment for plaintiff will not be reversed, where the trial court erred in holding that defendant's answer was not verified, where plaintiff was entitled to recover on the merits, though it was verified.—Darwin v. Moore (S. C.) 539.

Where the agent testified, in an action on a life policy, that the company's rules forbade delivery of policies to sick applicants, a prior ruling excluding an agent's manual showing the same rule, if error, was harmless.—Going v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. (S. C.) 556.

In an action on a note, error in allowing limitations to be interposed as an amendment to the reply was rendered harmless by a finding that they had no application.—Allen v. Petty (S. C.) 586.

A party cannot complain of a modification of an instruction, though the same be good law, which was not prejudicial to him.—Bowen v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 590.

In an action for the wrongful rescission of plaintiff's contract to erect certain buildings for defendant, the error, if any, of allowing an answer to a question as to how long it took to complete the work, was harmless.—Jenkins v. Charleston St. Ry. Co. (S. C.) 703.

§ 17. —— Error waived in appellate court.

Assignments of error not argued in the briefs will be treated as waived.—Moss v. Bohanon (Ga.) 954.

or such rulings will not be reversed on a subsequent appeal.—James v. Withers (N. C.) 178.

Judgment affirmed on divided opinion held res judicata as to particular case.—Johnson v. Charleston & S. Ry. Co. (S. C.) 851.

§ 19. Determination and disposition of cause.

The court with jurisdiction of person and subject-matter has power to take proper steps to have service duly made.—Devereaux v. Atlanta Railway & Power Co. (Ga.) 939.

A party against whom a verdict has been rendered, who, without motion for new trial, sues out a direct bill of exceptions, must not only show error was committed, but that adverse verdict resulted therefrom.—Western & A. R. Co. v. Callaway (Ga.) 967.

Where, on appeal from an order sustaining a demurrer, the demurrer is overruled as to one cause of action of the complaint, defendant, on remand of the case, may answer over, under Code, § 272.—Sloan v. Carolina Cent. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 21.

On filing a remittitur from the supreme court affirming a judgment of the trial court, the latter has no authority to modify its former judgment in any respect.—Merrimon v. Lyman (N. C.) 44.

Where the case on appeal contained testimony as to a master's negligence, the giving of which was shown to be doubtful by statements of the trial judge and his certificate in response to certiorari, and error on the issue of damages required reversal of the case, a new trial after reversal should not be confined to such issue.—Smith v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. (N. C.) 170.

After affirmance of judgment for plaintiff in supreme court, it is too late to apply for further relief in the court below.—McCall v. Webb (N. C.) 174.

Evidence admitted as competent by the trial court will be held competent on appeal, where the court is equally divided.—Boone v. Peebles (N. C.) 193.

Where the money paid by defendants for testator's land had been used to discharge testator's debts, but defendant's answer to a complaint filed by testator's children to set aside the sale did not formally plead their right of subrogation, the court, on appeal, will not decide that question, but will remand the cause, with leave to defendants to amend their answer.—Hunter v. Hunter (S. C.) 734.

ARBITRATION AND AWARD.

§ 1. Arbitrators and proceedings.

In the absence of a statutory requirement, it is not necessary that witnesses before a board of arbitrators should be sworn.—Rounds v. Aiken Mfg. Co. (S. C.) 714.

Where the action of the board of arbitrators at its meeting had been communicated to plaintiff, and no objection made by him thereto, he

Where a submission to arbitration provided for two arbitrators, who were to call in an umpire in case of differences between them, it was not necessary for the umpire, when called in, to examine witnesses, etc.; but it was proper for him to arrive at his conclusions from the findings of the other two.—Rounds v. Aiken Mfg. Co. (S. C.) 714.

Evidence held sufficient to show that one of the parties to an arbitration had received notice of the meeting of the board.—Rounds v. Aiken Mfg. Co. (S. C.) 714.

§ 2. Award.

The fact that defendant, in a case before arbitrators, had admitted items at a certain price, did not preclude the board from allowing a less price.—Rounds v. Aiken Mfg. Co. (S. C.) 714.

Objection to the award of a board of arbitrators on the ground that no allowance was made for painting extra woodwork held not well taken, where the award showed an allowance for extra woodwork complete.—Rounds v. Aiken Mfg. Co. (S. C.) 714.

It is no objection to an award of arbitrators that it was not signed by the umpire until the morning after the others had signed it, where the terms of the submission did not require any formal publication thereof.—Rounds v. Aiken Mfg. Co. (S. C.) 714.

Findings of a board of arbitrators, made in good faith after full consideration, will not be disturbed for mere errors of judgment.—Rounds v. Aiken Mfg. Co. (S. C.) 714.

The fact that an agent of one of the parties was present at sittings of the board of arbitrators did not invalidate the award, where no objection was made to his presence by the other party.—Rounds v. Aiken Mfg. Co. (S. C.) 714.

ASSIGNMENTS FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS.

§ 1. Requisites and validity.

Allotment of assignor's homestead exemption by three of his neighbors, at request of trustee, does not render assignment presumptively fraudulent.—Jordan v. Newsome (N. C.) 154.

Preference to assignor's mother-in-law will not invalidate assignment.—Jordan v. Newsome (N. C.) 154.

Preference to fictitious claim renders deed fraudulent only as to such claim.—Jordan v. Newsome (N. C.) 154.

Admissions in complaint held sufficient to show that general assignment was supported by valid indebtedness.—Jordan v. Newsome (N. C.) 154.

Where deed reserves debtor's homestead exemptions, it is not invalid, under Const. art. 10, § 8, because wife did not join therein.—Jordan v. Newsome (N. C.) 154.

Transfer of all one's property in the state on valid consideration held not an assignment for benefit of creditors.—Ex parte Neal Loan & Banking Co. (S. C.) 584; Lanahan v. Bailey Liquor Co., Id.

§ 2. Rights and remedies of creditors.

Evidence held sufficient to authorize an instruction that a claim preferred in an assignment for creditors was fictitious.—Jordan v. Newsome (N. C.) 154.

Complaint declaring on promise by debtor to make a new note for balance due on creditor's notes, on creditor's surrendering them to debtor's assignee for benefit of creditors and receiving half cash, held not demurrable as declaring on a promise fraudulent as to other creditors.—Wittkowsky v. Baruch (N. C.) 156.

Under 23 St. at Large, p. 30, amending Code, § 250, held, that an affidavit for attachment may be filed within 48 hours after issue of the warrant.—Ferst v. Powers (S. C.) 744.

A verified complaint and affidavits for attachment held a sufficient compliance with Code, § 250, requiring affidavits for attachment to show a cause of action, the amount and grounds thereof, and that defendant has assigned his property in fraud of creditors.—Ferst v. Powers (S. C.) 744.

An undertaking in attachment held sufficiently signed by plaintiffs, where their names were signed thereto by agents under authority of telegrams thereto attached.—Ferst v. Powers (S. C.) 744.

§ 2. Proceedings to support or enforce.
A complaint claiming for goods sold and delivered, and seeking to set aside an assignment as in fraud of creditors, held to sufficiently state a cause of action at law to justify resort to attachment.—Ferst v. Powers (S. C.) 744.

§ 3. Quashing, vacating, dissolution, or abandonment.
Evidence held immaterial on question of fraud in conveyance by mother to daughter.—Cooley v. Abbey (Ga.) 786.

Conveyance by insolvent mother to her daughter and son-in-law in good faith for a proper consideration held not fraudulent.—Cooley v. Abbey (Ga.) 786.

Denial of truth of ground of attachment held a traverse of such ground.—Cooley v. Abbey (Ga.) 786.

One holding note as transferee thereof ... sumed, in the absence of evidence to the ... trary, to be a bona fide holder for ... Walters v. Palmer (Ga.) 79.

Citizens' Banking Co. (Ga.) 460.

Sale by payee of negotiable note held not to make seller a borrower from the purchaser, though he indorsed the note.—Campbell v. Morgan (Ga.) 621; Morgan v. Campbell, Id.

Note for price of patent right, failing to set forth the consideration upon its face as provided by statute, held not void in hands of bona fide holder.—Smith v. Wood (Ga.) 649.

Under Acts 1897-98, pp. 896, 918, § 27, where a payee transferred a note to his creditor as collateral, the creditor was a holder for value to the extent of his lien.—Payne v. Zell (Va.) 379.

The holder of a note indorsed to him before maturity, and before complaint by the maker of a failure of consideration, was a holder without notice of such failure.—Payne v. Zell (Va.) 379.

Under Acts 1897-98, pp. 896, 918, § 25, where a payee transferred a note to his creditor in part payment of his indebtedness, the creditor was a holder for value.—Payne v. Zell (Va.) 379.

§ 4. Payment and discharge.

Payment of a note to the president of a bank held to discharge the makers, whether the paper was that of the president individually or that of the bank.—Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Camp (Ga.) 201.

§ 5. Actions.

Evidence in action on note, where defense was payment in part, held to sustain verdict for plaintiff.—Hannah v. Johnson (Ga.) 462.

Payee in possession of note is presumed to own it, though his indorsement thereon is uncanceled.—Bomar v. Equitable Mortg. Co. (Ga.) 601.

Answer in action on note for property bought, alleging that defendant was induced to sign the same by false and fraudulent representations as to the value and character of the property, held to state a good defense.—Carithers v. Levy (Ga.) 958.

In action on a note, oral evidence was admissible to show that part of the consideration was to protect plaintiff's testator as surety on defendant's bond, and that the bond had been discharged.—Trimmier v. Liles (S. C.) 652.

BOUNDARIES.

§ 1. Evidence, ascertainment, and establishment.

Running by processioners of a line between adjoining landowners, where none had been established, held unauthorized, and the superior old trees marked as pointers at the end of a line alleged to be the true line of a survey mistakenly described in a grant held insufficient to justify submission of the question to the jury.—Tucker v. Satterthwaite (N. C.) 188.

BREACH.

Of condition, see "Insurance," §§ 4, 5.
Of contract, see "Contracts," § 3; "Sales," § 4; "Vendor and Purchaser," § 2.

BRIDGES.

§ 1. Regulation and use for travel.

Where corporate limits of city are extended to include a highway and a bridge over stream crossing the same, the city is chargeable with the duty of keeping it in repair after the county had relinquished its jurisdiction.—Commissioners of Roads and Revenues of Polk County v. City of Cedartown (Ga.) 50.

A city is not liable for injuries from a defective bridge over a road on private property in no way controlled by the city.—City of Sandersville v. Hurst (Ga.) 757.

BROKERS.

See "Principal and Agent."

§ 1. Compensation and lien.

A broker held not entitled to commissions, on ground that annulling agreement of sale was due to misrepresentations of vendor, where no agreement would have been made but for the representation.—Crockett v. Grayson (Va.) 477.

Broker held not entitled to commission where contract for sale was annulled by vendee, pursuant to the contract, on discovery that liens on property were greater than represented by vendor.—Crockett v. Grayson (Va.) 477.

BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS.

A stockholder suing a corporation, alleging certain amendments to by-laws to be in violation of its contract, must set out the contract.—Crittenden v. Southern Home Building & Loan Ass'n (Ga.) 643.

Where petition in action against association by stockholder alleges right to recover certain amount as withdrawal value, the particular terms of the contract should be set out.—Crittenden v. Southern Home Building & Loan Ass'n (Ga.) 643.

Rights and liabilities of parties to loan from a building association, who executed a bond to secure the loan, and also under mortgage executed as additional security determined.—Meares v. Monroe Land & Improvement Co. (N. C.) 130.

Where, after withdrawal of a member of a building association, but before his withdrawal became effective, it changed its by-laws, so as to repeal prior provision for withdrawal fund, he was entitled to a receiver and to compel a dissolution of the association.—Andrews v. Roanoke Bldg. Ass'n & Inv. Co. (Va.) 531.

The withdrawing member's right to sue to compel its dissolution held not barred by limitations, where no fund existed since his withdrawal out of which his claim could have been recovered.—Andrews v. Roanoke Bldg. Ass'n & Inv. Co. (Va.) 531.

BY-LAWS.

Of corporations in general, see "Corporations," § 1.

§ 1. Right of action and defenses.
A deed will not be canceled because of a breach by grantee of a promise made by him in consideration of the deed.—Brand v. Power (Ga.) 53.

Equity will not decree cancellation of a paper where it is not essential to protection of party asking.—Hairalson v. Carson (Ga.) 319.

§ 2. Proceedings and relief.
A bill to cancel a deed because of breach by grantee of a promise in consideration thereof cannot be amended, to set up that grantor was mentally incompetent or to allege fraud.—Brand v. Power (Ga.) 53.

CARRIERS.

§ 1. Carriage of goods.
Evidence held insufficient to show acquiescence in unauthorized contract of agent.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Felton (Ga.) 93.

Railroad company can repudiate an unauthorized contract of its agent which he attempts to make with himself.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Felton (Ga.) 93.

Liability of common carrier of goods is that of insurer, from which he is excused only by act of God or the public enemy.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Lippman (Ga.) 202.

A carrier of goods may with certain restrictions make an express contract as to his liability.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Lippman (Ga.) 202.

Where goods arrived at destination, and are deposited by the railroad company in a place of safety, its liability as a warehouseman begins.—Georgia & A. Ry. v. Pound (Ga.) 312.

To prove a usage, it must be affirmatively shown that it was of an established and general nature, and that notice by carrier, given in pursuance thereof, warranted the inference that he intended to remain liable as common carrier, and not as warehouseman.—Georgia & A. Ry. v. Pound (Ga.) 312.

Evidence held insufficient to establish custom of carrier to remain liable as such after goods had been deposited in warehouse.—Georgia & A. Ry. v. Pound (Ga.) 312.

Under Code, § 1964, the refusal of a railroad company to ship each head of a lot of cattle was a separate offense, for which a penalty might be recovered.—Carter v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. (N. C.) 14.

A complaint against a railroad, alleging that defendant wrongfully allowed one who had agreed to purchase cotton of plaintiff to examine the same without production of bill of lading, which had draft attached, by reason of which examination purchaser did not accept, held demurrable.—Sloan v. Carolina Cent. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 21.

A complaint against a carrier for wrongfully allowing one to examine goods without production of bill of lading, and for allowing the goods to remain in cars without notifying plaintiff in order to charge demurrage, held not demurrable for misjoinder of causes of action, under Clark's Code (3d Ed.) 267, note 1.—Sloan v. Carolina Cent. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 21.

§ 2. Carriage of live stock.
A carrier of live stock may limit his liability to cases only of gross negligence.—Cooper v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. (Ga.) 240.

A common carrier of live stock is, under certain circumstances, exempt from liability for injuries caused by the nature of the animals.—Cooper v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. (Ga.) 240.

The burden rests on a carrier of live stock to show that he is not liable for injuries to live stock by reason of some cause which the law recognizes as an excuse.—Cooper v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. (Ga.) 240.

Where a contract for shipment of live stock provided that shipper should unload at his own risk, he may either be present or have some one representing him at the unloading of the stock; but failure of the shipper to be present will not defeat a recovery, unless the damages claimed resulted from such failure.—Cooper v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. (Ga.) 240.

Where evidence in action for damage to live stock showed that it resulted from negligent failure of plaintiff to attend to such stock, the verdict for plaintiff will be set aside.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Rogers (Ga.) 946.

The shipper's failure to give a formal written notice of his intention to demand compensation for damages to cattle shipped, under special contract requiring written notice before suit, held not to preclude his recovery where he signed a receipt for the cattle at destination under protest because of their damaged condition.—Hinkle v. Southern Ry. Co. (N. C.) 348.

The burden held on a carrier, where a shipment of cattle was under a special contract, to bring the injury complained of within its exceptions, and to show that it was not caused by its own negligence.—Hinkle v. Southern Ry. Co. (N. C.) 348.

Where horses shipped over several connecting lines were injured in shipment, an instruction that, if they were shipped under special contract, plaintiff could not recover by merely proving they were in good condition when loaded, or at any intermediate point, and not in good condition when they arrived at their destination, but must also show that the injury did not arise from their crowded condition in the car, nor from concussion incident to running freight trains, was proper.—Milam v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 571.

Where horses were injured in shipment, an instruction that if shipper failed to feed and rest them during shipment, according to his contract, he could not recover, was properly refused.—Milam v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 571.

Where horses transported by successive carriers were injured in shipment, an instruction that if they were shipped under special contract, in order to hold defendant liable for the injury, the jury must find that such injury occurred on defendant's line and because of its negligence, was proper.—Milam v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 571.

An instruction that where horses had been transported by successive carriers, and they were in good condition when first delivered, and damaged when they arrived at their destination, the law presumed that the damages were occasioned while they were in the hands of the last railway company, was properly refused.—Milam v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 571.

Where the court instructed that, before plaintiff could recover from defendant, they must be satisfied by the preponderance of evidence that the horses shipped by plaintiff over defendant's line of railway were injured while in possession of defendant, was proper.—Milam v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 571.

Where the evidence as to the appearance of horses on their arrival at their destination was conflicting, a motion for a nonsuit in an action for damages for improper care of them during shipment was properly denied; such question

A passenger held guilty of remaining in a car other than that to which he had been assigned, and liable to prosecution under Pen. Code, § 528.—Brown v. State (Ga.) 68.

A carrier of passengers is bound to extraordinary diligence, which he cannot waive.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Lippman (Ga.) 202.

Express contract entered into, under the terms of which a carrier is released from liability to passenger for personal injuries on freight train, cannot be enforced.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Lippman (Ga.) 202.

A carrier receiving a passenger on a freight train is bound by the same standard of diligence as if the passenger were on a regular passenger train.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Lippman (Ga.) 202.

A passenger voluntarily seeking to be transported by freight train assumes the risk of the usual necessary jars occurring in operation of the train.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Lippman (Ga.) 202.

A carrier of passengers cannot limit his liability from consequences of his own negligence by notice or express contract.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Watson (Ga.) 209.

A regulation limiting the time of transportation, and providing for refunding the price of any unused part of ticket after the limited period, held reasonable.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Watson (Ga.) 209.

A regulation fixing a time limit to a ticket, if otherwise reasonable, becomes a part of the contract; and where, after the limit, the passenger tenders the ticket, and is ejected for refusal to pay, he has no right of action against the carrier.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Watson (Ga.) 209.

No right of action accrues to passenger for ejection after ticket has expired under reasonable regulation of company.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Howard (Ga.) 213.

One taking passage on freight train held entitled to carriage only to a place in the city at which the run of the train on its usual schedule is terminated.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Howard (Ga.) 213.

Complaint in action by passenger against railroad for personal injuries held to state a cause of action.—Garland v. Southern Ry. Co. (Ga.) 595.

Petition in action for ejectment of passenger held to state a cause of action.—McIver v. Florida Cent. & P. R. Co. (Ga.) 775.

Where the complaint showed that the train on which plaintiff was a passenger stopped on a trestle, and that plaintiff, by reason of the darkness, fell from the trestle to the ground, and did not negative plaintiff's knowledge of the position of the train, the complaint shows contributory negligence.—Jarrell v. Charleston & W. C. Ry. Co. (S. C.) 910.

Where complaint merely alleged the negligent delay of the train on which plaintiff was a passenger, and its stopping on a high trestle, and that plaintiff, by reason of the darkness and the poor lights furnished, missed his footing and fell to the ground, it fails to show negligence of defendant to be the proximate cause of the injury.—Jarrell v. Charleston & W. C. Ry. Co. (S. C.) 910.

No presumption of negligence by the carrier arises from the fall of a passenger from a train, unless the fall is shown to be the result of some act or omission of the carrier.—Jarrell v. Charleston & W. C. Ry. Co. (S. C.) 910.

CERTIORARI.

Review of proceedings before justices of the peace, see "Justices of the Peace," § 3.

§ 1. Nature and grounds.

Evidence being conflicting on question of negligence, certiorari after verdict for plaintiff held properly overruled.—Georgia Railroad & Banking Co. v. Pounds (Ga.) 687.

Under Const. art. 5, §§ 15, 19, and Code Civ. Proc. § 57, certiorari will not lie to a judgment of the probate court declaring a person to be of unsound mind which was rendered without notice to such person.—Ex parte Gregory (S. C.) 433; In re Buffington, Id.

§ 2. Proceedings and determination.

A writ of certiorari issued on the sanction of a city court judge is void.—Kieve v. Ford (Ga.) 293.

Petition for certiorari, where no error is assigned in judgment sought to be reviewed, except to allege that the same was error, held not to comply with statute requiring a distinct setting forth of errors complained of.—Papworth v. City of Fitzgerald (Ga.) 311.

Where question whether written notice of petition for certiorari had been given in due time depends on conflicting evidence, ruling of trial court will not be disturbed.—Shearouse v. Morgan (Ga.) 927.

Judgment dismissing certiorari because notice of sanction was not given in due time will not be disturbed because judge dismissed without giving attorney for plaintiff opportunity to reply to affidavit by defendant's attorney, no substantial right being affected. — Shearouse v. Morgan (Ga.) 927.

Where original application for a writ is void, a renewal thereof within six months is ineffectual.—Hamilton v. Phenix Ins. Co. (Ga.) 960.

Where certiorari has been judicially decreed void, it cannot be renewed, and, not having been presented for sanction within 30 days after the verdict which it seeks to review, it should be dismissed.—Hamilton v. Phenix Ins. Co. (Ga.) 960.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

Provisions relating to particular subjects, see "Commerce," § 1; "Intoxicating Liquors," § 1; "Taxation," § 1.
—— enactment and validity of statutes, see "Statutes," § 1.
—— subjects and titles of statutes, see "Statutes," § 2.

§ 1. Distribution of governmental powers and functions.

Where court is created by constitution, the legislature, without express constitutional authority, cannot define what are contempts, and declare that court shall have jurisdiction over no acts except those specified.—Bradley v. State (Ga.) 630; Looney v. Same, Id.

§ 2. Vested rights.

Act Dec. 21, 1897, relating to allowance of improvements in ejectment, held not to interfere with any vested right of the owner.—Mills v. Geer (Ga.) 673.

§ 3. Obligation of contracts.

A franchise to establish and operate a ferry, granted by Priv. Laws 1873–74, c. 27, held not a contract, but a mere gratuity, and hence the legislature was not prohibited from limiting the extension of the franchise under Act 1897, c. 103.—Robinson v. Lamb (N. C.) 29.

Laws 1899, c. 128, § 2, prohibiting the bringing of an action against a town to recover fines and penalties collected, held in violation of contract clause of the federal constitution.—Board of Education of Vance County v. Town of Henderson (N. C.) 158.

§ 4. Retrospective and ex post facto laws.

Act Dec. 21, 1897, allowing value of improvements under certain circumstances to defendants in ejectment, held not unconstitutional as a retroactive act.—Mills v. Geer (Ga.) 673.

§ 5. Equal protection of laws.

The refusal to permit a foreign corporation, which has become a domestic corporation under Pub. Laws 1899, c. 62, to remove an action against it to the United States circuit court, held not to abridge its privileges as a United States citizen guarantied by United States constitution.—Debnam v. Southern Bell Tel. Co. (N. C.) 269.

§ 6. Due process of law.

An order, in a proceeding for the recovery of an office, compelling relators, without notice, before hearing, to deliver the books of the office, held not invalid, as depriving them of private property without due process of law.—Herring v. Pugh (N. C.) 287.

CONTEMPT.

§ 1. Acts or conduct constituting contempt of court.

Relators, in a proceeding to recover an office, cannot relieve themselves of contempt for disobeying a court's order to deliver the books of der of the court.—Herring v. Pugh (N. C.) 287.

§ 2. Power to punish and proceedings therefor.

Civ. Code, § 4046, in so far as it seeks to limit jurisdiction of constitutional courts to punish contempts to certain specified acts, is not binding on such courts.—Bradley v. State (Ga.) 630; Looney v. Same, Id.

That a given act may be indictable does not deprive the court of the power of dealing with it as a contempt.—Bradley v. State (Ga.) 630; Looney v. Same, Id.

The granting of a rule to show cause for contempt for disobeying an order is not defective because of the failure to serve respondents with notice of the order on which the contempt is based, where they appeared at the hearing of the contempt rule and declined to obey the order.—Herring v. Pugh (N. C.) 287.

A judge outside the judicial district in which respondents reside, and in which an alleged contempt was committed, may hear and determine the contempt, where the respondents appear and answer the rule, and make no objection to the jurisdiction.—Herring v. Pugh (N. C.) 287.

Respondents do not purge themselves of contempt in disobeying a court's order by answer disclaiming any intention to commit a contempt, where they refused to obey the order, which it was in their power to obey.—Herring v. Pugh (N. C.) 287.

Creation, see "Wills," § 7.

CONTINUANCE.

In criminal prosecution, see "Criminal Law," § 5.

Discretion of trial judge in refusing continuance will not be controlled where evidence as to the ground was conflicting.—Fletcher v. Collins (Ga.) 646.

Motion for continuance in behalf of claimant held erroneously denied.—Morse v. Lowe (Ga.) 688.

Refusal of continuance held not error, where answer filed by defendant was without merit and properly stricken.—Garlington v. Fletcher (Ga.) 920.

Refusal of continuance because of defendant's absence to keep a business engagement made several weeks before, when no effort was made to change the day set for trial till the case was called, held not error.—Payne v. Zell (Va.) 379.

Weakness of mind, not amounting to imbecility, held not to warrant setting aside a contract; there being no proof of fraud or undue influence.—Nance v. Stockburger (Ga.) 100.

Promise to pay rent to prevent unlawful eviction held not binding.—Smith v. Coker (Ga.) 107.

Where instrument signed by one partner and by an agent of the other, with a clause reciting that "this contract shall not be considered binding until approved in writing by" the second party, it is only a proposal to contract.—Barnes Cycle Co. v. Schofield (Ga.) 965.

Where a creditor agreed to an extension payment of a larger sum than the interest due, and the creditor received same, he was bound by the agreement, though based on payment of usurious interest.—Fleming v. Barden (N. C.) 17.

§ 2. Construction and operation.

Building contract held not divisible because of stipulation that at certain stage of completion owner may suspend further work on payment of a fixed sum.—Hunnicutt & Bellingrath Co. v. Van Hoose (Ga.) 669.

Where contractor estimated 928,339 brick for a wheel pit, but had only put in 519,020, the difference constituted an "omission," within the meaning of the contract providing for the submission of differences to arbitrators.—Rounds v. Aiken Mfg. Co. (S. C.) 714.

Where it appeared that defendants had paid for certain wood as material to be used by plaintiff in constructing a mill house under the terms of a contract, and the latter had disposed thereof, the wood constituted a proper item of charge against plaintiff in a case before the board of arbitration.—Rounds v. Aiken Mfg. Co. (S. C.) 714.

Under the terms of a building contract calling for a gross sum for all of the work done, and providing for the submission of questions of extra work, etc., to arbitration, and that the cost of the extra work was to be determined by the contract price, it was proper for the board to determine the value of such extra work by the current market price thereof.—Rounds v. Aiken Mfg. Co. (S. C.) 714.

Where contractors had agreed to furnish ventilators worth $35, and there was evidence to show that they were of inferior quality, and worth only $10, the difference constituted an "omission," which it was proper for arbitrators to consider under the terms of the contract.—Rounds v. Aiken Mfg. Co. (S. C.) 714.

§ 3. Performance or breach.

Where plaintiff contracted to ship a stated amount of merchandise to defendants, and to pay a stipulated sum per barrel for shortage, he was not liable for such shortage as was caused

§ 4. Actions for breach.

Action on contract, based on alleged breach of contract made by defendant with another party, held not maintainable, where petition did not show any privity of contract between plaintiffs and defendants.—Davis v. South Side Mfg. Co. (Ga.) 223.

Damages in the nature of expenses incurred because of breach of contract may be pleaded in defense to an action on the contract.—Gore v. Malsby (Ga.) 315.

An answer denying liability on a written contract because, through ignorance, defendant was induced to sign it by fraudulent representations, and to make a contract different from that he believed he was making, held not demurrable, as seeking to vary the terms of a written contract.—Gore v. Malsby (Ga.) 315.

An action cannot be maintained on an agreement to pay a stockholder 100 cents on the dollar for corporate stock within 90 days, without proof of tender of the stock and demand of payment in accordance with the agreement.—Morris v. Veach (Ga.) 753.

Where another was made party to pending suit, and action resolved itself into one between a newly-made party and plaintiff, who brought him into litigation, held error to grant a nonsuit against such newly-made party, where there was sufficient evidence to entitle him to judgment.—Spears v. Scott (Ga.) 950.

§ 1. Corporate name, seal, domicile, by-laws, and records.

Amendments to by-laws of corporation held not fraudulent as to a particular stockholder because made without his knowledge or not ratified by him.—Crittenden v. Southern Home Building & Loan Ass'n (Ga.) 643.

Business corporation may amend its by-laws when not inconsistent with its charter or constitution.—Crittenden v. Southern Home Building & Loan Ass'n (Ga.) 643.

for unpaid subscription.—Fouché v. Merchants' Nat. Bank (Ga.) 256; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Fouché, Id.

In suit by creditors against holder for unpaid subscription, where defendant pleads no ownership, a contract entered into by defendant at about that time, showing ownership, held admissible.—Fouché v. Merchants' Nat. Bank (Ga.) 256; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Fouché, Id.

To enable creditor to recover from one alleged to be a stockholder, it must appear that he was in fact a stockholder, when he was in law liable.—Fouché v. Merchants' Nat. Bank (Ga.) 256; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Fouché, Id.

Shareholders of insolvent corporation liable on unpaid stock subscription held not entitled to set off, in proceedings to enforce the subscription, debts due to them by the corporation.—Wilkinson v. Bertock (Ga.) 623.

In action by creditor to enforce subscription to insolvent corporation, right of stockholder to set off debt due by corporation in defense to a common-law action to enforce individual liability does not apply.—Wilkinson v. Bertock (Ga.) 623.

When stockholders intervene in a suit against corporation, and allege refusal of officer to defend through fraud, it was not error to refuse to permit them to defend in name of corporation when they decline to proceed in their own names in behalf of themselves and other stockholders who might join.—Cornell v. Sims (Ga.) 627.

§ 3. Insolvency and receivers.

A corporation is not liable to an officer for salary while the corporation is in a receiver's hands, since performance of the contract between the two was rendered impossible by judicial action, and not by the fault of the corporation—Lenoir v. Linville Imp. Co. (N. C.) 185.

§ 4. Foreign corporations.

A foreign corporation, by compliance with Pub. Laws 1899, c. 62, becomes a domestic corporation, and not a mere licensee authorized to do business in the state.—Debnam v. Southern Bell Tel. Co. (N. C.) 269.

Of record on appeal or writ of error, see "Appeal and Error," § 8.

COSTS.

§ 1. On appeal or error, and on new trial or motion therefor.

Where defendant in error brings up immaterial portions of the record, the costs thereof will be paid by him.—Cochran v. Hudson (Ga.) 71.

An affidavit for appeal in forma pauperis must be entitled in the cause.—Parks v. State (Ga.) 73.

Where no brief of evidence was filed on motion for new trial, or brought to the court in the record, damages for delay will be awarded against plaintiff in error.—Brooks v. Proctor (Ga.) 99.

Where a writ of error is palpably without merit, damages for delay will be awarded.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Hooper (Ga.) 232.

Damages for frivolous appeal cannot be enforced in claim cases.—Adams v. Carnes (Ga.) 597.

COUNTIES.

See "Municipal Corporations."

§ 1. Government and officers.

Under 18 St. at Large, pp. 581, 582, § 252, and Rev. St. 1893, § 274, an auditor who holds over for 1 month and 26 days after his term of office has expired is not entitled to the whole of additional compensation allowed thereby, but only to his proportionate share.—Finley v. Laurens County (S. C.) 588.

Code, § 3178, prohibiting removal of records of county clerk's office out of the county where office is located, is not violated by location of clerk's office in incorporated city.—Board of Norfolk County Sup'rs v. Cox (Va.) 380.

§ 2. Property, contracts, and liabilities.

A county is not liable for a tort committed by a chain-gang superintendent, though done under instructions of the county authorities.—Bailey v. Fulton County (Ga.) 596.

Under Code, §§ 3120, 3176, land selected by board of supervisors for erection of clerk's office must be within limits of county.—Board of Norfolk County Sup'rs v. Cox (Va.) 380.

Trial by court without jury, see "Trial," § 10.

§ 1. Courts of general original jurisdiction.

That sustaining a demurrer to a portion of complaint reduced the damages below $200 did not oust the superior court of jurisdiction, where sum originally demanded is not so palpably bad faith as to be fraud on jurisdiction of the court.—Sloan v. Carolina Cent. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 21.

§ 2. Courts of limited or inferior jurisdiction.

Condemnation of land in incorporated town for county clerk's office does not subject same to conflict of jurisdiction between city and county courts.—Board of Norfolk County Sup'rs v. Cox (Va.) 380.

COVENANTS.

In insurance policies, see "Insurance," § 5.

§ 1. Actions for breach.

Petition claiming as measure of damages value of property to which title failed held amendable, so as to make the same the purchase price.—St. John v. Leyden (Ga.) 610.

Evidence held to show breach of warranty as to title of land.—St. John v. Leyden (Ga.) 610.

Evidence in action for breach of warranty held to sustain verdict for plaintiff.—St. John v. Leyden (Ga.) 610.

Pleading construed, and held to be an action for breach of warranty of title to land.—St. John v. Leyden (Ga.) 610.

CREDITORS' SUIT.

Remedies in cases of assignments, see "Assignments for Benefit of Creditors," § 2.

Creditors' bill held maintainable, though plaintiff has no existing lien on property of main defendant.—Kruger v. Walker (Ga.) 794.

Party with whom judgment debtor made fraudulent conspiracy to conceal property held proper party defendant.—Kruger v. Walker (Ga.) 794.

Objection by demurrer that petition failed to show that judgment declared on was binding on individual assets of firm held cured by amendment.—Kruger v. Walker (Ga.) 794.

A judgment creditor is entitled to pursue successive actions on his judgment until satisfaction is obtained.—Kelly v. Hamblen (Va.) 491.

In an action to subject defendant's land to the lien of certain judgments, held error to sustain exceptions to an answer showing that there is other property of the debtor and his alienees subsequent to defendant still liable for such judgments.—Kelly v. Hamblen (Va.) 491.

§ 1. Jurisdiction.

Acts 1899, c. 371, held void, as infringing the constitutional jurisdiction of superior courts under Const. art. 4, §§ 2, 8, 10, 11, 18, 27.—Mott v. Commissioners of Forsyth County (N. C.) 330.

§ 2. Former jeopardy.

Where, in indictment for larceny, the ownership is erroneously laid, defendant is not placed in jeopardy, so as to bar a prosecution under another indictment charging him with stealing the same property belonging to the rightful owner.—State v. Council (S. C.) 663.

§ 3. Arraignment and pleas, and nolle prosequi or discontinuance.

Refusal to allow withdrawal of plea of not guilty, and finding of plea in abatement, held a proper exercise of the court's discretion.—Reed v. Commonwealth (Va.) 399.

§ 4. Evidence.

Evidence offered to prove an alibi should be considered in connection with all the testimony to determine whether guilt of accused has been established beyond a reasonable doubt.—Lucas v. State (Ga.) 87.

Nonexpert witnesses can testify that they knew accused, and had seen nothing to indicate insanity.—Herndon v. State (Ga.) 634.

Any witness, after examining a physical instrument, may testify in his opinion that it is a deadly weapon.—Perry v. State (Ga.) 781.

The law of circumstantial evidence does not apply where the state proved a positive confession.—Perry v. State (Ga.) 781.

Medical expert held competent to testify to an opinion that the blow struck came from the rear of the injured person.—Perry v. State (Ga.) 781.

Evidence of defendant's possession of weapons held admissible, as showing preparation for a homicide.—State v. Kinsauls (N. C.) 31.

Instruction to jury as to admissibility of confession held not erroneous.—State v. Baker (S. C.) 501.

Confession made by defendant upon preliminary examination held competent to go to jury. —State v. Baker (S. C.) 501.

A physician who attended the deceased may base his opinion as to the cause of decedent's death on his observation and examination of the deceased, without a hypothetical statement of facts.—State v. Foote (S. C.) 551.

Where defendant, having shot deceased, was stopped by another, who, seeking to restrain him, was also shot by him and killed, evidence of the other killing was admissible as part of the res gestæ.—Reed v. Commonwealth (Va.) 399.

§ 5. Time of trial and continuance.

Refusal to continue case a second time held proper.—Baker v. State (Ga.) 607.

Where defendant moved for a continuance, and produced a doctor's certificate that his nervous condition was disturbed and disordered, but defendant's appearance and manner did not indicate any nervous trouble, his motion was properly denied.—State v. Lee (S. C.) 706.

§ 6. Trial—Course and conduct of trial in general.

Where persons put their character in issue, it is error for judge to ask witness questions manifestly indicating that judge did not believe accused were of good character.—Jaques v. State (Ga.) 104.

It is discretionary with court to suspend trial to allow expert to examine indenture in skull of accused, in order to testify as to its effect upon accused as to sanity or insanity.—Herndon v. State (Ga.) 634.

§ 7. —— Reception of evidence.

Accused has no legal right to make more than one statement.—Sharp v. State (Ga.) 633.

A conviction will not be reversed because evidence not in rebuttal was admitted after the close of defendant's case.—Reed v. Commonwealth (Va.) 399.

§ 8. —— Arguments and conduct of counsel.

Improper remarks by prosecuting attorney, unrebuked, held no ground for reversal, where no objection is made.—Herndon v. State (Ga.) 634.

Waiver of argument to jury does not preclude state from reading to jury confession introduced in evidence on trial.—State v. Baker (S. C.) 501.

§ 9. —— Province of court and jury in general.

Whether defendant had mental capacity to deliberate is a question for the jury, on conflicting evidence.—State v. Jones (N. C.) 38.

§ 10. —— Necessity, requisites, and sufficiency of instructions.

Failure to charge that a confession alone, uncorroborated by other evidence, will not justify conviction, held cause for new trial.—Lucas v. State (Ga.) 87.

Where a witness on criminal prosecution testified that his evidence before the grand jury was false, it was error to fail to charge that, if witness knowingly swears falsely to a material matter, his testimony must be disregarded, unless corroborated.—Plummer v. State (Ga.) 233.

Where there was no corroboration of a witness shown to have sworn falsely, it was error to charge that, if he had been impeached and restored to confidence of the jury, he should be believed in preference to the impeaching evidence.—Plummer v. State (Ga.) 233.

A judge can base an instruction on the statement of the accused.—Gay v. State (Ga.) 857.

It is reversible error to charge on the subject of corroboration, when there is no corroborating evidence in the case.—Coney v. State (Ga.) 907.

Failure to recapitulate evidence in charges in a criminal trial held not error, in absence of request therefor.—State v. Kinsauls (N. C.) 31.

Giving an instruction in a criminal case not applicable to the facts is not error, unless the principle stated is erroneous, or might confuse or mislead a jury.—Reed v. Commonwealth (Va.) 399.

§ 11. —— Requests for instructions.

Where counsel submits certain propositions of law, without request to charge, it is enough if the court charges substantially the law applicable to the case.—State v. Wine (S. C.) 439.

Failure to charge on self-defense held not error, in absence of request.—State v. Chiles (S. C.) 496.

§ 12. —— Custody, conduct, and deliberations of jury.

Remarks of a preacher in prayer and sermon, at which jury attended during trial, held not misconduct prejudicial to the prisoner.—State v. Kinsauls (N. C.) 31.

In the absence of evidence of prejudice, judge allowing juror to receive a letter held not error. —State v. Wine (S. C.) 439.

Failure of the record to show that the usual oath was administered to the officer in charge of a jury on its adjournment from day to day held no ground for reversing a conviction.—Reed v. Commonwealth (Va.) 399.

The fact that one of the deputy sheriffs who had charge of the jury in a criminal case was a witness for the state is no ground for reversal of a conviction in such case.—Reed v. Commonwealth (Va.) 399.

§ 13. —— Verdict.

Verdict held sufficient in form, and a subsequent addition thereto not prejudicial.—State v. Kinsauls (N. C.) 31.

§ 14. —— Waiver and correction of irregularities and errors.

Where, on objection to state counsel's remarks in a criminal case, the judge stops him, and cautions the jury to disregard such remarks, no error is committed.—State v. Kinsauls (N. C.) 31.

§ 15. Motions for new trial and in arrest.

Dismissal of motion for new trial for want of brief of evidence held proper, where no brief was filed within the time prescribed by order be reversed.—Clark v. State (Ga.) 297.

New trial for newly-discovered evidence as to insanity of accused held properly denied.—Baker v. State (Ga.) 607.

Evidence held to sustain conviction of murder.—Baker v. State (Ga.) 607.

After verdict of guilty, a new trial should not be granted, on the ground of bias of a juror who qualified himself on his voir dire, on the uncorroborated evidence of one witness.—Turner v. State (Ga.) 686.

Newly-discovered evidence tending to impeach a witness affords no cause for granting a new trial.—Carmichael v. State (Ga.) 872.

Motion for new trial after close of term for misconduct of jury known at the time held too late.—State v. Kinsauls (N. C.) 31.

A motion in arrest admits truth of allegations of indictment.—State v. Newcomb (N. C.) 147.

The fact that a judge stated, in his refusal to grant a new trial because of the insufficiency of the evidence, that the jury had the right to discredit the testimony of an expert, does not make the refusal erroneous.—State v. Foote (S. C.) 551.

§§ 16, 17. Appeal and error, and certiorari—In general.

A ground of a motion for new trial assigning error in excluding evidence, but not setting it forth, cannot be considered.—Lucas v. State (Ga.) 87.

Where defendant pleads guilty to a charge in a court having no jurisdiction, he can bring certiorari to review error of court in imposing penalty.—Williams v. City Council of Augusta (Ga.) 607.

Grounds of motion for new trial not approved by presiding judge cannot be considered on appeal.—Sharp v. State (Ga.) 633.

Where there is no return or acknowledgment of service indorsed on the bill of exceptions, the writ of error will be dismissed.—Crow v. State (Ga.) 858.

Under Code, § 1237, the state cannot appeal from a judgment on general verdict.—State v. Savery (N. C.) 22.

Failure of prisoner's counsel to ask for fuller instructions precludes objection on appeal that fuller instructions were not given.—State v. Kinsauls (N. C.) 31.

In a capital case, specific exceptions to judge's charge may be inserted nunc pro tunc.—State v. Kinsauls (N. C.) 31.

Exception to charge "as given" held too broad to be available under Code, § 550.—State v. Kinsauls (N. C.) 31.

Finding of fact by judge on criminal trial that a juror was indifferent held not reviewable.—State v. Kinsauls (N. C.) 31.

Failure of prisoner to exhaust peremptory challenges precludes review of exceptions to jurors.—State v. Kinsauls (N. C.) 31.

A cause will not be reversed because of erroneous reason assigned for proper ruling.—State v. Weaver (S. C.) 499.

New trial will not be granted upon reversal of cause for illegal sentence.—State v. Baker (S. C.) 501.

Transcribing on the minute book of the county court a judgment of the circuit court reversing a judgment of such court was a sufficient compliance with Code, § 4060, and hence the coun-proper exclusion of evidence available, the record must show what the party offering the witness expected to prove by him.—Jackson v. Commonwealth (Va.) 487.

§ 18. —— Review.

A charge as to presumption arising from recent possession of stolen goods held not prejudicial to the accused.—Joseph v. State (Ga.) 61.

Statement of accused held to justify a charge on the law of voluntary manslaughter.—Gay v. State (Ga.) 857.

The court will not pass on assignments of error requiring consideration of evidence when the brief thereof is a full report of the examination, embracing needless matter.—Carmichael v. State (Ga.) 872.

Recapitulation of evidence in judge's charge in a criminal trial will be presumed where the record does not show the contrary.—State v. Kinsauls (N. C.) 31.

Action of trial court in rescinding during term order setting aside verdict of conviction held not reviewable, in absence of abuse of discretion.—State v. Chestnutt (N. C.) 278.

The overruling of a motion for a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence will not be reviewed on appeal, if the verdict is supported by some evidence.—State v. Foote (S. C.) 551.

An instruction leaving an inference to be drawn by the jury from facts undisputed and uncontradicted by evidence in a criminal case is not prejudicial error.—State v. Ross (S. C.) 659.

An instruction in a criminal case, in no respect prejudicial to defendant, cannot be urged as ground for reversal.—State v. Ross (S. C.) 659.

Where an instruction in a criminal case is proper when considered in connection with the whole charge, error based on it when taken separately is harmless.—State v. Lee (S. C.) 706.

Where defendant was on trial for murder, error based on the failure of the trial court to give an instruction in his preliminary charge was harmless, where such an instruction was given in the final charge.—State v. Lee (S. C.) 706.

§ 19. Punishment and prevention of crime.

Court cannot impose sentence of perpetual banishment from state for grand larceny.—State v. Baker (S. C.) 501.

The severity of a sentence for violating a city ordinance, within the limits of the ordinance and the city charter, is discretionary with the trial court.—City Council of Greenville v. Kemmis (S. C.) 727.

No objection to written interrogatories as leading will prevail, unless filed with interrogatories before issuing commission.—Franks v. Gress Lumber Co. (Ga.) 314.

Where a deposition transmitted by mail was by the postmaster, in the presence of the parties, delivered to the justice, pending trial, and on objection that it had not been indorsed as required by Civ. Code, § 5310, the justice made the proper indorsement, it was a sufficient compliance with the law.—Keys v. Flemister (Ga.) 948.

Under Code, § 3363, a notice served in Richmond at 3:45 p. m., May 24th, on counsel of nonresident, to take the deposition of a party at Hampton, Va., on May 26th, was not served in a reasonable time, where nonresident resided in Baltimore.—Payne v. Zell (Va.) 379.

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

See "Dower"; "Executors and Administrators."

§ 1. Persons entitled and their respective shares.

An heir is not disinherited without express devise or necessary implication thereof.—Baer v. Forbes (W. Va.) 364.

Deed conveying interest in growing timber construed, and held that payment of balance of price on each lot was not a condition precedent to right to enter and cut timber.—McRae v. Stillwell (Ga.) 604.

A deed conveying a determinable interest in growing timber held entitled to be recorded as conveying an interest in realty.—McRae v. Stillwell (Ga.) 604.

Deed construed, and held to convey to grantees timber suitable for purposes indicated therein, and to authorize removal within a reasonable time, and forfeiture of rights under deed on failure so to do.—McRae v. Stillwell (Ga.) 604.

§ 3. Pleading and evidence.

A legal registry of a deed raises a presumption of delivery.—Stallings v. Newton (Ga.) 227.

See "Dower"; "Executors and Administrators."

§ 1. Persons entitled and their respective shares.

An heir is not disinherited without express devise or necessary implication thereof.—Baer v. Forbes (W. Va.) 364.

Their distributive shares, held not to be a charge against real estate conveyed to such heirs, after the death of deceased, in consideration of the release of an indebtedness to deceased which was secured by a trust deed on the property.—James v. Withers (N. C.) 178.

Heirs and distributees of a decedent cannot acquire title to his choses in action, without administration proceedings, merely by taking possession, so as to authorize the maintenance of an action thereon in their own name.—Darwin v. Moore (S. C.) 539.

Where an administrator was entitled to one-third of intestate's land as her heir at law, his creditors could sell his share under a judgment secured against him in his individual capacity.—Hendrix v. Holden (S. C.) 1010.

Dismissal of appeal or writ of error, see "Appeal and Error," § 10; "Criminal Law," § 17.

§ 1. Involuntary.

Motion to reinstate after expiration of term at which order of dismissal was entered held erroneously granted, no sufficient excuse for the delay being shown.—Watkins v. Brizandine (Ga.) 807.

Where action is dismissed, unless petition is amended within certain time, it is too late, where amendment is not filed, to except to the order of dismissal, but same should be made subject-matter of direct bill of exceptions.—Chipman v. Cornwell (Ga.) 923.

Where court dismisses case because petition does not set forth cause of action, and allows plaintiff certain time to amend petition, and he fails so to do, the effect of the order is to dispose of the case.—Chipman v. Cornwell (Ga.) 923.

DIVORCE.

§ 1. Jurisdiction, proceedings, and relief.

Where it was shown that, less than three years before a divorce was decreed for abandonment in favor of a husband, he had lived and cohabited with his wife for several months, held not error to set aside the decree.—Willard v. Willard (Va.) 518.

Circumstances reviewed in a proceeding by a wife for rehearing of a divorce case, and such wife held not precluded by laches from the right to file an amended cross bill and procure proof of its allegations.—Willard v. Willard (Va.) 518.

Under Code, § 3233, a wife, against whom divorce was decreed without appearance or service of process, held entitled to a rehearing.—Willard v. Willard (Va.) 518.

§ 2. Alimony, allowances, and disposition of property.

On attachment for contempt against husband for failing to pay to his wife temporary alimony, the court can modify his order so as to reduce the amount.—Gordon v. Gordon (Ga.) 296.

In contempt proceedings for failure to pay temporary alimony to wife, the court can adjudge that part of the costs be paid by the wife.—Gordon v. Gordon (Ga.) 296.

DOWER.

§ 1. Nature and requisites.

A widow is entitled to dower in lands of which her husband was seised during the marriage unless the lands were bought and paid for by another and conveyed to him by inadvertence.—Gardner v. Gardner (Va.) 985.

A widow is not entitled to dower in land which her husband has agreed to devise to another before his marriage.—Burdine v. Burdine's Ex'r (Va.) 992.

§ 2. Inchoate interest.

Where a wife indorses her release of dower on a deed to her husband's land, which was free from her claim of dower.—Lavender v. Daniel (S. C.) 546; Same v. Lavender, Id.; Same v. Humphries, Id.

A deed of separation, by which both husband and wife release dower and curtesy, held not a statutory jointure, releasing dower, within Code, §§ 2270, 2271.—Land v. Shipp (Va.) 391.

A wife is entitled to dower in lands mortgaged by her husband after deed of separation in which she releases her dower, in which mortgage she does not join, since her release of dower is absolutely void.—Land v. Shipp (Va.) 391.

Release of a wife's dower held not authorized by Married Woman's Act, c. 103 (Code, § 2284), authorizing a married woman to contract with reference to her separate estate.—Land v. Shipp (Va.) 391.

§ 3. Rights and remedies of widow.

Widow adjudged entitled to dower held also entitled to damages for detention equal to one-third of rents and profits of lands from date of her demand for dower.—Brown v. Morisey (N. C.) 284.

Under Rev. St. 1893, § 1902, where a widow receipted for her distributive share of an estate, and thereafter sought to retract her election and claim dower, the burden is on her to show that she was misled as to the condition of the estate.—Lavender v. Daniel (S. C.) 546; Same v. Lavender, Id.; Same v. Humphries, Id.

A consideration to a wife for release of dower to her husband need not be returned as a condition to an assignment of dower, since such release is absolutely void.—Land v. Shipp (Va.) 391.

DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

See "Constitutional Law," § 6.

DYING DECLARATIONS.

See "Homicide," § 4.

EASEMENTS.

Public easements, see "Dedication"; "Highways."

§ 1. Extent of right, use, and obstruction.

In order to sustain application for removal of obstruction of private way based on prescription, plaintiff must show uninterrupted use for seven years, and that it did not exceed 15 feet in width, and that it was the same 15 feet originally appropriated.—Buchanan v. Parks (Ga.) 947.

EJECTION.

Of passenger, see "Carriers," § 3.

EJECTMENT.

§ 1. Right of action and defenses.

Under Code, §§ 143, 146, the pleading by defendant, in actions for the possession of real estate, of limitations, does not throw on plaintiff the burden of showing that he has been in possession within 20 years, where he shows title, since the presumption created by section 146 can only be rebutted by proof on the part of defendant that he had been in adverse possession for 20 years.—Conkey v. John L. Roper Lumber Co. (N. C.) 42.

Equitable title of the owner of mortgage is sufficient to sustain action by him for posses-title, which the party owning it could assert.—Wilson v. Braden (W. Va.) 367.

Defendant in possession cannot defeat recovery by showing transfer of title before action.—Wilson v. Braden (W. Va.) 367.

§ 2. Pleading and evidence.

Under Acts 1885, c. 147, and Code, § 1546, where plaintiff and defendant had a common grantor, and plaintiff's deed, though given long after defendant's, was recorded first, the burden of proving plaintiff's deed fraudulent rested on defendant.—Austin v. Staten (N. C.) 338.

The burden of proof is on defendant, alleging title in third person, to prove the same.—Wilson v. Braden (W. Va.) 367.

§ 3. Trial, judgment, enforcement of judgment, and review.

Where plaintiff shows perfect paper title to land in controversy, and defendant shows seven years' adverse possession under written evidence of title, held proper to direct verdict for defendant.—Briscoe v. Holder (Ga.) 960.

Where plaintiff in ejectment recovers an excessive judgment, it will be reversed on appeal, with direction to grant a new trial unless plaintiff remit the excess by accurate release entered of record.—Fry v. Stowers (Va.) 482.

Instructions that disclaimer of title can only be made by deed or court record, and that a party's admissions as to a boundary dispute are to be given the same weight as in other actions, held not conflicting.—Fry v. Stowers (Va.) 482.

It is error not to impose terms on a party in ejectment achieving an excessive recovery, either to remit excess or suffer new trial, the same as in any other action.—Fry v. Stowers (Va.) 482.

A disclaimer of excess recovered in ejectment, failing to accurately describe such excess, will not prevent a new trial unless accurate release be entered of record.—Fry v. Stowers (Va.) 482.

§ 4. Damages, mesne profits, improvements, and taxes.

Defendant, claiming credit for improvements made by his predecessor, is liable for mesne profits chargeable to his predecessor.—Mills v. Geer (Ga.) 673.

Under Act Dec. 21, 1897, where defendant has been in bona fide possession under adverse claim, he may plead as set-off permanent improvements placed thereon by himself or other bona fide claimants prior to the act.—Mills v. Geer (Ga.) 673.

Where plaintiffs have been in possession or enjoyed rents from land of defendant, which they had received in lieu of land involved in suit, defendant has a right to plead such benefits as a set-off to plaintiffs' claim for mesne profits against him.—Mills v. Geer (Ga.) 673.

ELECTIONS.

§ 1. Contests.

Under Code, § 160, the corporation court of a city has no jurisdiction to determine contests over election of members of the common council of the city.—Mitchell v. Witt (Va.) 528.

ELECTRICITY.

Petition in action against telephone companies for injuries caused by negligently allowing their wires to remain in contact held demurrable for failing to set out at what points breaking wires held not open to demurrer for misjoinder of parties defendant.—Western Union Tel. Co. v. Griffith (Ga.) 859.

EMBEZZLEMENT.

Evidence held insufficient to sustain conviction of larceny after trust.—Almand v. State (Ga.) 215.

An indictment charging defendant with conversion of money and a check intrusted to him by his tenant held not to charge embezzlement under Code, § 1014.—State v. Keith (N. C.) 169.

Landlord who converts tenant's share of proceeds of sale of crop, of which he was entitled to one-half is not guilty of embezzlement, under Code, § 1014.—State v. Keith (N. C.) 169.

EMINENT DOMAIN.

Public improvements by municipalities, see "Municipal Corporations," § 4.

§ 1. Nature, extent, and delegation of power.

Act Dec. 7, 1897, confers no power to condemn a water right, but only to condemn easements on land of others in order to run lines of wire, maintain dams, etc., for use necessary to transmit electricity.—Oconee Electric Light & Power Co. v. Carter (Ga.) 457.

Railroad owned by a partnership engaged in the sawmill business and used in operating it held not property used for public uses.—Garbutt Lumber Co. v. Georgia & A. Ry. (Ga.) 942.

Under Code, §§ 834, 925, board of supervisors is entitled to condemn land in city for enlargement of county clerk's office.—Board of Norfolk County Sup'rs v. Cox (Va.) 380.

§ 2. Compensation.

There is no law in force in the state which provides a method for fixing compensation to be paid the owner of a railroad sought to be crossed, when the right to cross is refused.—Garbutt Lumber Co. v. Georgia & A. Ry. (Ga.) 942.

§ 3. Proceedings to take property and assess compensation.

Proceedings in question held to show on their face an effort to condemn in a manner not authorized by Pol. Code, § 658 et seq.—Garbutt Lumber Co. v. Georgia & A. Ry. (Ga.) 942.

Civ. Code, § 4657 et seq., providing a method of taking private property for public use, does not apply where property is sought to be taken for a private purpose.—Garbutt Lumber Co. v. Georgia & A. Ry. (Ga.) 942.

Under Rev. St. § 1747, an order of the circuit court granting an appeal from the verdict of the jury impaneled by the clerk to assess compensation for land taken for a railroad, which recites that the court was satisfied of the reasonable sufficiency of the grounds of appeal, cannot be reviewed by this court.—Chesterfield & K. R. Co. v. Johnson (S. C.) 919.

§ 4. Remedies of owners of property.

Where a landowner had knowledge of the first entry on his land by a railroad company for the construction of its road, and made no objection in the manner prescribed by statute, his consent will be presumed.—Rankin v. Sievern & K. R. Co. (S. C.) 997.

§ 1. Jurisdiction, principles, and maxims.

Equity cannot sell life estate with contingent remainders, even with consent of parties having present interest, where estate in remainder cannot be ascertained during life of life tenant.—Hutchison v. Hutchison (N. C.) 149.

Code, c. 138, does not affect the jurisdiction of courts of equity to decree specific delivery of title papers.—Kelly v. Lehigh Min. & Mfg. Co. (Va.) 511.

§ 2. Laches and stale demands.

Where plaintiff's assignor of a note released the trust deed securing it, and no action was taken to set aside the release as having been obtained by fraud for more than four years after discovery of the alleged fraud, the laches will bar an action to set aside the release.—National Mut. Building & Loan Ass'n v. Blair (Va.) 513.

§ 3. Parties and process.

Where defendants, without service, appeared and demurred, and demurrer was overruled, and on the record waive their right to answer or plead, held not error to proceed without process issued.—Root-Tea-Na-Herb Co. v. Rightmire (W. Va.) 359.

§ 4. Pleading.

A petition setting forth separate causes of action against different defendants held demurrable on the ground of misjoinder, where there are no allegations showing a joint liability.—Shingleur v. Swift (Ga.) 222.

Petition setting forth separate causes of action against different defendants held demurrable on the ground of multifariousness.—Shingleur v. Swift (Ga.) 222.

A grantor's answer to a bill in equity to compel him to deliver his muniments of title to the land conveyed to plaintiff held sufficient.—Kelly v. Lehigh Min. & Mfg. Co. (Va.) 511.

§ 5. Hearing, submission of issues to jury, and rehearing.

On return of a master's report, the chancellor has power of his own discretion to submit one of the issues therein to a jury.—Trimmier v. Liles (S. C.) 652.

Where the chancellor, on return of a master's report, submitted one of the issues therein to a jury, an objection that he had no authority to order the issue to be tried at some other term of court held not well taken.—Trimmier v. Liles (S. C.) 652.

Where the chancellor, on return of a master's report, submitted one of the issues therein to a jury, he had power to designate which party should uphold the affirmative of the issue.—Trimmier v. Liles (S. C.) 652.

by ordering that proportion of the proceeds to be paid to him, and the amendment was not called to the attention of the master until five months after he had paid the proceeds of the sale to the parties entitled thereto under the original decree, the master was liable to petitioner for one-sixth of the proceeds.—Ex parte Murdaugh (S. C.) 568; Mayfield v. Murdaugh, Id.

The court has discretion to order a reference to take testimony, pending a motion for the submission of the issues to a jury under a rule of court.—Barnwell v. Marion (S. C.) 818.

Cherokee Lodge No. 66 (Ga.) 69.

A creditor, by accepting a mortgage in his favor, executed without a request, and of which he had no knowledge until it was tendered to him, ratified the acts of the person who procured the execution of the instrument.—Atlas Tack Co. v. Exchange Bank (Ga.) 939.

Obligees in bond given to stay an injunction held estopped by its recitals in suit thereon, though the recitals contradict the record in the injunction suit.—Blankenship v. Ely (Va.) 484.

§ 2. Equitable estoppel.

The fact that a husband was present and did not object to the sale of land under a mortgage foreclosure, after the mortgage had been discharged, held not to estop heirs of a deceased wife, who was the previous owner of the property, from maintaining an action to recover the property from the purchaser.—Fleming v. Barden (N. C.) 17.

Where plaintiff repudiated the acceptance of a note by his attorney in satisfaction of a decree, he was not estopped from enforcing the decree on the ground that the defendants were prevented by such acceptance from taking an appeal.—Smith's Ex'r v. Powell (Va.) 522.

2. Settlement, signing, and filing.
Acknowledgment of service of bill of excep-ions, entered before the same was certified by rial judge, is insufficient.—Whitley Grocery Co. . Walker (Ga.) 426.

Under Civ. Code, § 5528, where a judge ıakes interlineations in bill of exceptions, and hen certifies it, as corrected, to be true, such orrections will be considered a part of the bill. -McCullough Export Lumber & Warehouse ?o. v. National Bank (Ga.) 465.

Where bill of exceptions is corrected by inter-neations and verified by certificate of judge, the writ of error will not be dismissed, where interlineations and note did not contradict recitals in the bill of exceptions.—McCullough Export Lumber & Warehouse Co. v. National Bank (Ga.) 465.

Service of bill of exceptions cannot be shown in supreme court by parol statements of counsel.—Crow v. State (Ga.) 858.

EXCISE.

Regulation of traffic in intoxicating liquors, see "Intoxicating Liquors."

EXCUSABLE HOMICIDE.

See "Homicide," § 8.

EXECUTION.

See "Attachment"; "Garnishment"; "Judicial Sales."
Exemptions, see "Exemptions"; "Homestead."
Of judgment of foreclosure, see "Mortgages," § 9.

§ 1. Property subject to execution.
Refusal to enjoin execution sale held proper.—Koch v. Brockhan (Ga.) 695.

Where creditor, holding land under deed from guardian individually and as guardian, to secure note of guardian and ward, reconveys to guardian, the ward being dead and the guardian being sole heir, he can levy on the land in its entirety as the individual property of surviving guardian.—Koch v. Brockhan (Ga.) 695.

§ 2. Issuance, form, and requisites of writ.
An execution is illegally issued when signature of the clerk is not affixed by him or his authority.—Williams v. McAuthur (Ga.) 301.

§ 3. Lien, levy or extent, and custody of property.
A levying officer may sue for a breach of a forthcoming bond in his own name.—Turner v. Camp (Ga.) 76.

§ 4. Stay, quashing, vacating, and relief against execution.
Whether affidavit of illegality should be accepted is to be drawn by an inspection of the paper.—Williams v. McAuthur (Ga.) 301.

Remedy of claimant is by motion to dismiss levy, and not by motion to quash attachment or judgment upon which execution was based.—Morrison v. Anderson (Ga.) 462.

As one upon whose property an execution against another issued by a tax collector is levied may interpose a claim, injunction to prevent threatened sale will not be granted.—Racine Iron Co. v. McCommons (Ga.) 866.

Where execution against an individual is levied on property of a corporation, defendant cannot interpose affidavit of illegality on ground that execution is proceeding against property of such corporation.—State v. Sallade (Ga.) 922.

Where affidavit of illegality is filed by one not a defendant, it should be dismissed.—State v. Sallade (Ga.) 922.

Defendant in execution cannot file affidavit of illegality until execution has been levied.—State v. Sallade (Ga.) 922.

Affidavit of illegality alleging that judgment was rendered by a justice out of his district held good.—Hilson v. Kelley (Ga.) 966.

§ 5. Claims by third persons.
Where a husband turned over land to his wife, telling her and their children to support themselves, a crop produced thereon by labor of wife and children held not subject to judg-erty belonging to defendant in execution at time of levy, verdict for plaintiff was unwarranted.—Sams v. Thompson Hiles Co. (Ga.) 104.

Judgment for plaintiff in execution against claimant held not binding on one to whom the latter had conveyed before claim was filed.—Smith v. Coker (Ga.) 107.

That levying officer, against whom rule was sued out, answered that fund in his hands was claimed by another execution creditor, did not make such creditor a party to the proceeding.—Jones v. Coney (Ga.) 321.

Commission of errors in entering a judgment held no cause for granting a new trial.—Adams v. Carnes (Ga.) 597.

Under Civ. Code, § 4627, 10 per cent. damages cannot be rendered against the claimant unless the value of the property exceeds full amount of the execution.—Adams v. Carnes (Ga.) 597.

Privilege of claimant to withdraw his claim one time without consent of plaintiff in fi. fa. must be exercised before judgment finding property subject, and claimant cannot withdraw claim after appeal to superior court without plaintiff's consent.—Adams v. Carnes (Ga.) 597.

Where, after levy, a claim is interposed, the officer should transmit execution, with entries, to the court, together with the claim papers.—Brannon v. Barnes (Ga.) 689.

On trial of claim case, evidence that claimant has in two other cases filed claims to land levied on by different parties in his own domicile held inadmissible on question as to whether claim was made for delay.—Ray v. Atlanta Trust & Banking Co. (Ga.) 769.

Where, on trial of claim case, claim is withdrawn, and verdict rendered against plaintiff for damages, the court cannot consider complaints, in a motion for a new trial of the damage case, of rulings made in the trial of the claim case.—Ray v. Atlanta Trust & Banking Co. (Ga.) 769.

On trial of issue whether claim was made for delay only, counsel for claimant cannot testify as to what the evidence of his client would have been, if the court had allowed such evidence to be produced.—Ray v. Atlanta Trust & Banking Co. (Ga.) 769.

It is proper to strike an answer filed by defendant, in the nature of a cross bill, setting forth matters that should have been put in issue on trial of former case as to the same matter in which he was party.—Garlington v. Fletcher (Ga.) 920.

Tender to sheriff of affidavits requisite to interposition of claim in forma pauperis held not to make a claim case, where sheriff refuses to accept the same.—Jolley v. Hardeman (Ga.) 952.

Where two fi. fas. in favor of same plaintiff were levied upon realty claimed by a third person, held, that a charge restricting verdict to a mere general finding as to whether or not the property was subject was, under the circumstances, error.—First State Bank v. Carver (Ga.) 960.

Where issues in claim case were whether the deed under which claimant asserted title was one of bargain and sale, or merely given to secure a debt, and the amount of the debt, a general finding that the property levied on was subject did not cover the issues.—First State Bank v. Carver (Ga.) 960.

When property subject to mortgage which has not been foreclosed is levied on by process junior to that of mortgage, the entire estate cannot be sold, so as to allow mortgagee to claim proceeds of sale.—De Vaughn v. Byrom (Ga.) 267.

Where property is sold under execution, and purchaser refuses to comply with bid, but after second sale pays the amount of his bid at first sale, rule for determining distribution of proceeds established.—De Vaughn v. Byrom (Ga.) 267.

Unforeclosed mortgage cannot be basis of claim for money on rule to distribute.—De Vaughn v. Byrom (Ga.) 267.

An ordinary cotton press held not "liable to deteriorate from keeping," within Civ. Code, § 5463, authorizing speedy sale of such property on levy of execution.—Jolley v. Hardeman (Ga.) 952.

§ 7. Wrongful execution.

A complaint in an action for damages done plaintiff's reputation and credit by unlawfully seizing and selling his property was sufficient on demurrer for want of facts, without an allegation of value.—Long v. Hunter (S. C.) 579.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

See "Descent and Distribution"; "Wills."
Testamentary trustees, see "Trusts."
Testimony as to transactions with decedents, see "Witnesses," § 1.

§ 1. Appointment, qualification, and tenure.

On appeal by original caveator from order of ordinary vesting administration in clerk of the superior court, held error to dismiss appeal on the ground that there had been no caveat to appointment of clerk.—Hancock v. Minshew (Ga.) 296.

Payment for burial clothes with the purpose of obtaining administration thereby is not sufficient to give a right to the appointment as administrator.—Burkhim v. Pinkhussohn (S. C.) 908.

Under Rev. St. 1893, § 2067, held, that a nonresident cannot be appointed administrator.—Burkhim v. Pinkhussohn (S. C.) 908.

§ 2. Collection and management of estate.

Where will authorizes the executor to borrow money to pay debts it implies the power to pay attorney's fees, if necessary to collect debt by suit.—Fletcher v. American Trust & Banking Co. (Ga.) 767.

Where executor borrows money under power in will, held not incumbent on lender to ascertain whether there are debts to be paid by the loan.—Fletcher v. American Trust & Banking Co. (Ga.) 767.

Executor held authorized by will to borrow money to pay debts and to secure loan by mortgage.—Fletcher v. American Trust & Banking Co. (Ga.) 767.

Where, under power to borrow money to pay debts, executor borrows more money than is necessary, the estate is liable to the lender for the full amount, where there is no fraud by the lender.—Fletcher v. American Trust & Banking Co. (Ga.) 767.

§ 3. Allowances to surviving wife, husband, or children.

Where the ordinary has complied with statutory requirements as to year's support, it is too set aside in money, administrator, on execution for collection of the same, cannot show that he is entitled to credit for moneys advanced from the estate to widow before her year's support was set aside.—Fulghum v. Fulghum (Ga.) 602.

Widow's right to year's support is superior to chattel mortgage given by deceased husband to secure purchase money.—Puffer v. Caldwell (Ga.) 927.

Neither a widow nor her agent can apply proceeds of year's support, set apart for herself and minor children, to her individual debt.—Hill v. Van Duzer (Ga.) 966.

Claim of widow and children for a year's support held superior to material man's lien on property of decedent, attaching as the result of a contract made by him.—Gleason v. Traynham (Ga.) 969.

§ 4. Allowance and payment of claims.

An award in arbitration proceedings against a decedent's estate held properly disallowed in a creditors' suit against the estate, under Code, § 1448.—Dunn v. Beaman (N. C.) 172.

That an administratrix and heirs were parties to a creditors' bill against the estate did not entitle them to refer a claim of the heirs to arbitration, as authorized by Code, § 1426, and require the allowance of the award in the creditors' suit.—Dunn v. Beaman (N. C.) 172.

§ 5. Distribution of estate.

An executor cannot claim a life estate in land contrary to a devise in the will.—Tiddy v. Graves (N. C.) 127.

Under Rev. St. 1893, § 2048, it is proper to provide for payment of expense of last illness and funeral expenses before applying a fund to payment of decedent's judgment indebtedness.—De Loach v. Sarratt (S. C.) 532.

§ 6. Sales and conveyances under order of court.

Allegations in a caveat to an application to sell lands that administrator is in collusion with the widow to sacrifice the property of the estate held without merit.—Jackson v. Warthen (Ga.) 214.

It is not good ground for objection to application by administrator for sale of decedent's land to pay debts that the market is depressed.—Jackson v. Warthen (Ga.) 214.

That claim of caveating creditor is disputed does not afford cause for denying application to sell lands.—Jackson v. Warthen (Ga.) 214.

Where probate proceedings by an executrix for the sale of testator's land to pay his debts contained no order of sale, they conferred no power on her to make the conveyance.—Hunter v. Hunter (S. C.) 734.

§ 7. Actions.

Persons whose interest in lands advertised by administrator for sale are antagonistic cannot, because insolvents, be joined as co-defendants to an equitable petition by administrator for appointment of receiver and adjudication of conflicting claims.—Webb v. Parks (Ga.) 70.

A verified return of testator's executor approving the order recorded held admissible as prima facie evidence of payment of the money bequest.—Crawford v. Clark (Ga.) 404.

The administrator of a remainder-man or of an executory legatee may sue the personal representative of the life tenant, who had in his or her lifetime received a money bequest from the testator's representative.—Crawford v. Clark (Ga.) 404.

Modification of a judgment against an executor de bonis testatoris held not to preclude the judgment creditor from bringing a suit against the executrix personally on suggesting a devastavit.—Porter v. Rountree (Ga.) 761.

An action of claim and delivery cannot be maintained against an executor of an estate to recover possession of personal property unlawfully withheld by him.—Elmore v. Elmore (S. C.) 656.

Judgment against an administrator held enforceable by sale of testator's land, without proceedings against the heirs.—Hendrix v. Holden (S. C.) 1010.

Sale of land on judgment secured against administrator within one year of the grant of administration held valid, notwithstanding Rev. St. 1893, § 2322.—Hendrix v. Holden (S. C.) 1010.

§ 8. Accounting and settlement.

Turning over by executor of stocks and bonds in discharge of general legacy is not a delivering over of property in kind, within Civ. Code, § 3487, allowing compensation.—Walton v. Gairdner (Ga.) 666; Weed v. Same, Id.

An executor, delivering stocks or bonds in discharge of general legacy, held not entitled to commission, under Civ. Code, § 3484.—Walton v. Gairdner (Ga.) 666; Weed v. Same, Id.

Where last payment of administrator was made July 6, 1891, he was properly charged with interest on sum in his hands January 1, 1891, less payments up to July 6, 1891, until the decree of judge of probate on final accounting.—Tucker v. Richards (S. C.) 3.

Where an executor's disbursements during any given year exceed receipts of such year, the administrator is to be charged interest on sum found by adding to the annual balance in hands of trustee on January 1st in any year the receipts for that year, and deducting from result amount of disbursements of that year.—Tucker v. Richards (S. C.) 3.

Where administrators, by their maladministration, render litigation necessary on part of creditors of an estate to enable them to secure payment of their claims, such administrators are personally liable for costs of such litigation.—De Loach v. Sarratt (S. C.) 532.

Administrators indorsed a check given in payment of life insurance on the life of their decedent to one who collected the check and deposited the proceeds in his own name as trustee. Held, that the administrators never received or paid out the money, so as to entitle them to commissions thereon.—De Loach v. Sarratt (S. C.) 532.

In a suit by an assignee of a residuary legatee against the administrator's estate for a settlement of accounts, it must be presumed that money collected by the administrator, after receipts of the residuary legatees had been given in full settlement of their interests, was embraced in such receipts.—Tate v. Jones (Va.) 984.

Where an assignee of a residuary legatee delayed suing for a settlement of the administrator's accounts until over 20 years after the assignment, his right of action was barred by laches.—Tate v. Jones (Va.) 984.

§ 9. Foreign and ancillary administration.

Under Code, § 1374, certified copy of judgment rendered in another state is sufficient property to authorize issue of letters of ancillary administration.—Morefield v. Harris (N. C.) 125.

The finding of fact, by a court in Florida, that appellant was a fit and proper person to administer an estate, was not binding on a South Carolina court in appointing an administrator for the same estate.—Burkhim v. Pinkhussohn (S. C.) 908.

EXEMPTIONS.

See "Homestead."

§ 1. Nature and extent.

Sum due for labor on contract by which compensation was measured by amount done held not exempt from garnishment, though payments were made at the end of every four weeks.—Moore v. Hendry (Ga.) 921.

§ 2. Protection and enforcement of rights.

Amendment to objections to allowance of exemption which in general terms alleges that head of family owned property not scheduled, without further describing it, held properly disallowed.—Wood v. Collins (Ga.) 423.

A creditor, who files objections to allowance of exemption because specified articles were omitted from the schedule, should on trial be confined to such articles.—Wood v. Collins (Ga.) 423.

Where wife had actually disposed of money given to her by husband before applying for exemption out of his property, her failure to include it in her schedule will not vitiate her application.—Wood v. Collins (Ga.) 423.

An imprisonment from an arrest under a valid warrant will not give right of action for false imprisonment.—Page v. Citizens' Banking Co. (Ga.) 418.

FALSE PRETENSES.

An offense forbidden by Pen. Code, § 670, is complete when the owner is deprived of his property, and subsequent repentance is no bar to a prosecution.—Lowe v. State (Ga.) 856.

FEES.

Foreclosure, see "Mortgages," § 9.

FELLOW SERVANTS.

See "Master and Servant," § 5.

FERRIES.

§ 1. Establishment and maintenance.

To establish a private ferry no franchise is required.—Hudspeth v. Hall (Ga.) 770.

Right to establish public ferry is a franchise, which can only be granted by proper county authorities.—Hudspeth v. Hall (Ga.) 770.

While owner of private ferry may toll from persons incidentally crossing, he cannot maintain ferry for use of [illegible] Hudspeth v. Hall (Ga.) 770.

Proper authorities may grant additional public ferries over the same stream, as public convenience demands.—Hudspeth v. Hall (Ga.) 770.

Where one without franchise establishes public ferry, he will be enjoined to protect interest of one holding franchise.—Hudspeth v. Hall (Ga.) 770.

§ 2. Regulation and operation.

The superior court held to have no power to establish ferry rates, in the first instance, the county commissioners are authorized to establish by Code, § 2046.—Robinson v. Lane (S. C.) 29.

FRAUDS, STATUTE OF.

§ 1. Promises to answer for debt, default, or miscarriage of another.
Parol promise to see that certain notes were paid held within the statute.—Bluthenthal v. Moore (Ga.) 689.

Agreement to assume debt of another on extension of further credit held an original undertaking, which need not be in writing.—Ferst v. Bank of Waycross (Ga.) 773.

§ 2. Operation and effect of statute.
An agreement by a parent with her daughter and intended husband to convey lot, if he will build house thereon, after marriage, held taken out of the operation of the statute by the marriage and the building of the house.—Bell v. Sappington (Ga.) 780.

An insurance company cannot defeat a recovery on a fire policy which contains a condition that it shall be void if the insured is not the unconditional owner of the property by showing that the conveyance to insured was not in writing as required by the statute of frauds.—Cowell v. Phœnix Ins. Co. (N. C.) 184.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES.

§ 1. Transfers and transactions invalid.
Assignment by husband of life policy to wife, where it had no cash surrender or market value at the time, and where subsequent premiums were paid out of her funds or funds advanced to her by others, held not fraudulent as to insured's creditors, who extended credit on the faith of his representations in general terms that he had life policy payable to his estate.—Brooke v. Morris (Ga.) 937.

A mortgage of a corporation to secure a note on which the directors were individually liable, to be valid, must be explicit in its terms, so as to show an agreement by the directors with the corporation, at the time of becoming liable, for additional security by way of mortgage to be given on a demand.—Atlas Tack Co. v. Exchange Bank (Ga.) 939.

Validity of mortgage executed in favor of the creditor of an insolvent trading corporation, to secure a note on which the directors were liable as indorsers, determined.—Atlas Tack Co. v. Exchange Bank (Ga.) 939.

Where one makes a conveyance to his wife when he was a surety, and the obligation was thereafter paid by the principal, such a debt cannot be counted against him in determining whether he was insolvent when he made the conveyance.—Ayers v. Harrell (Ga.) 946.

Where one makes a voluntary deed to his wife, and some time thereafter dies, the value of his other property when the deed was made is the true test of his solvency at that time.—Ayers v. Harrell (Ga.) 946.

Complaint alleging transfer in fraud of creditors by assignee for benefit of creditors to wife of assignor for nominal consideration held good as to wife on demurrer.—Wittkowsky v. Baruch (N. C.) 156.

Facts held not sufficient to show knowledge of the grantee of land of the fraudulent intent of his grantor in conveying to hinder and delay creditors.—Newberry v. Bank of Princeton (Va.) 515.

debt, without fraudulent intent, held not to make the conveyance fraudulent in fact, but it stands for the benefit of all creditors, including the one preferred.—Herold v. Barlow (W. Va.) 8.

Where conveyance by insolvent is for part cash and part antecedent debt, as to such debt the conveyance will be held a preference, inuring to the benefit of all the creditors.—Herold v. Barlow (W. Va.) 8.

§ 2. Rights and liabilities of parties and purchasers.
An executed contract of conveyance is valid as between the parties although executed for the purpose of defrauding the grantor's creditors.—McManus v. Tarleton (N. C.) 338.

§ 3. Remedies of creditors and purchasers.
Evidence considered, and held, that a deed of trust was prior in lien to certain judgments.—Root-Tea-Na-Herb Co. v. Rightmire (W. Va.) 359.

GAME.

See "Fish."

Indictment under Act Dec. 6, 1898, for killing baited doves, held not to set forth any offense.—Harris v. State (Ga.) 232.

GAMING.

§ 1. Criminal responsibility.
A furnished room in a hotel, rented and occupied by defendant, is his "place," within an ordinance making it unlawful for any person to permit his place to be used as a place for gaming.—City Council of Greenville v. Kemmis (S. C.) 727.

GARNISHMENT.

See "Attachment"; "Exemptions," § 1.

§ 1. Nature and grounds.
Where tax execution has been transferred by tax collector to a private person, the latter cannot base on it garnishment proceedings against debtor of defendant in execution.—Davis v. Millen (Ga.) 803.

§ 2. Persons and property subject to garnishment.
Where officer of a company has been garnished both as an officer and individual, and answers that as an individual he has no property and owes no debts to the defendant, but as an officer he has in his hands money of the company, held error to enter judgment for the amount admitted to be in his hands as such officer.—Macon Nav. Co. v. Schofield (Ga.) 965.

§ 3. Proceedings to procure.
Where plaintiff brings two suits in the same court against the same defendant on different causes of action, one summons of garnishment based thereon, and bond to obtain the garnishment, were illegal and void.—Morgan v. Latham (Ga.) 99.

§ 4. Writ or summons and notice, service, and return.
Where officer in garnishment makes return that he served the garnishee with a summons of garnishment, it means that the summons directed garnishee to file his answer in the court in which garnishment was pending.—O'Neill Mfg. Co. v. Ahrens & Ott Mfg. Co. (Ga.) 66.

§ 5. Proceedings to support or enforce.
Allegation of garnishee that summons served directed him to answer in another court was a O'Neill Mfg. Co. v. Ahrens & Ott Mfg. Co. (Ga.) 66.

Where garnishee was in default in making answer at term directed, there was no error, after lapse of several terms, to refuse to allow garnishee to answer.—O'Neill Mfg. Co. v. Ahrens & Ott Mfg. Co. (Ga.) 66.

Where, three days after plaintiff obtained judgment against defendant, the garnishee filed an answer denying indebtedness, and showed good reason for not answering in due time, it was error to strike the answer and enter judgment against garnishee.—Atlanta Journal v. Brunswick Pub. Co. (Ga.) 929; Brunswick Pub. Co. v. Atlanta Journal, Id.

§ 6. Liabilities on bonds or undertakings.

Where proceedings in garnishment were totally void and illegal, plaintiff held not entitled to judgment on the garnishment bond.—Morgan v. Latham (Ga.) 99.

GIFTS.

Charitable gifts, see "Charities."

§ 1. Inter vivos.

Burden is on party claiming money of testator as a gift to prove the gift and delivery before death of the donor.—Duckworth v. Orr (N. C.) 150.

Evidence reviewed, and held to show a gift by insured to his wife of his life policy before an assignment for the benefit of his creditors.—Barron v. Williams (S. C.) 561.

A gift of an insurance policy by the insured to his wife held not void as to creditors where insured's property, including the cash surrender value of the policy, did not exceed his homestead exemption.—Barron v. Williams (S. C.) 561.

§ 2. Causa mortis.

In action to determine validity of gift causa mortis, held error to direct verdict against donee.—Sorrells v. Collins (Ga.) 74.

Evidence held to show delivery sufficient to sustain a gift causa mortis.—Sorrells v. Collins (Ga.) 74.

To render a gift causa mortis valid, it is not necessary that delivery should be made to donee personally.—Sorrells v. Collins (Ga.) 74.

GUARANTY.

See "Indemnity"; "Principal and Surety."

Requirements of statute of frauds, see "Frauds, Statute of," § 1.

§ 1. Requisites and validity.

Indorsement on contract held only to be a proposal of guaranty, and not to take effect until original paper becomes a binding contract.—Barnes Cycle Co. v. Schofield (Ga.) 965.

GUARDIAN AND WARD.

§ 1. Custody and care of ward's person and estate.

Where guardian settles with debtor of ward, if the settlement is free from fraud, the ward cannot, on arriving at majority, maintain action against the debtor for balance which he ought to have paid guardian on proper settlement.—Malpass v. Graves (Ga.) 955.

§ 2. Sales and conveyances under order of court.

Prior to Act 1889 a judge of the superior court could not, in vacation, authorize guardian Code, § 2533, file application to be relieved on reasons other than those relating to misconduct of guardian.—National Surety Co. v. Morris (Ga.) 690.

Application to be relieved as surety on guardian's bond, alleging an act amounting to misconduct and facts showing he was not a proper person, held not demurrable.—National Surety Co. v. Morris (Ga.) 690.

HARMLESS ERROR.

In civil actions, see "Appeal and Error," § 16.

HAWKERS AND PEDDLERS.

A trading corporation is not liable for the special tax levied on peddlers.—Bohannon v. Wrought-Iron Range Co. (Ga.) 907.

HEALTH.

§ 1. Boards of health and sanitary officers.

Under Priv. Laws 1885, c. 120, § 37, a complaint to recover of the town commissioners of Morganton for burning a dwelling house must allege that the burning was done in the negligent exercise of some lawful duty to charge them in their corporate capacity, as the burning of a house is not within the scope of their prescribed duties.—Prichard v. Commissioners of Morganton (N. C.) 353.

Under Priv. Laws 1885, c. 120, § 37, the town commissioners of Morganton have no power to burn a dwelling house to prevent the spread of smallpox, and for so doing are not liable to suit in their corporate capacity.—Prichard v. Commissioners of Morganton (N. C.) 353.

A complaint against county commissioners to recover for the burning of a dwelling house to prevent the spread of smallpox is demurrable unless it shows that the house was declared a nuisance by the superintendent of health, as it fails to show a cause of action against the commissioners in their corporate capacity.—Prichard v. Commissioners of Morganton (N. C.) 353.

Under Code, § 707, subd. 22, the county commissioners are not empowered to burn a dwelling house to prevent the spread of smallpox, and for so doing are not liable to suit in their corporate capacity.—Prichard v. Commissioners of Morganton (N. C.) 353.

possession, and the lower court refused to do so, and the property owner bought other pretended titles to such land, equity will cancel the deeds so far as they are a cloud on the public's title, and will enjoin further litigation of the public's right.—Town of Weston v. Ralston (W. Va.) 446.

HOMESTEAD.

See "Exemptions."

§ 1. Transfer or incumbrance.

Under Code, § 3634, a deed of the homestead by the husband alone is void.—Virginia & T. Coal & Iron Co. v. McClelland (Va.) 479.

Code, § 3634, is not unreasonable, and does not impair the rights granted by Const. art. 11.—Virginia & T. Coal & Iron Co. v. McClelland (Va.) 479.

§ 2. Rights of surviving husband, wife, children, or heirs.

A devise of part of testator's real estate to a son in fee, and of the balance to his widow for life with remainder to his son, will defeat the widow's right to claim homestead.—Ex parte Bullock (S. C.) 563.

§ 3. Protection and enforcement of rights.

It is not necessary for applicant to fix valuation of realty sought to be set apart.—Wood v. Collins (Ga.) 423.

Allotment of debtor's homestead exemption by persons appointed by trustee under deed of general assignment is invalid.—Jordan v. Newsome (N. C.) 154.

Exceptions to report of commissioners to appraise homestead should set out facts on which exceptions are based.—Bleckley v. Shirley (S. C.) 503.

Exception to report of commissioners appointed to appraise homestead of judgment debtor will not be considered, in absence of record showing facts in its support.—Bleckley v. Shirley (S. C.) 503.

Appraisement of homestead of judgment debtor may be made by appraisers appointed by sheriff and creditor, where debtor refuses to make appointment.—Bleckley v. Shirley (S. C.) 503.

Under Acts 1896, p. 191, exceptions to report of commissioners to appraise homestead of judgment debtor are triable de novo on testimony taken in open court.—Bleckley v. Shirley (S. C.) 503.

Under Acts 1896, No. 77, § 3, commissioners appointed to appraise homestead of judgment debtor should set apart in their report the debtor's personal property exempt from execution.—Bleckley v. Shirley (S. C.) 503.

HOMICIDE.

§ 1. Manslaughter.

When death results from discharge of a gun in the hands of another, who had no intention to kill, nor to discharge the gun, the discharge being caused by his negligence, the slayer is guilty of involuntary manslaughter.—Austin v. State (Ga.) 52.

§ 2. Assault with intent to kill.

One going in search of another with intent to shoot him held not justified.—State v. Chiles (S. C.) 496.

§ 3. Excusable or justifiable homicide.

Provisions of law relating to justifiable homicide where there has been a mutual combat

One may lawfully kill another who is attempting by violence or surprise to commit a felony on his person.—Ragland v. State (Ga.) 682.

An instruction that if the defendant assaulted the deceased, and thereby brought about the necessity of killing him, the defendant could not justify such killing by a plea of necessity, unless he were without fault in bringing about such necessity, was proper.—Jackson v. Commonwealth (Va.) 487.

Where the defendant assaulted the deceased, and killed him by hitting him with a rock as the deceased was running away from him, instruction on the law of self-defense was properly refused.—Jackson v. Commonwealth (Va.) 487.

§ 4. Evidence.

Evidence held to authorize conviction.—Sharp v. State (Ga.) 633.

Evidence held to sustain conviction.—Perry v. State (Ga.) 781.

Evidence that, shortly after the mortal wound was inflicted, accused made declarations and did acts showing malice, held admissible.—Perry v. State (Ga.) 781.

There is no error in excluding evidence offered merely to affect the question of punishment.—Perry v. State (Ga.) 781.

Evidence held insufficient to admit statements as dying declarations.—State v. Jaggers (S. C.) 434.

Evidence that person shot was apprehensive of approaching death held insufficient to justify admission of allegation denying declarations.—State v. Jaggers (S. C.) 434.

Evidence that deceased had made threats to injure defendant does not authorize the state, in reply, to prove threats made by defendant against deceased before the homicide.—State v. Jaggers (S. C.) 434.

Where deceased was shot by defendant, and there was evidence that they had quarreled frequently for several years prior to the shooting, the admission of a statement of deceased, as a dying declaration, that the shooting was willful and malicious, was not objectionable as the mere expression of an opinion, without facts on which to base it.—State v. Lee (S. C.) 706.

Where deceased was shot by defendant, the admission of a statement of deceased, as a dying declaration, that "he shot me for nothing," was not objectionable as the mere expression of an opinion.—State v. Lee (S. C.) 706.

Where deceased was shot by defendant, who claimed the killing was accidental, evidence of threats made by defendant against deceased several years before the killing was admissible.—State v. Lee (S. C.) 706.

Evidence held to sustain a verdict of murder in the first degree.—Reed v. Commonwealth (Va.) 399.

How a bystander dodged or fell when shot by defendant, who was pursuing deceased, held irrelevant.—Reed v. Commonwealth (Va.) 3[illegible]

Evidence of defendant's drunkenness on ing with his wife, whom he killed, was ble to rebut his testimony that he he her, promising to reform, and wishin with him.—Reed v. Commonwealth

Where the defendant struck fatal blow as the latter was r him, the quarrelsome char

ed, and held not to authorize charge as to manslaughter.—Baker v. State (Ga.) 607.

Where a given charge is directed to a theory raised by defendant's statement, it should fully cover the theory so raised.—Ragland v. State (Ga.) 682.

Whether advance by a man armed with a stick in the nighttime is equivalent to assault, so as to reduce homicide to voluntary manslaughter, is a question for the jury.—Ragland v. State (Ga.) 682.

Where defense is based on theory that deceased was about to commit a felony on accused, instruction as to law of justifiable homicide in cases of mutual combat was erroneously given.—Ragland v. State (Ga.) 682.

It is not error to refuse a charge inapplicable to the issues.—Perry v. State (Ga.) 781.

Under the evidence, held, that instruction that jury could not find defendant guilty of murder in the first degree was properly refused.—State v. Smith (N. C.) 165.

An instruction assuming a state of facts not justified by the evidence is properly refused.—State v. Medlin (N. C.) 344.

A charge that, if the deceased died of a cause independent of the gunshot wound, defendant could not be convicted, but that defendant is liable if the deceased died from a disease brought on by the wound, is not erroneous.—State v. Foote (S. C.) 551.

A charge to ascertain whether defendant or disease caused the deceased's death, and, if caused by defendant, whether it was in self-defense, is not erroneous where there was testimony that the deceased died of a disease brought on by the wound, nor was it objectionable as a charge on the facts.—State v. Foote (S. C.) 551.

Where deceased was shot by defendant, who claimed the killing was accidental, an instruction that if the jury found that the killing was accidental homicide, but occurred when the defendant was in pursuance of an unlawful or felonious act, they should find him guilty of murder, was proper.—State v. Lee (S. C.) 706.

Where no provocation was shown for a homicide, refusal to give an instruction as to different degrees of provocation was not error.—Reed v. Commonwealth (Va.) 399.

An instruction held not to preclude the jury from finding defendant guilty of murder in the second degree.—Reed v. Commonwealth (Va.) 399.

Where defendant assaulted deceased, whom he killed with a rock as the deceased was running away from him, an instruction that if the first assault was made by the prisoner with the preconceived design to kill or inflict great bodily harm, then the malice of the first assault communicates itself to the last act of the prisoner, and the killing is murder, was proper.—Jackson v. Commonwealth (Va.) 487.

§ 6. Appeal and error.

Where deceased, who was a physician, was shot by defendant, and statements made by deceased were admitted as dying declarations, the remark of the trial court, in the presence of the jury, that the testimony justified the opinion, and that there was a continuous dying condition, of which the deceased was aware, and of which he was more able to judge, because he was a medical man, was not prejudicial to defendant.—State v. Lee (S. C.) 706.

ministrators," § 3; "Homestead," § 2.

§ 1. Marriage settlements.

Contract by parent with daughter and her intended husband to convey lot, if husband would build a dwelling house thereon, held based on sufficient consideration.—Bell v. Sappington (Ga.) 780.

§ 2. Conveyances, contracts, and other transactions between husband and wife.

Where personalty of a husband was set apart as an exemption for the benefit of his wife, though she could subject the income to her support, she was not entitled to recover possession in trover.—Floyd v. Floyd (Ga.) 879.

§ 3. Disabilities and privileges of coverture.

Where a woman voluntarily borrows money, giving note and mortgage therefor, she is bound by contract, though loan was to pay debt of husband, where lender was not the creditor.—Chastain v. Peak (Ga.) 967.

§ 4. Wife's separate estate.

Where a bequest did not create a separate estate in the wife under the law then in force, and the husband took possession, he was entitled to its use during his wife's life.—Crawford v. Clark (Ga.) 404.

In action on married woman's note executed in 1890, plaintiff need not show that contract was for benefit of her separate estate, but only that she contracted with reference to it.—Darwin v. Moore (S. C.) 539.

Land owned by wife will not be subjected to a judgment against husband for the price of materials sold to him with which to enlarge their home on her land, where the wife's title was for a long time of record, and she was not implicated in any fraudulent collusion with her husband to induce the sale.—City Nat. Bank v. Cobb (S. C.) 569.

A husband held entitled to recover from his wife the value of the use of his teams in cultivating the wife's farm.—Browning's Ex'r v. Browning (Va.) 108.

A wife held to have assumed a debt contracted by the husband before marriage, and to have released him therefrom.—Browning's Ex'r v. Browning (Va.) 108.

§ 5. Actions.

A general motion to dismiss because the suit is by a married woman alone for a tort, she living with her husband, held properly overruled.—City of Athens v. Smith (Ga.) 955.

Under Civ. Code, § 2475, a married woman living with her husband may sue in her own name for physical injuries sustained by her.—City of Athens v. Smith (Ga.) 955.

Contract of guaranty against liability of a stockholder on stock purchased held not an unconditional agreement to pay the par value of the shares within 90 days from the date of the contract.—Morris v. Veach (Ga.) 753.

An agreement to save a stockholder harmless from any loss or damage or liability as a stockholder held not an undertaking to guaranty him against loss sustained by reason of the stock becoming worthless in the market.—Morris v. Veach (Ga.) 753.

INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION.

For particular offenses, see "Embezzlement"; "Larceny," § 2.
—— for violation of liquor laws, see "Intoxicating Liquors," § 3.

§ 1. Conviction of offense included in charge.

Though the evidence, in prosecution for assault with intent to maim, was not sufficient to justify a conviction of such offense, defendant might be convicted of the simple assault, as an included offense. — Montgomery v. Commonwealth (Va.) 371.

Record held to show service of summons on infant defendants.—Foster v. Crawford (S. C.) 5; Same v. Heath, Id.; Same v. Cunningham, Id.; Same v. Poovey, Id.; Same v. Lancaster Cotton Mills, Id.; Same v. Springs, Id.; Same v. Porter, Id.; Same v. McManus, Id.; Same v. Jones, Id.; Same v. Culp, Id.

An objection, in an action by minors, that their guardian ad litem was illegally appointed and was not a fit person, held insufficient for failure to show prejudice.—Griffith v. Cromley (S. C.) 738.

Reappointment of guardian ad litem for minors before commencement of second action for partition of land held unnecessary, where complaint in first action was withdrawn before service of summons in second.—Griffith v. Cromley (S. C.) 738.

INFERIOR COURTS.

See "Courts," § 2.

overruled.—Brooks v. Stroud (Ga.) 960.

§ 2. Subjects of protection and relief.

Equity will enjoin municipal authorities from holding elections as to annexation to the city where the ordinance providing for election was void.—City of Macon v. Hughes (Ga.) 247.

A lessee of land, not having complied with the condition precedent to the operation of the lease, had no such "perfect title" as to authorize an injunction against the lessor, under Civ. Code, § 4927, without proof of irreparable damage or insolvency.—Clyatt v. Barbour (Ga.) 468.

Application for injunction to restrain cutting of timber held not to show perfect title in plaintiff, as required by statute granting the writ.—Camp v. Dixon (Ga.) 878.

In suit to enjoin prosecution for violation of municipal ordinance, the court will not inquire into validity of ordinance.—City of Bainbridge v. Reynolds (Ga.) 935.

The court will not enjoin prosecution for violation of a municipal ordinance.—City of Bainbridge v. Reynolds (Ga.) 935.

§ 3. Actions for injunctions.

A petition which has no standing as one for injunction, other than by virtue of the general prayer, will not be retained where it shows that plaintiff is not seeking an interlocutory injunction, and that a permanent injunction after a final hearing would be unavailing.—Hairalson v. Carson (Ga.) 319.

Where bill for injunction to restrain cutting of timber did not show perfect title in plaintiff, nor allege nor prove insolvency of defendant, nor irreparable damages, injunction is properly denied.—Camp v. Dixon (Ga.) 878.

§ 4. Preliminary and interlocutory injunctions.

Discretion of court in refusing injunction on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.—Lamar v. Gardner (Ga.) 640.

§ 5. Writ, order, or decree, service, and enforcement.

Where a court, in injunction proceedings, grants relief on stated conditions, which the party accepts, such conditions are enforceable, though ordering physical acts.—Waycross Air-Line R. Co. v. Southern Pine Co. (Ga.) 641.

§ 6. Liabilities on bonds or undertakings.

The fact that a bond given to stay an injunction does not conform to requirements of decree authorizing it held not ground for demurrer to suit thereon.—Blankenship v. Ely (Va.) 484.

INSURANCE.

§ 1. Insurance agents and brokers.

Policy of insurance held not invalid because agent of company, after policy has been placed in his hands, fills blanks therein before delivery, so as to make it a complete contract.—Smith v. Farmers' Mut. Ins. Ass'n (Ga.) 957.

§ 2. The contract in general.

Where an applicant for life insurance reserved the right to inspect policy before paying the first premium, and after its issuance, but before delivery, became fatally ill, he could recover, providing he waived his right and tendered payment.—Going v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. (S. C.) 556.

§ 3. Premiums, dues, and assessments.

Delivery is essential to validity of note.—Reese v. Fidelity Mut. Life Ass'n (Ga.) 637.

A mutual insurance association, after receiving large assessments from a member, cannot, without his consent, so alter his contract as to increase his assessments.—Strauss v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Ass'n (N. C.) 352.

§ 4. Avoidance of policy for misrepresentation, fraud, or breach of warranty or condition.

A failure to disclose in an application for insurance an incumbrance on property which is not found to be material or fraudulent will not vitiate the policy within Acts 1893, c. 299, §§ 8, 9.—McCarty v. Imperial Ins. Co. (N. C.) 284; Same v. Scottish Union & National Ins. Co., Id.

§ 5. Forfeiture of policy for breach of promissory warranty, covenant, or condition subsequent.

Breach of iron-safe clause held to avoid insurance on buildings as well as on stock.—Southern Fire Ins. Co. v. Knight (Ga.) 821.

Invoice of goods purchased held not an inventory, within the provisions of the iron-safe clause.—Southern Fire Ins. Co. v. Knight (Ga.) 821.

Insurance policy construed, and held, that default in premium released company from all liability.—Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Clancy (Ga.) 944.

Where local agent of life company represented to holder of a policy that time of payment of premium would be changed, and assured made written request therefor, failure to reply held not to excuse payment in accordance with the terms of the policy.—Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Clancy (Ga.) 944.

§ 6. Estoppel, waiver, or agreements affecting right to avoid or forfeit policy.

Application for policy of life insurance and policy construed, and held, that actual payment of first premium during good health of applicant was condition precedent to liability of association.—Reese v. Fidelity Mut. Life Ass'n (Ga.) 637.

owner of the land on which it is located.—Cowell v. Phœnix Ins. Co. (N. C.) 184.

§ 7. Risks and causes of loss.

Policy of fire insurance, stipulating that a gin house, which shall at intervals be operated by steam, will not be protected so long as it is so operated, construed.—Edwards v. Planters' & People's Mut. Fire Ass'n (Ga.) 755.

§ 8. Notice and proof of loss.

Insurance company held not to have waived defense of failure to serve notice of accident by sending proofs to be filled out after the time for service had expired.—United Benev. Soc. of America v. Freeman (Ga.) 764.

Evidence held not to show that insured's failure to give notice of injury within the time prescribed in an accident policy was caused by impossibility of performance.—United Benev. Soc. of America v. Freeman (Ga.) 764.

Where an accident policy required service of proof of injury within 10 days thereafter, and such service was not rendered impossible by the injury, insured, not having served the notice, was not entitled to recover.—United Benev. Soc. of America v. Freeman (Ga.) 764.

Conditions of policy construed, and held, that proofs of loss were filed within the time required by the terms of the policy.—Southern Fire Ins. Co. v. Knight (Ga.) 821.

§ 9. Payment or discharge, contribution, and subrogation.

Evidence, to entitle an insurance company to recover back money paid on a policy, must show the policy void because of fraud of insured, or that, after it was issued, he was guilty of conduct rendering it void, and fraudulently concealed such fact.—Rome Grocery Co. v. Greenwich Ins. Co. (Ga.) 63.

To entitle an insurance company to recover money paid on a policy, it is, under Civ. Code, § 2113, incumbent on the company to show that, after payment, it discovered evidence showing itself not liable on the policy.—Rome Grocery Co. v. Greenwich Ins. Co. (Ga.) 63.

§ 10. Actions on policies.

Where, in action on insurance policy, plaintiff's testimony showed affirmatively failure to comply with conditions, a motion to nonsuit should have been sustained.—Southern Fire Ins. Co. v. Knight (Ga.) 821.

Where verdict was right, it is immaterial whether the charges complained of were erroneous or not.—Futrell v. Mutual Ben. Fire Ass'n (Ga.) 947.

Under the evidence in an action on a life policy, it was not error to refuse to submit issues that the agent of the company had waived certain physical defects or did not deem them material to the risk.—Sprinkle v. Knights Templar & Masons Life Indemnity Co. (N. C.) 112.

The burden of proving the fraudulent intent of insured, or the materiality of a misrepresentation in failing to disclose an incumbrance on property, is on the insurer.—McCarty v. Imperial Ins. Co. (N. C.) 284; Same v. Scottish Union & National Ins. Co., Id.

Where a mutual life association violates its contract with a member, the damages to which he is entitled are the amount of premiums and dues paid by him, with interest from the date of each payment.—Strauss v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Ass'n (N. C.) 352.

Where, in an action on a fire insurance policy providing it should be void if the insured did not own the property in fee simple, plaintiff, on judgment of nonsuit was erroneous.—Shute v. Manchester Fire Assur. Co. (S. C.) 541.

In an action on a policy, an agent's manual, forbidding agents to deliver policies unless the applicant was in good health at the time of delivery, was inadmissible, without proof that the applicant knew the rule.—Going v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. (S. C.) 556.

In an action on a life policy, a letter from plaintiff's attorneys to the company, stating that tender of first premium had been made, and that they believed the claim was valid, was properly admitted.—Going v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. (S. C.) 556.

§ 11. Mutual benefit insurance.

Where, in suit on benefit certificate, defendant's answer denied liability on ground insured had been suspended, the court should not have allowed defendant to prove the certificate not in force by reason of the dissolution of the local commandery of which insured was a member.—Doggett v. United Order of Golden Cross (N. C.) 26.

Where neither benefit certificate nor laws of a society required beneficiary to make proofs of death, a mere showing of the certificate and demand for sum due on death of a member made a prima facie case against society.—Doggett v. United Order of Golden Cross (N. C.) 26.

In suit on benefit certificate, it was no defense that insured's local commandery had been dissolved for nonpayment of assessment, when no notice of such dissolution had been sent such commandery, as required by laws of society.—Doggett v. United Order of Golden Cross (N. C.) 26.

Where, in suit on benefit certificate, defendant claimed the certificate not in force on ground insured had been disconnected for nonpayment of dues, such forfeiture was not established, in absence of showing that insured had received the notice of assessment required by laws of society.—Doggett v. United Order of Golden Cross (N. C.) 26.

If an insurance company, before expiration of time within which proofs of loss may be furnished, denies liability on ground of suspension, such denial is a waiver of the condition requiring proofs of death.—Doggett v. United Order of Golden Cross (N. C.) 26.

Acts 1884–85, p. 528, relating to local option in Troup county, held constitutional.—Robinson v. State (Ga.) 201.

§ 2. Offenses.

Evidence held insufficient to sustain conviction for selling liquor without a license.—Huby v. State (Ga.) 301.

Retailing liquor on the Sabbath without a license held a violation of a penal statute.—Williams v. City Council of Augusta (Ga.) 607.

On a prosecution for violation of the dispensary law, an instruction that if defendant's place contained the paraphernalia for making liquor, and defendant was engaged in the manufacture of it, he was guilty, was proper.—State v. Ross (S. C.) 659.

A licensed distiller, having no license to sell in quantities less than a gallon, held to violate the law by selling a gallon or more, to be left in his custody and taken away in quantities less than a gallon.—McKeever v. Commonwealth (Va.) 995.

§ 3. Criminal prosecutions.

The recorder's court in the city of Augusta held to have no jurisdiction of a prosecution for retailing spirituous liquors without license.—Williams v. City Council of Augusta (Ga.) 607.

Indictment under dispensary law need not allege that dispensary was in operation on the date the offense was committed.—State v. Newcomb (N. C.) 147.

On a prosecution for violation of the dispensary law, whether defendant was a manufacturer of liquor was a question for the jury.—State v. Ross (S. C.) 659.

On a prosecution for a violation of the dispensary law, an instruction that no man shall keep a place where liquor "is to be made" held not misleading.—State v. Ross (S. C.) 659.

Where indictment charges illegal sale to two jointly, and evidence shows a separate sale to each, it is no ground for reversal.—McKeever v. Commonwealth (Va.) 995.

§ 4. Rights of property and contracts.

Validity of sale of intoxicating liquors on ground of their contraband nature can only be questioned by the state.—Ex parte Neal Loan & Banking Co. (S. C.) 584; Lanahan v. Bailey Liquor Co., Id.

§ 1. On trial of issues.

Judgment in suit on note held not invalid, though based on verdict, when judgment was signed by the judge, who thus adopted as his own judicial act the jury's finding.—Koch v. Brockhan (Ga.) 695.

Improper incorporation of special lien on land in a judgment, even if erroneous or void, held not to invalidate the entire judgment.—Bush v. Bank of Thomasville (Ga.) 900.

§ 2. Equitable relief.

Equity will not set aside judgment in a court of law where petition shows that plaintiff was negligent in making his defense in the action at law.—Berry v. Burghard (Ga.) 459.

§ 3. Collateral attack.

Judgment against an executor de bonis testatoris held not subject to collateral attack for fraud or mistake in its rendition in a subsequent suit in the same court in which the judgment was rendered.—Porter v. Rountree (Ga.) 761.

§ 4. Merger and bar of causes of action and defenses.

Where, in rendering judgment on demurrer, the court does not pass on the merits, a judgment dismissing the action is not a bar to another suit.—Papworth v. City of Fitzgerald (Ga.) 311.

Judgment on a similar cause of action between the same parties held res judicata.—Brown v. Everett-Ridley-Ragan Co. (Ga.) 813.

Decree in processioning proceeding, under Acts 1893, c. 22, held not pleadable in bar of subsequent ejectment.—Vandyke v. Farris (N. C.) 171.

Plaintiff's neglect to ask for fees and emoluments in action of quo warranto to try the title to an office does not estop recovery of same in another action.—McCall v. Webb (N. C.) 174.

§ 5. Conclusiveness of adjudication.

A trustee held finally concluded by adjudication in suit by beneficiary, so far as decree was warranted by the pleadings.—Payne v. Bowdrie (Ga.) 89.

Where fund from sale of land was brought for distribution into court, creditors whose judgments were older than the one under which the sale was made, but younger than the deed given to secure the note on which judgment was rendered, could not attack the younger judgment because note was infected with usury.—Bush v. Bank of Thomasville (Ga.) 900.

Purchaser at sheriff's sale held the privy of plaintiff in execution, so that judgment in claim case estops claimant from setting up title to the same in action against him for its recovery by the purchaser.—Garlington v. Fletcher (Ga.) 920.

Judgments are conclusive between parties and privies as to all matters in issue, or which might have been put in issue.—Garlington v. Fletcher (Ga.) 920.

Where a demurrer to a complaint for want of facts was overruled, the ruling was binding on its renewal before another judge.—Long v. Hunter (S. C.) 579.

her right to satisfaction out of the proceeds of the sale of such land by allowing the sale on foreclosure to the original grantors to be confirmed and treating the purchase price as paid.—Max Meadows Land & Improvement Co. v. McGavock (Va.) 490.

Plea of res judicata held not available where the prior suit involved different property and defendant in the present suit was not a party to the former.—Kelly v. Hamblen (Va.) 491.

Permitting the confirmation of a commissioner's report containing a charge for commissions for the sale of property under a trust deed, without objecting to the amount thereof, held to be an adjudication which would prevent a subsequent objection to the amount allowed.—Roller's Adm'r v. Pitman's Adm'r (Va.) 987.

§ 6. Lien.

The holder of the oldest unpaid judgment lien is entitled to be satisfied first out of the property of the debtor, where his lien is a general one.—Max Meadows Land & Improvement Co. v. McGavock (Va.) 490.

§ 7. Foreign judgments.

Where appellant was appointed administrator in Florida, the appointment of another person in South Carolina did not violate Const. U. S. art. 4, § 1, providing that full credit should be given the judicial proceedings of other states.—Burkhim v. Pinkhussohn (S. C.) 908.

A judgment of a foreign state cannot pass title or affect land in the state.—Wilson v. Braden (W. Va.) 367.

§ 8. Payment.

A judgment, having been paid by two partners of the firm, held extinguished, and not provable against the estate of the deceased third partner.—Dunn v. Beaman (N. C.) 174.

Questions for jury in civil actions, see "Trial," § 6.
—— in criminal prosecutions, see "Criminal Law," § 9.
Taking case or question from jury at trial, see "Trial," § 6.
Trial by jury of issues in equity, see "Equity," § 5.

§ 1. Right to trial by jury.

In action on unconditional contract in writing, the court can render judgment without intervention of jury.—Bush v. Bank of Thomasville (Ga.) 900.

Under Code, § 274, defendant's consent to a reference of the case to a master to take testimony constituted a waiver of right to trial by jury.—Griffith v. Cromley (S. C.) 738.

§ 2. Qualifications of jurors and exemptions.

Evidence held insufficient to support challenge to juror for nonpayment of poll tax.—State v. Weaver (S. C.) 499.

The burden of proof is on one who challenges a juror on the ground of legal disqualification to show that such disqualification exists.—State v. Weaver (S. C.) 499.

§ 3. Competency of jurors, challenges, and objections.

It is too late, after verdict, to complain that proper questions were not propounded to jurors on their voir dire.—Lindsey v. State (Ga.) 62.

Defendants in criminal case held not entitled to complain of ruling on challenge for cause, where peremptory challenges are not exhausted.—State v. Weaver (S. C.) 499.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

§ 1. Civil jurisdiction and authority.

Where a justice is disqualified by reason of relationship, any other justice of the county may issue execution and preside on the trial of an issue formed by counter affidavit on levy of execution.—Savage v. Oliver (Ga.) 54.

A justice has no authority to foreclose a chattel mortgage when principal of debt exceeds $100.—De Vaughn v. Byrom (Ga.) 267.

Under Code, § 71, subd. 4, a magistrate has jurisdiction in attachment against a nonresident to at least render judgment in rem.—Bird v. Sullivan (S. C.) 494.

Const. 1895, art. 5, § 23, does not prevent action by attachment against nonresident under a judgment in rem.—Burckhalter v. Jones (S. C.) 495.

Under Acts 1884 (18 St. at Large, p. 751) §§ 1, 2, a magistrate is authorized to issue a warrant to enforce a lien for rent, where the amount claimed does not exceed $100.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Sarratt (S. C.) 504.

§ 2. Procedure in civil cases.

Entry on fi. fa. from justice court held not such a compliance with Civ. Code, § 4167, as to authorize constable to levy execution on land.—Eaves v. Garner (Ga.) 688.

Where summons names only a certain man as defendant, and he and his wife are served, and she did not appear or plead, judgment against the wife is void.—Shearouse v. Wolfe (Ga.) 923.

When plaintiff accepted a tender deposited with a justice in full of the demand and costs, after the judgment was rendered against defendant, the tender was not void because the Magistrates are within Const. art. 5, § 26, relating to the charging of juries on questions of fact; they being included in the word "judge."—Marchbanks v. Marchbanks (S. C.) 438.

A nonresident, by appearing at trial and contesting case on merits, gives magistrate jurisdiction to render judgment in personam.—Bird v. Sullivan (S. C.) 494.

Omission of magistrate to sign his name on original summons held not a jurisdictional defect, where order of publication is signed and the words, "Magistrate's Summons for Debt," and "By W. [magistrate] to J. [defendant]," appears on face of summons.—Burckhalter v. Jones (S. C.) 495.

§ 3. Review of proceedings.

Where there was ample evidence to sustain a verdict on trial in justice court, there was no error in overruling certiorari thereto.—Shields v. Mills (Ga.) 51.

It is too late, on trial of appeal from justice in action on unconditional contract for defendant, to file a plea, where no defense was made in lower court.—Morgan v. Prior (Ga.) 75.

Finding of superior court that verdict in justice's court was not contrary to evidence held not error, where issues of fact were supported by testimony.—Smith v. Coker (Ga.) 105.

Where evidence in action before justice demands the verdict rendered, and there is no error of law, the superior court should not sustain a certiorari.—Whitaker v. Arnold (Ga.) 231.

Petition of certiorari to justice held to sufficiently specify the testimony and the alleged errors complained of.—Moran v. Childs (Ga.) 235.

Held not error to refuse to dismiss certiorari to justice because part of the militia district where court was held was omitted from the petition.—Moran v. Childs (Ga.) 235.

Defendant cannot appeal to a jury in the justice court from a part only of the judgment.—Bryson v. Scott (Ga.) 619.

Recordari held proper method of bringing up record, when justice refuses to allow an appeal from judgment on attachment against a person alleged to be a nonresident.—Merrell v. McHone (N. C.) 35.

A judgment of the common pleas court affirming a judgment of a magistrate's court is conclusive as to the jurisdiction of the latter court in action on appeal bond.—Tiedman v. Mayer (S. C.) 509.

Circuit court, after dismissing appeal from magistrate on the ground that he was not served with notice and grounds of appeal, has no jurisdiction to entertain motion to reverse the judgment appealed from.—Baker v. Irvine (S. C.) 742.

Code provision for personal service of notice and grounds of appeal on the magistrate held satisfied where acceptance of service thereof is signed in the magistrate's name by his authorized agent.—Baker v. Irvine (S. C.) 742.

KNOWLEDGE.

Actual or constructive knowledge, see "Notice."
By grantee of fraud in conveyance, see "Fraudulent Conveyances," § 1.

Effect in equity, see "Equity," § 2.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

Railroad leases, see "Railroads," § 4.

§ 1. Creation and existence of the relation.

One holding option to purchase land, and entering thereon with permission of vendor, held not to become, after expiration of option, a tenant of the owner.—Henry v. Perry (Ga.) 87.

Where landowner contracted with another to furnish land and supplies, and the other was to do the work and receive part of the crop, the relation was that of landlord and cropper.—Hancock v. Boggus (Ga.) 970.

§ 2. Terms for years.

A lessee, without consent of his landlord, cannot transfer his lease.—Bass v. West (Ga.) 244.

Contract set up by tenant as defense in proceedings to eject him as holding over held not bad, as too indefinite.—Walker v. Edmundson (Ga.) 800.

In proceedings by landlord to eject tenant as holding over, counter affidavits filed by tenant held to set up a good defense.—Walker v. Edmundson (Ga.) 800.

§ 3. Premises, and enjoyment and use thereof.

In case of wrongful eviction, lessee's damages would be the value of the premises for rent during the remainder of the term.—Bass v. West (Ga.) 244.

Where lessee conducts established business, the value of good will and loss of profits occasioned by eviction may be considered in estimating damages therefrom.—Bass v. West (Ga.) 244.

A petition alleging that plaintiff, a tenant, was injured by a defective plank in floor of rented building, and that landlord had notice of "defective condition of the floor," sufficiently alleges notice of defective condition of the plank.—Stack v. Harris (Ga.) 615.

§ 4. Rent and advances.

Where a lease of timber for turpentine purposes required payment of the money before boxing began, such payment was a condition precedent to the lease becoming operative.—Clyatt v. Barbour (Ga.) 468.

A tenant against whom a distress warrant has been sued out, who files a counterclaim affidavit, with no distinct denial of plaintiff's demand, but alleging only that a designated portion of the rent claimed is not due for certain reasons, will be confined in the evidence to such reasons.—Hunnicutt v. Chambers (Ga.) 853.

To render penal a sale by tenant of personalty subject to landlord's lien, it must appear that sale was without landlord's consent, with intent to defraud, and that he suffered loss.—Morrison v. State (Ga.) 902.

On trial for certain personalty subject to landlord's lien, held error to omit in charge to state that, to render accused guilty, it must appear that sale was made with intent to defraud landlord.—Morrison v. State (Ga.) 902.

On trial for certain personalty subject to landlord's lien, it must appear that sale was without landlord's consent.—Morrison v. State (Ga.) 902.

If a landlord's lien for supplies or crop is inferior to laborer's special lien, the laborer can-pensation in cotton raised held not to affect landlord's lien, he having no knowledge of such agreement.—Rousey v. Mattox (Ga.) 925.

Where tenant agrees to pay specified portion of the crops as rent, and to cultivate the land in a husbandlike manner, and fails to do so, the landlord can distrain for only the value of such portion of the crops actually made, and not for what might have been made.—Reynolds v. Howard (Ga.) 967.

Where, pending cultivation of crop, the land was sold under execution, and the purchaser relied on agreement with landlord that persons cultivating should pay him the amount agreed to be paid the landlord, the purchaser acquired simply the interest of the landlord, and cannot sue out a distress warrant.—Hancock v. Boggus (Ga.) 970.

In order to maintain distress warrant against counter affidavit denying any sum due, it must be shown that relation of landlord and tenant existed.—Hancock v. Boggus (Ga.) 970.

Code, § 255a, by virtue of the provisions of Rev. St. 1893, § 2519, applies only to proceedings by attachment, and not to proceedings to enforce an agricultural or landlord's lien, except in so far as relates to the affidavits and statements.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Sarratt (S. C.) 504.

§ 5. Re-entry and recovery of possession by landlord.

Owner of land cannot by dispossessory warrant eject, as a tenant at sufferance, holder of option to purchase land entering into possession thereunder after expiration of option.—Henry v. Perry (Ga.) 87.

Affidavit required by Civ. Code, § 4813, in proceedings to oust tenant, may be made before a justice, who need not be in the district where the premises are.—Fletcher v. Collins (Ga.) 646.

Bill to restrain dispossessory warrant against tenant holding over, containing allegations that plaintiff has title by prescription, held improperly dismissed on demurrer.—Smith v. Wynn (Ga.) 970.

A landlord who forcibly re-entered after the expiration of a tenancy, and without notice to the tenant caused him and his household goods to be put into the street, is not liable as a trespasser ab initio therefor.—Rush v. Aiken Mfg. Co. (S. C.) 497.

LARCENY.

See "Embezzlement"; "False Pretenses."

§ 1. Offenses, and responsibility therefor.

Where pledgor takes property from pledgee's control with fraudulent intent, he may be convicted of larceny.—Henry v. State (Ga.) 55.

§ 2. Prosecution and punishment.

Indictment held sufficient to charge larceny from the person, under Pen. Code, § 175, although there was no allegation that the article was the property of him from whom it was taken.—Hugo v. State (Ga.) 60.

Possession of stolen goods several months after the alleged theft, with failure to account therefor, held not to authorize conviction.—Calloway v. State (Ga.) 63.

Where there was no proof of the value of the articles nor of the time at which the larceny was committed, conviction was erroneous.—May v. State (Ga.) 222.

In order that recent possession may be considered as evidence of guilt of larceny, the goods found must be clearly shown to have been stolen.—Turner v. State (Ga.) 686.

Larceny having been clearly shown to have been committed, a charge that it was necessary to find that the thing alleged to have been stolen was so recently in defendant's possession, and immediately after the theft, with his knowledge and consent, held not erroneous.—Turner v. State (Ga.) 686.

An indictment for stealing ungathered corn, which alleges that it is the property of the tenant who rents the premises for agricultural purposes, is not bad for not alleging title in the lessor.—State v. Higgins (N. C.) 113.

LIBEL AND SLANDER.

§ 1. Words and acts actionable, and liability therefor.

To write and publish of another that he is a liar is libelous.—Colvard v. Black (Ga.) 80.

Where design was to apply libelous charge to a particular person, such person may bring action for libel, though all the public would not understand the meaning of the defamatory matter.—Colvard v. Black (Ga.) 80.

To publish of merchant that he has not confidence of local people, and is considered of small financial responsibility, held libelous, if false.—Dun v. Weintraub (Ga.) 808.

To publish of a merchant that he has given unrecorded mortgage held not actionable, without allegations of special damage.—Dun v. Weintraub (Ga.) 808.

§ 2. Actions.

An amendment seeking to add to a petition legally setting forth a cause of action for libel, by declaring on another publication, was properly rejected.—Colvard v. Black (Ga.) 80.

LICENSES.

§ 1. For occupations and privileges.

An "emigrant," within the act requiring a license in order to solicit emigrants, is one who quits his country for a lawful reason, with a design to settle elsewhere, taking his family and effects with him.—Varner v. State (Ga.) 93.

Evidence held insufficient to convict for soliciting emigrants without a license.—Varner v. State (Ga.) 93.

An ordinance imposing on the business of loaning money on personalty a license tax in a prosecution for selling without a license, the defendant has the burden of showing that he is protected by a license.—State v. Morrison (N. C.) 329.

Under Laws 1899, c. 11, § 27, the issuance of a license to a corporation having several agents and employés traveling and selling organs under that one license protects only the agent who has possession of it.—State v. Morrison (N. C.) 329.

Under Acts 1889–90, c. 244, §§ 27, 28, 32, 33, and Act March 3, 1896, a person selling country produce from his wagon on the market square is not conducting a mercantile business, as to make him liable to a fine for doing business as a merchant without a license.—Brown v. Commonwealth (Va.) 485.

Roanoke City Charter, § 104, imposing a merchant's license, does not apply to a person selling country produce from his wagon on the market square.—Brown v. Commonwealth (Va.) 485.

Under Roanoke City Ordinances, §§ 70, 472, 474, a person selling country produce from his wagon on the market square, and who has paid the curbage tax, is not required to pay a license tax as a merchant in the city.—Brown v. Commonwealth (Va.) 485.

LIFE ESTATES.

See "Dower"; "Remainders."

Where by the terms of the will a devise of a life estate to testator's wife was burdened with the support of testator's children, an action brought by the children during the lifetime of the wife to set aside the sale of her life interest was not premature.—Hunter v. Hunter (S. C.) 734.

Terms of a will construed, and held, that an executrix thereunder had no implied power to sell her life estate.—Hunter v. Hunter (S. C.) 734.

The life tenant has no power to so mortgage the land as to bind the remainder-men.—McDonald v. Woodward (S. C.) 918; Same v. Stewart, Id.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

Laches, see "Equity," § 2.

§ 1. Computation of period of limitation.

Statute is suspended, as to a debtor who removes from the state, until his return to reside therein.—Payne v. Bowdrie (Ga.) 89.

Sale of ward's lands under a decree held notice to the ward of the receipt of the price by the guardian, and hence the ward was not entitled to allege constructive fraud to remove the bar of limitations as against creditors' claims against the deceased guardian's estate.—Dunn v. Beaman (N. C.) 172.

LIQUOR SELLING.

See "Intoxicating Liquors."

LIS PENDENS.

Pendency of a claim case held not to constitute lis pendens as to an action by the claimant against levying officer and purchaser at execution sale for recovery of property sold.—Jolley v. Hardeman (Ga.) 952.

"Carrying on" prosecution defined.—Page v. Citizens' Banking Co. (Ga.) 418.

Suing out a money rule against an officer leaving an execution held equivalent to a civil action against him.—Roberts v. Keeler (Ga.) 617.

§ 2. Want of probable cause.

Issuing a rule nisi against a sheriff held not an adjudication that there is probable cause for suing out the same, when the petition does not truly set forth the facts.—Roberts v. Keeler (Ga.) 617.

§ 3. Actions.

A firm, the individual members thereof, and one not a member may be joined as defendants, if prosecution was instituted as a result of the conspiracy.—Page v. Citizens' Banking Co. (Ga.) 418.

Petition in action against firm and its members, alleging that the prosecution was in furtherance of the firm's interests, held proper.—Page v. Citizens' Banking Co. (Ga.) 418.

Petition alleging that defendants conspired to injure plaintiff, a corporation, and destroy its business, held properly dismissed on general demurrer.—Fulton Grocery Co. v. Maddox (Ga.) 647.

MALICIOUS TRESPASS.

See "Trespass," § 2.

MALPRACTICE.

See "Physicians and Surgeons."

MANDAMUS.

§ 1. Nature and grounds in general.

Solicitor of superior court held to have sufficient interest to maintain mandamus to compel county commissioners to draw a grand jury for such court.—Mott v. Commissioners of Forsyth County (N. C.) 330.

§ 2. Subjects and purposes of relief.

Mandamus lies to compel levying officer to accept good affidavit of illegality.—Williams v. McAuthur (Ga.) 301.

Where a state officer is entitled to the salary provided by law, mandamus will issue to the state auditor to issue a warrant for the salary, and to state treasurer to pay it.—White v. Worth (N. C.) 132.

Courts will not interfere by mandamus with the determination of the question of the color of a school child by school trustees, since such determination involves the exercise of a judicial discretion.—Eubank v. Boughton (Va.) 529.

Mandamus will not lie to compel school trustees to receive into a white school a child whom they have decided is a negro, since there is a right of appeal from the board's decision.—Eubank v. Boughton (Va.) 529.

MASTER AND SERVANT.

See "Work and Labor."

§ 1. Services and compensation.

That employé, when he received part of wages, gave receipt in full, does not estop him to claim the balance, when he protested against stoppage of portion of wages.—Georgia R. Co. v. Gouedy (Ga.) 691.

In suit by employé against railroad company for wages, company cannot defend by showing mistake whereby company had suffered loss, which loss it had charged to the employé.—Georgia R. Co. v. Gouedy (Ga.) 691.

Declaration in action for recovery of part of salary after wrongful discharge held to state a cause of action.—Moore v. Kelley & Jones Co. (Ga.) 802.

§ 2. Master's liability for injuries to servant—Nature and extent in general.

Where an employé, without fault on his master's part, becomes placed in a dangerous (Ga.) 810.

Rev. St. § 1582, held broad enough to include an action against a city for personal injuries sustained by an employé through defendant's mismanagement of a steam roller while repairing its streets.—Barksdale v. City of Laurens (S. C.) 661.

§ 3. —— Tools, machinery, appliances, and places for work.

Where a master's act, alleged to have caused an injury to a servant, was not in fact an act of negligence, it was error to refuse to grant nonsuit in an action against a master for the injury.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Edwards (Ga.) 810.

Master held not liable for an injury to a servant, where master's negligent acts, while contributing to the injury, were not the proximate cause thereof.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Edwards (Ga.) 810.

Where a master provided for the use of his servants several ways of approach to a building, an instruction that the servants might leave by any one of these ways, and if, in so doing, a servant was injured by the neglect of the master to keep it in repair, he was responsible for the injury, was proper.—Rinake v. Victor Mfg. Co. (S. C.) 700.

§ 4. —— Methods of work, rules, and orders.

A railroad company held not guilty of negligence causing injury to fireman. — Brown v. Southern Ry. Co. (N. C.) 19.

§ 5. —— Fellow servants.

A master is not exempt from liability for injuries to a child by negligence of a superintendent, under whose orders the child was at work and which orders he was bound to obey.—Southern Agricultural Works v. Franklin (Ga.) 693.

Master is not liable for injuries caused by an incompetent fellow servant, unless he knew, or by diligence could have known, of the incompetency.—Gunn v. Willingham (Ga.) 804.

Evidence held to show plaintiff injured by negligence of a fellow servant.—Gunn v. Willingham (Ga.) 804.

Though immediate cause of the injury is negligence of fellow servant, the master is liable if the servant did this act in obedience to the order of the vice principal, where the order was negligent.—City Council of Augusta v. Owens (Ga.) 830.

Person placed as general superintendent in charge of a rock quarry, with power to direct movements of laborers, and not working himself, held a vice principal, and not a fellow servant.—City Council of Augusta v. Owens (Ga.) 830.

§ 6. —— Risks assumed by servant.

An employé injured while mounting a moving car held not entitled to recover either under the general rules of law or any Alabama statute.—Quirouet v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. (Ga.) 599.

Master is not liable for injuries caused by defective machinery, where servant had knowledge of defects and did not call master's attention to it.—Gunn v. Willingham (Ga.) 804.

A master is not liable for injuries received by an employe who, as a mere volunteer, does an act outside of the scope of his employment. —Allen v. Hixson (Ga.) 810.

§ 7. —— Contributory negligence of servant.

Evidence held to show that emergency under which employé acted was of his own making, so that master was not liable for injuries received than the safe, way of doing certain work, he cannot, under law of Alabama, recover for injuries received.—Quirouet v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. (Ga.) 599.

In an action by an employé against a city for personal injuries, evidence held sufficient to show contributory negligence, barring plaintiff's recovery.—Barksdale v. City of Laurens (S. C.) 661.

In action for injuries to employé, petition held good against special demurrer.—Southern Agricultural Works v. Franklin (Ga.) 693.

§ 8. —— Actions.

Code Ala. § 2590, rendering a master liable to an employé for injuries caused by defective appliances, does not preclude defense of contributory negligence.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Harbin (Ga.) 218.

Petition in action for injuries received while working in a quarry held not subject to special demurrer because failing to allege where the quarry was located.—City Council of Augusta v. Owens (Ga.) 830.

Instruction as to duty of master to furnish a reasonably safe place to work, and that servant could assume that it was safe, held correct.—City Council of Augusta v. Owens (Ga.) 830.

In suit by employé against railroad company, admission of rule of railroad company, without proving knowledge of the rule by employé, held not error, as such knowledge may be shown after its admission.—Binion v. Georgia, S. & F. Ry. Co. (Ga.) 938.

An instruction permitting a servant to recover for loss of time, payments for medical attention, and endurance of mental anguish held erroneous, where there was no evidence of such damage.—Smith v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. (N. C.) 170.

Instruction on contributory negligence held not erroneous.—Ward v. Odell Mfg. Co. (N. C.) 194.

In an action by an employé of a city for injuries, evidence held sufficient to make a prima facie case.—Barksdale v. City of Laurens (S. C.) 661.

In an action by a city employé for personal injuries, under Rev. St. § 1582, he must show, as part of his case, that he was not guilty of contributory negligence.—Barksdale v. City of Laurens (S. C.) 661.

An instruction that if, after an independent contractor had left the premises, the master adopted and used the structures which such contractor had erected, or acquiesced in their use by his servants, the structures became those of the master, and he was responsible for any injury to his servants occasioned by his neglect to keep them in repair, was proper.—Rinake v. Victor Mfg. Co. (S. C.) 700.

An instruction that where a master allowed an independent contractor to erect appliances on his premises, which the master adopted and used, or acquiesced in their use by his servants while engaged in his work, he was responsible for his servants' safety, held proper.—Rinake v. Victor Mfg. Co. (S. C.) 700.

§ 9. Liabilities for injuries to third persons.

An action will lie against a master for injuries resulting from the negligence of a servant while acting within the scope of his authority.—Skipper v. Clifton Mfg. Co. (S. C.) 509.

MASTERS IN CHANCERY.

See "Equity," § 6.

MECHANICS' LIENS.

§ 1. Right to lien.

Where contractor abandons work, leaving building incomplete, and owner completes it, held, if the amount required for completion, when added to sums properly paid contractor, exceeded original contract price, owner was not liable to material man for any part thereof.—Hunnicutt & Bellingrath Co. v. Van Hoose (Ga.) 669.

After a building had been completed, surrendered to the owner, and paid for, a material man cannot acquire a lien for material purchased, used thereon by the contractor to remedy a defect in the building, without the owner's knowledge.—Sheehan v. South River Brick Co. (Ga.) 759.

Surrender of a building to the owner, and full payment for services of a contractor performed in substantial compliance with the contract, held to terminate all relation between the contractor and the owner as to third parties.—Sheehan v. South River Brick Co. (Ga.) 759.

§ 2. Enforcement.

Petition by subcontractor held demurrable where it did not state what part of sum claimed was for work done and what part for material furnished.—Smith v. Van Hoose (Ga.) 77; Van Hoose v. Smith, Id.

MORTGAGES.

Personal property, see "Chattel Mortgages."

§ 1. Requisites and validity.

Where one has conveyed lands to secure debt, and received bond conditioned to reconvey, the grantor's interest is the right to redeem.—Williams v. E. E. Foy Mfg. Co. (Ga.) 927.

Instrument construed, and held a deed of trust, and not a mortgage, so that, the trustee dying, another may be appointed with right to foreclose.—Wright v. Fort (N. C.) 113.

§ 2. Recording and registration.

The fact that a trust deed securing purchase money may not have been properly acknowledged and recorded will not affect the priority, as between it and another deed, where the owner of the latter deed had actual knowledge of the existence of the former.—National Mut. Building & Loan Ass'n v. Blair (Va.) 513.

§ 3. Construction and operation.

Under Code, § 1255, one having claim for tort against corporation can reduce claim to judgment, and levy, notwithstanding mortgage.—Williams v. West Asheville & S. S. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 189.

§ 4. Rights and liabilities of parties.

Where a wife mortgaged property to secure her husband's antecedent debt, and the creditor, after the wife's death, granted the husband a mortgagor, having affirmed a mortgage sale in part, is bound thereby in all respects.—Austin v. Stewart (N. C.) 37.

§ 5. Assignment of mortgage or debt.

Assignee of note secured by mortgage held entitled to all the benefits of the security thus afforded, though the mortgage had not been assigned.—National Bank v. Exchange Bank (Ga.) 265.

Equitable claim of assignee of note secured by mortgage to surplus of fund arising by sale under superior lien held prior to that based on foreclosure of junior mortgage.—National Bank v. Exchange Bank (Ga.) 265.

Assignees of note secured by mortgage, although not foreclosed, have an equitable claim to a fund in court arising from the sale of the mortgaged property under a superior lien; the fund being a balance after satisfying such lien.—National Bank v. Exchange Bank (Ga.) 265.

An assignee of a trust deed who sustained loss from his own and his immediate assignor's negligence in enforcing the security held not entitled to recourse against his remote assignor.—Payne's Ex'rs v. Huffman (Va.) 476.

§ 6. Transfer of property mortgaged or of equity of redemption.

The right to redeem is an equitable interest, which may be conveyed, subject to paramount right of original grantee to have all the land appropriated to his debt.—Williams v. E. E. Foy Mfg. Co. (Ga.) 927.

Where original grantor, after delivery of mortgage, conveys all the timber growing on the land, subject to the rights of the mortgagee, he conveys the right to the timber if the grantor redeems, and an equitable right to redeem.—Williams v. E. E. Foy Mfg. Co. (Ga.) 927.

Where mortgagor conveys timber growing on land subject to mortgage, and subsequently conveys to another the right to redeem the land, and such person redeems, he takes title subject to right of grantee of timber to pay proportionate share of original debt and convert his equitable interest in the timber to legal title.—Williams v. E. E. Foy Mfg. Co. (Ga.) 927.

Where one party has equitable interest in land, and another in timber, both acquired after mortgage, they will possess an equal equity, and, when the grantee of land paid the mortgage debt and took a conveyance, the grantee of the timber could contribute his proportion of the amount paid to redeem.—Williams v. E. E. Foy Mfg. Co. (Ga.) 927.

§ 7. Payment or performance of condition, release, and satisfaction.

Release of a trust deed held by a vendor operates as a release of a trust deed held by his grantee of the property, securing the same purchase-money notes which the latter had assumed.—National Mut. Building & Loan Ass'n v. Blair (Va.) 513.

§ 8. Foreclosure by exercise of power of sale.

Where a mortgagee sells mortgaged land on foreclosure under the power of sale in the mortgage, and himself becomes the real purchaser thereof through the intervention of a third person, the mortgagor may disaffirm the sale and have a new sale ordered.—Austin v. Stewart (N. C.) 37.

Where defendants seized and sold plaintiff's property on account of indebtedness, and thereafter advertised a sale of property held as security, they were liable for advertising the sale, if the amount due them was paid prior

On foreclosure of two notes secured by two mortgages describing separate tracts of land, where plaintiff sought to subject to each mortgage the property described therein on rule absolute, it was proper to issue execution accordingly.—Lewis v. Douglas County Co-op. Store (Ga.) 222.

Purchaser at void trustee's sale under a trust deed held not entitled to a lien on the land for the price paid.—James v. Withers (N. C.) 178.

Under Code, § 685, claimant for damages for corporation's tort held not entitled to intervene in foreclosure of mortgage given by corporation.—Williams v. West Asheville & S. S. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 189.

An answer which alleges that the mortage sued on was in renewal of a former mortgage given to a firm, for which firm a receiver had been appointed, and that the assignment to plaintiff of such former mortgage was made after the appointment of the receiver, though antedated, and in pursuance of a plan to remove the assets of the firm beyond the reach of the court, and which further denies plaintiff's ownership, sufficiently alleges the defense of failure of consideration.—Duckworth v. McKinney (S. C.) 730.

Purchaser at foreclosure sale held entitled, before deed passed, to abatement for portion of lands described in decree and advertisement of sale, but previously recovered from mortgagor by title paramount.—People's Bank v. Bramlett (S. C.) 912.

Allowing the confirmation of a commissioner's report containing a charge for commissions for the sale of property under a trust deed, without objecting to the amount thereof, held to estop the beneficiary from subsequently insisting that the allowance is too large.—Roller's Adm'r v. Pitman's Adm'r (Va.) 987.

A judgment debtor held not entitled to credit for the price paid by a creditor for property transferred to him by a trust deed, when the property was afterwards taken away from the debtor under a vendor's lien.—Deaton Grocery Co. v. Pepper (Va.) 988.

A city ordinance, requiring all scavenger work to be done by a city scavenger, and fixing the time when such work must be done and the rates to be charged for doing it, held an unreasonable and unnecessary interference with common right, and hence invalid.—State v. Hill (N. C.) 326.

§ 2. Officers, agents, and employés.

Petition by treasurer for recovery of commission on moneys received and paid out held demurrable for uncertainty.—Town of Eastman v. Cameron (Ga.) 462.

Chief executive officer of a municipality cannot grant exclusive right to sell liquor within the corporation.—Fletcher v. Collins (Ga.) 646.

§ 3. Contracts in general.

Ordinance prescribing that all work of a designated kind shall be given exclusively to persons belonging to labor unions held illegal.—City of Atlanta v. Stein (Ga.) 932.

§ 4. Public improvements.

Under a provision in a city charter, one insertion of advertisement for tax sale in each calendar week for 30 days preceding the sale held sufficient.—Montford v. Allen (Ga.) 305.

If an execution embracing an unpaid street tax also included a tax to which the property levied on was subject, the execution and sale were valid.—Montford v. Allen (Ga.) 305.

A city clerk held to have no authority to postpone a tax sale or grant indulgence under tax execution.—Montford v. Allen (Ga.) 305.

City charter construed, and held, that a street may be opened in the same manner as provided for opening a public road by county commissioners, and therefore the city is not liable for damages to abutting owner for raising sidewalk without his consent.—Bramlett v. City of Laurens (S. C.) 444.

§ 5. Police power and regulations.

Power to levy license tax on persons exercising any profession or calling within a city does not give power to impose on a legitimate business a prohibitory tax.—Morton v. City of Macon (Ga.) 627.

A city ordinance, making it unlawful for any person to permit his place to be used as a place for gambling, held not in conflict with Cr. St. § 391.—City Council of Greenville v. Kemmis (S. C.) 727.

§ 6. Use and regulation of public places, property, and works.

A way connecting a city lot with a public street held to become a public street by continuous user for 30 years, and by having been kept in repair by the city.—Carlisle v. Wilson (Ga.) 54.

A city has jurisdiction to entertain petition filed by abutting owner to have a fence obstructing passage removed from a street.—Carlisle v. Wilson (Ga.) 54.

§ 7. Torts.

City is not liable because its mayor required of a person charged with violating city ordinance excessive bond, thereby causing his confinement.—Gray v. City of Griffin (Ga.) 792.

A city is not liable for illegal arrest of person by a police officer, nor his subsequent imprisonment.—Gray v. City of Griffin (Ga.) 792.

A city, maintaining a prison, is not liable in damages to person arrested for injuries sustained by him while confined, because of negligent maintenance of such prison.—Gray v. City of Griffin (Ga.) 792.

Augusta v. Owens (Ga.) 830.

Where the proximate cause of an injury to a pedestrian was defective condition of the street, and a city was negligent in not repairing or protecting the same, it was liable for injury.—City of Milledgeville v. Wood (Ga.) 924.

A town held not liable with a lot owner for injuries occasioned by an excavation in a street, as a joint tort feasor, but only for permitting the excavation to remain unguarded.—Brown v. Town of Louisburg (N. C.) 166.

§ 8. Fiscal management, public debt, securities, and taxation.

A solicitor general has no authority, after 20 days from date of service of notice under Act Dec. 6, 1897, relating to validating bonds, to file petition prescribed by the act.—Roff v. Town of Calhoun (Ga.) 214.

§ 9. Actions.

In an action against a city for injuries resulting from waters overflowing a street, facts held to present a question for the jury on the question of defendant's having provided sufficient drainage.—Capital Printing Co. v. City of Raleigh (N. C.) 33.

§ 1. Acts or omissions constituting negligence.

Definition of negligence held sufficient.—Bradley v. Ohio River & C. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 181.

§ 2. Contributory negligence.

A person engaging a hack is not responsible for the negligent conduct of the driver, unless he assumed to direct or control him.—Bradley v. Ohio River & C. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 181.

Plaintiff held not entitled to recover when injured by negligence of driver, to which injury defendant did not proximately contribute.—Crampton v. Ivie (N. C.) 351.

Plaintiff held not entitled to recover because of his own negligence.—Crampton v. Ivie (N. C.) 351.

Where plaintiff is injured through the negligence of defendant, concurring with that of plaintiff's driver, he cannot recover.—Crampton v. Ivie (N. C.) 351.

An infant 16 months old cannot be guilty of contributory negligence.—Mason v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 440.

Contributory negligence must be the direct and proximate cause of an injury.—Bowen v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 590.

ant, a nonsuit was properly awarded.—Barber v. East & W. R. Co. (Ga.) 50.

Where evidence shows plaintiff's injury resulted from a pure accident, and not from any negligence chargeable to defendants, no recovery can be had.—Seaboard & R. R. Co. v. Spencer (Ga.) 921.

The jury having found joint negligence in an injury case, a refusal to instruct that plaintiff's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury was proper.—Wheeler v. Gibbon (N. C.) 277.

An instruction that negligence was a fact for the jury was not error, where the court also defined what negligence was.—Bowen v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 590.

A complaint which alleges generally that it was defendant's duty to do certain things, without stating any facts out of which the duty arose, fails to state a cause of action.—Dorn v. Georgia, C. & N. Ry. Co. (S. C.) 654.

NEW TRIAL.

Costs, see "Costs," § 1.
In criminal prosecutions, see "Criminal Law," § 15.
Necessity of motion for purpose of review, see "Appeal and Error," § 4.

§ 1. Grounds.

A new trial should not be granted because jurors were not properly examined, where questions in substance were those prescribed by statute.—Lindsey v. State (Ga.) 62.

Where verdict is contrary to law, a new trial should be granted on the merits.—Poole v. Baggett (Ga.) 86.

Rejecting evidence offered to prove a given fact held not ground for new trial, when opposite party admits the fact.—Whitaker v. Arnold (Ga.) 231.

That an attorney of party to action suggested to a juror, while suffering from sickness, that medicine of a particular kind would benefit him, and procured it for the juror at his own expense, held not to require setting aside the verdict, where attorney did not know that such person was a juror, and juror took the medicine, not as a gift, but expected to pay for it.—Barker v. Stewart (Ga.) 238.

Excluding immaterial evidence is not ground for a new trial.—Ray v. Camp (Ga.) 242.

Error in instruction held not ground for new trial, where the evidence demanded the finding rendered.—Wood v. Collins (Ga.) 423.

New trial after judgment against claimant on levy of execution held improperly granted.—Adams v. Carnes (Ga.) 597.

A grant of a new trial on conflicting evidence is not error.—Buice v. Buice (Ga.) 969.

The supreme court will grant a new trial on petition for rehearing, where the previous opinion was by a bare majority of the court, and grave doubt exists in their minds whether the essential principle of proximate cause was properly explained to the jury.—Crampton v. Ivie (N. C.) 351.

§ 2. Proceedings to procure new trial.

Where no brief of evidence was filed on motion for new trial, there was no error in overruling the motion.—Brooks v. Proctor (Ga.) 99.

superior court, motion for new trial by another claimant, not a party, was properly dismissed, as made by one who had no right in the premises.—Jones v. Coney (Ga.) 321.

Ground of motion held not to plainly point out any errors in the instruction.—St. John v. Leyden (Ga.) 610.

Entry on brief of evidence, presented with motion for new trial, held not a legal approval of such brief.—Brantley v. Meyer (Ga.) 924; Meyer v. Brantley, Id.

Where motion is made in term, and ordered to be heard in vacation, and through no fault of movant is not heard on such day, it is error to dismiss it because not heard at appointed time.—Helmly v. Davis (Ga.) 927.

Where court inadvertently approves a document as a brief of evidence which was not such, and thereafter revokes the approval and overrules motion for new trial for want of lawful brief, there is no error.—Keys v. Bell (Ga.) 967.

Where time for filing in vacation a brief of evidence on motion for new trial expires, and brief is not filed, motion is properly dismissed.—Western & A. R. Co. v. Callaway (Ga.) 967.

The supreme court will not reverse action of trial court in refusing to accept, as excuse for failing to file brief of evidence on motion for new trial in time, failure of court stenographer to write out the evidence.—Western & A. R. Co. v. Callaway (Ga.) 967.

NOVATION.

Facts held not to show novation.—Deaton Grocery Co. v. Pepper (Va.) 988.

Evidence that, when a trust deed was given by the son of a judgment debtor to the creditor, the parties knew that there had been a vendor's lien on the property, but that the debtor insisted that it had been extinguished, held admissible to determine whether the transfer was for security or was a novation.—Deaton Grocery Co. v. § 1. Defendants.

Where trust created by will became executed on arrival of beneficiaries at majority, in action by one beneficiary thereafter against legal representatives of the other to recover property received under the will, the trustees were not necessary parties.—Phillips v. Lowther (Ga.) 596.

PARTITION.

§ 1. Actions for partition.

A judgment for costs against defendants in partition, who prevailed on an issue of title

McCarter v. Caldwell (S. C.) 507.

Where a judgment has been recovered, defendant cannot recover the value of his improvements, under the betterment act, since such act only gives a remedy where there has been a judgment against defendant "in an action to recover lands"; partition not being such an action.—Hall v. Boatwright (S. C.) 1001.

Under the betterment act, evidence in action, after partition, that valuable improvements had been made, will not warrant sending the case to the jury.—Hall v. Boatwright (S. C.) 1001.

Since the betterment act was intended to give a remedy where none existed before, it does not apply to a tenant in common who, believing himself sole owner, has made improvements on the common property, as he has ample relief without such act.—Hall v. Boatwright (S. C.) 1001.

PARTNERSHIP.

Subrogation on payment, see "Subrogation."

§ 1. The firm, its name, powers, and property.

Where conveyance under grant to firm was not properly executed by the firm, but purported to be to another firm, composed of the original partnership and another, a conveyance by the latter partnership, executed by all the partners and in the firm name, held sufficient to pass title.—McRae v. Stillwell (Ga.) 604.

§ 2. Mutual rights, duties, and liabilities of partners.

One partner, while the partnership is continuing, cannot sue the other at law for damages resulting to the firm by reason of defendant's failure to perform his duties.—Miller v. Freeman (Ga.) 961.

Judgments against a partnership, paid by one partner, cannot be enforced by him against the co-partner's property in the hands of a purchaser.—Sands' Adm'r v. Durham (Va.) 472.

§ 3. Rights and liabilities as to third persons.

A firm may be liable for malicious prosecution when the process of arrest was sued out in the interest of the firm and under direction of the members.—Page v. Citizens' Banking Co. (Ga.) 418.

A firm held liable in an action for malicious prosecution where same was instituted by direct authority of members.—Page v. Citizens' Banking Co. (Ga.) 418.

It is not lawful to levy execution against individual on property of a firm of which he was a member.—Jolley v. Hardeman (Ga.) 952.

§ 4. Dissolution, settlement, and accounting.

An accounting may be had by one partner against the other, without a dissolution, where the firm has by agreement several years to run, and the partnership articles contemplate a settlement at the end of each season.—Miller v. Freeman (Ga.) 961.

§ 2. Pleading, evidence, and province of court and jury.

Evidence in action by administrator held insufficient to show payment of claim sued on.—Simmons v. Thornton (Ga.) 685.

A defense based on statutory presumption of payment or abandonment held not maintainable since the Code of 1868.—Boone v. Peebles (N. C.) 193.

PEDDLERS.

See "Hawkers and Peddlers."

PEDIGREE.

Declarations as evidence, see "Evidence," § 6.

PENALTIES.

§ 1. Actions and other proceedings.

Penalties claimed against the same defendant under the same statute may be properly joined.—Carter v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. (N. C.) 14.

The penalty provided by Code, § 1964, for a transportation company's refusal to ship freight, may be recovered by any person who will sue therefor.—Carter v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. (N. C.) 14.

—— crossing railroad, see "Railroads," § 5.

PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS.

Allegations of petition in action against physician for malpractice, and testimony, considered, and held, that court was not authorized to conclude that plaintiff's case was based on negligent treatment caused by amputation of leg, but there was evidence to go to the jury whether plaintiff suffered damages in pain and suffering, though treatment of physician may not have caused loss of limb.—Moon v. McRae (Ga.) 635.

§ 1. Form and allegations in general.

Words in petition, whatever may be their true intent and meaning when standing alone, t be construed in connection with all the gations of the petition.—Johnson v. Ameri- Freehold Land Mortg. Co. (Ga.) 614.

Declaration, complaint, petition, or statement.

here petition does not allege that defendant f the county in which suit is brought, it ld be dismissed on special demurrer.— therly v. Southern Co-operative Foundry (Ga.) 59.

here a petition contains averments which ld have been stricken out on special de- rers filed, the refusal to strike them out round for new trial.—Southern Ry. Co. v. rd (Ga.) 78.

action on contract of employment, set- out part of the correspondence leading up he contract, special demurrer on the ground it was not set forth in full held improperly ained, as the entire correspondence was lusage.—Moore v. Kelley & Jones Co. (Ga.)

Plea or answer, cross complaint, and affidavit of defense.

here a petition alleges that defendant is bted on open account, and in another par- ph that he refuses to pay the same, answer ifically denying all the allegations in these graphs is good.—De Soto Plantation Co. Hammett (Ga.) 304.

here answer does not deny allegations, but act admits them to be true, no issue of fact resented.—Hartley v. McGee (Ga.) 926.

dmission by answer of paragraph of com- nt in action alleging right of curtesy held admission only that the husband still sur- s, and not that he was entitled to curtesy alleged in the complaint.—Tiddy v. Graves C.) 127.

here defenses to suit on a bond are equally ilable and availed of under general issue, s not error to reject special pleas.—Blank- ip v. Ely (Va.) 484.

Demurrer or exception.

dealing with demurrer, the judge should dispose of it, and, where petition is dis- ed, it is not a proper practice to deal with urrer to an answer thereto.—Page v. Citi- s' Banking Co. (Ga.) 418.

here petition is unnecessarily voluminous or sufficiently clear, its defects can be reached a special demurrer.—South Carolina & G. Co. v. Augusta Southern R. Co. (Ga.) 593.

here a demurrer to a complaint admitted s which constituted a cause of action, it error to sustain the demurrer to such por- of the complaint.—Sloan v. Carolina Cent. Co. (N. C.) 21.

here a complaint pleads a statute which has existence, a demurrer to the complaint does admit that such statute exists.—Prichard v. missioners of Morganton (N. C.) 353.

complaint alleging that defendants adver- d a sale of mortgaged property after pay- t held sufficient on demurrer for want of s.—Long v. Hunter (S. C.) 579.

Amended and supplemental pleadings and repleader.

nder Act December 21, 1897, amending Civ. e, § 5057, it is within the discretion of trial ge to allow amendment to answer without lavit required by the section.—Marsh v. (Ga.) 230.

ne at whose instance another was made par- a pending suit cannot, after latter has filed wer in nature of cross bill, amend his plead- , so as to prevent hearing on the merits.— rs v. Scott (Ga.) 950.

Under Code, § 273, defect of parties plaintiff may be cured by amendment before trial.—Mills v. Callahan (N. C.) 164.

Under Code, § 194, complaint against railroad company for damages from fire set by its negligence may be amended after commencement of trial by alleging that plaintiff's buildings were thereby destroyed.—Brown v. Carolina Midland Ry. Co. (S. C.) 852.

§ 6. Signature and verification.

Where the verification of an answer was insufficient, it was not error to allow an amended verification.—Best v. Dunn (N. C.) 126.

§ 7. Filing and service.

Where no defense was filed at the first term, held not error, when the case came for trial, to strike out a plea of non est factum filed after the expiration of the appearance term.—Tucker v. Carson (Ga.) 217.

Evidence held to show no excuse for failure to file plea of non est factum at the first term.—Tucker v. Carson (Ga.) 217.

§ 8. Motions.

In determining sufficiency of answer, the court must pass judgment on what the same actually contains, and not on erroneous representations as to its contents, made in open court by counsel for the plaintiffs.—Bates v. First Nat. Bank (Ga.) 949.

§ 9. Defects and objections, waiver, and aider by verdict or judgment.

Objection that complaint in an action for partition did not show possession by plaintiffs within 10 years held waived by failure to demur.—Griffith v. Cromley (S. C.) 738.

PLEDGES.

Evidence held sufficient to show such a delivery of the property as to constitute a valid pledge.—Henry v. State (Ga.) 55.

Property pledged to secure a note may be resorted to to enforce payment of draft on third person given to pledgee to be applied on the note, and which the drawee had failed to pay.—Holmes v. Langston (Ga.) 251; Langston v. Holmes, Id.

Where payee of note secured by collateral converts the latter, he is liable to the maker of the note for its actual value at time of sale by him.—Harrell v. Citizens' Banking Co. (Ga.) 460.

Agency cannot be proved by declarations of alleged agent.—Amicalola Marble & Power Co. v. Coker (Ga.) 950.

Power of agent to deliver moneys to third party, as directed by principal, is terminated by death of principal.—Duckworth v. Orr (N. C.) 150.

§ 2. Rights and liabilities as to third persons.

Where general agent to collect receives payment in property other than money, though creditor is bound thereby as to debtor, he can refuse to accept from the agent, and hold him liable for the debt.—Holmes v. Langston (Ga.) 251; Langston v. Holmes, Id.

Where agent makes with common carrier contract to ship goods in his charge, and does carry with it authority to collect proceeds.—Walton Guano Co. v. McCall (Ga.) 469.

An agent's authority to collect notes is not shown by occasional receipts of payment in which he produced the paper and entered the credit.—Walton Guano Co. v. McCall (Ga.) 469.

Petition in action for breach of contract to sell land held not to set forth that the agent with whom the alleged contract was made had power to sell.—Johnson v. American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. (Ga.) 614.

Agent having authority to receive proposals to purchase property and submit the same cannot make binding contract of sale.—Johnson v. American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. (Ga.) 614.

General power of attorney to transact business of the principal construed, and held confined to specific objects to be accomplished and limited by the recitals made in regard thereto.—Born v. Simmons (Ga.) 956.

Where an agent is to carry on a mercantile business, and it is necessary to rent a house, the principal will be bound for the rent.—Baldwin v. Garrett (Ga.) 966.

Agency to collect a claim does not authorize agent to agree that proceeds shall be applied to a debt due by his principal.—Hill v. Van Duzer (Ga.) 966.

Under Civ. Code, § 3024, one dealing with agent of undisclosed principal can sue the principal when discovered.—Baldwin v. Garrett (Ga.) 966.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY.

See "Guaranty."
Liabilities of sureties on bonds for performance of duties of office or trust, see "Guardian and Ward," § 3.

§ 1. Creation and existence of relation.

A bond given to stay injunction held sufficiently signed by principal where signed in her name by her husband at her request, and acted on by court and parties, so as to bind the sureties defending under alleged agreement with principal to sign in order to bind them.—Blankenship v. Ely (Va.) 484.

§ 2. Discharge of surety.

Extension of credit to makers of note, contrary to terms of agreement with sureties, held not to effect release of surety.—Rouss v. Krauss (N. C.) 146.

Evidence being found by jury insufficient to effect release of surety, held, that co-surety could not claim release because of the other's release.—Rouss v. Krauss (N. C.) 146.

RAILROADS.

See "Street Railroads."
Carriage of goods and passengers, see "Carriers."

§ 1. Railroad companies.

Issuance by secretary of state of certificate of incorporation to purchasers at judicial sale of property and franchise of railroad company does not create corporation authorized to operate the railroad and exercise its franchises.—Watson v. Albany & N. Ry. Co. (Ga.) 324.

§ 2. Right of way and other interests in land.

Contract conveying right of way to a railroad company construed, and held not to authorize the company to build a line for a temporary spur track, from its main line to a point three miles distant, to which it was not authorized in its charter to build its road.—Waycross Air Line R. Co. v. Southern Pine Co. (Ga.) 641.

Where a railroad attempted to build a spur track on land of another and under a contract which did not include such right, an injunction was properly granted restraining the company from constructing the road.—Waycross Air-Line R. Co. v. Southern Pine Co. (Ga.) 641.

§ 3. Construction, maintenance, and equipment.

Civ. Code, § 2176, held not to prevent the construction of a private railroad within 10 miles and in close proximity to a commercial railroad.—Waycross Air-Line R. Co. v. Southern Pine Co. (Ga.) 641.

In an action against a railroad company for past damages to crops caused by the diversion of waters, and for permanent damages therefor, it is proper to require a separate finding on each issue.—Lassiter v. Norfolk & C. R. Co. (N. C.) 48.

An action for the damages caused by the diversion of waters by a railroad company is not barred by Acts 1895, c. 224, till five years after the damage is done.—Lassiter v. Norfolk & C. R. Co. (N. C.) 48.

Where, in an action against a railroad company for damage caused by the diversion of water, there were separate findings of the amount of past damages to crops, and of permanent damages, it was error for the court to limit the judgment to the permanent damage found.—Lassiter v. Norfolk & C. R. Co. (N. C.) 48.

Complaint in action for obstruction of a water course held bad on demurrer.—Delaney v. Georgia, C. & N. Ry. Co. (S. C.) 699.

§ 4. Sales, leases, traffic contracts, and consolidation.

Contract for lease of one railroad by another construed, and held, that the keeping of certain

Co. v. Augusta Southern R. Co. (Ga.) 593.

Petition in action on lease of one railroad by another held to sufficiently allege breach of covenants by lessee entitling plaintiff to institute action.—South Carolina & G. R. Co. v. Augusta Southern R. Co. (Ga.) 593.

Lease of one railroad to another construed, and held that, upon a breach by lessee of any of certain stipulations in the lease, the right of lessor to sue for forfeiture thereof was established.—South Carolina & G. R. Co. v. Augusta Southern R. Co. (Ga.) 593.

Where one of the covenants of a lease of one railroad by another provided for payment of interest on certain bonds, failure to pay such interest held not ground for forfeiture, where interest was paid before filing of petition.—South Carolina & G. R. Co. v. Augusta Southern R. Co. (Ga.) 593.

§ 5. Operation—Accidents at crossings.

Building and keeping in repair bridge over a private crossing held to render a railroad company liable for injuries resulting from defects negligently permitted to remain.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Hooper (Ga.) 232.

Evidence of how other crossings were constructed held inadmissible to show that crossing at which accident occurred was defectively constructed.—Raper v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. (N. C.) 115.

Dangerous condition of crossing held prima facie evidence of railroad's negligence.—Raper v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. (N. C.) 115.

Admissibility of evidence to show defective construction of railroad crossing at which plaintiff's intestate was killed determined.—Raper v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. (N. C.) 115.

To show railroad crossing dangerous, condition of other similar crossings may be shown.—Raper v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. (N. C.) 115.

If crossing is so constructed as to be safe to one crossing the track, that is enough, though it might be dangerous to one walking along the railroad.—Raper v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. (N. C.) 115.

Where a railway company kicks a train over a crossing without proper means to stop the train, and a person in the exercise of ordinary care is killed on the crossing, the killing is a negligent killing.—Bradley v. Ohio River & C. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 181.

Failure of those in charge of a moving train to keep a lookout when approaching a crossing is negligence, where such lookout would have saved life.—Bradley v. Ohio River & C. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 181.

Whether the sounding of a whistle when the train was 50 feet from a crossing was timely is for the jury.—Bradley v. Ohio River & C. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 181.

An instruction defining negligence in an action for injury at a crossing held proper.—Bradley v. Ohio River & C. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 181.

Plaintiff, in an action against a railroad company, held entitled to show, as bearing on defendant's negligence in backing its trains, its custom as to where it stopped its train for the discharge of passengers with reference to the crossing at which plaintiff was injured.—Bradley v. Ohio River & C. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 181.

Where a person was killed on a crossing by being struck by a backing train, evidence that the hack and body of deceased were pushed back by the train is admissible as showing what stopped the train, that it was kicked crossing by being struck by a backing train, it may be shown that the conductor knew the custom of hackmen in crossing after the train had passed, and had notified them that hacks could pass the crossing after the train had passed it.—Bradley v. Ohio River & C. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 181.

An instruction in action for injuries at crossing properly refused which deprived plaintiff of right of recovery under Rev. St. § 1692, unless guilty of gross negligence.—Bowen v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 590.

A railway company's failure to comply with Rev. St. §§ 1685, 1692, requiring the blowing of a whistle or ringing of a bell at crossings, is negligence per se.—Bowen v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 590.

An instruction in an action for injuries did not require defendant to disprove negligence alleged, and hence not error.—Bowen v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 590.

An instruction in an action for injuries at a railway crossing held not erroneous, as requiring both the ringing of the bell and blowing of the whistle, when Rev. St. §§ 1685, 1692, required only one of the two.—Bowen v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 590.

An instruction held not to impose an absolute liability for plaintiff's injuries on defendant, on its failure to comply with statutory requirements as to signals.—Bowen v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 590.

Failure to signal when approaching crossing held not negligence in case of a horse frightened thereby.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Cooper (Va.) 388.

§ 6. —— Injuries to persons on or near tracks.

Where there was evidence that employés on defendant's train could have stopped the train before striking plaintiff's decedent, held error to grant a nonsuit.—Clay v. Macon & B. R. Co. (Ga.) 233.

Violation by railroad company of a valid ordinance is negligence per se.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Bond (Ga.) 299.

It is incompetent to show that railway employé, who has violated a city ordinance, was ignorant thereof.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Bond (Ga.) 299.

Evidence held to show that person killed on track was guilty of contributory negligence.—Neal v. Carolina Cent. R. Co. (N. C.) 117.

It is the duty of railroad company to have fireman to aid engineer in keeping proper lookout, when curves in road make it impracticable for engineer to keep it alone.—Arrowood v. South Carolina & G. Extension Ry. Co. (N. C.) 151.

Defective lookout kept by engineer held to be proximate cause of death, notwithstanding contributory negligence of deceased.—Arrowood v. South Carolina & G. Extension Ry. Co. (N. C.) 151.

Testimony that railroad company's engineer could have seen deceased, and that he did not see him when it was his duty to have seen him, is competent on behalf of plaintiff in action for causing death.—Arrowood v. South Carolina & G. Extension Ry. Co. (N. C.) 151.

Where track is used as a passway, railroad company is required to exercise greater degree of care in running trains than where track is not so used.—Arrowood v. South Carolina & G. Extension Ry. Co. (N. C.) 151.

track.—Mason v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 440.

In action for injury to child on track, evidence of omission of signals held admissible on the question of proximate cause.—Mason v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 440.

§ 7. —— Injuries to animals on or near tracks.

Evidence in action for killing stock held insufficient to sustain verdict for plaintiff.—Georgia S. & F. Ry. Co. v. Sanders (Ga.) 458.

§ 8. —— Fires.

A petition alleging fire set by negligence of agents of defendant railroad company held amendable by alleging that it was set by negligence of the section foreman.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Ward (Ga.) 78.

Evidence held sufficient to go to the jury on the question of defendant's liability for setting fire to plaintiff's land.—McMillan v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. (N. C.) 129.

Where a particular engine was alleged to have caused a fire, evidence of other fires caused by other engines, without showing their condition or the attending circumstances, held erroneously admitted.—Hygienic Plate Ice-Mfg. Co. v. Raleigh & A. Air-Line R. Co. (N. C.) 279.

REAL ACTIONS.

See "Ejectment."

REBUTTAL.

Evidence, see "Trial," § 4.

RECEIVERS.

Of corporations in general, see "Corporations," § 8.

§ 1. Appointment, qualification, and tenure.

Dismissal by plaintiff of equitable proceeding in which receiver has been appointed does not discharge receiver, who retains custody of assets pending order of court.—Fountain v. Mills (Ga.) 428.

§ 2. Management and disposition of property.

Where suit in which receiver has been appointed has been dismissed, the judge may retain jurisdiction over the fund in the hands of the receiver until proper petition of creditor for equitable distribution.—Fountain v. Mills (Ga.) 428.

§ 3. Actions.

Where receiver's appointment is denied, he should prove the same by a certified copy of decree dissolving the corporation and appointing him.—Person v. Leary (N. C.) 35.

§ 4. Accounting and compensation.

A receiver may be paid at stated intervals during the continuance of his functions, and need not wait until the termination of his trust.—Battery Park Bank v. Western Carolina Bank (N. C.) 39.

Under Code, § 379 (4), a receiver may be allowed commissions on both receipts and disbursements to the extent of 5 per cent. on each.—Battery Park Bank v. Western Carolina Bank (N. C.) 39.

§ 5. Foreign and ancillary receiverships.

Foreign receivers, suing in the state, must obtain leave of court.—Person v. Leary (N. C.) 35.

To master or commissioner in equity, see "Equity," § 6.

§ 1. Nature, grounds, and order of reference.

Where in an action defendant sets up a plea in bar, it is erroneous for the court to refer the cause, contrary to defendant's objection, before such plea is passed on.—Austin v. Stewart (N. C.) 37.

§ 2. Referees and proceedings.

A referee has no jurisdiction to dismiss an action which has been referred to him, on the ground that the court appointing him had no jurisdiction of the cause.—Austin v. Stewart (N. C.) 37.

§ 3. Report and findings.

Where no exception was taken to a master's finding, it was binding on the circuit judge on the subsequent hearing of the case.—Hendrix v. Holden (S. C.) 1010.

REFORMATORIES.

An association for the care of prisoners for a compensation, making its own by-laws and managed by officers of its own selection, held not to be a public corporation, and hence liable for its torts.—Trevett v. Prison Ass'n (Va.) 373.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES.

Trustees of a church are not, as such, liable for lumber sold to the pastor on his individual corporated religious society, whose name has not been recorded as provided by law.—Thurmond v. Cedar Spring Baptist Church (Ga.) 221.

Action in name of unincorporated church, purporting to be brought by named persons as its officers, held not maintainable or amendable.—Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Inman Park Presbyterian Church (Ga.) 880.

REMAINDERS.

See "Life Estates."

A remainder may be created in money.—Crawford v. Clark (Ga.) 404.

REMAND.

Of cause on appeal or writ of error, see "Appeal and Error," § 19.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES.

Change of venue or place of trial, see "Venue," § 3.

§ 1. Citizenship or alienage of parties.

A foreign corporation, which has become a domestic corporation under Pub. Laws 1899, c. 62, cannot remove the cause to a United States court, when sued by a citizen as a domestic corporation on a cause of action disclosing no federal question.—Debnam v. Southern Bell Tel. Co. (N. C.) 269.

A foreign railroad corporation, though domesticated under Act March 19, 1896, is still entitled to have a cause against it removed to the United States courts because of nonresidence.—Wilson v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 701.

A railroad company incorporated under the laws of another state is a nonresident of the state for the purpose of removal to a federal court.—Calvert v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 750.

§ 2. Proceedings to procure and effect of removal.

Though plaintiff in a suit which had been removed from a state to a federal court was nonsuited, he could bring another suit on the same cause of action in the state court, though the damages in the second suit were laid in an amount which would prevent another removal.—McIver v. Florida Cent. & P. R. Co. (Ga.) 775.

The state court cannot be deprived of its jurisdiction by the mere filing of a petition regular in form for removal to a federal court, but the petition for removal, taken in connection with the complaint, must show a prima facie right of removal.—Debnam v. Southern Bell Tel. Co. (N. C.) 269.

RENT.

See "Landlord and Tenant," § 4.

REPEAL.

Of statute, see "Statutes," § 4.

REPLEVIN.

§ 1. Right of action and defenses.

In replevin for property sold under conditional sale reserving title, plaintiff was not bound to return part of the price paid, where the value of the use of the property during the time it was held by defendant equaled the under a warrant to enforce a lien for rent, property the rightful possession of which is in another.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Sarratt (S. C.) 504.

Under Rev. St. 1893, § 2522, a third person in whose hands personal property is seized, which it is claimed is subject to a lien for rent, may, on executing bond, recover the same in an action of claim and delivery.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Sarratt (S. C.) 504.

§ 2. Proceedings for taking and redelivery of property.

Execution of recognizance for forthcoming of personal property, where bail has been required in trover, held not to estop defendant from denying that he had ever been in possession thereof.—Bell v. G. Ober & Sons Co. (Ga.) 904.

§ 3. Pleading and evidence.

In replevin for property sold under conditional sale reserving title, evidence as to the value of the property for hire while in defendant's possession was admissible.—Commercial Pub. Co. v. Campbell Printing-Press & Mfg. Co. (Ga.) 756.

Evidence to establish, by way of recoupment, damages sustained out of the same contract, held inadmissible in trover.—Bell v. G. Ober & Sons Co. (Ga.) 904.

Testimony that a bill of sale executed by a plaintiff in replevin, conveying the property claimed to the defendant, was in reality a mortgage, and had been fully paid, held competent to impeach the title shown by the bill of sale.—Williams v. Griffin (S. C.) 665.

§ 4. Damages.

Where the subject-matter of an action of bail trover was notes pledged by defendant as collateral security for a debt due plaintiff, and placed in the defendant's hands for collection, the measure of damages was the amount due on judgment rendered in former suit, provided the value of the collaterals equaled or exceeded that amount, and, if not, the value of the collaterals.—Holmes v. Langston (Ga.) 251; Langston v. Holmes, Id.

§ 5. Trial, judgment, enforcement of judgment, and review.

Where, in action of trover, there was clear proof of conversion of certain of the property, held proper to deny a nonsuit.—Bell v. G. Ober & Sons Co. (Ga.) 904.

§ 6. Liabilities on bonds and undertakings.

An obligation by defendant in bail trover construed, and held in substantial compliance with Civ. Code, § 4605.—Holmes v. Langston (Ga.) 251; Langston v. Holmes, Id.

Sureties in action of bail trover to recover certain securities, after plaintiff has announced election to take money judgment, cannot free themselves by tendering a portion of the property, offering to pay the money value of another portion, and accounting for balance by setting up facts which could have been pleaded by defendant as defense in the former suit.—Holmes v. Langston (Ga.) 251; Langston v. Holmes, Id.

§ 1. Requisites and validity of contract.

Evidence held to show that purchaser bought on his own judgment, and not on the faith of seller's false representations, made pending negotiations which led up to the sale.—Floyd v. Woods (Ga.) 225.

Where, on a sale, a contract is expressed in writing, embracing the entire agreement, containing no reference to sample, conformity of the bulk to the sample is not an agreed term.—Imperial Portrait Co. v. Bryan (Ga.) 291.

§ 2. Construction of contract.

Evidence held insufficient to show a sale by sample.—Imperial Portrait Co. v. Bryan (Ga.) 291.

Bill of sale purporting to show conveyance of title to president of designated corporation held inadmissible to show title in corporation.—Florida Cent. & P. R. Co. v. Usina (Ga.) 928.

§ 3. Modification or rescission of contract.

Where seller fails to deliver separate article of machinery purchased under entire contract, only a contract for fraud, he will waive his objections unless he acts immediately on discovery thereof.—Pearce v. Borg Chewing-Gum Co. (Ga.) 457.

Where purchaser seeks to avoid contract for fraud, he must, on discovery, announce his purpose to rescind at first opportunity.—Pearce v. Borg Chewing-Gum Co. (Ga.) 457.

§ 4. Performance of contract.

Contract to deliver complete outfit for ginning cotton for a gross price held an entire one, and a breach was caused by failure to deliver any specific article.—Harden v. Lang (Ga.) 100.

Where, after breach of contract of sale by failure to deliver all articles purchased under entire contract, purchaser retains articles delivered and notifies seller that he has obtained the balance elsewhere, he holds the articles received under the terms of contract.—Harden v. Lang (Ga.) 100.

§ 5. Remedies of seller.

Claim for damages for breach of contract of sale cannot be allowed by plea of recoupment in defense of trover.—Harden v. Lang (Ga.) 100.

Profits capable of exact computation may be shown in an action for breach of contract.—Gore v. Malsby (Ga.) 315.

Where firm directs an importer to import and ship certain goods at stated prices, and refuses to accept, it is liable in damages, but not to an action as for goods sold and delivered.—Maddox v. Wagner (Ga.) 609.

Breach of executory contract for purchase of goods will not support action for price.—Maddox v. Wagner (Ga.) 609.

§ 6. Conditional sales.

An agreement between principal and agent as to purchase of live stock construed, and held not a sale with reservation of title, to be recorded under Civ. Code, § 2776.—Evans v. Napier (Ga.) 426.

The intent of the parties to a contract for the sale of stock, and the bona fides of the transaction, held questions for the jury.—Evans v. Napier (Ga.) 426.

SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS.

Mandamus to school board, see "Mandamus," § 2.

§ 1. Public schools.

Where pupil, instructed to prepare a paper on a certain subject, reads a paper prepared by her father, which is disrespectful to the teacher, the pupil may be punished for failure to prepare a paper in accordance with the instructions.—Samuel Benedict Memorial School v. Bradford (Ga.) 920; Bradford v. Samuel Benedict Memorial School, Id.

Authorities of public school have power to make the writing of compositions and entering into debates a part of the school course.—Samuel Benedict Memorial School v. Bradford (Ga.) 920; Bradford v. Samuel Benedict Memorial School, Id.

Whether particular subject given by school authorities for composition is suited to the age of the pupil is a question for such authorities and not for the court.—Samuel Benedict Memorial School v. Bradford (Ga.) 920; Bradford v. Samuel Benedict Memorial School, Id.

For disobedience of proper direction, pupil held liable to expulsion or suspension.—Samuel Benedict Memorial School v. Bradford (Ga.) 920; Bradford v. Samuel Benedict Memorial School, Id.

Laws 1899, c. 128, providing that fines and penalties collected by towns shall be used for municipal purposes, is void, as repugnant to Const. art. 9, § 5, which provides that such fines shall belong to the county school fund.—Board of Education of Vance County v. Town of Henderson (N. C.) 158.

Under Const. art. 9, § 5, providing that the clear proceeds of all penalties and of all fines collected shall be paid to the county school fund, fines collected by a town must be paid into such fund without deductions therefrom.—Board of Education of Vance County v. Town of Henderson (N. C.) 158.

Under Const. art. 9, § 5, the proceeds of penalties recovered by a civil action by a town for violations of its ordinances belong to such town, and not to the county school fund.—Board of Education of Vance County v. Town of Henderson (N. C.) 158.

Under Code, §§ 3818, 3820, and Const. art. 9, § 5, fines collected by a town for violations of city ordinances belong to the common-school fund of the county.—Board of Education of Vance County v. Town of Henderson (N. C.) 158.

SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES.

§ 1. Compensation.

Where execution on foreclosure of landlord's lien and a distress warrant are placed in the hands of a constable, he is entitled to retain from the proceeds costs legitimately incurred.—Moran v. Childs (Ga.) 235.

§ 2. Powers, duties, and liabilities.

Evidence held to warrant finding that rules against the constable for failure to execute a writ were issued maliciously and without probable cause.—Roberts v. Keeler (Ga.) 617.

That costs on a fi. fa. have not been paid will not justify the issuance of a rule against the officer for the principal and interest, which have been paid to the plaintiff in execution.—Roberts v. Keeler (Ga.) 617.

A sheriff may show that an execution placed in his hands has been paid, as an excuse for not making the money thereon.—Roberts v. Keeler (Ga.) 617.

While sheriff, on failure to sell property on levy, is liable to attachment for contempt, in defense of a rule he can show that it was not subject to execution.—Brannon v. Barnes, 689.

A sheriff held not liable to amercement for failure to return an execution issued by a justice and directed to a constable.—McGee v. Mitchell (N. C.) 164.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

§ 1. Contracts enforceable.

Where improvements are destroyed before deed or possession given, the vendee is entitled to abatement of the contract price.—Prince v. Guernsey (Ga.) 796.

Specific performance of a contract to purchase land will not be granted where the vendee has only an equitable right therein, against which there are a large number of judgments.—Newberry v. French (Va.) 519.

Parties complying with the terms of a contract to devise property held entitled to specific performance thereof, though they did not perform it.—Burdine v. Burdine's Ex'r (Va.) 966.

§ 2. Good faith and diligence.

Where a vendor has delayed performance of his contract to convey for 30 months, during which time the property has greatly depreciated in value, specific performance will not be decreed against the vendee.—Newberry v. French (Va.) 519.

§ 1. Enactment, requisites, and validity in general.

Under Const. art. 2, § 14, requiring bills authorizing municipalities to create debts to have three readings before passing, the question, on the third reading of an act for that purpose, of the words "majority of" to a vote which read, "when authorized by all the qualified voters," was immaterial.—Gleaves v. (N. C.) 167.

to make penal the killing of doves at any other place than at the bait.—Harris v. State (Ga.) 232.

Where body of penal statute is broader than the title warrants, it is unconstitutional as to matters not comprehended in the title.—Harris v. State (Ga.) 232.

Act providing for the amendment of a city charter held to express the subject in the title.—City of Macon v. Hughes (Ga.) 247.

Rev. St. § 1582, held not repugnant to Const. art. 3, § 17, providing that the subject of every act shall be expressed in its title.—Barksdale v. City of Laurens (S. C.) 661.

§ 3. Amendment, revision, and codification.

Though act passed before adoption of Code of 1895, and which was incorporated therein, ing the act.—Parks v. State (Ga.) 73.

§ 4. Repeal, suspension, expiration, and revival.

Pub. Laws 1899, c. 349, held to have destroyed plaintiff's pending action for a penalty, brought under Code, § 3816, notwithstanding Code, § 3764.—Dyer v. Ellington (N. C.) 177.

Act Dec. 24, 1884, repealed provisions of Spartanburg city charter relating to assessments of damages for taking land for streets, and proceedings subsequently taken under the charter are void.—State v. Tenny (S. C.) 555.

§ 5. Construction and operation.

Laws imposing a license, where there is doubt as to their meaning, are construed more strongly against the government and in favor of the citizen.—Brown v. Commonwealth (Va.) 485.

SUBROGATION.

Where, at the time of the execution of a mortgage by defendant to plaintiff, and a junior mortgage to D., a third mortgage to N. was of record and unsatisfied, the fact that N.'s mortgage was paid by the proceeds of D.'s loan did not entitle him to be subrogated to the rights of N.—Gunter v. Addy (S. C.) 553.

A partner who pays a partnership judgment is not entitled to subrogation, without an agreement making him a surety for his co-partner.—Sands' Adm'r v. Durham (Va.) 472.

Code, § 2855, does not change the rule that a partner paying partnership judgments is not entitled to subrogation.—Sands' Adm'r v. Durham (Va.) 472.

A county treasurer, who without request voluntarily paid taxes on lands of another, held not entitled to be subrogated to rights of state and county.—Repass v. Moore (Va.) 474.

SUBSCRIPTIONS.

In an action to determine the liability of the makers of certain subscription notes, evidence held to show that the notes were given on certain conditions, outlined when the plans for raising the funds were adopted.—Catt v. Olivier (Ga.) 980.

In an action to determine the liability of the makers of certain subscription notes to creditors, which were given on certain conditions, that payments were made by such makers before the conditions on which they were given were complied with held not a waiver of such conditions.—Catt v. Olivier (Ga.) 980.

TAXATION.

See "Licenses," § 1.
Assessments for municipal improvements, see "Municipal Corporations," § 4.

1. Constitutional requirements and restrictions.

The act of March 9, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 388), authorizing tolls for floating logs on certain streams, violates Const. art. 8, § 4, in that the toll authorized is for a private benefit, and not for the public good, and confers no corresponding benefit on the owner of the logs.—Hutton v. Webb (N. C.) 341

§ 2. Liability of persons and property.

Commissioners of dispensary established under Act Dec. 16, 1897, held county authorities, within general tax act, imposing a tax on dispensary conducted by counties or municipal authorities.—Sheffield v. Board of Com'rs (Ga.) 302.

Act Oct. 16, 1889, gives no county authority to assess and collect back taxes on railroad property.—Staten v. Savannah, F. & W. Ry. Co. (Ga.) 938.

§ 3. Lien and priority.

Property subject to tax liens, as between creditors of owner, determined.—Reynolds v. Wood (Ga.) 593.

§ 4. Collection and enforcement against persons or personal property.

Where a tax fi. fa., issued and transferred prior to Code of 1895, was levied, and a claim was filed by a third person, no record of the transfer being made, the levy should be dismissed.—Funkhouser v. Male (Ga.) 57.

A tax fi. fa., transferred to one other than defendant, loses its lien, unless it be recorded as provided by law.—Funkhouser v. Male (Ga.) 57.

Property of town dispensary held subject to sale under execution for state taxes.—Sheffield v. Board of Com'rs (Ga.) 302.

§ 5. Sale of land for nonpayment of tax.

Levy of wild-land tax fi. fa. cannot be attacked as excessive when issued, not against the owner, but against the particular lot.—Vickers v. Hawkins (Ga.) 463.

Where alterations had been made in the entry of levy on a tax execution, it will be presumed that they were made at the time of the original entry, and burden is on objecting party to show the contrary.—Vickers v. Hawkins (Ga.) 463.

Under Act Feb. 28, 1874, as amended March 2, 1875, providing that advertisements as to tax sales should be published once a week for four weeks, where the advertisement is inserted four times in as many weeks, and the first insertion is published 28 days or more before the executions were issued, it was sufficient.—Bentley v. Shingler (Ga.) 935.

Tax execution against wild land under Act Feb. 28, 1874, need not recite that they are wild or had not been returned for taxation.—Bentley v. Shingler (Ga.) 935.

There is no provision of law that sheriffs' sales under tax executions issued under Act Feb. 28, 1874, as amended by Act March 2, 1875, should be advertised for 90 days.—Bentley v. Shingler (Ga.) 935.

§ 6. Redemption from tax sale.

One whose property has been sold cannot redeem after 12 months.—Montford v. Allen (Ga.) 305.

Two years given remainder-man in which to redeem do not apply to sales for city taxes.—Tiddy v. Graves (N. C.) 127.

§ 7. Tax titles.

Facts considered, and held that, as plaintiff had been lulled into security by the promise of the clerk and actions of the defendant after defective sale for delinquent taxes, equity will relieve him by annulling the deed issued thereunder.—Thomas v. Jones (Va.) 382.

TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES.

Liability for injuries caused by electricity, see "Electricity."

Possession of premises by one of two tenants in common thereof, not having been adverse for 20 years, is deemed the possession of both tenants.—Conkey v. John L. Roper Lumber Co. (N. C.) 42.

§ 1. Fiscal management, public debt, securities, and taxation.

A town may urge the invalidity of bonds voted by it in aid of a railroad, though it has paid an installment of interest thereon.—Glenn v. Wray (N. C.) 167.

The legislature may authorize a town to vote bonds in aid of a railroad, in the act incorporating such railroad, though the town charter does not permit the voting of such bonds.—Glenn v. Wray (N. C.) 167.

TRESPASS.

Ejection of trespasser, see "Carriers," § 3.

§ 1. Actions.

Bare possession gives right of action against one wrongfully interfering therewith.—Bass v. West (Ga.) 244.

ness of plaintiff, a corporation, held not to set forth a cause of action in trespass.—Fulton Grocery Co. v. Maddox (Ga.) 647.

Under general denial in action for trespass on land, defendant cannot introduce any evidence save such as tends to disprove the allegations of the complaint.—Henderson v. Bennett (S. C.) 2.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 144, a circuit court held to have jurisdiction to try action of trespass on land in county where the land is situate, though all defendants reside in another.—Henderson v. Bennett (S. C.) 2.

In determining a demurrer to a complaint for trespass on real property, on the ground that the complaint does not state a cause of action, all alleged circumstances of aggravation must be eliminated.—Rankin v. Sievern & K. R. Co. (S. C.) 997.

A complaint against a railroad company for trespass on plaintiff's land which fails to allege that defendant entered on the land to construct its road without plaintiff's consent is fatally defective.—Rankin v. Sievern & K. R. Co. (S. C.) 997.

Where a complaint for trespass alleges that defendant, a railroad company, entered on plaintiff's land and did certain acts without having acquired a right of way, the words "without having acquired a right of way" present a conclusion of law.—Rankin v. Sievern & K. R. Co. (S. C.) 997.

Where a complaint for trespass alleges that defendant, a railroad company, entered on plaintiff's land and did certain acts, and thus broke plaintiff's close, the words "thus broke plaintiff's close" must be eliminated in determining a demurrer on the ground that the complaint does not state a cause of action.—Rankin v. Sievern & K. R. Co. (S. C.) 997.

A complaint for trespass on the person which alleges no assault on plaintiff states no cause of action.—Rankin v. Sievern & K. R. Co. (S. C.) 997.

§ 2. Criminal responsibility.

Affidavit and warrant charging trespass after notice sufficiently allege the offense of entry on the land of another after notice prohibiting the same.—State v. Tenny (S. C.) 555.

Where defendants in a prosecution for trespass offered void condemnation proceedings in evidence as a justification, they were properly rejected.—State v. Tenny (S. C.) 555.

Under Code, § 3729, where defendant was indicted for unlawfully tearing down the fence of the prosecutor, evidence that he had title to the property under a verbal contract was admissible to show bona fides on the part of the defendant.—Wise v. Commonwealth (Va.) 479.

Where defendant was indicted for unlawfully tearing down the fence of the prosecutor, to refuse an instruction, if he tore down such fence under a claim to right, believing it to be his own, to acquit, was erroneous.—Wise v. Commonwealth (Va.) 479.

Place of trial, see "Venue," § 3.
Right to trial by jury, see "Jury," § 1.

§ 1. Notice of trial and preliminary proceedings.

Where exceptions to report of commissioners to appraise homestead are placed on calendar 14 days before the commencement of the term, no further notice of trial is necessary.—Bleckley v. Shirley (S. C.) 503.

§ 2. Dockets, lists, and calendars.

Where a party, without objection, participates at an extra term of the circuit court in the trial of a cause not docketed at the preceding regular term, he will be deemed to have waived his objection that the cause was not docketed on the calendar of the preceding regular term, and the court has jurisdiction, notwithstanding Code, § 28.—Rivers v. Priester (S. C.) 543; Priester v. Whaley, Id.

§ 3. Course and conduct of trial in general.

Before defendant in action ex contractu can open and close, he must admit enough in his pleadings to make a prima facie case.—Whitaker v. Arnold (Ga.) 231.

To entitle defendant to open and close, he must admit enough to make out a prima facie case for plaintiff.—Reid v. Sewell (Ga.) 937.

§ 4. Reception of evidence.

A general objection to evidence as a whole is bad, when some of it is admissible.—Ray v. Camp (Ga.) 242.

A party's reasons for failing to subpœna a particular witness are not a proper subject of investigation.—Ray v. Camp (Ga.) 242.

A party may introduce in evidence relevant portions of the minutes of a corporation, without being required to introduce all its minutes relevant to the matter under investigation.—Fouché v. Merchants' Nat. Bank (Ga.) 256; Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Fouché, Id.

Where a party introduces immaterial evidence without objection, the other party is not thereby entitled to introduce, over objection, other illegal evidence in rebuttal.—Stapleton v. Monroe (Ga.) 428.

Where an agent's manual, showing rules of the company, was excluded from evidence in an action on a life policy, because it was not shown that the insured knew the rules, subsequent testimony to that effect did not invalidate the ruling.—Going v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. (S. C.) 556.

§ 5. Arguments and conduct of counsel.

It is error to allow counsel to argue to the jury on a basis not established by the evidence.—Georgia & A. Ry. v. Pound (Ga.) 312.

§ 6. Taking case or question from jury.

Evidence in an action against a city because of defective street warranting a finding of negligence, it was error to grant a nonsuit.—Shiflett v. City of Cedartown (Ga.) 221.

The amount of damages to be recovered is a question for the jury.—Horkan v. Benning (Ga.) 432.

Where, in action for negligence, evidence demanded verdict for defendant, it was properly directed.—Quirouet v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. (Ga.) 599.

The question being whether an employé negligently chose the more dangerous of two methods of doing work, and the evidence not demanding a finding thereon against plaintiff, it was error to grant a nonsuit.—Matthews v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. (Ga.) 926.

Where evidence was conflicting on the main issues, held error to direct verdict for defendant.—Binion v. Georgia, S. & F. Ry. Co. (Ga.) 938.

Where plaintiff's evidence only is introduced, and shows plaintiff's decedent guilty of contributory negligence, the court may take the case from the jury.—Neal v. Carolina Cent. R. Co. (N. C.) 117.

Verdict held properly directed against surety, notwithstanding breach of contract between principal, surety, and payee.—Rouss v. Krauss (N. C.) 146.

Where issues are submitted to the jury, an instruction that plaintiff cannot recover cannot be granted.—Bradley v. Ohio River & C. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 181.

It was not error to deny defendant's motion for a nonsuit, made at the close of plaintiff's evidence, where the evidence was conflicting, and some tended to establish plaintiff's cause of action, and other tended to show contributory negligence.—Short v. Gill (N. C.) 336.

Where the evidence is conflicting as to the facts on which plaintiff predicated his right to recover in an action for injuries, it is proper to submit the question of negligence and proximate cause to the jury.—Short v. Gill (N. C.) 336.

Evidence in an action on a life policy held sufficient to justify a refusal to nonsuit.—Going v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. (S. C.) 556.

Where there is any material evidence on the issues raised by the pleadings, the refusal of a nonsuit is proper.—Jenkins v. Charleston St. Ry. Co. (S. C.) 703.

A demurrer to the evidence is the proper mode of taking from the jury the determination of its weight.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Cooper (Va.) 388.

§ 7. Instructions to jury—Province of court and jury in general.

A portion of a charge wherein a correct proposition is stated is not erroneous because it fails to embrace an instruction which would be appropriate in connection with that proposition.—Lucas v. State (Ga.) 87.

What part of evidence of witness should be given most weight is for the jury.—Owen v. Palmour (Ga.) 969.

Under Code, § 413, court is not required to charge jury where question at issue is simply one of fact, and evidence is not conflicting or complicated.—Duckworth v. Orr (N. C.) 150.

The jury having been told that certain evidence was to be considered only to contradict a witness, the instruction need not afterwards be given.—Mason v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 440.

Where the charge declares the law on a hypothetical statement of facts, it is not a violation of Const. art. 5, § 26, prohibiting a charge on the facts.—Jenkins v. Charleston St. Ry. Co. (S. C.) 703.

§ 8. —— Applicability to pleadings and evidence.

Where neither pleadings nor evidence give jury a right to find damages growing out of diminished earnings of plaintiff caused by the injury, it was error to charge the jury on inquiry

An instruction on a defense not set up by the answer held properly refused.—City Council of Augusta v. Owens (Ga.) 830.

It is immaterial that an illustration in the charge is inapplicable, where it is not misleading.—Mason v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 440.

Where there was no evidence that horses shipped by plaintiff were unruly, failure of the trial court to instruct that carrier was not liable for injuries occasioned by their unruly disposition was not error.—Milam v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 571.

Where a request for instruction contains an abstract proposition of law, not relevant under the pleadings, it should be refused.—Long v. Hunter (S. C.) 579.

Where the question raised by an instruction was merely speculative, it was properly refused. —Long v. Hunter (S. C.) 579.

§ 9. —— Requests or prayers.

Held not error to fail to charge on contributory negligence, there being no request for such charge, and it appearing that no such contention was made.—Southern Ry. Co. v. Hooper (Ga). 232.

Refusal of a request to instruct as to a rule of law directly bearing on contested issue is error.—Central of Georgia Ry. Co. v. Bond (Ga.) 299.

Refusal of a request sufficiently covered by the general charge is not ground for a new trial. —Gramling v. Pool (Ga.) 430.

Omission to give instruction, where no request was made, held not error.—Cooley v. Abbey (Ga.) 786.

Where requests for particular instructions are covered by the general charge, a refusal thereof was not error.—Odum v. Creighton Min. & Mill. Co. (Ga.) 947.

It is not error to refuse to give a request to charge, when not made in writing.—Atlanta Mach. Works v. Pope (Ga.) 950.

An instruction which assumes as a fact that about which the evidence is conflicting is properly refused.—Bradley v. Ohio River & C. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 181.

Requested instructions which, in so far as they are correct, are covered by the charge, are properly refused.—Bradley v. Ohio River & C. Ry. Co. (N. C.) 181.

Where plaintiff's evidence was uncontradicted, and, if true, would entitle him to recover, it was not error to refuse to instruct that, if the jury believed the evidence, they should find for defendant, and to instruct that, if they believed plaintiff's testimony, he was entitled to recover.—Cowell v. Phœnix Ins. Co. (N. C.) 184.

No error can be based on the failure of the trial court to give an instruction, where no request therefor was made.—Milam v. Southern Ry. Co. (S. C.) 571.

Where defendant objected that the facts causing an alleged special damage did not appear plainly, the objection should have been raised by motion, and not by request to charge.—Long v. Hunter (S. C.) 579.

Where the proposition contained in a request for instruction was covered in the general charge, failure to give the specific instruction was not error.—Long v. Hunter (S. C.) 579.

Where appellant presented no request for a more comprehensive charge, he cannot complain on appeal that the charge given was not cannot be taken advantage of by assigning error on charge abstractly correct.—Wood v. Collins (Ga.) 423.

§ 10. Custody, conduct, and deliberations of jury.

That the jury, in returning the verdict in an action on a note, accepted a calculation made by plaintiff's attorney, is not ground for reversal, where the verdict was for a proper amount.—Keys v. Flemister (Ga.) 948.

§ 10½. Trial by court.

Where all contested questions are submitted to jury for special findings under agreement that the judge shall enter a decree thereon, the judge should consider all material facts which are not at issue in making up the decree.—Wilkinson v. Bertock (Ga.) 623.

Held error to dismiss plaintiff's complaint in an action to set aside devises in a will, without granting defendants affirmative relief against a judgment held by plaintiffs against defendants' testator.—Cooley v. Cooley (S. C.) 563.

Under Const. 1895, art. 5, § 17, failure of court to file decision within 60 days did not invalidate it.—Griffith v. Cromley (S. C.) 738.

§ 11. Waiver and correction of irregularities and errors.

Misconduct of counsel in referring to matters not in evidence held cured by act of the court.—O'Neill Mfg. Co. v. Pruitt (Ga.) 59.

TROVER AND CONVERSION.

§ 1. Acts constituting conversion, and liability therefor.

Assignment for benefit of creditors of property intrusted to assignor for collection for pledgee held a conversion.—Holmes v. Langston (Ga.) 251; Langston v. Holmes, Id.

§ 2. Actions.

While mere possession of a chattel will give a right of action for interference therewith, such possession must be in the plaintiff's own right, and not as agent of another.—Mitchell v. Georgia & A. Ry. Co. (Ga.) 971.

A petition in the name of one, as agent, who has not possession in his own right, cannot be so amended as to proceed in the name of plaintiff for the use of the real owner.—Mitchell v. Georgia & A. Ry. Co. (Ga.) 971.

editor of an insolvent held not entitled to r usury voluntarily paid by the debtor bensolvency, where he instituted no progs for such purpose within 12 months he payment.—Gramling v. Pool (Ga.) 430.

lence held insufficient to establish defense ry in action on note.—Finney v. Equitaortg. Co. (Ga.) 461.

er of note, who induced another to sign ety in ignorance of usury, cannot set up usury as defense to trover by surety for personalty securing it, after he has paid the note and taken an assignment.—Campbell v. Morgan (Ga.) 621; Morgan v. Campbell, Id.

Purchase of note from payee held not usurious, as between maker and payee, because discount was more than maximum rate of interest.—Campbell v. Morgan (Ga.) 621; Morgan v. Campbell, Id.

Where agent of owner exacted from borrower a commission which, with interest, exceeded lawful charge, transaction was usurious, if the lender was to pay agent nothing for his services.—Clarke v. Havard (Ga.) 837.

Answer in action by national bank on note held to sufficiently allege usury as a defense.—Bates v. First Nat. Bank (Ga.) 949.

Under Code, § 3835, and Acts 1895, c. 69, payor paying his payee interest in fact usurious held entitled to have it allowed in an accounting with indorsee, though at the time he acquiesced in the amount the payee claimed, in order to get the indorsee to take the note.—Faison v. Grandy (N. C.) 276.

A referee's report that excess paid by payor of note over amount due was made up of "improper charges" and a claim for money paid payor's creditor above what was actually paid construed as a finding of usury; payor pleading usury and the excess not being otherwise explained.—Faison v. Grandy (N. C.) 276.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

See "Sales."
Specific performance of contract, see "Specific Performance."

§ 1. Requisites and validity of contract.

A vendor cannot recover on a contract for the sale of land which contains no written obligation to pay.—Davison v. West Oxford Land Co. (N. C.) 162.

§ 2. Performance of contract.

Rule for determining abatement of price, where improvements are destroyed before deed or possession given under contract of sale, determined.—Phinizy v. Guernsey (Ga.) 796.

Purchaser cannot recover for deficiency in land, where he fails to avail himself of means of information open to him before purchase, and no representation is made.—Smathers v. Gilmer (N. C.) 153.

§ 3. Rights and liabilities of parties.

Where binding contract for sale of realty has been made, and improvements are destroyed by fire before vendor conveys or vendee obtains possession, the loss is that of the vendor.—Phinizy v. Guernsey (Ga.) 796.

A vendee of land held not, as a matter of law, entitled to his vendor's muniments of title as at common law.—Kelly v. Lehigh Min. & Mfg. Co. (Va.) 511.

Under Code, c. 74, a bona fide purchaser, without notice of fraudulent intent of grantor or fraud rendering void the title of grantor, is protected.—Root-Tea-Na-Herb Co. v. Rightmire (W. Va.) 359.

§ 4. Remedies of vendor.

A vendee in an action for a balance due on a land contract cannot recover on a counterclaim for payments on the price made without his authority, where plaintiffs received the amount so paid as assignees for the benefit of creditors, and have paid it to such creditors.—Davison v. West Oxford Land Co. (N. C.) 162.

In an action for a balance due on a land contract, vendee cannot recover on a counterclaim for payments on the price made without his authority, where such payments were not made to plaintiff.—Davison v. West Oxford Land Co. (N. C.) 162.

A plea in an action on notes given for the price of land held to raise an issue as to whether the vendor was not required to deliver a bond for title on delivery of the notes.—Battery Park Bank v. Loughran (N. C.) 281.

Where a decree foreclosing a vendor's purchase-money lien was largely in excess of the judgment liens against the land, and provided for the payment thereof, the purchaser could not complain of an assignment of a note for the price by the vendor, in violation of the contract, since he is amply protected against the judgment liens.—Carper v. Marshall (Va.) 526.

A purchaser of land held entitled to have his damages, sustained by plaintiff's delay and failure to collect and apply on the indebtedness a bond assigned to him by defendant, set off against his liability for purchase price.—Carper v. Marshall (Va.) 526.

§ 5. Remedies of purchaser.

In these tables are shown the page of the South Carolina Reports where each case begins, arranged in numerical order. Opposite this is given the volume and page of the Southeastern Reporter where the case is found. By this the subscriber, finding a South Carolina case cited, without the title, by volume and page of the South Carolina Reports, can readily turn to it in the Southeastern Reporter.

In these tables is shown the page of the Virginia Reports where each case begins, arranged in numerical order. Opposite this are given the volume and page of the Southeastern Reporter where the case is found. By this the subscriber, finding a Virginia case cited, without the title, by volume and page of the Virginia Reports, can readily turn to it in the Southeastern Reporter.
